GALBA, SER. SULPĬCIUS, Roman emperor from June, A.D. 68, to January, A.D. 69. He was born near Terracina, on the 24th of December, B.C. 3. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have told him that one day he would be at the head of the Roman world, from which we must infer that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents. From his parents he inherited great wealth. He was invested with the curule offices before attaining the legitimate age. He was prætor A.D. 20, and consul 33. After his consulship he had the government of Gaul, 39, where he carried on a successful war against the Germans, and restored discipline among the troops. On the death of Caligula many of his friends urged him to seize the empire, but he preferred living in a private station. Claudius intrusted him, in 45, with the administration of Africa, which he governed with wisdom and integrity. In the reign of Nero he lived for several years in retirement, through fear of becoming the victim of the tyrant's suspicion; but in 61 Nero gave him the government of Hispania Tarraconensis, where he remained for eight years. In 68 Vindex rebelled in Gaul. About the same time Galba was informed that Nero had sent secret orders for his assassination. He therefore resolved at once to follow the example of Vindex; but he did not assume the imperial title, and professed to act only as the legate of the Roman senate and people. Shortly afterward Nero was murdered; and Galba thereupon proceeded to Rome, where he was acknowledged as emperor. But his severity and avarice soon made him unpopular with his new subjects, and especially with the soldiers. His powers had also become enfeebled by age, and he was completely under the sway of favorites, who perpetrated many enormities in his name. Perceiving the weakness of his government, he adopted Piso Licinianus, a noble young Roman, as his successor. But this only hastened his ruin. Otho, who had hoped to be adopted by Galba, formed a conspiracy among the soldiers, who rose in rebellion six days after the adoption of Piso. Galba was murdered, and Otho was proclaimed emperor.

GALĒNUS, CLAUDĬUS, commonly called GALEN, a very celebrated physician, whose works have had a longer and more extensive influence on the different branches of medical science than those of any other individual either in ancient or modern times. He was born at Pergamum in A.D. 130. His father Nicon, who was an architect and geometrician, carefully superintended his education. In his seventeenth year (146), his father, who had hitherto destined him to be a philosopher, altered his intentions, and, in consequence of a dream, chose for him the profession of medicine. He at first studied medicine in his native city. In his twentieth year (149) he lost his father, and about the same time he went to Smyrna for the purpose of studying under Pelops the physician, and Albinus the Platonic philosopher. He afterward studied at Corinth and Alexandrea. He returned to Pergamum in his twenty-ninth year (158), and was immediately appointed physician to the school of gladiators, an office which he filled with great reputation and success. In 164 he quitted his native country on account of some popular commotions, and went to Rome for the first time. Here he stayed about four years, and gained great reputation from his skill in anatomy and medicine. He returned to Pergamum in 168, but had scarcely settled there when he received a summons from the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them at Aquileia in Venetia. From Aquileia Galen followed M. Aurelius to Rome in 170. When the emperor again set out to conduct the war on the Danube, Galen with difficulty obtained permission to be left behind at Rome, alleging that such was the will of Æsculapius. Before leaving the city the emperor committed to the medical care of Galen his son Commodus, who was then nine years of age. Galen stayed at Rome some years, during which time he employed himself in lecturing, writing, and practicing with great success. He subsequently returned to Pergamum, but whether he again visited Rome is uncertain. He is said to have died in the year 200, at the age of seventy, in the reign of Septimius Severus; but it is not improbable that he lived some years longer. Galen wrote a great number of works on medical and philosophical subjects. The works still extant under the name of Galen consist of eighty-three treatises acknowledged to be genuine; nineteen whose genuineness has been doubted; forty-five undoubtedly spurious; nineteen fragments; and fifteen commentaries on different works of Hippocrates. Galen attached himself exclusively to none of the medical sects into which the profession was divided, but chose from the tenets of each what he believed to be good and true, and called those persons slaves who designated themselves as followers of Hippocrates, Praxagoras, or any other man. The best edition of his works is by Kühn, Lips., 1821–1833, 20 vols. 8vo.

GALEPSUS (Γαληψός: Γαλήψιος), a town in Macedonia, on the Toronaic Gulf.

GALÆSUS (now Galeso), a river in the south of Italy, flows into the Gulf of Tarentum through the meadows where the sheep fed whose wool was so celebrated in antiquity (dulce pellitis ovibus Galæsi flumen, Hor., Carm., ii., 6, 10).

GĂLĔUS (Γάλεος), that is, "the lizard," son of Apollo and Themisto, the daughter of the Hyperborean king Zabius. In pursuance of an oracle of the Dodonean Zeus, Galeus emigrated to Sicily, where he built a sanctuary to his father Apollo. The GALEOTÆ, a family of Sicilian soothsayers, derived their origin from him. The principal seat of the Galeotæ was the town of Hybla, which was hence called GALEOTIS or GALEATIS.

GALILÆA (Γαλιλαία), at the birth of Christ, was the northernmost of the three divisions of Palestine west of the Jordan. It lay between the Jordan and the Mediterranean on the east and west, and the mountains of Hermon and Carmel on the north and south. It was divided into Upper or North Galilee, and Lower or South Galilee. It was very fertile and densely peopled; but its inhabitants were a mixed race of Jews, Syrians, Phœnicians, Greeks, and others, and were therefore despised by the Jews of Judæa. Vid. PALÆSTINA.

GALINTHĬAS or GALANTHIS (Ov., Met., ix., 306), daughter of Prœtus of Thebes and a friend of Alcmene. When Alcmene was on the point of giving birth to Hercules, and the Mœræ and Ilithyiæ, at the request of Juno (Hera), were endeavoring to delay the birth, Galinthias suddenly rushed in with the false report that Alcmene had given birth to a son. The hostile goddesses were so surprised at this information that they dropped their arms. Thus the charm was broken, and Alcmene was enabled to give birth to Hercules. The deluded goddesses avenged the deception practiced upon them by metamorphosing Galinthias into a weasel or cat (γαλῆ). Hecate, however, took pity upon her, and made her her attendant, and Hercules afterward erected a sanctuary to her. At Thebes it was customary at the festival of Hercules first to offer sacrifices to Galinthias.

GALLA. 1. Wife of Constantius, son of the Emperor Constantius Chlorus. She was the mother of Gallus Cæsar. Vid. GALLUS.—2. Daughter of the Emperor Valentinian I., and second wife of Theodosius the Great.—3. GALLA PLACIDIA, or simply PLACIDIA, daughter of Theodosius the Great by No. 2. She fell into the hands of Alaric when he took Rome, A.D. 410; and Ataulphus, the Gothic king, married her in 414. After the death of Ataulphus she was restored to Honorius; and in 417 she was married to Constantius, to whom she bore the Emperor Valentinian III. During the minority of the latter she governed the Western empire. She died about 450.

GALLÆCĬA, the country of the GALLÆCI (Καλλαϊκοί), in the north of Spain, between the Astures and the Durius, was in earlier times included in Lusitania. Gallæcia was sometimes used in a wider sense to include the country of the Astures and the Cantabri. It produced tin, gold, and a precious stone called gemma Gallaica. Its inhabitants were some of the most uncivilized in Spain. They were defeated with great slaughter by D. Brutus, consul B.C. 138, who obtained in consequence the surname of Gallæcus.

GALLĬA (ἡ Κελτική, Γαλατία), was used before the time of Julius Cæsar to indicate all the land inhabited by the Galli or Celtæ, and consequently included not only the later Gaul and the north of Italy, but a part of Spain, greater part of Germany, the British isles, other countries. The early history of the Celtic race, and their various settlements in different parts of Europe, are related under CELTÆ. GALLĬA, also called GALLĬA TRANSALPĪNA, GALLĬA ULTERĬOR, to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina, or the north of Italy. GALLĬA BRACCĀTA and GALLĬA COMĀTA are also used in contradistinction to Gallia Togata or the north of Italy, but these names are not identical with the whole of Gallia Transalpina. Gallia Braccata was the part of the country first subdued by the Romans, the later Provincia, and was so called because the inhabitants wore braccæ or trowsers. Gallia Comata was the remainder of the country, excluding Gallia Braccata, and derived its name from the inhabitants wearing their hair long. The Romans were acquainted with only a small portion of Transalpine Gaul till the time of Cæsar. In the time of Augustus it was bounded on the south by the Pyrenees and the Mediterranean; on the east by the River Varus and the Alps, which separated it from Italy, and by the River Rhine, which separated it from Germany; on the north by the German Ocean and the English Channel; and on the west by the Atlantic; thus including not only the whole of France and Belgium, but a part of Holland, a great part of Switzerland, and all the provinces of Germany west of the Rhine. The greater part of this country is a plain, well watered by numerous rivers. The principal mountains were MONS CEBENNA or Gebenna in the south; the lofty range of MONS JURA in the east, separating the Sequani and the Helvetii; MONS VOSEGUS or Vogesus, a continuation of the Jura. The chief forest was the Silva ARDUENNA, extending from the Rhine and the Treviri as far as the Scheldt. The principal rivers were, in the east and north, the RHENUS (now Rhine), with its tributaries the MOSA (now Maas) and MOSELLA (now Moselle); the SEQUANA (now Seine), with its tributary the MATRONA: in the centre the LIGERIS (now Loire); in the west, the GARUMNA (now Garonne); and in the south the RHODANUS (now Rhone). The country was celebrated for its fertility in ancient times, and possessed a numerous and warlike population. The Greeks, at a very early period, became acquainted with the southern coast of Gaul, where they founded, in B.C. 600, the important town of MASSILIA, which in its turn founded several colonies, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the neighboring districts. The Romans did not attempt to make any conquests in Transalpine Gaul till they had finally conquered not only Africa, but Greece and a great part of Western Asia. In B.C. 125 the consul M. Fulvius Flaccus commenced the subjugation of the Salluvii in the south of Gaul. In the next three years (124-122) the Salluvii were completely subdued by Sextius Calvinus, and the colony of Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix) was founded in their country. In 121 the Allobroges were defeated by the proconsul Domitius Ahenobarbus; and in the same year Q. Fabius Maximus gained a great victory over the united forces of the Allobroges and Arverni, at the confluence of the Isara and the Rhone. The south of Gaul was now mad a Roman province · and in 118 was founded the colony of Narbo Martius (now Narbonne,) which was the chief town of the province. In Cæsar's Commentaries the Roman province is called simply Provincia, in contradistinction to the rest of the country: hence comes the modern name of Provence. The rest of the country was subdued by Cæsar after a struggle of several years (58–50.) At this time Gaul was divided into three parts, Aquitania, Celtica, and Belgica, according to the three different races by which it was inhabited. The Aquitani dwelt in the southwest, between the Pyrenees and the Garumna; the Celtæ, or Galli proper, in the centre and west, between the Garumna and the Sequana and the Matrona; and the Belgæ in the northeast, between the two last-mentioned rivers and the Rhine. The different tribes inhabiting Aquitania and Belgica are given elsewhere. Vid. AQUITANIA, BELGÆ. The most important tribes of the Celtæ or Galli were, 1. Between the Sequana and the Liger: the ARMORICI, the name of all the tribes dwelling on the coast between the mouths of these two rivers; the AULERCI, dwelling inland close to the Armorici; the NAMNETES, ANDECAVI or ANDES, on the banks of the Liger; east of them the CARNUTES; and on the Sequana, the PARISII, SENONES, and TRICASSES.—2. Between the Liger and the Garumna: on the coast the PICTONES and SANTONES; inland the TURONES, probably on both sides of the Liger, the BITURIGES CUBI, LEMOVICES, PETROCORII, and CADURCI; east of these, in the mountains of Cebenna, the powerful ARVERNI (in the modern Auvergne); and south of them the RUTENI.—3. On the Rhone and in the surrounding country: between the Rhone and the Pyrenees, the VOLCÆ; between the Rhone and the Alps, the SALYES or SALLUVII; north of them the CAVARES; between the Rhone, the Isara, and the Alps, the ALLOBROGES; and further north the ÆDUI, SEQUANI, and HELVETII, three of the most powerful people in all Gaul. Augustus divided Gaul into four provinces: 1. Gallia Narbonensis, the same as the old Provincia. 2. G. Aquitanica, which extended from the Pyrenees to the Liger. 3. G. Lugdunensis, the country between the Liger, the Sequana and the Arar, so called from the colony of Lugdunum (now Lyon), founded by Munatius Plancus. 4. G. Belgica, the country between the Sequana, the Arar, and the Rhine. Shortly afterward the portion of Belgica bordering on the Rhine, and inhabited by German tribes, was subdivided into two new provinces, called Germania Prima and Secunda, or Germania Superior and Inferior. At a later time the provinces of Gaul were still further subdivided, till at length, under the Emperor Gratian, they reached the number of seventeen. Gallia Narbonensis belonged to the senate, and was governed by a proconsul; the other provinces belonged to the emperor, and were governed by imperial legati. After the time of Claudius, when a formidable insurrection of the Gauls was suppressed, the country became more and more Romanized. The Latin language gradually became the language of the inhabitants, and Roman civilization took deep root in all parts of the country. The rhetoricians and poets of Gaul occupy a distinguished place in the later history of Roman literature and Burdigala, Narbo, Lugdunum, and other towns, possessed schools, in which literature and philosophy were cultivated with success. On the dissolution of the Roman empire, Gaul, like the other Roman provinces, was overrun by barbarians, and the greater part of it finally became subject to the Franci or Franks, under their king Clovis, about A.D. 496.—2. GALLIA CISALPĪNA, also called G. CITERĬOR and G. TOGĀTA, a Roman province in the north of Italy, was bounded on the west by Liguria and Gallia Narbonensis (from which it was separated by the Alps), on the north by Rætia and Noricum, on the east by the Adriatic and Venetia (from which it was separated by the Athesis), and on the south by Etruria and Umbria (from which it was separated by the River Rubico). It was divided by the Po into GALLIA TRANSPADĀNA, also called ITALIA TRANSPADĀNA, in the north, and GALLIA CISPADĀNA in the south. The greater part of the country is a vast plain, drained by the PADUS (now Po) and its affluents, and has always been one of the most fertile countries of Europe. It was originally inhabited by Ligurians, Umbrians, Etruscans, and other races; but its fertility attracted the Gauls, who at different periods crossed the Alps, and settled in the country, after expelling the original inhabitants. We have mention of five distinct immigrations of Gauls into the north of Italy. The first was in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, and is said to have been led by Bellovesus, who settled with his followers in the country of the Insubres, and built Milan. The second consisted of the Cenomani, who settled in the neighborhood of Brixia and Verona. The third of the Salluvii, who pressed forward as far as the Ticinus. The fourth of the Boii and Lingones, who crossed the Po, and took possession of the country as far as the Apennines, driving out the Etruscans and Umbrians. The fifth immigration was the most important, consisting of the warlike race of the Senones, who invaded Italy in immense numbers, under the command of Brennus, and took Rome in B.C. 390. Part of them subsequently recrossed the Alps and returned home; but a great number of them remained in the north of Italy, and were for more than a century a source of terror to the Romans. After the first Punic war the Romans resolved to make a vigorous effort to subdue their dangerous neighbors. In the course of four years (225–222) the whole country was conquered, and upon the conclusion of the war (222) was reduced to the form of a Roman province. The inhabitants, however, did not bear the yoke patiently, and it was not till after the final defeat of the Boii, in 191, that the country became submissive to the Romans. The most important tribes were: In Gallia Transpadana, in the direction of west to east, the TAURINI, SALASSI, LIBICI, INSUBRES, CENOMANI: in G. Cispadana, in the same direction, the BOII, LINGONES, SENONES.

GALLIĒNUS, with his full name, P. LICINIUS VALERIANUS EGNATIUS GALLIENUS, Roman emperor A.D. 260–268. He succeeded his father Valerian when the latter was taken prisoner by the Persians in 260, but he had previously reigned in conjunction with his father from his accession in 258. Gallienus was indolent, profligate, and indifferent to the public welfare, and his reign was one of the most ignoble and disastrous in the history of Rome. The barbarians ravaged the fairest portion of the empire, and the inhabitants were swept away by one of the most frightful plagues recorded in history. This pestilence followed a long-protracted famine. When it was at its greatest height, five thousand sick are said to have perished daily at Rome; and, after the scourge had passed away, it was found that the inhabitants of Alexandrea were diminished by nearly two thirds. The complete dissolution of the empire was averted mainly by a series of internal rebellions. In every district able officers sprang up, who asserted and strove to maintain the dignity of independent princes. The armies levied by these usurpers, who are commonly distinguished as The Thirty Tyrants, in many cases arrested the progress of the invaders, and restored order in the provinces which they governed. Gallienus was at length slain by his own soldiers in 268, while besieging Milan, in which the usurper Aureolus had taken refuge.

GALLINĀRĬA. 1. (Now Galinara), an island off the coast of Liguria, celebrated for its number of hens; whence its name.—2. SILVA, a forest of pine-trees near Cumæ in Campania.

GALLĬO, JŪNĬUS. 1. A Roman rhetorician, and a friend of M. Annæus Seneca, the rhetorician, whose son he adopted. He was put to death by Nero. In early life he had been a friend of Ovid (Ex Pont., iv., 11.)—2. Son of the rhetorician M. Annæus Seneca, and an elder brother of the philosopher Seneca, was adopted by No. 1.

GALLĬUS, Q., was a candidate for the prætorship in B.C. 64, and was accused of ambitus or bribery by M. Calidius. He was defended on that occasion by Cicero in an oration of which a few fragments have come down to us. He was prætor urbanus B.C. 63, and presided at the trial of C. Cornelius. He left two sons, Q. GALLIUS, who was prætor in 43, and was put to death by the triumvirs; and M. GALLIUS, who is mentioned as one of Antony's partisans, in 43.

GALLOGRÆCĬA. Vid. GALATIA.

GALLŌNĬUS, a public crier at Rome, probably contemporary with the younger Scipio, whose wealth and gluttony passed into the proverb "to live like Gallonius." He was satirized by Horace (Sat., ii., 2, 46).

GALLUS, ÆLĬUS. 1. A jurist, contemporary with Cicero and Varro, though probably rather older than either. He was the author of a treatise, De Verborum, quæ ad Jus Civile pertinent, Significatione, which is frequently cited by the grammarians.—2. An intimate friend of the geographer Strabo, was præfect of Egypt in the reign of Augustus. In B.C. 24 he invaded Arabia, and after his army had suffered dreadfully from the heat and want of water, he was obliged to retreat with great loss.

GALLUS, L. ANĬCĬUS, prætor B.C. 168, conducted the war against Gentius, king of the Illyrians, whom he compelled to submit to the Romans.

GALLUS, C. AQUILLĬUS, a distinguished Roman jurist, was a pupil of Q. Mucius Scævola, and the instructor of Serv. Sulpicius. He was prætor along with Cicero B.C. 66. He is often cited by the jurists in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from his own works in the Digest.

GALLUS SALONĪNUS, L. ASĬNĬUS, son of Asinius Pollio, was consul B.C. 8. He was hated by Tiberius because he had married Vipsania, the former wife of Tiberius. In A.D. 30 Tiberius got the senate to sentence him to die, and kept him imprisoned for three years on a most scanty supply of food. He died in prison of starvation, but whether his death was compulsory or voluntary is unknown. Gallus wrote a work, entitled De Comparatione patris ac Ciceronis, which was unfavorable to the latter, and against which the Emperor Claudius wrote a defence of Cicero.

GALLUS, L. CANĬNĬUS, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 56, when he supported the views of Pompey. During the civil war he appears to have remained neutral. He died in 44.

GALLUS, CESTIUS, governor of Syria (legatus A.D. 64, 65), under whom the Jews broke out into the rebellion which ended in the destruction of their city and temple by Titus.

GALLUS, CONSTANTĬUS, son of Julius Constantius and Galla, grandson of Constantine Chlorus, nephew of Constantine the Great, and elder brother, by a different mother, of Julian the Apostate. In A.D. 351 he was named Cæsar by Constantius II., and was left in the command of the East, where he conducted himself with the greatest haughtiness and cruelty. In 354 he went to the West to meet Constantius at Milan, but was arrested at Petovio in Pannonia, and sent to Pola in Istria, where he was beheaded in a prison.

GALLUS, C. CORNĒLĬUS, was born at Forum Julii (now Frejus) in Gaul, of poor parents, about B.C. 66. He went to Italy at an early age, and began his career as a poet when he was about twenty. He had already attained considerable distinction at the time of Cæsar's death, 44; and upon the arrival of Octavianus in Italy after that event, Gallus embraced his party, and soon acquired great influence with him. In 41 he was one of the triumviri appointed by Octavianus to distribute lands in the north of Italy among his veterans, and on that occasion he afforded protection to the inhabitants of Mantua and to Virgil. He afterward accompanied Octavianus to the battle of Actium, 31, and commanded a detachment of the army. After the battle, Gallus was sent with the army to Egypt, in pursuit of Antony; and when Egypt was made a Roman province, Octavianus appointed Gallus the first prefect of the province. He remained in Egypt for nearly four years; but he incurred at length the enmity of Octavianus, though the exact nature of his offence is uncertain. According to some accounts, he spoke of the emperor in an offensive and insulting manner; he erected numerous statues of himself in Egypt, and had his own exploits inscribed on the pyramids. The senate deprived him of his estates, and sent him into exile; whereupon he put an end to his life by throwing himself upon his own sword, B.C. 26. The intimate friendship existing between Gallus and the most eminent men of the time as Asinius Pollio, Virgil, Varus, and Ovid, and the high praise they bestow upon him prove that he was a man of great intellectual powers and acquirements. Ovid (Trist., iv., 10, 5) assigns to him the first place among the Roman elegiac poets; and we know that he wrote a collection of elegies in four books, the principal subject of which was his love of Lycoris. But all his productions have perished; for the four epigrams in the Latin Anthology attributed to Gallus could not have been written by a contemporary of Augustus. Gallus translated into Latin the poems of Euphorion of Chalcis, but this translation is also lost. Some critics attribute to him the poem Ciris, usually printed among the works of Virgil, but the arguments do not appear satisfactory.

Gallus, Sulpĭcius, a distinguished orator, was prætor B.C. 169, and consul 166, when he fought against the Ligurians. In 168 he served as tribune of the soldiers under Æmilius Paulus in Macedonia, and during this campaign predicted an eclipse of the moon.

Gallus, Trebonĭānus, Roman emperor A.D. 251–254. His full name was C. Vibius Trebonianus Gallus. He served under Decius in the campaigns against the Goths, 251, and he is said to have contributed by his treachery to the disastrous issue of the battle, which proved fatal to Decius and his son Herennius. Gallus was thereupon elected emperor, and Hostilianus, the surviving son of Decius, was nominated his colleague. He purchased a peace of the Goths by allowing them to retain their plunder, and promising them a fixed annual tribute. In 253 the Goths again invaded the Roman dominions, but they were driven back by Æmilianus, whose troops proclaimed him emperor in Mœsia. Æmilianus thereupon marched into Italy; and Gallus was put to death by his own soldiers, together with his son Volusianus, before any collision had taken place between the opposing armies. The name of Gallus is associated with nothing but cowardice and dishonor. In addition to the misery produced by the inroads of the barbarians during this reign, a deadly pestilence broke out 252, and continued its ravages over every part of the empire for fifteen years.

Gallus. 1. A river in Bithynia, rising near Modra, on the borders of Phrygia, and falling into the Sangarius near Leucæ (now Lefkeh).—2. A river in Galatia, which also fell into the Sangarius near Pessinus. From it the priests of Cybele are said to have obtained their name of Galli.

Gamēlĭi (γαμήλιοι θεοί), that is, the divinities protecting and presiding over marriage. These divinities are usually regarded as the protectors of marriage. Respecting the festival of the Gamelia, vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

Gandăræ (Γανδάραι), an Indian people in the Paropamisus, on the northwest of the Punjab, between the rivers Indus and Suastus. Under Xerxes they were subjects of the Persian empire. Their country was called Gandarĭtis (Γανδαρῖτις).

Gandarĭdæ or Gandarītæ (Γανδαρίδαι, Γανδαρῖται), an Indian people, in the middle of the Punjab, between the rivers Acesines (now Chenab) and Hydraotes (now Ravee), whose king, at the time of Alexander's invasion, was a cousin and namesake of the celebrated Porus. Whether they were different from the Gandaræ is uncertain. Sanscrit writers mention the Ghandára in the centre of the Punjab.

Gangărĭdæ (Γαγγαρίδαι), an Indian people about the mouths of the Ganges.

Ganges (Γάγγης: now Ganges or Gunga), the greatest river of India, which it divided into the two parts named by the ancients India intra Gangem (now Hindustan) and India extra Gangem (now Burmah, Cochin China, Siam, and the Malay Peninsula). It rises in the highest part of the Emodi Montes (now Himalaya) and flows in a general southeastern direction till it falls by several mouths into the head of the Gangeticus Sinus (now Bay of Bengal). Like the Nile, it overflows its banks periodically, and these inundations render its valley the most fertile part of India. The knowledge of the ancients respecting it was very imperfect, and they give very various accounts of its source, its size, and the number of its mouths. The breadth which Diodorus Siculus assigns to it in the lower part of its course, thirty-two stadia, or about three miles, is perfectly correct. The following rivers are mentioned as its tributaries: Cainas, Jomanes or Diamunas, Sarabus, Condochates, Œdanes, Cosoagus or Cossoanus, Erannoboas, Sonus or Soas, Sittocestis, Solomatis, Sambus, Magon, Agoranis, Omalis, Commenases, Cacuthis, Andomatis, Amystis, Oxymagis, and Errhenysis. The name is also applied to a city in the interior of India, on the Ganges, where it makes its great bend to the eastward, perhaps Allahabad.

Gangra (Γάγγρα: now Kankari), a city of Paphlagonia, near the confines of Galatia, was originally a fortress; in the time of King Deiotarus, a royal residence; and under the later emperors, the capital of Paphlagonia.

Ganos (Γάνος), a fortress in Thrace, on the Propontis.

Ganȳmēdes (Γανυμήδης), son of Tros and Callirrhoë, and brother of Ilus and Assaracus, was the most beautiful of all mortals, and was carried off by the gods that he might fill the cup of Jupiter (Zeus), and live among the eternal gods. This is the Homeric account; but other traditions give different details. Some call him son of Laomedon, others son of Ilus, and others, again, of Erichthonius or Assaracus. The manner in which he was carried away from the earth is likewise differently described; for while Homer mentions the gods in general, later writers state that Jupiter (Zeus) himself carried him off, either in his natural shape, or in the form of an eagle, or by means of his eagle. There is, further, no agreement as to the place where the event occurred; though later writers usually represent him as carried off from Mount Ida (captus ab Ida, Hor., Carm., iv., 4). The early legend simply states that Ganymedes was carried off that he might be the cup-bearer of Jupiter (Zeus), in which office he was conceived to have succeeded Hebe; but later writers describe him as the beloved and favorite of Jupiter (Zeus), without allusion to his office. Jupiter (Zeus) compensated the father for his loss by a pair of divine horses. Astronomers have placed Ganymedes among the stars under the name of Aquarius. The Romans called him by a corrup form of his name, CATAMITUS.

GĂRĂMA. Vid. GARAMANTES.

GĂRĂMANTES (Γαράμαντες), the southernmost people known to the ancients in Northern Africa, dwelt far south of the Great Syrtis, in the region called Phazania (now Fezzan), where they had a capital city, Gărămă (Γάραμα: now Mourzouk, latitude 25° 53′ north, longitude 14° 10′ east). They are mentioned by Herodotus as a weak, unwarlike people; he places them nineteen days' journey from Æthiopia and the shores of the Indian Ocean, fifteen days' journey from Ammonium, and thirty days' journey from Egypt. The Romans obtained fresh knowledge of them by the expedition of Cornelius Balbus into their country in B.C. 43.

[GĂRĂMAS (Γαράμας), son of Apollo and Acacallis (daughter of Minos), from whom the Garamantes were fabled to have derived their name.]

GARGĀNUS MONS (now Monte Gargano), a mountain and promontory in Apulia, on which were oak forests (querceta Gargani, Hor., Carm., ii., 9, 7).

[GARGAPHIA (Γαργαφία), a fountain in a valley near Platææ in Bœotia; in the second Persian war Mardonius caused its waters to be poisoned in order to destroy the Greeks who had encamped in its vicinity.]

GARGĂRA, -ON or -US Γάργαρα, ον, ος: Γαργαρεύς). 1. (Now Kaz-Dagh), the southern summit of Mount Ida, in the Troad.—2. A city at the foot of Mount Ida, on the shore of the Gulf f Adramyttium, between Assus and Antandrus; aid to have been founded originally on the summit of the mountain by the Leleges; afterward colonized from Miletus; and removed to the lower site on account of the inclemency of its situation on the mountain. Its neighborhood was rich in corn.

GARGETTUS (Γαργηττός: Γαργήττιος) a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeis, on the northwestern slope of Mount Hymettus; the birth-place of the philosopher Epicurus.

GARĪTES, a people in Aquitania, neighbors of the Ausci, in the modern Comté de Gauve.

GAROCĔLI, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, near Mount Cenis, in the neighborhood of St. Jean de Maurienne.

GARSĂURĬA or -ĪTIS (Γαρσαουρία or -ῖτις), a præfectura in Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia and Tyanitis. Its chief town was called Γαρσάουρα.

GARŬLI, a people of Liguria in the Apennines.

GARUMNA (now Garonne), one of the chief rivers of Gaul, rises in the Pyrenees, flows northwest through Aquitania, and becomes a bay of the sea below Burdigala (now Bordeaux).

GARUMNI, a people in Aquitania, on the Garumna.

GATHĒÆ (Γαθέαι), a town in Arcadia, on the GATHEĀTAS, a river which flows into Alphēus, west-southwest of Megalopolis.

[GAUDA, a Numidian, son of Mastanabal, half brother to Jugurtha, had been named by his uncle Micipsa as heir to the kingdom should Adherbal, Hiempsal, and Jugurtha die without issue.]

[GAUDOS. Vid. GAULOS.]

GAUGĂMĒLA (τὰ Γαυγάμηλα: now Karmelis), a village in the district of At.ria in Assy.. scene of the last and decisive battle between . ander and Darius Codomannus, B.C. 331, com ly called the battle of ARBELA.

GAULANĪTIS (Γαυλα- or -ονῖτις: now Ja a district in the north of Palestine, on the ern side of the Lake of Tiberias, as far so the River Hieromax, named from the to Golan (Γαύλανα).

GAULOS (Γαῦλος: Γαυλίτης: now Gozzo) An island in the Sicilian Sea, near Melite (Malta).—[2. Or GAUDOS, an island opposite rapytna in Crete, supposed by some to be island of Calypso.]

GAURELĔON, GAURĬON. Vid. ANDROS.

GAURUS MONS, GAURANUS or -NI M. (Monte Gauro), a volcanic range of mountai Campania, between Cumæ and Neapolis, in neighborhood of Puteoli, which produced g wine, and was memorable for the defeat of Samnites by M. Valerius Corvus, B.C. 343.

[GAVIUS, P., a citizen of Cosa, arrested by V res, and crucified at the city of Messana in Si although this punishment was permitted only the case of slaves; the account of his death is of the most eloquent passages in the Verrine o tions of Cicero.]

GAZA (Γάζα). 1. (Now Ghuzzeh), the last c on the southwestern frontier of Palestine, a the key of the country on the side of Egy stood on an eminence about two miles from sea, and was, from the very earliest times which we have any record, very strongly fo fied. It was one of the five cities of the Phili tines; and, though taken from them more th once by the Jews, was each time recovere It was taken by Cyrus the Great, and remaine in the hands of the Persians till the time of Al exander, who only gained possession of it afte an obstinate defence of several months. I B.C. 315 it fell into the power of Ptolemy, th son of Lagus, as the result of his victory ove Demetrius before the city, and was destroyed by him. But it again recovered, and was pos sessed alternately by the kings of Syria and Egypt, during their prolonged wars, and after ward by the Asmonæan princes of Judæa, one of whom, Alexander Jannæus, again destroyed it, B.C. 96. It was rebuilt by Gabinius; given by Augustus to Herod the Great; and, after Herod's death, united to the Roman province of Syria. In A.D. 65 it was again destroyed in an insurrection of its Jewish inhabitants; but it recovered once more, and remained a flourish ing city till it fell into the hands of the Arabs in A.D. 634. In addition to its importance as a military post, it possessed an extensive commerce, carried on through its port, Majuma or CONSTANTIA.—2. (Now Ghaz), a city in the Persian province of Sogdiana, between Alexandrea and Cyropolis; one of the seven cities which rebelled against Alexander in B.C. 328.

GĂZĂCA (Γάζακα: now Tabreez), a city in the north of Media Atropatene, equidistant from Artaxata and Ecbatana, was a summer residence of the kings of Media.

GAZIŪRA (Γαζίουρα), a city in Pontus Galaticus, on the River Iris, below Amasia, was the ancient residence of the kings of Pontus; but in Strabo's time it had fallen to decay.

[GE (Γῆ). Vid. GÆA.]

GĕBĀLĒNE (Γεβαληνή), the district of Arabia Petræa around the city of Petra.

GEBENNA MONS. Vid. CEBENNA.

GEDRŌSĬA (Γεδρωσία and Γαδρωσία: southeastern part of Beloochistan), the furthest province of the Persian empire on the southeast, and one of the subdivisions of ARIANA, was bounded on the west by Carmania, on the north by Drangiana and Arachosia, on the east by India (or, as the country about the lower course of the Indus was called, Indo-Scythia), and on the south by the Mare Erythræum, or Indian Ocean. It is formed by a succession of sandy steppes, rising from the sea-coast toward the table-land of Ariana, and produced little besides aromatic shrubs. The slip of land between the coast and the lowest mountain range is watered by several rivers, the chief of which was called Arabis (now Doosee?); but even this district is for the most part only a series of salt marshes. Gedrosia is known in history chiefly through the distress suffered for want of water, in passing through it, by the armies of Cyrus and of Alexander. The inhabitants were divided by the Greek writers into two races, the Ichthyophagi on the sea-coast, and the Gedrosi in the interior. The latter were a wild nomade people, whom even Alexander was only able to reduce to a temporary subjection. The whole country was divided into eight districts. Its chief cities were Rhambacia and Pura, or Parsis.

GEGANĬA GENS, traced its origin to the mythical Gyas, one of the companions of Æneas. It was one of the most distinguished Alban houses, transplanted to Rome on the destruction of Alba by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled among the Roman patricians. There appears to have been only one family in this gens, that of Macerinus, many members of which filled the highest offices in the state in the early times of the republic.

GELA (ἡ Γέλα, Ion. Γέλη: Γελῷος, Gelensis: ruins at Terra Nuova), a city on the southern coast of Sicily, on a river of the same name (now Fiume di Terra Nuova), founded by Rhodians from Lindos, and by Cretans, B.C. 690. It soon obtained great power and wealth; and in 582 it founded Agrigentum, which, however, became more powerful than the mother city. Like the other cities of Sicily, it was subject to tyrants, of whom the most important were HIPPOCRATES, GELON, and HIERON. Gelon transported half of its inhabitants to Syracuse; the place gradually fell into decay, and in the time of Augustus was no longer inhabited. The poet Æschylus died here. North of Gela were the celebrated Campi Gelōi, which produced rich crops of wheat.

GELÆ. Vid. CADUSII.

GELĀNOR (Γελάνωρ), king of Argos, was expelled by Danaus.

[GELBIS (now Kyll), a small river of Gallia Belgica, which empties into the Mosella (now Moselle).]

GELDŬBA (now Gelb, below Cologne), a fortified place of the Ubii, on the Rhine, in Lower Germany.

GELLĬA GENS, plebeian, was of Samnite origin, and afterward settled at Rome. There were two generals of this name in the Samnite wars, Gellius Statius in the second Samnite war, who was defeated and taken prisoner B.C. 305, and Gellius Egnatius in the third Samnite war. Vid. EGNATIUS. The chief family of the Gellii at Rome bore the name of PUBLICOLA.

GELLĬUS. 1. CN., a contemporary of the Gracchi, the author of a history of Rome from the earliest epoch down to B.C. 145 at least. The work is lost, but it is frequently quoted by later writers.—2. AULUS, a Latin grammarian of good family, was probably a native of Rome. He studied rhetoric under T. Castricius and Sulpicius Apollinaris, philosophy under Calvisius Taurus and Peregrinus Proteus, and enjoyed also the friendship and instructions of Favorinus, Herodes Atticus, and Cornelius Fronto. While yet a youth, he was appointed by the prætor to act as umpire in civil causes. The precise date of his birth and death is unknown; but he must have lived under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 117–180. He wrote a work entitled Noctes Atticæ, because it was composed in a country house near Athens during the long nights of winter. It is a sort of miscellany, containing numerous extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on a variety of topics connected with history, antiquities, philosophy, and philology, interspersed with original remarks, the whole thrown together into twenty books, without any attempt at order or arrangement. The eighth book is entirely lost with the exception of the index. The best editions are by Jac. Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1706 (reprinted by Conradi, Lips., 1762), and by Lion, Gotting., 1824.—3. PUBLĬCĬUS, a jurist, one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius.

GELON (Γέλων). 1. Son of Dinomenes, tyrant of Gela, and afterward of Syracuse, was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Gela. He held the chief command of the cavalry in the service of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, shortly after whose death he obtained the supreme power, B.C. 491. In 485 he availed himself of the internal dissensions of Syracuse to make himself master of this city also. From this time he neglected Gela, and bent all his efforts to the aggrandizement of Syracuse, to which place he removed many of the inhabitants of the other cities of Sicily. In 480 he gained a brilliant victory at Himera over the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily with an army, amounting, it is said, to the incredible number of three hundred thousand men. Scarcely any of this vast host survived to carry the news to Carthage. The victory is said to have been gained on the very same day as that of Salamis. He died in 478 of a dropsy, after reigning seven years at Syracuse. He was succeeded by his brother HIERON. He is represented as a man of singular leniency and moderation, and as seeking in every way to promote the welfare of his subjects; and his name even appears to have become almost proverbial as an instance of a good monarch. A splendid tomb was erected to him by the Syracusans at the public expense, and heroic honors were decreed to his memory.—2. Son of Hieron II., king of Syracuse, who died before his father, at the age of more than fifty years. He received the title of king in the lifetime of his father.

GĔLŌNI (Γελωνοί), a Scythian people, who dwelt in Sarmatia Asiatica, to the east of the River Tanaïs (now Don). They were said to have been of Greek origin, and to have migrated from the shores of the Euxine; but they intermixed with the Scythians so as to lose all traces of their Hellenic race. Their chief city was called Gelonus (Γελωνός).

[GELŌNUS (Γελωνός). 1. Son of Hercules, and brother of Agathyrsus, said to have given name to the Geloni.—2. (ἡ Γελωνός). Vid. GELONI.]

GEMĪNUS (Γεμῖνος), an astronomer, was a native of Rhodes, and flourished about B.C. 77. He is the author of an extant work, entitled Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὰ Φαινόμενα, which is a descriptive treatise on elementary astronomy, with a great deal of historical allusion. It is printed in the Uranologion of Petavius, Paris, 1630, and in Halma's edition of Ptolemy, Paris, 1819.

GEMĪNUS, SERVĪLIUS. 1. P., twice consul with C. Aurelius Cotta in the first Punic war, namely, in B.C. 252 and 248. In both years he carried on war against the Carthaginians.—2. CN., son of No. 1, was consul 217 with C. Flaminius, in the second Punic war, and ravaged the coast of Africa. He fell in the battle of Cannæ, 216.—3. M., also surnamed PULEX, consul 202 with Tib. Claudius Nero, obtained Etruria for his province. He is mentioned on several occasions subsequently.

GEMONIÆ (scalæ) or GEMONII (gradus), a flight of steps cut out of the Aventine, down which the bodies of the criminals strangled in the prisons were dragged, and afterward thrown into the Tiber.

GENĂBUM or CENĂBUM (now Orleans), a town in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the northern bank of the Ligeris, was the chief town of the Carnutes; it was plundered and burnt by Cæsar, but subsequently rebuilt. In later times it was called Civitas Aurelianorum or Aurelianensis Urbs, whence its modern name.

GENAUNI, a people in Vindelicia, the inhabitants of the Alpine valley, now called Valle di Non, were subdued by Drusus. (Hor., Carm., iv., 14, 10).

GENESĬUS, JOSĒPHUS, lived about A.D. 940, and wrote in four books a history of the Byzantine emperors, from A.D. 813 to 886, consequently of the reigns of Leo V., Michael II., Theophilus, Michael III., and Basil I. Edited by Lachmann, Bonn, 1834.

GENETÆUS (Γενηταῖος), a surname of Jupiter (Zeus,) from Cape Genetus on the Euxine, where he was worshipped as εὔξεινος, i. e., "the hospitable."

GENETYLLIS (Γενετυλλίς), the protectress of births, occurs both as a surname of Venus (Aphrodite), and as a distinct divinity and a companion of Venus (Aphrodite). We also find the plural Γενετυλλίδες or Γενναΐδες, as a class of divinities presiding over generation and birth, and as companions of Venus (Aphrodite) Colias.

GĔNĔVA or GENĀVA (Genevensis: now Geneva,) the last town of the Allobroges, on the frontiers of the Helvetii, was situated on the southern bank of the Rhone, at the spot where the river flowed out of the Lacus Lemannus. There was a bridge here over the Rhone.

GĔNĬTRIX, that is, "the mother," is used by Ovid (Met., xiv., 536) as a surname of Cybele, in the place of mater, or magna mater; but it is better known as a surname of Venus, to w[hom] Cæsar dedicated a temple at Rome as [the] mother of the Julia Gens.

GENĬUS, a protecting spirit, analogous to [the] guardian angels invoked by the Church of R[ome]. The belief in such spirits existed both in Gr[eece] and at Rome. The Greeks called them δα[ίμονες], Dæmons, and appear to have believed in th[em] from the earliest times, though Homer does [not] mention them. Hesiod says that the Dæm[ons] were thirty thousand in number, and that th[ey] dwelled on earth unseen by mortals, as the m[in]isters of Jupiter (Zeus), and as the guardians [of] men and of justice. He further conceives th[em] to be the souls of righteous men who lived [in] the Golden Age of the world. The Greek p[hi]losophers took up this idea, and developed [a] complete theory of dæmons. Thus we read [in] Plato that dæmons are assigned to men at t[he] moment of their birth, that they accompa[ny] men through life, and after death conduct th[eir] souls to Hades. Pindar, in several passag[es], speaks of γενέθλιος δαίμων, that is, the spi[rit] watching over the fate of man from the ho[ur] of his birth. The dæmons are further describ[ed] as the ministers and companions of the go[ds], who carry the prayers of men to the gods, an[d] the gifts of the gods to men, and according[ly] float in immense numbers in the space betwe[en] heaven and earth. There was also a distin[ct] class of dæmons, who were exclusively the min[]isters of the gods. The Romans seem to have received their notions respecting the genii from the Etruscans, though the name Genius itself is Latin (it is connected with gi-gn-o, gen-[] and equivalent in meaning to generator or fa[]ther). The genii of the Romans are the powers which produce life (dii genitales), and accom[]pany man through it as his second or spiritual self. They were further not confined to man but every living being, animal as well as man, and every place, had its genius. Every human being at his birth obtained (sortitur) a genius, whom he worshipped as sanctus et sanctissimus deus, especially on his birth-day, with libations of wine, incense, and garlands of flowers. The bridal bed was sacred to the genius, on account of his connection with generation, and the bed itself was called lectus genialis. On other merry occasions, also, sacrifices were offered to the genius, and to indulge in merriment was not unfrequently expressed by genio indulgere, genium curare or placare. The whole body of the Roman people had its own genius, who is often seen represented on coins of Hadrian and Trajan. He was worshipped on sad as well as joyous occasions; thus sacrifices were offered to him at the beginning of the second year of the war with Hannibal. The genii are usually represented in works of art as winged beings. The genius of a place appears in the form of a serpent eating fruit placed before him.

GENSĔRIC, king of the Vandals, and the most terrible of all the barbarian invaders of the empire. In A.D. 429 he crossed over from Spain to Africa, and ravaged the country with frightful severity. Hippo was taken by him in 431 but Carthage did not fall into his hands till 439. Having thus become master of the whole of the northwest of Africa, he attacked Italy itself. In 455 he took Rome and plundered it for four teen days, and in the same year he destroyed Capua, Nola, and Neapolis. Twice the empire endeavored to revenge itself, and twice it failed: the first was the attempt of the Western emperor Majorian (457), whose fleet was destroyed in the Bay of Carthagena. The second was the expedition sent by the Eastern emperor Leo (468), which was also baffled by the burning of the fleet off Bona. Genseric died in 477, at a great age. He was an Arian; and in the cruelties exercised under his orders against his Catholic subjects he exhibited the first instance of persecution carried on upon a large scale by one body of Christians against another.

GENTĬUS, son of Pleuratus, a king of the Illyrians. As early as B.C. 180 he had given offence to the Romans on account of the piracies of his subjects; and in 168 he entered into an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia. In the following year the prætor L. Anicius Gallus was sent against him. The war was finished within thirty days. Gentius was defeated in battle, and then surrendered himself to Anicius, who carried him to Rome to adorn his triumph. He was afterward kept as a prisoner at Spoletium.

GENUA (Genuas, -ātis, Genuensis: now Genoa), an important commercial town in Liguria, situated at the extremity of the Ligurian Gulf (now Gulf of Genoa), was in the possession of the Romans at the beginning of the second Punic war, but toward the end of the war was held for some time by the Carthaginian Mago. It was a Roman municipium, but it did not become of political importance till the Middle Ages, when it was commonly called Janua.

GENŪCĬA GENS, patrician, of which the principal families bore the names of AVENTINENSIS and AUGURINUS.

GENŪSUS (now Iskumi), a river in Greek Illyria, north of the Apsus.

GEPHYRÆI (Γεφυραῖοι), an Athenian family, to which Harmodius and Aristogīton belonged. They said that they came originally from Eretria in Eubœa. Herodotus believed them to be of Phœnician descent, to have followed Cadmus into Bœotia, and from thence to have emigrated to Athens. They dwelt on the banks of the Cephisus, which separated the territory of Athens from that of Eleusis, and their name was said to have been derived from the bridge (γέφυρα) which was built over the river at this point. Such a notion, however, is quite untenable, since "bridge" appears to have been a comparatively recent meaning of γέφυρα. We find that there were temples at Athens belonging peculiarly to the Gephyræi, to the exclusion of the rest of the Athenians, especially one to Ceres (Demeter) Achæa, whose worship they seem to have brought with them from Bœotia.

GEPIDÆ, a Gothic people, who came from Scandinavia, and first settled in the country between the Oder and the Vistula, from which they expelled the Burgundiones. Subsequently they joined the numerous hosts of Attila; and after his death they settled in Dacia, on the banks of the Danube. As they were dangerous neighbors to the Eastern empire, Justinian invoked the aid of the Langobardi or Lombards, who conquered the Gepidæ and destroyed their kingdom.

GER or GIR (Γείρ: now Ghir or Ma uolig), a river of Gætulia in Africa, south of Mauretania Cæsariensis, flowing southeast from the southern slope of Mount Atlas till it is lost in the desert. It first became known to the Romans through the expedition of Suetonius Paulinus in the reign of Nero.

GERÆSTUS (Γεραιστός: Γεραίστιος: now Cape Mandili), a promontory and harbor at the southern extremity of Eubœa, with a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), in whose honor the festival of the Geræstia (Γεραίστια) was here celebrated.

GERANĒA (ἡ Γεράνεια), a range of mountains, beginning at the southwestern slope of Cithæron, and running along the western coast of Megaris till it terminated in the promontory Olmiæ in the Corinthian territory; but the name is sometimes confined to the mountain in the Corinthian territory.

GERĒNĬA (Γερηνία), an ancient town in Messenia, the birth-place of Nestor, who is hence called Gerenian (Γερήνιος). It was regarded by some as the same place as the Homeric Enope.

GERGIS, or GERGĪTHA, or -ES, or -US (Γέργις, Γέργιθα, or -ες, or -ος: Γεργίθιος), a town in the Troad, north of the Scamander, inhabited by Teucrians. Attalus removed the inhabitants to the sources of the Caïcus, where mention is made of a place called Gergētha or Gergithion in the territory of Cyme.

GERGŌVĬA. 1. A fortified town of the Arverni in Gaul, situated on a high and inaccessible hill, west or southwest of the Elaver (now Allier). Its site is uncertain; but it was probably in the neighborhood of the modern Clermont.—2. A town of the Boii in Gaul, of uncertain site.

GERMA (Γέρμη), the name of three cities in Asia Minor. 1. (Ruins at Germaslu) in Mysia Minor, near Cyzicus.—2. (Now Yermatepe) in Mysia, between Pergamus and Thyatira.—3. (Now Yerma) in Galatia, between Pessinus and Ancyra; a colonia.

GERMĀNĬA, was bounded by the Rhine on the west, by the Vistula and the Carpathian Mountains on the east, by the Danube on the south, and by the German Ocean and the Baltic on the north. It thus included much more than modern Germany on the north and east, but much less in the west and south. The north and northeast of Gallia Belgica were likewise called Germania Prima and Secunda under the Roman emperors (vid. p. 319, a); and it was in contradistinction to these provinces that Germania proper was also called GERMANIA MAGNA, or G. TRANSRHENĀNA, or G. BARBĂRA. It was not till Cæsar's campaigns in Gaul (B.C. 58–50) that the Romans obtained any accurate knowledge of the country. The Roman writers represent Germany as a dismal land, covered for the most part with forests and swamps, producing little corn, and subject to intense frosts and almost eternal winter. Although these accounts are probably exaggerated, yet there can be no doubt, that, before the immense woods were cleared and the morasses drained, the climate of Germany was much colder than it is at present. The north of Germany is a vast plain, but in the south there are many mountains, which were covered in antiquity with vast forests, and thus were frequently called Silvæ. Of these the most important was the HERCYNIA SILVA. The chief rivers were the RHENUS (now Rhine), DANUBIUS (now Danube), VISTULA, AMISIA (now Ems), VISURGIS (now Weser), ALBIS (now Elbe), VIADUS (now Oder). The inhabitants were called GERMANI by the Romans. Tacitus says (Germ., 2) that Germani was the name of the Tungri, who were the first German people that crossed the Rhine. It would seem that this name properly belonged only to those tribes who were settled in Gaul; and as these were the first German tribes with which the Romans came into contact, they extended the name to the whole nation. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Some modern writers derive it from the German ger, gwer, Heer, Wehr, so that the word would be equivalent to Wehrman, Wehrmänner, that is, warriors. The Germans themselves do not appear to have used any one name to indicate the whole nation; for there is no reason to believe, as some have done, that the name Teutones (i. e., Teuten, Deutsche) was the general name of the nation in the time of the Romans. The Germans regarded themselves as indigenous in the country; but there can be no doubt that they were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who, along with the Celts, migrated into Europe from the Caucasus and the countries around the Black and Caspian Seas at a period long anterior to historical records. They are described as a people of high stature and of great bodily strength, with fair complexions, blue eyes, and yellow or red hair. Notwithstanding the severity of their climate, they wore little clothing, and their children went entirely naked. They had scarcely any defensive armor: their chief offensive weapon was the framea, a long spear with a narrow iron point, which they either darted from a distance or pushed in close combat. Their houses were only low huts, made of rough timber, and thatched with straw. A number of these were of course often built near each other; but they could not be said to have any towns properly so called. Many of their tribes were nomad, and every year changed their place of abode. The men found their chief delight in the perils and excitement of war. In peace they passed their lives in listless indolence, only varied by deep gaming and excessive drinking. Their chief drink was beer, and their carouses frequently ended in bloody brawls. The women were held in high honor. Their chastity was without reproach. They accompanied their husbands to battle, and cheered them on by their presence, and frequently by their example as well. Both sexes were equally distinguished for their unconquerable love of liberty; and the women frequently destroyed both themselves and their children rather than fall into the power of their husbands' conquerors. In each tribe we find the people divided into four classes: the nobles; the freemen; the freedmen or vassals; and the slaves. All questions relating to peace and war, and the general interests of the tribe, were decided in the popular assembly, in which each freeman had a right to take part. In these assemblies a king was elected from among the nobles; but his power was very limited, and he only acted as the supreme magistrate in time of peace; for when a war broke out, the people elected a distinguished warrior as their leader, upon whom [the] prerogatives of the king devolved. The relig[ion] of the Germans is known to us only from [the] Greek and Roman writers, who have conf[used] the subject by seeking to identify the gods [of] the Germans with their own divinities. [We] know that they worshipped the sun, the m[oon], and the stars. They are also said to have p[aid] especial honor to Mercury, who was prob[ably] the German Wodan or Odin. Their other ch[ief] divinities were Isis (probably Freia, the wife [of] Odin); Mars (Tyr or Zio, the German god [of] war); the mother of the gods, called Nerth[us] (less correctly Herthus or Hertha); and Jupi[ter] (Thor, or the god of Thunder). The worsh[ip] of the gods was simple. They had both prie[sts] and priestesses to attend to their service; a[nd] some of the priestesses, such as Veleda am[ong] the Bructeri, were celebrated throughout Ge[r]many for their prophetic powers. The Ge[r]mani first appear in history in the campaig[ns] of the Cimbri and Teutones (B.C. 113), the la[t]ter of whom were undoubtedly a German[ic] people. Vid. TEUTONES. About fifty years af[t]erward, Ariovistus, a German chief, crossed th[e] Rhine, with a vast host of Germans, and sub[]dued a great part of Gaul; but he was defeat[ed] by Cæsar with great slaughter (58), and drive[n] beyond the Rhine. Cæsar twice crossed th[e] river (55, 53), but made no permanent conque[st] on the eastern bank. In the reign of Augustus, his step-son, Drusus, carried on war in Ger[]many with great success for four years (12–9) and penetrated as far as the Elbe. On his death (9), his brother Tiberius succeeded to the com[]mand; and under him the country between the Rhine and the Visurgis (now Weser) was en[]tirely subjugated, and bid fair to become a Ro[]man province. But in A.D. 9, the impolitic and tyrannical conduct of the Roman governor Quintilius Varus, provoked a general insurrec[]tion of the various German tribes, headed by Arminius, the Cheruscan. Varus and his le[]gions were defeated and destroyed, and the Ro[]mans lost all their conquests east of the Rhine. Vid. VARUS. The defeat of Varus was avenged by the successful campaigns of Germanicus, who would probably have recovered the Roman do[]minions east of the river, had not the jealousy of Tiberius recalled him to Rome, A.D. 16. From this time the Romans abandoned all fur[]ther attempts to conquer Germany; but, in con[]sequence of the civil dissensions which broke out in Germany soon after the departure of Ti[]berius, they were enabled to obtain peaceable possession of a large portion of the southwest of Germany, between the Rhine and the Dan[]ube, to which they gave the name of the AGRI DECUMATES. Vid. p. 33, b. On the death of Nero, several of the tribes in Western Germany joined the Batavi in their insurrection against the Romans (A.D. 69–71). Domitian and Tra[]jan had to repel the attacks of some German tribes; but in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Marcomanni, joined by various other tribes, made a more formidable attack upon the Ro[]man dominions, and threatened the empire with destruction. From this time the Romans were often called upon to defend the left bank of the Rhine against their dangerous neighbors, espe[]cially against the two powerful confederacies at the Alemanni and Franks (vid. ALEMANNI, FRANCI); and in the fourth and fifth centuries the Germans obtained possession of some of the fairest provinces of the empire. The Germans are divided by Tacitus into three great tribes: 1. Ingævones, on the Ocean. 2. Herminones, inhabiting the central parts. 3. Istævones, in the remainder of Germany, consequently in the eastern and southern parts. These three names were said to be derived from the three sons of Mannus, the son of Tuisco. Pliny makes five divisions: 1. Vindili, including Burgundiones, Varini, Carini, and Guttones. 2. Ingævones, including Cimbri, Teutones, and Chauci. 3. Istævones, including the midland Cimbri. 4. Hermiones, including the Suevi, Hermunduri, Chatti, and Cherusci. 5. Peucini and Bastarnæ, bordering on the Dacians. But whether we adopt the division of Tacitus or Pliny, we ought to add the inhabitants of the Scandinavian peninsula, the Hilleviones, divided into the Sinones and Sitones. It is difficult to fix with accuracy the position of the various tribes, as they frequently migrated from one spot to another. An account of each is given under the name of the tribe. Vid. CHAUCI, CHERUSCI, CIMBRI, SUEVI, &c.

GERMANICUS CÆSAR, son of Nero Claudius Drusus and Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir Antony, was born B.C. 15. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius in the lifetime of Augustus, and was raised at an early age to the honors of the state. He assisted Tiberius in the war against the Pannonians and Dalmatians (A.D. 7–10), and also fought along with Tiberius against the Germans in the two following years (11, 12). He had the command of the legions in Germany when the alarming mutiny broke out among the troops in Germany and Illyricum, upon the death of Augustus (14). Germanicus was a favorite with the soldiers, and they offered to place him at the head of the empire; but he rejected their proposal, and exerted all his influence to quell the mutiny, and reconcile them to their new sovereign. After restoring order among the troops, he crossed the Rhine, and laid waste the country of the Marsi with fire and sword. In the following year (15) he again crossed the Rhine, and marched into the interior of the country. He penetrated as far as the Saltus Teutoburgiensis, north of the Lippe, in which forest the army of Quintilius Varus had been destroyed by the Germans. Here his troops gathered up the bones of their ill-fated comrades, and paid the last honors to their memory. But meantime Arminius had collected a formidable army with which he attacked the Romans; and it was not without considerable loss that Germanicus made good his retreat to the Rhine. It was in this campaign that Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of Germanicus. Vid. ARMINIUS. Next year (16) Germanicus placed his troops on board a fleet of one thousand vessels, and sailed through the canal of his father, Drusus (vid. p. 272, a), and the Zuydersee to the ocean and from thence to the mouth of the Amisia (now Ems), where he landed his forces. After crossing the Ems and the Weser, he fought two battles with Arminius, in both of which the Germans were completely defeated. The Germans could no longer offer him any effectual resistance, and Germanicus needed only another year to reduce completely the whole country between the Rhine and the Elbe. But the jealousy of Tiberius saved Germany. Upon pretence of the dangerous state of affairs in the East, the emperor recalled Germanicus to Rome which he entered in Triumph on the 26th of May A.D. 17. In the same year all the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus; but Tiberius placed Cn. Piso in command of Syria, with secret instructions to check and thwart Germanicus. Piso soon showed his hostility to Germanicus; and his wife, Plancina, in like manner, did every thing in her power to annoy Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus. In 18, Germanicus proceeded to Armenia, where he placed Zeno on the throne, and in the following year (19) he visited Egypt, and on his return he was seized with a dangerous illness, of which he died. He believed that he had been poisoned by Piso, and shortly before he died he summoned his friends, and called upon them to avenge his murder. He was deeply and sincerely lamented by the Roman people; and Tiberius was obliged to sacrifice Piso to the public indignation. Vid. PISO. By Agrippina he had nine children, of whom six survived him. Of these the most notorious were the Emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. Germanicus was an author of some repute. He wrote several poetical works. We still possess the remains of his Latin translation of the Phænomena of Aratus. The latest edition of this work is by Orelli, at the end of his Phædrus, Zurich 1831.

GERMANĬCĬA or CÆSĂRĒA GERMANĬCA (Γερμανίκεια Καισάρεια Γερμανική), a town in the Syrian provinces of Commagene, near the borders of Cappadocia: the birth-place of the heretic Nestorius.

GERRA (Γέῤῥα: near El-Katif), one of the chief cities of Arabia and India, stood on the northeastern coast of Arabia, and a great emporium for the trade of Arabia Felix, two hundred stadia (twenty geographical miles) from the shore of the Sinus Gerræus or Gerraicus (now Elwah Bay?), a bay on the western side of the Persian Gulf, two thousand four hundred stadia (two hundred and forty geographical miles—4° of lat.) from the mouth of the Tigris. The city was five Roman miles in circuit. The inhabitants, called Gerræi (Γεῤῥαῖοι), were said to have been originally Chaldæans, who were driven out of Babylon. There was a small place of the same name on the northeastern frontier of Egypt, between Pelusium and Mount Casius, fifty stadia or eight Roman miles from the former.

GERRHUS (Γέῤῥος), a river of Scythia, flowing through a country of the same name, was a branch of the Borysthenes, and flowed into the Hapacyris, dividing the country of the Nomad Scythians from that of the Royal Scythians.

GERUNDA (now Gerona), a town of the Ausetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Narbo in Gaul.

[GERUNIUM, is named by Livy, in his account of the second Punic war, as an ancient decayed city of the Samnites.]

GĒRYON or GĒRYŎNES (Γηρυόνης), son of Chry

aior and Callirrhoë, a monster with three heads, or, according to others, with three bodies united together, was a king in Spain, and possessed magnificent oxen, which Hercules carried away. For details, vid. HERCULES.

GESORIĂCUM (now Boulogne), a port of the Morini in Gallia Belgica, at which persons usually embarked to cross over to Britain: it was subsequently called BONONĬA, whence its modern name.

GESSĬUS FLŌRUS. Vid. FLORUS.

GETA, SEPTĬMĬUS, brother of Caracalla, by whom he was assassinated, A.D. 212. For details, vid. CARACALLA.

GETÆ, a Thracian people, called Daci by the Romans. Herodotus and Thucydides place them south of the Ister (now Danube), near its mouths, but in the time of Alexander the Great they dwelt beyond this river and north of the Triballi. They were driven by the Sarmatians further west toward Germany. For their later history, vid. DACIA.

GIGANTES (Γίγαντες), the giants. According to Homer, they were a gigantic and savage race of men, dwelling in the distant west, in the island of Thrinacia, and were destroyed on account of their insolence toward the gods. Hesiod considers them as divine beings, who sprang from the blood that fell from Cœlus (Uranus) upon the earth, so that Terra (Ge) (the earth) was their mother. Neither Homer nor Hesiod knows any thing about their contest with the gods. Later poets and mythographers frequently confound them with the Titans, and represent them as enemies of Jupiter (Zeus) and the gods, whose abode on Olympus they attempt to take by storm. Their battle with the gods seems to be only an imitation of the revolt of the Titans against Uranus. Terra (Ge), it is said, indignant at the fate of her former children, the Titans, gave birth to the Gigantes, who were beings of a monstrous size, with fearful countenances and the tails of dragons. They were born, according to some, in the Phlegræan plains in Sicily, Campania, or Arcadia, and, according to others, in the Thracian Pallene. In their native land they made an attack upon heaven, being armed with huge rocks and trunks of trees. The gods were told that they could not conquer the giants without the assistance of a mortal, whereupon they summoned Hercules to their aid. The giants Alcyoneus and Porphyrion distinguished themselves above their brethren. Alcyoneus was immortal so long as he fought in his native land; but Hercules dragged him away to a foreign land, and thus killed him. Porphyrion was killed by the lightning of Jupiter (Zeus) and the arrows of Hercules. The other giants, whose number is said to have been twenty-four, were then killed one after another by the gods and Hercules, and some of them were buried by their conquerors under (volcanic) islands. It is worthy of remark, that most writers place the giants in volcanic districts; and it is probable that the story of their contest with the gods took its origin from volcanic convulsions.

GIGŌNUS (Γίγωνος: Γιγώνιος), a town and promontory of Macedonia, on the Thermaic Gulf.

[GILBOA MONS, a sterile range of hills to the south and southeast of Tabor, bounding the valley of the Jordan on the west for m[...] miles.]

GILDO or GILDON, a Moorish chieftain, [...] ernod Africa for some years as a subject of [...] Western empire; but in A.D. 397 he tr[ans]ferred his allegiance to the Eastern empire, [...] the Emperor Arcadius accepted him as a [sub]ject. Stilicho, guardian of Honorius, sent [...] army against him. Gildo was defeated: [...] being taken prisoner, he put an end to his [...] life by hanging himself (398). The history [of] this war forms the subject of one of Claudi[an's] poems (De Bello Gildonico).

[GILIGAMBÆ (Γιλιγάμβαι or Γιλιγάμμαι, H[...] an African people in Marmarica and Cyrenai[ca].

[GINDĀNES (Γινδᾶνες), a people dwelling [in] the inland parts of the Syrtica Regio in Afric[a].

GINDĂRUS (Γίνδαρος: now Gindaries), a v[ery] strong fortress in the district of Cyrrhestice [in] Syria, northeast of Antioch.

[GIR. Vid. GER.]

GIRBA, a city on the island of Meninx (no[w] Jerbah), at the southern extremity of the Les[ser] Syrtis, in northern Africa: celebrated for i[ts] manufactures of purple.

GISCO or GISGO (Γίσκων or Γέσκων). 1. S[on] of Hamilcar, who was defeated and killed in th[e] battle of Himera, B.C. 480. In consequence of this calamity, Gisgo was banished from Car[thage]. He died at Selinus in Sicily.—2. Son of Hanno, was in exile when the Carthaginians were defeated at the River Crimisus by Timoleon, 339. He was then recalled from exile, and sent to oppose Timoleon, but was unable to accomplish any thing of importance.—3. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Lilybæum at the end of the first Punic war. After the conclusion of peace, 241, he was deputed by the government to treat with the mercenaries who had risen in revolt, but he was seized by them and put to death.

GITIĀDAS (Γιτιάδας), a Lacedæmonian architect, statuary, and poet. He completed the temple of Minerva (Athena) Poliouchos at Sparta, and ornamented it with works in bronze, from which it was called the Brazen House, and hence the goddess received the surname of Χαλκίοικος. He composed a hymn to the goddess, besides other poems. He flourished about B.C. 516, and is the last Spartan artist of any distinction.

GLABRĬO, ACĬLĬUS, plebeians. 1. C., quæstor B.C. 203, and tribune of the plebs 197. He acted as interpreter to the Athenian embassy in 155, when the three philosophers, Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus, came as envoys to Rome. He wrote in Greek a history of Rome from the earliest period to his own times. It was translated into Latin by one Claudius, and his version is cited by Livy, under the titles of Annales Aciliani (xxv., 39) and Libri Aciliani (xxxv., 14).—2. M'., tribune of the plebs 201, prætor 196, and consul 191. In his consulship he defeated Antiochus at Thermopylæ, and subsequently the Ætolians likewise.—3. M'., married a daughter of M. Æmilius Scaurus, consul 115, whom Sulla, in 82, compelled him to divorce. Glabrio was prætor urbanus in 70, when he presided at the impeachment of Verres. He was consul in 67, and in the following year proconsul of Cilicia. He succeeded L. Lucullus in the command of the war against Mithradates, but remained inactive in Bithynia. He was superseded by Cn. Pompey.—4. M'., son of No. 3, was born in the house of Cn. Pompey, B.C. 81, who married his mother after her compulsory divorce from the elder Glabrio. Æmilia died in giving birth to him. In the civil war, Glabrio was one of Cæsar's lieutenants, commanded the garrison of Oricum in Epirus in 48, and was stationed in Sicily in 46. He was twice defended on capital charges by Cicero, and acquitted.

Glanis, more usually written Clanis.

Glănum Livĭi (ruins near St. Remy), a town of the Salyes in Gallia Narbonensis.

Glaphўra. Vid. Archelaus, No. 6.

Glauce (Γλαύκη). 1. One of the Nereides, the name Glauce being only a personification of the color of the sea.—2. Daughter of Creon of Corinth, also called Creusa. For details, vid. Creon.

[Glauce (Γλαύκη), a harbor of Ionia, on the Promontory Mycale, opposite Samos.]

Glaucĭa, C. Servĭlius, prætor B.C. 100, the chief supporter of Saturninus, with whom he was put to death in this year. Vid. Saturninus.

Glaucĭas (Γλαυκίας). 1. King of the Taulantians, one of the Illyrian tribes, fought against Alexander the Great, B.C. 335. In 316 he afforded an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, and refused to surrender him to Cassander. In 307 he invaded Epirus, and placed Pyrrhus, then twelve years old, upon the throne.—2. A Greek physician, who probably lived in the third or second century B.C.—3. A statuary of Ægina, who made the bronze chariot and statue of Gelon, flourished B.C. 488.

[Glaucippus (Γλαύκιππος), an Athenian rhetorician, son of the celebrated orator Hyperīdes: he wrote several orations, but they have entirely perished.]

Glaucon (Γλαύκων). 1. Son of Critias, brother of Callæschrus, and father of Charmides and of Plato's mother, Perictione.—2. Brother of Plato, who makes him one of the speakers in the Republic.

Glaucus (Γλαῦκος). 1. Grandson of Æolus, son of Sisyphus and Merope, and father of Bellerophontes. He lived at Potniæ, despised the power of Venus (Aphrodite), and did not allow his mares to breed, that they might be the stronger for the horse-race. According to others, he fed them with human flesh. This excited the anger of Venus (Aphrodite), who destroyed him. According to some accounts, his horses became frightened and threw him out of his chariot, as he was contending in the funeral games celebrated by Acastus in honor of his father Pelias. According to others, his horses tore him to pieces, having drunk from the waters of a sacred well in Bœotia, in consequence of which they were seized with madness. Glaucus of Potniæ (Γλαῦκος Ποτνιεύς) was the title of one of the lost tragedies of Æschylus.—2. Son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Bellerophontes, was a Lycian prince, and assisted Priam in the Trojan war. He was connected with Diomedes by ties of hospitality; and when they recognized one another in the battle, they abstained from fighting, and exchanged arms with one another. Glaucus was slain by Ajax.—3. Son of the Messenian king Æpytus, whom he succeeded on the throne.—4. One of the sons of the Cretan king Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete. When a boy, he fell into a cask full of honey, and was smothered. Minos searched for his son in vain, and was at length informed by Apollo or the Curetes that the person who should devise the most appropriate comparison between a cow, which could assume three different colors, and any other object, would find the boy. The soothsayer Polyidus of Argos solved the problem by likening the cow to a mulberry, which is at first white, then red, and in the end black. By his prophetic powers he then discovered the boy. Minos now required Polyidus to restore his son to life; but as he could not accomplish this, Minos ordered him to be entombed alive with the body of Glaucus. When Polyidus was thus shut up in the vault, he saw a serpent approaching the dead body, and killed the reptile. Presently another serpent came, and placed a herb upon the dead serpent, which was thereby restored to life. Thereupon Polyidus covered the body of Glaucus with the same herb, and the boy at once rose into life again. The story of Glaucus and Polyidus was a favorite subject with the ancient poets and authors.—5. Of Anthedon in Bœotia, a fisherman, who became immortal by eating a part of the divine herb which Saturn (Cronos) had sown. His parentage is differently stated: some called his father Copeus, others Polybus, the husband of Eubœa, and others, again, Anthedon or Neptune (Poseidon). He was further said to have been a clever diver, to have built the ship Argo, and to have accompanied the Argonauts as their steersman. In the sea-fight of Jason against the Tyrrhenians, Glaucus alone remained unhurt; he sank to the bottom of the sea, where he was visible to none save Jason. From this moment he became a marine deity, and was of service to the Argonauts. The story of his sinking or leaping into the sea was variously modified in the different traditions. There was a belief in Greece that once in every year Glaucus visited all the coasts and islands, accompanied by marine monsters, and gave his prophecies. Fishermen and sailors paid particular reverence to him, and watched his oracles, which were believed to be very trustworthy. He is said to have even instructed Apollo in the prophetic art. Some writers stated that he dwelt in Delos, where he prophesied in conjunction with the nymphs; but the place of his abode varied in different traditions. The stories about his various loves were favorite subjects with the ancient poets.—6. Of Chios, a statuary in metal, distinguished as the inventor of the art of soldering metals (κόλλησις), flourished B.C. 490. His most noted work was an iron base (ὑποκρητηρίδιον), which, with the silver bowl it supported, was presented to the temple at Delphi by Alyattes, king of Lydia.

Glaucus (Γλαῦκος). 1. A small river of Phrygia, falling into the Mæander near Eumenia.—2. A small river of Lycia, on the borders of Caria, flowing into the Sinus Glaucus (now Gulf of Makri).

Glaucus Sinus. Vid. preceding, No. 2

Glessārĭa (now Ameland), an island off the coast of the Frisii, so called from "glessum" or amber which was found there: its proper name was Austeravia.

Glisas (Γλίσας: Γλισάντιος), an ancient town in Bœotia, on Mount Hypaton. It was in ruins in the time of Pausanias.

Glycas, Michael, a Byzantine historian, the author of a work entitled Annals (βίβλος χρονική), containing the history of the world from the creation to the death of Alexis I. Comnenus, A.D 1118. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1836.

Glycĕra (Γλυκέρα), "the sweet one," a favorite name of hetairæ. The most celebrated hetairæ of this name are, 1. The daughter of Thalassis, and the mistress of Harpalus.—2. Of Sicyon, and the mistress of Pausias.—3. A favorite of Horace.

Glycĕrĭus, became emperor of the West A.D. 473, after the death of Olybrius, by the assistance of Gundobald the Burgundian. But the Byzantine court did not acknowledge Glycerius, and proclaimed Julius Nepos emperor, by whom Glycerius was dethroned (474), and compelled to become a priest. He was appointed bishop of Salona in Dalmatia.

Glycon (Γλύκων) an Athenian sculptor, known to us by the magnificent colossal marble statue of Hercules, commonly called the "Farnese Hercules." It was found in the baths of Caracalla, and, after adorning the Farnese palace for some time, was removed to the royal museum at Naples. It represents the hero resting on his club after one of his labors. The swollen muscles admirably express repose after severe exertion. Glycon probably lived under the early Roman emperors.

[Glycys Portus (Γλυκὺς λιμήν, "the sweet harbor"), a harbor with a town Glycys at the mouth of the Acheron in Epirus.]

[Gnatia, a shortened form of Egnatia. Vid. Egnatia.]

Gnipho, M. Antōnĭus, a Roman rhetorician, was born B.C. 114, in Gaul, but studied at Alexandrea. He afterward established a school at Rome, which was attended by many distinguished men, and among others by Cicero, when he was prætor.

Gnosus, Gnossus. Vid. Cnosus.

Gōbrўas (Γωβρύας), a noble Persian, one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian. He accompanied Darius into Scythia. He was doubly related to Darius by marriage; Darius married the daughter of Gobryas, and Gobryas married the sister of Darius.

[Gōgăna (Γώγανα, now Kongun or Cogun), a place in the Persian district Persis.]

Golgi (Γολγοί: Γόλγιος), a town in Cyprus, of uncertain site, was a Sicyonian colony, and one of the chief seats of the worship of Aphrodite (Venus).

Gomphi (Γόμφοι: Γομφεύς), a town in Hestiæotis in Thessaly, was a strong fortress on the confines of Epirus, and commanded the chief pass between Thessaly and Epirus: it was taken and destroyed by Cæsar (B.C. 48), but was afterward rebuilt.

Gonni, Gonnus (Γόννοι, Γόννος: Γόννιος), a strongly fortified town of the Perrhæbi in Thessaly, on the River Peneus, and at the entrance of the Vale of Tempe, was, from its position, of great military importance: but it is not mentioned after the time of the wars betwee[n] Macedonians and Romans.

Gordĭānus, M. Antōnĭus, the name of th[ree] Roman emperors, father, son, and grand[son]. 1. Surnamed Africanus, son of Metius Ma[rul]lus and Ulpia Gordiana, possessed a prin[cely] fortune, and was distinguished alike by m[oral] and intellectual excellence. In his first [consul]ship, A.D. 213, he was the colleague of Ca[rac]alla; in his second, of Alexander Severu[s], and soon afterward was nominated procu[rator] of Africa. After governing Africa for seve[ral] years with justice and integrity, a rebelli[on] broke out in the province in consequence of t[he] tyranny of the procurator of Maximinus. T[he] ring-leaders of the conspiracy compelled Go[r]dian, who was now in his eightieth year, to a[s]sume the imperial title. He entered on his ne[w] duties at Carthage in the month of Februar[y], associated his son with him in the empire, a[nd] dispatched letters to Rome announcing h[is] elevation. Gordianus and his son were at on[ce] proclaimed Augusti by the senate, and prepa[r]ations were made in Italy to resist Maximinus. But meantime a certain Capellianus, procurato[r] of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the autho[r]ity of the Gordiani, and marched against them. The younger Gordianus was defeated by him and slain in the battle; and his aged father thereupon put an end to his own life, after reigning less than two months.—2. Son of the preceding and of Fabia Orestilla, was born A.D. 192, was associated with his father in the pur[]ple, and fell in battle, as recorded above.—3. Grandson of the elder Gordianus, either by a daughter or by the younger Gordianus. The soldiers proclaimed him emperor in July, A.D. 238, after the murder of Balbinus and Pupienus, although he was a mere boy, probably not more than twelve years old. He reigned six years, from 238 to 244. In 241 he married the daughter of Misitheus, and in the same year set out for the east to carry on the war against the Persians. With the assistance of Misitheus, he defeated the Persians in 242. Misitheus died in the following year; and Philippus, whom Gordian had taken into his confidence, excited discontent among the soldiers, who at length rose in open mutiny, and assassinated Gordian in Mesopotamia, 244. He was succeeded by Philippus.

Gordĭum (Γόρδιον, Γορδίου Κώμη), the ancient capital of Phrygia, the royal residence of the kings of the dynasty of Gordius, and the scene of Alexander's celebrated exploit of "cutting the Gordian knot." Vid. Gordius. It was situated in the west of that part of Phrygia which was afterward called Galatia, north of Pessinus, on the northern bank of the Sangarius. In the reign of Augustus it received the name of Juliopolis (Ἰουλιούπολις).

Gordĭus (Γόρδιος), an ancient king of Phrygia, and father of Midas, was originally a poor peasant. Internal disturbances having broke[n] out in Phrygia, an oracle informed the inhabitants that a wagon would bring them a king, who should at the same time put an end to the disturbances. When the people were deliberating on these points, Gordius, with his wife and son, suddenly appeared riding in his wag[]on in the assembly of the people, who at once acknowledged him as king. Gordius, out of gratitude, dedicated his chariot to Jupiter (Zeus) in the acropolis of Gordium. The pole was fastened to the yoke by a knot of bark; and an oracle declared that whatsoever should untie the knot should reign over all Asia. Alexander, on his arrival at Gordium, cut the knot with his sword and applied the oracle to himself.

Gordiūtīchos (Γορδίου τεῖχος) a town in Caria, near the borders of Phrygia, between Antiochia ad Mæandrum and Tabæ.

Gordyæi. Vid. Gordyene.

Gordyæi Montes (τὰ Γορδυαῖα ὄρη: now Mountains of Kurdistan), the name given by Strabo to the northern part of the broad belt of mountains which separates the Tigris Valley from the great table-land of Iran, and which divided Mesopotamia and Assyria from Armenia and Media. They are connected with the mountains of Armenia at Ararat, whence they run southeast between the Arsissa Palus (now Lake Van) and the sources of the Tigris and its upper confluents as far as the confines of Media, where the chain turns more to the south and was called Zagros.

Gordyēne or Corduēne (Γορδυηνή, Κορδουηνή), a mountainous district in the south of Armenia Major, between the Arsissa Palus (now Lake Van) and the Gordyæi Montes. After the Mithradatic war, it was assigned by Pompey to Tigranes, with whom its possession had been disputed by the Parthian king Phraates. Trajan added it to the Roman empire; and it formed afterward a constant object of contention between the Romans and the Parthian and Persian kings, but was for the most part virtually independent. Its warlike inhabitants, called Γορδυαῖοι or Corduēni, were no doubt the same people as the Carduchi of the earlier Greek geographers, and the Kurds of modern times.

Gorge (Γόργη), daughter of Œneus and Althea. She and her sister Deianira alone retained their original forms, when their other sisters were metamorphosed by Diana (Artemis) into birds.

Gorgĭas (Γοργίας). 1. Of Leontini, in Sicily, a celebrated rhetorician and orator, sophist and philosopher, was born about B.C 480, and is said to have lived one hundred and five years, or even one hundred and nine years. Of his early life we have no particulars; but when he was of advanced age (B.C. 427) he was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Athens, for the purpose of soliciting its protection against Syracuse. He seems to have returned to Leontini only for a short time, and to have spent the remaining years of his vigorous old age in the towns of Greece Proper, especially at Athens and the Thessalian Larissa, enjoying honor every where as an orator and teacher of rhetoric. The common statement that Pericles and the historian Thucydides were among his disciples can not be true, as he did not go to Athens till after the death of Pericles; but Alcibiades, Alcidamas, Æschines, and Antisthenes are called either pupils or imitators of Gorgias, and his oratory must have had great influence upon the rhetorician Isocrates. The high estimation in which he was held at Athens appears from the way in which he is introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name The eloquence of Gorgias was chiefly calculated to tickle the ear by antitheses, alliterations, the symmetry of its parts, and similar artifices. Two declamations have come down to us under the name of Gorgias, viz., the Apology of Palamedes, and the Encomium on Helena, the genuineness of which is doubtful. Besides his orations, which were mostly what the Greeks called Epideictic or speeches for display, such as his oration addressed to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, Gorgias also wrote loci communes, probably as rhetorical exercises; a work on dissimilar and homogeneous words, and another on rhetoric. The works of Gorgias did not even contain the elements of a scientific theory of oratory any more than his oral instructions. He confined himself to teaching his pupils a variety of rhetorical artifices, and made them learn by heart certain formulas relative to them. —2. Of Athens, gave instruction in rhetoric to young M. Cicero when he was at Athens. He wrote a rhetorical work, a Latin abridgment of which by Rutilius Lupus is still extant, under the title De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis.

Gorgo and Gorgŏnes (Γοργώ and Γοργόνες) Homer mentions only one Gorgo, who appears in the Odyssey (xi., 633) as one of the frightful phantoms in Hades: in the Iliad the ægis of Athena (Minerva) contains the head of Gorgo the terror of her enemies. Hesiod mentions three Gorgones, Stheno, Euryale, and Medūsa, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whence they are sometimes called Phorcydes. Hesiod placed them in the far west in the Ocean, in the neighborhood of Night and the Hesperides· but later traditions transferred them to Libya. They were frightful beings; instead of hair, their heads were covered with hissing serpents; and they had wings, brazen claws, and enormous teeth. Medusa, who alone of her sisters was mortal, was, according to some legends, at first a beautiful maiden, but her hair was changed into serpents by Athena (Minerva) in consequence of her having become by Poseidon the mother of Chrysaor and Pegasus in one of Athena's (Minerva's) temples. Her head now became so fearful that every one who looked at it was changed into stone. Hence the great difficulty which Perseus had in killing her. Vid. Perseus. Athena (Minerva) afterward placed the head in the centre of her shield or breast-plate.

Gortȳn, Gortȳna (Γόρτυν, Γόρτυνα Γορτύνιος). 1. (Ruins near Hagios Dheka, six miles from the foot of Mount Ida), one of the most ancient cities in Crete, on the River Lethæus, ninety stadia from its harbor Lebēn, and one hundred and thirty stadia from its other harbor Metalia. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Europa, whence it was called Hellotis; and it was subsequently peopled by Minyans and Tyrrhene-Pelasgians, whence it also bore the name of Larissa. It was the second city in Crete, being only inferior to Cnossus· and on the decline of the latter place under the Romans, it became the metropolis of the island. —2. Also Gortys (ruins near Atzikolo), a town in Arcadia, on the River Gortynius, a tributary of the Alpheus.

Gothi, Gothŏnes, Guttŏnes, a powerful German people, who played an important part in the overthrow of the Roman empire. They originally dwelt on the Prussian coast of the Baltic, at the mouth of the Vistula, where they are placed by Tacitus; but they afterward migrated south, and at the beginning of the third century they appear on the coasts of the Black Sea, where Caracalla encountered them on his march to the East. In the reign of the Emperor Philippus (A.D. 244–249), they obtained possession of a great part of the Roman province of Dacia; and in consequence of their settling in the countries formerly inhabited by the Getæ and Scythians, they are frequently called both Getæ and Scythians by later writers. From the time of Philippus the attacks of the Goths against the Roman empire became more frequent and more destructive. In A.D. 272 the Emperor Aurelian surrendered to them the whole of Dacia. It is about this time that we find them separated into two great divisions, the Ostrogoths or Eastern Goths, and the Visigoths or Western Goths. The Ostrogoths settled in Mœsia and Pannonia, while the Visigoths remained north of the Danube. The Visigoths, under their king Alaric, invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410). A few years afterward they settled permanently in the southwest of Gaul, and established a kingdom, of which Tolosa was the capital. From thence they invaded Spain, where they also founded a kingdom, which lasted for more than two centuries, till it was overthrown by the Arabs. The Ostrogoths meantime had extended their dominions almost up to the gates of Constantinople; and the Emperor Zeno was glad to get rid of them by giving them permission to invade and conquer Italy. Under their king Theodoric the Great they obtained possession of the whole of Italy (493). Theodoric took the title of King of Italy, and an Ostrogothic dynasty reigned in the country till it was destroyed by Narses, the general of Justinian, A.D. 553. The Ostrogoths embraced Christianity at an early period; and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the sacred Scriptures into Gothic, about the middle of the fourth century.

Gothini, a Celtic people in the southeast of Germany, subject to the Quadi.

Gracchānus, M. Jūnius, assumed his cognomen on account of his friendship with C. Gracchus. He wrote a work, De Potestatibus, which gave an account of the Roman constitution and magistracies from the time of the kings. It was addressed to T. Pomponius Atticus, the father of Cicero's friend. This work, which appears to have been one of great value, is lost, but some parts of it are cited by Joannes Lydus. Vid. Lydus.

Tiberius was inferior to his brother in talent, but surpassed him in the amiable traits of his gentle nature: the simplicity of his demeanor, and his calm dignity, won for him the hearts of the people. His eloquence, too, formed a strong contrast with the passionate and impetuous harangues of Caius; for it was temperate, graceful, persuasive, and, proceeding as it did from the fullness of his own heart, it found a ready entrance into the hearts of his hearers. Tiberius served in Africa under P. Scipio Africanus the younger, who had married his sister, and was present at the destruction of Carthage (146). In 137 he was quæstor, and in that capacity he accompanied the consul Hostilius Mancinus, to Hispania Citerior, where he gained both the affection of the Roman soldiers, and the esteem and confidence of the victorious enemy. The distressed condition of the Roman people had deeply excited the sympathies of Tiberius. As he travelled through Etruria on his journey to Spain, he observed with grief and indignation the deserted state of that fertile country; thousands of foreign slaves in chains were employed in cultivating the land and tending the flocks upon the immense estates of the wealthy, while the poorer classes of Roman citizens, who were thus thrown out of employment, had scarcely their daily bread or a clod of earth to call their own. He resolved to use every effort to remedy this state of things, by endeavoring to create an industrious middle class of agriculturists, and to put a check upon the unbounded avarice of the ruling party, whose covetousness, combined with the disasters of the second Punic war, had completely destroyed the middle class of small land-owners. With this view, he offered himself as a candidate for the tribuneship, and obtained it for the year 133. The agrarian law of Licinius, which enacted that no one should possess more than five hundred jugera of public land, had never been repealed, but had for a long series of years been totally disregarded. The first measure, therefore, of Tiberius was to propose a bill to the people, renewing and enforcing the Licinian law, but with the modification that besides the five hundred jugera allowed by that law, any one might possess two hundred and fifty jugera of the public land for each of his sons. This clause, however, seems to have been limited to two, so that a father of two sons might occupy one thousand jugera of public land. The surplus was to be taken from them and distributed in small farms among the poor citizens. The business of measuring and distributing the land was to be intrusted to triumvirs, who were to be elected as a permanent magistracy. The measure encountered the most vehement opposition from the senate and the aristocracy, and they got one of the tribunes, M. Octavius, to put his intercessio or veto upon the bill. When neither persuasions nor threats would induce Octavius to withdraw his opposition, the people, upon the proposition of Tiberius, deposed Octavius from his office. The law was then passed; and the triumvirs appointed to carry it into execution were Tib. Gracchus, App. Claudius, his father-in-law, and his brother C. Gracchus, who was then little more than twenty years old, and was serving in the camp of P. Scipio at Numantia. About this time Attalus died, bequeathing his kingdom and his property to the Roman people. Gracchus thereupon proposed that this property should be distributed among the people, to enable the poor, who were to receive lands, to purchase the necessary implements, cattle, and the like. When the time came for the election of the tribunes for the following year, Tiberius again offered himself as a candidate. The senate declared that it was illegal for any one to hold this office for two consecutive years; but Tiberius paid no attention to the objection. While the tribes were voting, a band of senators, headed by P. Scipio Nasica, rushed from the senate house into the forum and attacked the people. Tiberius was killed as he was attempting to escape. He was probably about thirty-five years of age at the time of his death. Whatever were the errors of Tiberius in legislation, his motives were pure; and he died the death of a martyr in the protection of the poor and oppressed. All the odium that has for many centuries been thrown upon Tiberius and his brother Caius arose from party prejudice, and more especially from a misunderstanding of the nature of a Roman agrarian law, which did not deal with private property, but only with the public land of the state. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. AGRARIAE LEGES.—4. C., brother of No. 3, was in Spain at the time of his brother's murder, as has been already stated. He returned to Rome in the following year (132), but kept aloof from public affairs for some years. In 126 he was quaestor, and went to Sardinia, under the consul L. Aurelius Orestes, and there gained the approbation of his superiors and the attachment of the soldiers. The senate attempted to keep him in Sardinia, dreading his popularity in Rome; but after he had remained there two years, he left the province without leave, and returned to the city in 124. Urged on by the popular wish, and by the desire of avenging the cause of his murdered brother, he became a candidate for the tribuneship of the plebs, and was elected for the year 123. His reforms were far more extensive than his brother's, and such was his influence with the people that he carried all he proposed; and the senate were deprived of some of their most important privileges. His first measure was the renewal of the agrarian law of his brother. He next carried several laws for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, enacting that the soldiers should be equipped at the expense of the republic; that no person under the age of seventeen should be drafted for the army; and that every month corn should be sold at a low fixed price to the poor. In order to weaken the power of the senate, he enacted, that the judices in the judicia publica, who had hitherto been elected from the senate, should in future be chosen from the equites; and that in every year, before the consuls were elected, the senate should determine the two provinces which the consuls should have. No branch of the public administration appears to have escaped his notice. He gave a regular organization to the province of Asia, which had for many years been left unsettled. In order to facilitate intercourse between the several parts of Italy, and at the same time to give employment to the poor, he made new roads in all directions, repaired the old ones, and set up mile-stones along them. Caius was elected tribune again for the following year, 122. The senate, finding it impossible to resist the measures of Caius, resolved, if possible, to destroy his influence with the people, that they might retain the government in their own hands. For this purpose they persuaded M. Livius Drusus, one of the colleagues of Caius, to propose measures still more popular than those of Caius. The people allowed themselves to be duped by the treacherous agent of the senate, and the popularity of Caius gradually waned. During his absence in Africa, whither he had gone as one of the triumvirs to establish a colony at Carthage, in accord ance with one of his own laws, his party had been considerably weakened by the influence of Drusus and the aristocracy, and many of his friends had deserted his cause. He failed in obtaining the tribuneship for the following year (121); and when his year of office expired, his enemies began to repeal several of his enact ments. Caius appeared in the forum to oppose these proceedings. One of the attendants of the consul Opimius was slain by the friends of Caius. Opimius gladly availed himself of this pretext to persuade the senate to confer upon him unlimited power to act as he thought best for the good of the republic. Fulvius Flaccus, and the other friends of Caius, called upon him to repel force by force; but he refused to arm, and while his friends fought in his defence, he fled to the grove of the Furies, where he fell by the hands of his slave, whom he had commanded to put him to death. The bodies of the slain, whose number is said to have amounted to three thousand, were thrown into the Tiber, their property was confiscated, and their houses demolished. All the other friends of Gracchus who fell into the hands of their enemies were thrown into prison, and there strangled.

Gradīvus, i. e., the marching (probably from gradior), a surname of Mars, who is hence called gradivus pater and rex gradivus. Mars Gradivus had a temple outside the porta Capena on the Appian road, and it is said that King Numa appointed twelve Salii as priests of this god.

Grææ (Γραῖαι), that is, "the old women," daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, were three in number, Pephredo, Enyo, and Dino, and were also called Phorcydes. They had gray hair from their birth; and had only one tooth and one eye in common, which they borrowed from each other when they wanted them. They were, perhaps, marine deities, like the other children of Phorcys.

Græcĭa or Hellas (ἡ Ἑλλάς), a country in Europe, the inhabitants of which were called Græci or Hellēnes (Ἕλληνες). Among the Greeks Hellas did not signify any particular country, bounded by certain geographical limits, but was used in general to signify the abode of the Hellenes, wherever they might happen to be settled. Thus the Greek colonies of Cyrene in Africa, of Syracuse in Sicily, of Tarentum in Italy, and of Smyrna in Asia, are said to be in Hellas. In the most ancient times Hellas was a small district of Phthiotis in Thessaly, in which was situated a town of the same name. As the inhabitants of this district, the Hellenes, gradually spread over the surrounding country, their name was adopted by other tribes, who became assimilated in language, manners, and customs to the original Hellenes, till at length the whole of the north of Greece, from the Ceraunian and Cambunian Mountains to the Corinthian isthmus, was designated by the name of Hellas.* Peloponnesus was generally spoken of during the flourishing times of Greek independence as distinct from Hellas proper; but subsequently Peloponnesus and the Greek islands were also included under the general name of Hellas, in opposition to the land of the barbarians. Still later, even Macedonia, and the southern part of Illyria, were sometimes reckoned part of Hellas. The Romans called the land of the Hellenes Græcia, whence we have derived the name of Greece. A[...] account of the geography, early inhabitants, and history of each of these districts is given in separate articles. It is only necessary to remark here that, before the Hellenes had spread over the country, it was inhabited by various tribes, whom the Greeks call by the general name of barbarians. Of these the most celebrated were the Pelasgians, who had settled in most parts of Greece, and from whom a considerable part of the Greek population was undoubtedly descended. These Pelasgians were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, and spoke a language akin to that of the Hellenes, whence the amalgamation of the two races was rendered much easier. Vid. Pelasgi. The Hellenes traced their origin to a mythical ancestor Hellen, from whose sons and grandsons they were divided into the four great tribes of Dorians, Æolians, Achæans, and Ionians. Vid. Hellen.

Græcĭa Magna or G. Major (ἡ μεγάλη Ἑλλάς), a name given to the districts in the south of Italy, inhabited by the Greeks. This name was never used simply to indicate the south of Italy; it was always confined to the Greek cities and their territories, and did not include the surrounding districts, inhabited by the Italian tribes. It appears to have been applied chiefly to the cities on the Tarentine Gulf, Tarentum, Sybaris, Croton, Caulonia, Siris (Heraclea,) Metapontum, Locri, and Rhegium; but it also included the Greek cities on the western coast, such as Cumæ and Neapolis. Strabo extends the appellation even to the Greek cities of Sicily.—The origin of the name is doubtful whether it was given to the Greek cities by the Italian tribes from their admiring the magnifi[...]

GRATIĀNUS. 1. Emperor of the Western Empire, A.D. 367–383, son of Valentinian I., was raised by his father to the rank of Augustus in 367, when he was only eight years old. On the death of Valentinian in 375, Gratian did not succeed to the sole sovereignty, as Valentinian II., the half-brother of Augustus, was proclaimed Augustus by the troops. By the death of his uncle, Valens (378), the Eastern empire devolved upon him; but the danger to which the East was exposed from the Goths led Gratian to send for Theodosius, and appoint him emperor of the East (379). Gratian was fond of quiet and repose, and was greatly under the influence of ecclesiastics, especially of Ambrose of Milan. He became unpopular with the army. Maximus was declared emperor in Britain, and crossed over to Gaul, where he defeated Gratian, who was overtaken and slain in his flight after the battle.—2. A usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain, and was murdered by his troops about four months after his elevation (407). He was succeeded by Constantine. Vid. CONSTANTINUS, No. 3.

GRATIĀRUM COLLIS (Χαρίτων λόφος, Herod., iv., 175: now Hills of Tarhounah), a range of wooded hills running parallel to the coast of Northern Africa, between the Syrtes, and containing the source of the CINYPS and the other small rivers of that coast.

GRAVISCÆ, an ancient city of Etruria, subject to Tarquinii, was colonized by the Romans B.C 183, and received new colonists under Augustus It was situated in the Maremma, and its air was unhealthy (intempestæ Graviscæ, Virg., Æn., x. 184): whence the ancients ridiculously derived its name from aër gravis. Its ruins are on the right bank of the River Marta, about two miles from the sea, where are the remains of a magnificent arch.

GREGŎRAS, NICĒPHŎRUS, one of the most important Byzantine historians, was born about A.D. 1295, and died about 1359. His principal work is entitled Historia Byzantina. It is in thirty-eight books, of which only twenty-four have been printed. It begins with the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, and goes down to 1359; the twenty-four printed books contain the period from 1204 to 1351. Edited by Schopen, Bonn, 1829.

GRĔGŎRĬUS (Γρηγόριος). 1. Surnamed NAZIANZĒNUS, and usually called GREGORY NAZIANZEN, was born in a village near Nazianzus, in Cappadocia, about A.D. 329. His father took the greatest pains with his education, and he afterward prosecuted his studies at Athens, where he earned the greatest reputation for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy, and mathematics. Among his fellow-students was Julian, the future emperor, and Basil, with the latter of whom he formed a most intimate friendship. Gregory appears to have remained at Athens about six years (350–356), and then returned home. Having received ordination, he continued to reside at Nazianzus, where he discharged his duties as a presbyter, and assisted his aged father, who was bishop of the town. In 372 he was associated with his father in the bishopric; but after the death of the latter in 374, he refused to continue bishop of Nazianzus, as he was averse from public life, and fond of solitary meditation. After living some years in retirement he was summoned to Constantinople in 379, in order to defend the orthodox faith against the Arians and other heretics. In 380 he was made bishop of Constantinople by the Emperor Theodosius; but he resigned the office in the following year (381), and withdrew altogether from public life. He lived in solitude at his paternal estate at Nazianzus, and there he died in 389 or 390. His extant works are, 1. Orations or Sermons; 2. Letters; 3. Poems. His discourses, though sometimes really eloquent, are generally nothing more than favorable specimens of the rhetoric of the schools. He is more earnest than Chrysostom, but not so ornamental. He is more artificial but also more attractive than Basil. Edited by Morell, Paris, 2 vols. fol., 1609–1611, reprinted 1630. Of the Benedictine edition, only the first volume, containing the discourses, was published, Paris, 1778.—2. NYSSĒNUS, bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia, was the younger brother of Basil, and was born at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, about 331 He was made bishop of Nyssa about 372, and, like his brother Basil and their friend Gregory Nazianzen, was one of the pillars of orthodoxy. He died soon after 394. Like his brother, he was an eminent rhetorician, but his oratory often offends by its extravagance. His works are edited by Morell and Gretser, 2 vols. fol., Paris, 1615–1618.—3. Surnamed THAUMATURGUS, from his miracles, was born at Neocæsarea, in Cappadocia, of heathen parents. He was converted to Christianity by Origen about 234, and subsequently became the bishop of his native town. He died soon after 265. His works are not numerous. The best edition is the one published at Paris, 1622.

GRUMENTUM (Grumentinus: now Il Palazzo,) a town in the interior of Lucania, on the road from Beneventum to Heraclēa, frequently mentioned in the second Punic war.

GRYLLUS (Γρύλλος), elder son of Xenophon, fell at the battle of Mantinea, B.C. 362, after he had, according to some accounts, given Epaminondas his mortal wound.

[GRYNĒUS. 1. A Centaur, who slew Broteas and Oreon, and was himself slain by Exadius at the nuptials of Pirithous.—2. Appellation of Apollo. Vid. GRYNĪA.]

GRȲNĪA or -IUM (Γρύνεια, Γρύνιον), a very ancient fortified city on the coast of the Sinus Elaïticus, in the south of Mysia, between Elæa and Myrina, seventy stadia from the former and forty from the latter: celebrated for its temple and oracle of Apollo, who is hence called Grynæus Apollo (Virg., Æn., iv., 345). It possessed also a good harbor. Parmenion, the general of Alexander, destroyed the city and sold the inhabitants as slaves. It was never again restored.

GRYPS or GRYPHUS (Γρύψ), a griffin, a fabulous animal, dwelling in the Rhipæan Mountains, between the Hyperboreans and the one-eyed Arimaspians, and guarding the gold of the north. The Arimaspians mounted on horseback, and attempted to steal the gold, and hence arose the hostility between the horse and the griffin. The body of the griffin was that of a lion, while the head and wings were those of an eagle. It is probable that the origin of the belief in griffins must be looked for in the East, where it seems to have been very ancient. They are also mentioned among the fabulous animals which guarded the gold of India.

GUGERNI or GUBERNI, a people of Germany, probably of the same race as the Sygambri, crossed the Rhine, and settled on its left bank, between the Ubii and Batavi.

GULUSSA, a Numidian, second son of Masinissa, and brother to Micipsa and Mastanabal. On the death of Masinissa in B.C. 149, he succeeded, along with his brothers, to the dominions of their father. He left a son named MASSIVA.

[GUNEUS (Γουνεύς), one of the Greek leaders before Troy, who commanded the Perrhæbians from Thessaly.]

GYGÆUS LACUS (ἡ Γυγαίη λίμνη: now Lake Marmora), a small lake in Lydia, between the rivers Hermus and Hyllus, north of Sardis, the necropolis of which city was on its banks. I was afterward called Coloē.

GYGES (Γύγης). 1. The first king of Lydia of the dynasty of the Mermnadæ, dethroned Candaules, and succeeded to the kingdom, as related under CANDAULES. He reigned B.C. 716-678. He sent magnificent presents to Delphi and carried on various wars with the cities of Asia Minor, such as Miletus, Smyrna, Colophon and Magnesia. "The riches of Gyges" became a proverb.—[2. A companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

GYLIPPUS (Γύλιππος), a Spartan, son of Cleandridas, was sent as the Spartan commander to Syracuse, to oppose the Athenians, B.C. 414. Under his command the Syracusans annihilated the great Athenian armament, and took Demosthenes and Nicias prisoners, 413. In 404 he was commissioned by Lysander, after the capture of Athens, to carry home the treasure; but, by opening the seams of the sacks underneath he abstracted a considerable portion. The theft was discovered, and Gylippus went at once into exile. The syllable Γυλ- in the name of Gylippus is probably identical with the Latin Gilva

GYNÆCOPŎLIS (Γυναικόπολις, or Γυναικῶν πόλις), a city in the Delta of Egypt, on the western bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Momemphis. It was the capital of the Nomos Gynæcopolites.

GYNDES (Γύνδης), a river of Assyria, rising in the country of the Matieni (in the mountains of Kurdistan), and flowing into the Tigris, celebrated through the story that Cyrus the Great drew off its waters by three hundred and sixty channels. (Herod., i., 189). It is very difficult to identify this river: perhaps it is the same as the Delas or Silla (now Diala), which falls into the Tigris just above Ctesiphon and Seleucia. It is also doubtful whether the Sindes of Tacitus (Ann., xi., 10) is the same river.

[GȲRÆ (Γυραὶ πέτραι), certain rocks in the Icarian Sea, or, as others suppose, in the Ægean, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

GYRTŌN, GYRTŌNA (Γυρτών, Γυρτώνη: Γυρτώνιος: ruins near Tatari), an ancient town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, on the Peneus.

GȲTHĒUM, GYTHĪUM (τὸ Γύθειον, Γύθιον: Γυθεάτης: now Palæopolis near Marathonisi), an ancient town on the coast of Laconia, founded by the Achæans, lay near the head of the Laconian Bay, southwest of the mouth of the River Eurotas. It served as the harbor of Sparta, and was important in a military point of view. In the Persian war the Lacedæmonian fleet was stationed at Gytheum, and here the Athenians under Tolmides burned the Lacedæmonian arsenal, B.C. 455. After the battle of Leuctra (370) it was taken by Epaminondas. In 195 it was taken by Flamininus, and made independent of Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, whereupon it joined the Achæan league.

GYZANTES (Γύζαντες), a people in the western part of Libya (Northern Africa), whose country was rich in honey and wax. They seem to have dwelt in Byzacium.

HADES or PLUTO (Ἀιδης, Πλούτων, or poetically Ἀΐδης, Ἀϊδωνεύς, Πλουτεύς) the God of the Nether World. Plato observes that people preferred calling him Pluto (the giver of wealth) to pronouncing the dreaded name of Hades or Aïdes. Hence we find that in ordinary life and in the mysteries the name Pluto became generally established, while the poets preferred the ancient name Aïdes or the form Pluteus. The Roman poets use the names DIS, ORCUS, and TARTARUS, as synonymous with Pluto, for the god of the Nether World. Hades was son of Saturn (Cronus) and Rhea, and brother of Jupiter (Zeus) and Neptune (Poseidon). His wife was Persephŏne or Proserpina, the daughter of Ceres (Demeter), whom he carried off from the upper world, as is related elsewhere. Vid. p. 248, a. In the division of the world among the three brothers, Hades (Pluto) obtained the Nether World, the abode of the shades, over which he ruled. Hence he is called the infernal Jupiter (Zeus) (Ζεὺς καταχθόνιος), or the king of the shades (ἄναξ ἐνέρων). He possessed a helmet which rendered the wearer invisible, and later traditions stated that this helmet was given him as a present by the Cyclopes after their delivery from Tartarus. Ancient story mentions both gods and men who were honored by Hades (Pluto) with the temporary use of this helmet. His character is described as fierce and inexorable, whence of all the gods he was most hated by mortals. He kept the gates of the lower world closed (and is therefore called Πυλάρτης), that no shades might be able to escape or return to the region of light. When mortals invoked him, they struck the earth with their hands; the sacrifices which were offered to him and Persephone (Proserpina) consisted of black sheep; and the person who offered the sacrifice had to turn away his face. The ensign of his power was a staff, with which, like Hermes (Mercury), he drove the shades into the lower world. There he sat upon a throne with his consort Persephone (Proserpina). Like the other gods, he was not a faithful husband; the Furies are called his daughters; the nymph Mintho, whom he loved, was metamorphosed by Persephone (Proserpina) into a plant called mint; and the nymph Leuce, with whom he was likewise in love, was changed by him after her death into a white poplar, and transferred to Elysium. Being the king of the lower world, Pluto is the giver of all the blessings that come from the earth: he is the possessor and giver of all the metals contained in the earth, and hence his name Pluto. He bears several surnames referring to his ultimately assembling all mortals in his kingdom, and bringing them to rest and peace; such as Polydegmon, Polydectes, Clymenus, &c. He was worshipped throughout Greece and Italy. We possess few representations of this divinity, but in those which still exist, he resembles his brother Jupiter (Zeus) and Neptune (Poseidon), except that his hair falls down his forehead, and that his appearance is dark and gloomy. His ordinary attributes are the key of Hades and Cerberus. In Homer Aïdes is invariably the name of the god; but in later times it was transferred to his house, his abode or kingdom, so that it became a name for the nether world.

HĂDRĬĀNŎPŎLIS (Ἀδριανόπολις: Ἀδριανοπολίτης: now Adrianople), a town in Thrace, on the right bank of the Hebrus, in an extensive plain founded by the Emperor Hadrian. It was strongly fortified; possessed an extensive commerce; and in the Middle Ages was the most important town in the country after Constantinople.

HĂDRĬĀNOTHĒRA or -Æ (Ἀδριανουθῆρα), a city in Mysia, between Pergamus and Miletopolis, founded by the Emperor Hadrian.

HĂDRĬĀNUS, P. ÆLIUS, usually called HADRIAN, Roman emperor A.D. 117–138, was born at Rome, A.D. 76. He lost his father at the age of ten, and was brought up by his kinsman Ulpius Trajanus (afterward emperor) and by Cælius Attianus. From an early age he studied with zeal the Greek language and literature. At the age of fifteen he went to Spain, where he entered upon his military career; and he subsequently served as military tribune in Lower Mœsia. After the elevation of Trajan to the throne (98), he married Julia Sabina, a granddaughter of Trajan's sister Marciana. This marriage was brought about through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan; and from this time Hadrian rose rapidly in the emperor's favor. He was raised successively to the quæstorship (101), prætorship (107), and consulship (109). He accompanied Trajan in most of his expeditions, and distinguished himself in the second war against the Dacians, 104–106; was made governor of Pannonia in 108; and subsequently fought under Trajan against the Parthians. When Trajan's serious illness obliged him to leave the East, he placed Hadrian at the head of the army. Trajan died at Cilicia on his journey to Rome (117). Hadrian, who pretended that he had been adopted by Trajan, was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria, and the senate ratified the election. Hadrian's first care was to make peace with the Parthians, which he obtained by relinquishing the conquests of Trajan east of the Euphrates. He returned to Rome in 118; but almost immediately afterward set out for Mœsia, in consequence of the invasion of this province by the Sarmatians. After making peace with the Sarmatians, and suppressing a formidable conspiracy which had been formed against his life by some of the most distinguished Roman nobles, all of whom he put to death, he returned to Rome in the course of the same year. He sought to gain the good will of the senate by gladiatorial exhibitions and liberal largesses, and he also cancelled all arrears of taxes due to the state for the last fifteen years. The remainder of Hadrian's reign was disturbed by few wars. He spent the greater part of his reign in travelling through the various provinces of the empire, in order that he might inspect personally the state of affairs in the provinces, and apply the necessary remedies wherever mismanagement was discovered. He commenced these travels in 119, visiting first Gaul, Germany, and Britain, in the latter of which countries he caused a wall to be built from the Solway to the mouth of the River Tyne. He afterward visited Spain, Africa, and the East, and took up his residence at Athens for three years (123–126). Athens was his favorite city, and he conferred upon its inhabitants many privileges. The most important war during his reign was that against the Jews, which broke out in 131. The Jews had revolted in consequence of the establishment of a colony, under the name of Ælia Capitolina, on the site of Jerusalem, and of their having been forbidden to practice the rite of circumcision. The war was carried on by the Jews as a national struggle with the most desperate fury, and was not brought to an end till 136, after the country had been nearly reduced to a wilderness. During the last few years of Hadrian's life, his health failed. He became suspicious and cruel, and put to death several persons of distinction. As he had no children, he adopted L. Ælius Verus, and gave him the title of Cæsar in 136. Verus died on the first of January, 138, whereupon Hadrian adopted Antoninus, afterward surnamed Pius, and conferred upon him likewise the title of Cæsar. In July in the same year, Hadrian himself died, in his sixty-second year, and was succeeded by ANTONINUS. The reign of Hadrian may be regarded as one of the happiest periods in Roman history. His policy was to preserve peace with foreign nations, and not to extend the boundaries of the empire, but to secure the old provinces, and promote their welfare. He paid particular attention to the administration of justice in the provinces as well as in Italy. His reign forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. It was at Hadrian's command that the jurist Silvius Julianus drew up the edictum perpetuum, which formed a fixed code of laws. Some of the laws promulgated by Hadrian are of a truly humane character, and aimed at improving the public morality of the time. The various cities which he visited received marks of his favor or liberality; in many places he built aqueducts, and in others harbors or other public buildings, either for use or ornament. But what has rendered his name more illustrious than any thing else are the numerous and magnificent architectural works which he planned and commenced during his travels, especially at Athens, in the southwestern part of which he built an entirely new city, Adrianopolis. We can not here enter into an account of the numerous buildings he erected; it is sufficient to direct attention to his villa at Tibur, which has been a real mine of treasures of art, and his mausoleum at Rome, which forms the groundwork of the present Castle of St. Angelo. Hadrian was a patron of learning and literature as well as of the arts, and he cultivated the society of poets, scholars, rhetoricians, and philosophers. He founded at Rome a scientific institution under the name of Athenæum, which continued to flourish for a long time after him. He was himself an author, and wrote numerous works, both in prose and in verse, all of which are lost, with the exception of a few epigrams in the Greek and Latin Anthologies.

HADRIĀNUS, the rhetorician. Vid. ADRIANUS.

HADRŪMĒTUM or ADRŪMĒTUM (Ἀδρύμη: now Hammeim), a flourishing city founded by the Phœnicians in northern Africa, on the eastern coast of Byzacena, of which district it was the capital under the Romans. Trajan made it a colony; and it was afterward called Justinianopolis.

[HÆDILIA (MONS), a mountain of Italy, near Horace's Sabine farm, infested by wolves, (Hædiliæ lupos, Hor., Carm., i., 17, 9.)]

HÆMON (Αἵμων). 1. Son of Pelasgus and father of Thessalus, from whom the ancient name of Thessaly, HÆMONIA or ÆMONIA, was believed to be derived. The Roman poets frequently use the adjective Hæmonius as equivalent to Thessalian.—2. Son of Lycaon, and the reputed founder of Hæmonia in Arcadia.—3. Son of Creon of Thebes, was destroyed, according to some accounts, by the sphinx; but, according to other traditions, he was in love with Antigone, and killed himself on hearing that she was condemned by his father to be entombed alive.

HÆMŎNĬA (Αἱμονία). Vid. HÆMON, No. 1.

HÆMUS (Αἷμος), son of Boreas and Orithyia, husband of Rhodope, and father of Hebrus. As he and his wife presumed to assume the names of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera), both were metamorphosed into mountains.

HÆMUS (ὁ Αἷμος, τὸ Αἷμον: now Balkan), a lofty range of mountains, separating Thrace and Mœsia, extended from Mount Scomius, or, according to Herodotus, from Mount Rhodope on the west to the Black Sea on the east. The name is probably connected with the Sanscrit himâ (whence comes the word Himalaya), the Greek χειμών, and the Latin hiems; and the mountains were so called on account of their cold and snowy climate. The height of these mountains was greatly exaggerated by the ancients: the mean height does not exceed three thousand or four thousand feet above the sea. There are several passes over them; but the one most used in antiquity was in the western part of the range, called "Succi" or "Succorum angustiæ," also "Porta Trajani" (now Sulu Derbend), between Philippopolis and Serdica. The later province of "Hæmimontus" in Thrace derived its name from this mountain.

HAGNŪS (Ἁγνοῦς, -οῦντος: Ἁγνούσιος: near Markopulo), a demus in Attica, west of Pæania, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

HALÆ (Ἁλαί, Ἅλαι, Ἁλαί: Ἁλαιεύς). 1. H. ARAPHĒNĬDES (Ἀραφηνίδες), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Ægeis, was situated on the eastern coast of Attica, and served as the harbor of Brauron: it possessed a temple of Diana (Artemis).—2. H. ÆXŌNĬDES (Αἰξωνίδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, situated on the western coast.—3. A town, formerly of the Opuntii Locri, afterward of Bœotia, situated on the Opuntian Gulf.

[HALCYŎNE. Vid. ALCYŎNE.]

HALES (Ἅλης). 1. A river of Ionia in Asia Minor, near Colophon, celebrated for the coldness of its water.—2. A river in the island of Cos.

HALESA ('Αλαισα: Halesinus: now Torre di Pittineo), a town on the northern coast of Sicily, on the River HALESUS (now Pittineo), was founded by the Greek mercenaries of Archonides, a chief of the Siculi, and was originally called ARCHONIDES. It became a place of considerable importance, and was in later times a municipium, exempt from taxes.

HALESUS, a chief of the Auruncans and Oscans, son of a soothsayer, and an ally of Turnus, slain by Pallas. He came to Italy from Argos in Greece, whence he is called Agamemnonius, Atrides, or Argolicus. He is said to have founded the town of Falerii.

HALEX. Vid. ALEX.

HALIACMON ('Αλιάκμων: now Vistritza Indje-Karasu), an important river in Macedonia, rises in the Tymphæan Mountains, flows first southeast through Elimæa, then northeast, forming the boundary between Eordæa and Pieria, and falls into the Thermaic Gulf in Bottiæis. Cæsar (B. C. iii., 36) incorrectly makes it the boundary between Macedonia and Thessaly.

HALIARTUS ('Αλίαρτος: 'Αλιάρτιος: now Mazi), an ancient town in Bœotia, on the south of the Lake Copais. It was destroyed by Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B.C. 480), but was rebuilt, and appears as an important place in the Peloponnesian war. Under its walls Lysander lost his life (395). It was destroyed by the Romans (171), because it supported Perseus, king of Macedonia, and its territory was given to the Athenians.

HALIAS ('Αλιάς: 'Αλιεύς: now Haliza), a district on the coast of Argolis, between Asine and Hermione, so called because fishing was the chief occupation of its inhabitants. Their town was called HALIÆ ('Αλιαί) or HALIES ('Αλιεῖς).

HALICARNASSUS ('Αλικαρνασσός, Ion. 'Αλικαρνησσός: 'Αλικαρνασσεύς, Halicarnassensis, Halicarnassius: ruins at Budrum), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, stood in the southwestern part of Caria, on the northern coast of the Sinus Ceramicus, opposite to the island of Cos. It was said to have been founded by Dorians from Trœzene, and was at first called Zephyra. It was one of the six cities that originally formed the Dorian Hexapolis, but it was early excluded from the confederacy, as a punishment for the violation, by one of its citizens, of a law connected with the common worship of the Triopian Apollo. (Herod., i., 144.) With the rest of the coast of Asia Minor, it fell under the dominion of the Persians, at an early period of whose rule Lygdamis made himself tyrant of the city, and founded a dynasty which lasted for some generations. His daughter Artemisia assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. Vid. ARTEMISIA, No. 1. Her grandson, Lygdamis, was overthrown by a revolution, in which Herodotus is said to have taken part. Vid. HERODOTUS. In the Peloponnesian war, we find Halicarnassus, with the other Dorian cities of Caria, on the side of the Athenians; but we do not know what was its form of government, until the re-establishment, by HECATOMNUS, of a dynasty ruling over all Caria, with its capital first at Mylasa, and afterward at Halicarnassus, and virtually independent of Persia; before B.C. 380. It seems not unlikely that both this and the older dynasty of tyrants of Halicarnassus were a race of native Carian princes, whose ascendency at Halicarnassus may be accounted for by the prevalence of the Carian element in its population at an early period. Hecatomnus left three sons and two daughters, who all succeeded to his throne in the following order: Mausolus, Artemisia, Idrieus, Ada, Pixodarus, and Ada again. In B.C. 334, Alexander took the city, after an obstinate defence by the Persian general Memnon, and destroyed it. From this blow it never recovered, although it continued to be celebrated for the Mausoleum, a magnificent edifice which Artemisia II. built as a tomb for Mausolus, and which was adorned with the works of the most eminent Greek sculptors of the age. Fragments of these sculptures, which were discovered built into the walls of the citadel of Budrum, are now in the British Museum. With the rest of Caria, Halicarnassus was assigned by the Romans, after their victory over Antiochus the Great, to the government of Rhodes, and was afterward united to the province of Asia. The city was very strongly fortified, and had a fine harbor, which was protected by the island of ARCONNESUS: its citadel was called Salmacis (Σαλμακίς), from the name of a spring which rose from the hill on which it stood. Halicarnassus was the birth-place of the historians HERODOTUS and DIONYSIUS.

HALICYÆ ('Αλικύαι: Halicyensis: now Salemi?), a town in the northwest of Sicily, between Entella and Lilybæum, was long in the possession of the Carthaginians, and in Cicero's time was a municipium, exempt from taxes.

HALIMUS ('Αλιμοῦς, -οῦντος: 'Αλιμούσιος) a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, on the western coast, a little south of Athens.

HALIPEDON ('Αλίπεδον), a plain near the Piræus, probably between the Piræus and the Academy.

HALIRRHOTHIUS ('Αλιῤῥόθιος), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Euryte, attempted to violate Alcippe, daughter of Mars (Ares) and Agraulos, but was slain by Mars (Ares). Mars (Ares) was brought to trial by Neptune (Poseidon) for this murder, on the hill at Athens, which was hence called Areopagus, or the Hill of Ares (Mars.)

[HALITHERSES ('Αλιθέρσης). 1. A son of Mastor of Ithaca, celebrated as a hero and diviner.—2. A son of Ancæus and Samia, the daughter of the River Mæander.]

[HALIUS ('Αλιος), second son of Alcinous, distinguished himself in dancing, as described in the eighth book of the Odyssey.]

HALIUSA ('Αλιοῦσα? now Karavi), an island in the Argolic Gulf.

HALIZONES ('Αλίζωνες and -οι), a people of Bithynia, with a capital city Alybe ('Αλύβη), mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans.

HALMYDESSUS. Vid. SALMYDESSUS.

HALMYRIS ('Αλμυρίς, sc. λίμνη), a bay of the sea in Mœsia, formed by the southern mouth of the Danube, with a town of the same name upon it.

HALONESUS ('Αλόνησος, 'Αλόννησος: 'Αλονήσιος, 'Αλονησίτης: now Khiliodromia), an island of the Ægean Sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and east of Sciathos and Peparethos, with a town of the same name upon it. The possession of this island occasioned great disputes between Philip and the Athenians: there is a speech on this subject among the extant orations of Demosthenes, but it was probably written by Hegesippus.

HALOSYDNE ('Αλοσύδνη), "the Sea-born," a surname of Amphitrite and Thetis.

HALUNTIUM. Vid. ALUNTIUM.

HALUS. Vid. ALUS.

HALYCUS ('Άλυκος: now Platani), a river in the south of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Heraclea Minoa.

HALYS ('Άλυς: now Kizil-Irmak, i. e., the Red River), the greatest river of Asia Minor, rises in that part of the Anti-Taurus range called Paryadres, on the borders of Armenia Minor and Pontus, and, after flowing west by south through Cappadocia, turns to the north and flows through Galatia to the borders of Paphlagonia, where it takes a northeastern direction, dividing Paphlagonia from Pontus, and at last falls into the Euxine (now Black Sea) between Sinope and Amisus. In early times it was a most important boundary, ethnographical as well as political. It divided the Indo-European races which peopled the western part of Asia Minor from the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) races of the rest of southwestern Asia, and it separated the Lydian empire from the Medo-Persian, until, by marching over it to meet Cyrus, Crœsus began the contest which at once ended in the overthrow of the former and the extension of the latter to the Ægean Sea.

HAMADRYADES. Vid. NYMPHÆ.

HAMAXITUS ('Αμαξιτός), a small town on the coast of the Troad, near the Promontory Lectum; said to have been the first settlement of the Teucrian immigrants from Crete. The surrounding district was called 'Αμαξιτία. Lysimachus removed the inhabitants to Alexandrea Troas.

HAMAXOBII ('Αμαξόβιοι), a people in European Sarmatia, in the neighborhood of the Palus Mæotis, were a nomad race, as their name signifies.

HAMILCAR ('Αμίλκας). The two last syllables of this name are the same as Melcarth, the tutelary deity of the Tyrians, called by the Greeks Hercules, and the name probably signifies "the gift of Melcarth." 1. Son of Hanno, or Mago, commander of the great Carthaginian expedition to Sicily, B.C. 480, which was defeated and almost destroyed by Gelon at Himera. Vid. GELON. Hamilcar fell in the battle.—2. Surnamed Rhodanus, was sent by the Carthaginians to Alexander after the fall of Tyre, B.C. 332. On his return home he was put to death by the Carthaginians for having betrayed their interests.—3. Carthaginian governor in Sicily at the time that Agathocles was rising into power. At first he supported the party at Syracuse, which had driven Agathocles into exile, but he afterward espoused the cause of Agathocles, who was thus enabled to make himself master of Syracuse, 317.—4. Son of Gisco, succeeded the preceding as Carthaginian commander in Sicily, 311. He carried on war against Agathocles, whom he defeated with great slaughter, and then obtained possession of the greater part of Sicily; but he was taken prisoner while besieging Syracuse, and was put to death by Agathocles.—5. A Carthaginian general in the first Punic war, must be carefully distinguished from the great Hamilcar Barca [No. 6.] In the third year of the war (262) he succeeded Hanno in the command in Sicily, and carried on the operations by land with success. He made himself master of Enna and Camarina, and fortified Drepanum. In 257 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet on the northern coast of Sicily, and fought a naval action with the Roman consul C. Atilius Regulus. In the following year (256), he and Hanno commanded the great Carthaginian fleet, which was defeated by the two consuls M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulso, off Ecnomus, on the southern coast of Sicily. He was afterward one of the commanders of the land forces in Africa opposed to Regulus.—6. Surnamed BARCA, an epithet supposed to be related to the Hebrew Barak, and to signify "lightning." It was merely a personal appellation, and is not to be regarded as a family name, though, from the great distinction that he obtained, we often find the name of Barcine applied either to his family or his party in the state. He was appointed to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily in the eighteenth year of the first Punic war, 247. At this time the Romans were masters of the whole of Sicily, with the exception of Drepanum and Lilybæum, both of which were blockaded by them on the land side. Hamilcar established himself, with his whole army, on a mountain named Herctè (now Monte Pellegrino), in the midst of the enemy's country, and in the immediate neighborhood of Panormus, one of their most important cities. Here he succeeded in maintaining his ground, to the astonishment alike of friends and foes, for nearly three years. In 244 he abruptly quitted Herctè, and took up a still stronger position on Mount Eryx, after seizing the town of that name. Here he also maintained himself, in spite of all the efforts of the Romans to dislodge him. After the great naval defeat of the Carthaginians by Lutatius Catulus (241), Hamilcar, who was still at Eryx, was intrusted by the Carthaginian government with the conclusion of the peace with the Romans. On his return home, he had to carry on war in Africa with the Carthaginian mercenaries, whom he succeeded in subduing after an arduous struggle of three years (240–238). Hamilcar now formed the project of establishing in Spain a new empire, which should not only be a source of strength and wealth to Carthage, but should be the point from whence he might at a subsequent period renew hostilities against Rome. He crossed over into Spain soon after the termination of the war with the mercenaries; but we know nothing of his operations in the country, save that he obtained possession of a considerable portion of Spain, partly by force of arms, and partly by negotiation. After remaining in Spain nearly nine years, he fell in battle (229) against the Vettones. He was succeeded in the command by his son-in-law Hasdrubal. He left three sons, the celebrated Hannibal, Hasdrubal, and Mago.—7. Son of Gisco, Carthaginian governor of Melite (now Malta) which surrendered to the Romans, 218.—8. Son of Bomilcar, one of the generals in Spain, 215, with Hasdrubal and Mago, the two sons of Barca. The three generals were defeated by the two Scipios while besieging Illiturgi.—9. A Carthaginian who excited a general revolt of the Gauls in Upper Italy about 200, and took the Roman colony of Placentia. On the defeat of the Gauls by the consul Cethegus in 197, he was taken prisoner.

HANNIBAL (Ἀννίβας). The name signifies "the grace or favor of Baal;" the final syllable bal, of such common occurrence in Punic names, always having reference to this tutelary deity of the Phœnicians. 1. Son of Gisco, and grandson of HAMILCAR [No. 1]. In 409 he was sent to Sicily, at the head of a Carthaginian army, to assist the Segestans against the Selinuntines. He took Selinus, and subsequently Himera also. In 406 he again commanded a Carthaginian army in Sicily along with Himilco, but died of a pestilence while besieging Agrigentum.—2. Son of Gisco, was the Carthaginian commander at Agrigentum when it was besieged by the Romans, 262. After standing a siege of seven months, he broke through the enemy's lines, leaving the town to its fate. After this he carried on the contest by sea, and for the next year or two ravaged the coast of Italy; but in 260 he was defeated by the consul Duilius. In 259 he was sent to the defence of Sardinia. Here he was again unfortunate, and was seized by his own mutinous troops and put to death.—3. Son of Hamilcar (perhaps HAMILCAR, No. 5), succeeded in carrying succors of men and provisions to Lilybæum when it was besieged by the Romans, 250.—4. A general in the war of the Carthaginians against the mercenaries (240–238), was taken prisoner by the insurgents, and crucified.—5. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and one of the most illustrious generals of antiquity, was born B.C. 247. He was only nine years old when his father took him with him into Spain, and it was on this occasion that Hamilcar made him swear upon the altar eternal hostility to Rome. Child as he then was, Hannibal never forgot his vow, and his whole life was one continual struggle against the power and domination of Rome. He was early trained in arms under the eye of his father, and was present with him in the battle in which Hamilcar perished (229). Though only eighteen years old at this time, he had already displayed so much courage and capacity for war, that he was intrusted by Hasdrubal (the son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar) with the chief command of most of the military enterprises planned by that general. He secured to himself the devoted attachment of the army under his command; and, accordingly, on the assassination of Hasdrubal (221), the soldiers unanimously proclaimed their youthful leader commander-in-chief, which the government at Carthage forthwith ratified. Hannibal was at this time in the twenty-sixth year of his age. There can be no doubt that he already looked forward to the invasion and conquest of Italy as the goal of his ambition; but it was necessary for him first to complete the work which had been so ably begun by his two predecessors, and to establish the Carthaginian power as firmly as possible in Spain. In two campaigns he subdued all the country south of the Iberus, with the exception of the wealthy town of Saguntum. In the spring of 219 he proceeded to lay siege to Saguntum, which he took after a desperate resistance which lasted nearly eight months. Saguntum lay south of the Iberus, and was therefore not included under the protection of the treaty which had been made between Hasdrubal and the Romans; but as it had concluded an alliance with the Romans, the latter regarded its attack as a violation of the treaty between the two nations. On the fall of Saguntum, the Romans demanded the surrender of Hannibal; and when this demand was refused, war was declared, and thus began the long and arduous struggle called the second Punic war. In the spring of 218 Hannibal quitted his winter-quarters at New Carthage and commenced his march for Italy. He crossed the Pyrenees, and marched along the southern coast of Gaul. The Romans sent the consul P. Scipio to oppose him in Gaul; but when Scipio arrived in Gaul, he found that Hannibal had already reached the Rhone, and that it was impossible to overtake him. After Hannibal had crossed the Rhone, he continued his march up the left bank of the river as far as its confluence with the Isère. Here he struck away to the right, and commenced his passage across the Alps. He probably crossed the Alps by the pass of the Little St. Bernard, called in antiquity the Graian Alps. His army suffered much from the attacks of the Gaulish mountaineers, and from the natural difficulties of the road, which were enhanced by the lateness of the season (the beginning of October, at which time the snows have already commenced in the high Alps). So heavy were his losses, that when he at length emerged from the valley of Aosta into the plains of the Po, he had with him no more than twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse. During Hannibal's march over the Alps, P. Scipio had sent on his own army into Spain, under the command of his brother Cneius, and had himself returned to Italy. He forthwith hastened into Cisalpine Gaul, took the command of the prætor's army, which he found there, and led it against Hannibal. In the first action, which took place near the Ticinus, the cavalry and light-armed troops of the two armies were alone engaged; the Romans were completely routed, and Scipio himself severely wounded. Scipio then crossed the Po and withdrew to the hills on the left bank of the Trebia, where he was soon after joined by the other consul, Ti. Sempronius Longus. Here a second and more decisive battle was fought. The Romans were completely defeated, with heavy loss, and the remains of their army took refuge within the walls of Placentia. This battle was fought toward the end of 218. Hannibal was now joined by all the Gaulish tribes, and he was able to take up his winter-quarters in security. Early in 217 he descended by the valley of the Macra into the marshes on the banks of the Arno. In struggling through these marshes great numbers of his horses and beasts of burden perished, and he himself lost the sight of one eye by a violent attack of ophthalmia. The consul Flaminius hastened to meet him, and a battle was fought on the Lake Trasimenus, in which the Roman army was destroyed; thousands fell by the sword, among whom was the consul himself; thousands more perished in the lake, and no less than fifteen thousand prisoners fell into the hands of Hannibal. Hannibal now marched through the Apennines into Picenum, and thence into Apulia, where he spent a great part of the summer. The Romans had collected a fresh army, and placed it under the command of the dictator Fabius Maximus, who had prudently avoided a general action, and only attempted to harass and annoy the Carthaginian army. Meanwhile the Romans had made great preparations for the campaign of the following year (216). The two new consuls, L. Æmilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, marched into Apulia at the head of an army of little less than ninety thousand men. To this mighty host Hannibal gave battle in the plains on the right bank of the Aufidus, just below the town of Cannæ. The Roman army was again annihilated: between forty and fifty thousand men are said to have fallen in the field, among whom was the consul Æmilius Paulus, both the consuls of the preceding year, above eighty senators, and a multitude of the wealthy knights who composed the Roman cavalry. The other consul, Varro, escaped with a few horsemen to Venusia, and a small band of resolute men forced their way from the Roman camp to Canusium; all the rest were killed, dispersed, or taken prisoners. This victory was followed by the revolt from Rome of most of the nations in the south of Italy. Hannibal established his army in winter-quarters in Capua, which had espoused his side. Capua was celebrated for its wealth and luxury, and the enervating effect which these produced upon the army of Hannibal became a favorite theme of rhetorical exaggeration in later ages. The futility of such declamations is sufficiently shown by the simple fact that the superiority of that army in the field remained as decided as ever. Still it may be truly said that the winter spent at Capua, 216–215, was in great measure the turning point of Hannibal's fortune, and from this time the war assumed an altered character. The experiment of what he could effect with his single army had now been fully tried, and, notwithstanding all his victories, it had decidedly failed; for Rome was still unsubdued, and still provided with the means of maintaining a protracted contest. From this time the Romans in great measure changed their plan of operations, and, instead of opposing to Hannibal one great army in the field, they hemmed in his movements on all sides, and kept up an army in every province of Italy, to thwart the operations of his lieutenants, and check the rising disposition to revolt. It is impossible here to follow the complicated movements of the subsequent campaign, during which Hannibal himself frequently traversed Italy in all directions. In 215 Hannibal entered into negotiations with Philip, king of Macedonia, and Hieronymus of Syracuse, and thus sowed the seeds of two fresh wars. From 214 to 212 the Romans were busily engaged with the siege of Syracuse, which was at length taken by Marcellus in the latter of these years. In 212 Hannibal obtained possession of Tarentum; but in the following year he lost the important city of Capua, which was recovered by the Romans after a long siege. In 209 the Romans also recovered Tarentum. Hannibal's forces gradually became more and more weakened; and his only object now was to maintain his ground in the south until his brother Hasdrubal should appear in the north of Italy, an event to which he had long looked forward with anxious expectation. In 207 Hasdrubal at length crossed the Alps, and descended into Italy; but he was defeated and slain on the Metaurus. Vid. Hasdrubal, No. 3. The defeat and death of Hasdrubal was decisive of the fate of the war in Italy. From this time Hannibal abandoned all thoughts of offensive operations, and collected together his forces within the peninsula of Bruttium. In the fastnesses of the wild and mountainous region he maintained his ground good for nearly four years (207-203). He crossed over to Africa toward the end of 203 in order to oppose P. Scipio. In the following year (202) the decisive battle was fought near Zama. Hannibal was completely defeated with great loss. All hopes of resistance were now at an end, and he was one of the first to urge the necessity of an immediate peace. The treaty between Rome and Carthage was not finally concluded until the next year (201). By this treaty Hannibal saw the object of his whole life frustrated, and Carthage effectually humbled before her imperious rival. But his enmity to Rome was unabated; and, though now more than forty-five years old, he set himself to work to prepare the means for renewing the contest at no distant period. He introduced the most beneficial reforms into the state, and restored the ruined finances; but, having provoked the enmity of a powerful party at Carthage, they denounced him to the Romans as urging on Antiochus III., king of Syria, to take up arms against Rome. Hannibal was obliged to flee from Carthage, and took refuge at the court of Antiochus, who was at this time (193) on the eve of a war with Rome. Hannibal in vain urged the necessity of carrying the war at once into Italy, instead of awaiting the Romans in Greece. On the defeat of Antiochus (190), the surrender of Hannibal was one of the conditions of the peace granted to the king. Hannibal, however, foresaw his danger, and took refuge at the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia. Here he found for some years a secure asylum; but the Romans could not be at ease so long as he lived, and T. Quintius Flamininus was at length dispatched to the court of Prusias to demand the surrender of the fugitive. The Bithynian king was unable to resist; and Hannibal, perceiving that flight was impossible, took poison, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, about the year 183. Of Hannibal's abilities as a general it is unnecessary to speak: all the great masters of the art of war, from Scipio to the Emperor Napoleon, have concurred in their homage to his genius. But in comparing Hannibal with any other of the great leaders of antiquity, we must ever bear in mind the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed. Feebly and grudgingly supported by the government at home, he stood alone, at the head of an army composed of mercenaries of many nations. Yet not only did he retain the attachment of these men, unshaken by any change of fortune, for a period of more than fifteen years, but he trained up army after army; and, long after the veterans that had followed him over the Alps had dwindled into an inconsiderable remnant, his new levies were still as invincible as their predecessors.

HANNIBALLIĀNUS. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife Theodora, and half-brother of Constantine the Great. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine.—2. Son of the elder, brother of the younger Delmatius, was also put to death on the death of Constantine.

HANNIBĂLIS CASTRA. Vid. CASTRA, No. 2.

HANNO (Ἄννων), one of the most common names at Carthage. Only the most important persons of the name can be mentioned. 1. One of the Carthaginian generals who fought against Agathocles in Africa, B.C. 310.—2. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Messana at the beginning of the first Punic war, 294. In consequence of his surrendering the citadel of this city to the Romans, he was crucified on his return home.—3. Son of Hannibal, was sent to Sicily by the Carthaginians with a large force immediately after the capture of Messana, 264, where he carried on the war against the Roman consul Appius Claudius. In 262 he again commanded in Sicily, but failed in relieving Agrigentum, where Hannibal was kept besieged by the Romans. Vid. HANNIBAL, No. 2. In 256 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet, along with Hamilcar, at the great battle of Ecnomus.—4. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet, which was defeated by Lutatius Catulus off the Ægates, 241. On his return home he was crucified.—5. Surnamed the Great, apparently for his successes in Africa. We do not, however, know against what nations of Africa his arms were directed, nor what was the occasion of the war. He was one of the commanders in the war against the mercenaries in Africa after the end of the first Punic war (240–238). From this time forward he appears to have taken no active part in any of the foreign wars or enterprises of Carthage. But his influence in her councils at home was great; he was leader of the aristocratic party, and, as such, the chief adversary of Hamilcar Barca and his family. On all occasions, from the landing of Barca in Spain till the return of Hannibal from Italy, a period of above thirty-five years, Hanno is represented as thwarting the measures of that able and powerful family, and taking the lead in opposition to the war with Rome, the great object to which all their efforts were directed. He survived the battle of Zama, 202.—6. A Carthaginian officer left in Spain by Hannibal when that general crossed the Pyrenees, 218. He was shortly afterward defeated by Cn. Scipio, and taken prisoner.—7. Son of Bomilcar, one of the most distinguished of Hannibal's officers. He commanded the right wing at the battle of Cannæ (216), and is frequently mentioned during the succeeding years of the war. In 203 he took the command of the Carthaginian forces in Africa, which he held till the arrival of Hannibal.—8. A Carthaginian general, who carried on the war in Sicily after the fall of Syracuse, 211. He left Sicily in the following year, when Agrigentum was betrayed to the Romans.—9. The last commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Capua when it was besieged by the Romans 212–111).—10. A Carthaginian navigator, under whose name we possess a Periplus (περίπλους), which was originally written in the Punic language, and afterward translated into Greek. The author had held the office of suffetes, or supreme magistrate at Carthage, and he is said by Pliny to have undertaken the voyage when Carthage was in a most flourishing condition. Hence it has been conjectured that he was the same as the Hanno, the father or son of Hamilcar, who was killed at Himera, B.C. 480; but this is quite uncertain. In the Periplus itself Hanno says that he was sent out by his countrymen to undertake a voyage beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and to found Libyphœnician towns, and that he sailed with a body of colonists to the number of thirty thousand. On his return from his voyage, he dedicated an account of it, inscribed on a tablet, in the temple of Saturn (Cronos). It is therefore presumed that our periplus is a Greek version of the contents of that Punic tablet. Edited by Falconer, Lond., 1797, with an English translation.

HARMA (τὸ Ἅρμα: Ἁρματεύς). 1. A small place in Bœotia, near Tanagra, said to have been so called from the harma or chariot of Adrastus, which broke down here, or from the chariot of Amphiaraus, who was here swallowed up by the earth along with his chariot.—2. A small place in Attica, near Phyle.

HARMĂTŪS (Ἁρματοῦς), a city and promontory on the coast of Æolis in Asia Minor, on the northern side of the Sinus Elaïticus.

HARMŎDĬUS and ARISTOGĪTON (Ἁρμόδιος, Ἀριστογείτων), Athenians, of the blood of the GEPHYRÆI, were the murderers of Hipparchus, brother of the tyrant Hippias, in B.C. 514. Aristogiton was strongly attached to the young and beautiful Harmodius, who returned his affection with equal warmth. Hipparchus endeavored to withdraw the youth's love to himself, and, failing in this, resolved to avenge the slight by putting upon him a public insult. Accordingly, he took care that the sister of Harmodius should be summoned to bear one of the sacred baskets in some religious procession, and when she presented herself for the purpose, he caused her to be dismissed and declared unworthy of the honor. This fresh insult determined the two friends to slay both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias as well. They communicated their plot to a few friends, and selected for their enterprise the day of the festival of the great Panathenæa, the only day on which they could appear in arms without exciting suspicion. When the appointed time arrived, the two chief conspirators observed one of their accomplices in conversation with Hippias. Believing, therefore, that they were betrayed, they slew Hipparchus. Harmodius was immediately cut down by the guards. Aristogiton at first escaped, but was afterward taken, and was put to the torture; but he died without revealing the names of any of the conspirators. Four years after this Hippias was expelled, and thenceforth Harmodius and Aristogiton obtained among the Athenians of all succeeding generations the character of patriots, deliverers, and martyrs—names often abused, indeed, but seldom more grossly than in the present case. Their deed of murderous vengeance formed a favorite subject of drinking songs. To be born of their blood was esteemed the highest of honors, and their descendants enjoyed an immunity from public burdens. Their statues, made of bronze by Antenor, were set up in the Agora. When Xerxes took the city, he carried these statues away, and new ones, the work of CRITIAS, were erected in 477. The original statues were afterward sent back to Athens by Alexander the Great.

HARMŎNĬA (Ἁρμονία), daughter of Mars (Ares) and Venus (Aphrodite), or, according to others, of Jupiter (Zeus) and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, in Samothrace. When Minerva (Athena) assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, Jupiter (Zeus) gave him Harmonia for his wife, and all the gods of Olympus were present at the marriage. On the wedding-day Cadmus received a present of a peplus, which afterward became fatal to all who possessed it. Harmonia accompanied Cadmus when he was obliged to quit Thebes, and shared his fate. Vid. CADMUS. Polynices, who inherited the fatal necklace, gave it to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband, Amphiaraus, to undertake the expedition against Thebes. Through Alcmæon, the son of Eriphyle, the necklace came into the hands of Arsinoë, next into those of the sons of Phegeus, Pronous and Agenor, and lastly into those of the sons of Alcmæon, Amphoterus and Acarnan, who dedicated it in the temple of Minerva (Athena) Pronœa at Delphi.

HARPĂGĬA or -ĬUM (Ἁρπαγεῖα or -άγιον), a small town in Mysia, between Cyzicus and Priapus, the scene of the rape of Ganymedes, according to some legends.

HARPĂGUS (Ἅρπαγος). 1. A noble Median, whose preservation of the infant Cyrus, with the events consequent upon it, are related under CYRUS. He became one of the generals of Cyrus, and conquered the Greek cities of Asia Minor.—2. A Persian general, under Darius I., took Histiæus prisoner.

[HARPALION (Ἁρπαλίων), a Paphlagonian, son of Pylæmenes, and guest-friend of Paris: he was slain by Meriones in the Trojan war.]

HARPĂLUS (Ἅρπαλος). 1. A Macedonian of noble birth, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia as superintendent of the treasury. After the conquest of Darius, he was left by Alexander in charge of the royal treasury, and with the administration of the wealthy satrapy of Babylon. Here, during Alexander's absence in India, he gave himself up to the most extravagant luxury and profusion, and squandered the treasures intrusted to him. When he heard that Alexander, contrary to his expectations, was returning from India, he fled from Babylon with about five thousand talents and a body of six thousand mercenaries, and crossed over to Greece, B.C. 324. He took refuge at Athens, where he employed his treasures to gain over the orators, and induce the people to support him against Alexander and his vicegerent, Antipater. Among those whom he thus corrupted are said to have been Demades, Charicles, the son-in-law of Phocion, and even Demosthenes himself. Vid. DEMOSTHENES. But he failed in his general object, for Antipater having demanded his surrender from the Athenians, it was resolved to place him in confinement until the Macedonians should send for him. He succeeded in making his escape from prison, and fled to Crete where he was assassinated soon after his arrival by Thibron, one of his own officers.—2. A Greek astronomer, introduced some improvements in the cycle of CLEOSTRATUS. Harpalus lived before METON.

HARPĂLŸCE (Ἁρπαλύκη). 1. Daughter of Harpalycus, king in Thrace. As she lost her mother in infancy, she was brought up by her father with the milk of cows and mares, and was trained in all manly exercises. After the death of her father, she lived in the forests as a robber, being so swift in running that horses were unable to overtake her. At length she was caught in a snare by shepherds, who killed her.—2. Daughter of Clymenus and Epicaste, was seduced by her own father. To revenge herself she slew her younger brother, and served him up as food before her father. The gods changed her into a bird.

[HARPALŸCUS (Ἁρπάλυκος). 1. Vid. HARPALYCE, No. 1.—2. A Trojan warrior, companion of Æneas, slain by Camilla.

HARPĂSA (Ἅρπασα: now Arepas), a city of Caria, on the River HARPASUS.

HARPĂSUS (Ἅρπασος). 1. (now Arpa-Su), a river of Caria, flowing north into the Mæander, into which it falls opposite to Nysa.—2. (now Harpa-Su), a river of Armenia Major, flowing south into the Araxes. Xenophon, who crossed it with the ten thousand Greeks, states its width as four plethra (about four hundred feet).

HARPĪNA or HARPINNA (Ἅρπινα, Ἅρπιννα), a town in Elis Pisatis, near Olympia, said to have been called after a daughter of Asopus.

[HARPOCRATES. Vid. HORUS.

HARPOCRĂTĬON, VALĔRĬUS, a Greek grammarian of Alexandrea, of uncertain date, the author of an extant dictionary to the works of the ten Attic orators, entitled Περὶ τῶν λέξεων τῶν δέκα ῥητόρων, or Λεξικὸν τῶν δέκα ῥητόρων. It contains not only explanations of legal and political terms, but also accounts of persons and things mentioned in the Attic orators, and is a work of great value. The best editions are the one published at Leipzig, 1824, and the one by Bekker, Berlin, 1833.

HARPYIÆ (Ἅρπυιαι), the Harpies, that is, the Robbers or Spoilers, are in Homer nothing but personified storm-winds, who are said to carry off any one who had suddenly disappeared from the earth. Thus they carried off the daughters of King Pandareus, and gave them as servants to the Erynnyes. Hesiod describes them as daughters of Thaumas by the Oceanid Electra, fair-locked and winged maidens, who surpassed winds and birds in the rapidity of their flight. But even in Æschylus they appear as ugly creatures with wings; and later writers represent them as most disgusting monsters, being birds with the heads of maidens, with long claws, and with faces pale with hunger. They were sent by the gods to torment the blind Phineus, and whenever a meal was placed before him, they darted down from the air and carried it off: later writers add, that they either devoured the food themselves, or rendered it unfit to be eaten. Phineus was delivered from them by Zetes and Calais, sons of Boreas, and two of the Argonauts. Vid. p. 91, a. Hesiod mentions two Harpies, Ocypete and Aëllo: later writers three: but [the]ir names are not the same in all accounts. [Bes]ides the two already mentioned, we find Aël[lopu]s, Nicothoë, Ocythoë, Ocypode, Celæno, [P]odoë. Virgil places them in the islands [call]ed Strophades, in the Ionian Sea (Æn., iii., [210]), where they took up their abode after they [had] been driven away from Phineus. In the [Xanth]ian Harpy monument recently brought from [Lyc]ia to England, the Harpies are represented [in] the act of carrying off the daughters of Pan[dar]eus.

[H]ARUDES, a people in the army of Ariovistus [(B].C. 58), supposed to be the same as the CHA[RUDES] mentioned by Ptolemy, and placed by [hi]m in the Chersonesus Cimbrica.

HASDRŬBAL (Ἀσδρούβας), a Carthaginian name, [pro]bably signifies one whose help is Baal. 1. [Son] of Hanno, a Carthaginian general in the [firs]t Punic war. He was one of the two gen[era]ls defeated by Regulus B.C. 256. In 254 he [was] sent into Sicily with a large army, and re[ma]ined in the island four years. In 250 he was totally defeated by Metellus, and was put [to] death on his return to Carthage.—2. A Car[th]aginian, son-in-law of Hamilcar Barca, on whose death, in 229, he succeeded to the com[m]and in Spain. He ably carried out the plans of his father-in-law for extending the Cartha[gi]nian dominions in Spain, and intrusted the conduct of most of his military enterprises to the young Hannibal. He founded New Carthage, and concluded with the Romans the celebrated treaty which fixed the Iberus as the boundary between the Carthaginian and Roman dominions. He was assassinated by a slave, whose master he had put to death (221), and was succeeded in the command by HANNIBAL.—3. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and brother of Hannibal. When Hannibal set out for Italy (218), Hasdrubal was left in the command in Spain, and there fought for some years against the two Scipios. In 207 he crossed the Alps and marched into Italy, in order to assist Hannibal; but he was defeated on the Metaurus by the consuls C. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator, his army was destroyed, and he himself fell in the battle. His head was cut off and thrown into Hannibal's camp.—4. One of Hannibal's chief officers, commanded the left wing of the Carthaginian army at the battle of Cannæ (216).—5. Surnamed the Bald (Calvus), commander of the Carthaginian expedition to Sardinia in the second Punic war, 215. He was defeated by the Roman prætor T. Manlius, taken prisoner, and carried to Rome.—6. Son of Gisco, one of the Carthaginian generals in Spain during the second Punic war. He fought in Spain from 214 to 206. After he and Mago had been defeated by Scipio in the latter of these years, he crossed over to Africa, where he succeeded in obtaining the alliance of Syphax by giving him his daughter Sophonisba in marriage. In conjunction with Syphax, Hasdrubal carried on war against Masinissa, but he was defeated by Scipio, who landed in Africa in 204. He was condemned to death for his ill success by the Carthaginian government, but he still continued in arms against the Romans. On the arrival of Hannibal from Italy his sentence was reversed; but the popular feeling against him had not subsided, and, in order to escape death from his enemies, he put an end to his life by poison.—7. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet in Africa in 208, must be distinguished from the preceding.—8. Surnamed the Kid (Hædus), one of the leaders of the party at Carthage favorable to peace toward the end of the second Punic war.—9. General of the Carthaginians in the third Punic war. When the city was taken he surrendered to Scipio, who spared his life. After adorning Scipio's triumph, he spent the rest of his life in Italy.

HATERĬUS, Q., a senator and rhetorician in the age of Augustus and Tiberius, died A.D. 26, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

HĒBĒ (Ἥβη), called JUVENTAS by the Romans the goddess of youth, was a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera). She waited upon the gods, and filled their cups with nectar before Ganymedes obtained this office; and she is further represented as assisting her mother Juno (Hera) in putting the horses to her chariot, and in bathing and dressing her brother Mars (Ares). She married Hercules after he was received among the gods, and bore to him two sons, Alexiares and Anticetus. Later traditions represent her as a divinity who had it in her power to make aged persons young again. At Rome there were several temples of Juventas. She is even said to have had a chapel on the Capitol before the temple of Jupiter was built there

HEBROMĂGUS. Vid. EBUROMAGUS.

HEBRON (Ἑβρών, Χεβρών· Ἑβρώνιος: now El-Khulil), a city in the south of Judæa, as old as the times of the patriarchs, and the first capital of the kingdom of David, who reigned there seven and a half years as king of Judah only.

HEBRUS (Ἕβρος: now Maritza), the principal river in Thrace, rises in the mountains of Scomius and Rhodope, flows first southeast and then southwest, becomes navigable for smaller vessels at Philippopolis, and for larger ones at Hadrianopolis, and falls into the Ægean Sea near Ænos, after forming by another branch an estuary called STENTORIS LACUS. The Hebrus was celebrated in Greek legends. On its banks Orpheus was torn to pieces by the Thracian women; and it is frequently mentioned in connection with the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus.)

HECAERGE (Ἑκαέργη). 1. Daughter of Boreas, and one of the Hyperborean maidens, who were believed to have introduced the worship of Diana (Artemis) into Delos.—2. A surname of Diana (Artemis), signifying the goddess who hits at a distance.

HĔCĂLE (Ἑκάλη), a poor old woman, who hospitably received Theseus when he had gone out for the purpose of killing the Marathonian bull. She vowed to offer to Jupiter (Zeus) a sacrifice for the safe return of the hero; but as she died before his return, Theseus ordained that the inhabitants of the Attic tetrapolis should offer a sacrifice to her and Jupiter (Zeus) Hecalus, or Hecaleius.

[HECĂMĒDE (Ἑκαμήδη), daughter of Arsinous, taken prisoner by Achilles, when he captured the island of Tenedos: she became the slave of Nestor.]

HECATÆUS (Ἑκαταῖος). 1. Of Miletus, one of the earliest and most distinguished Greek historians and geographers. He was the son of Hegesander, and belonged to a very ancient and illustrious family. We have only a few particulars of his life. In B.C. 500 he endeavored to dissuade his countrymen from revolting from the Persians; and when this advice was disregarded, he gave them some sensible counsel respecting the conduct of the war, which was also neglected. Previous to this, Hecatæus had visited Egypt and many other countries. He survived the Persian wars, and appears to have died about 476. He wrote two works: 1. Περίοδος γῆς, or Περιήγησις, divided into two parts, one of which contained a description of Europe, and the other of Asia, Egypt, and Libya. Both parts were subdivided into smaller sections, which are sometimes quoted under their respective names, such as Hellespontus, &c. 2. Γενεαλογίαι or Ἱστορίαι, in four books, contained an account of the poetical fables and traditions of the Greeks. His work on geography was the more important, as it embodied the results of his numerous travels. He also corrected and improved the map of the earth drawn up by ANAXIMANDER. Herodotus knew the works of Hecatæus well, and frequently controverts his opinions. Hecatæus wrote in the Ionic dialect in a pure and simple style. The fragments of his works are collected by Klausen, Hecatæi Milesii Fragmenta, Berlin, 1831, and by C. and Th. Müller, Frag. Hist. Græc., Paris, 1841.—2. Of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great and Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, appears to have accompanied the former on his Asiatic expedition. He was a pupil of the skeptic Pyrrho, and is himself called a philosopher, critic, and grammarian. In the reign of the first Ptolemy he travelled up the Nile as far as Thebes. He was the author of several works, of which the most important were, 1. A History of Egypt. 2. A work on the Hyperboreans. 3. A history of the Jews, frequently referred to by Josephus and other ancient writers. This work was declared spurious by Origen: modern critics are divided in their opinions.

HĔCĂTE (Ἑκάτη), a mysterious divinity, commonly represented as a daughter of Persæus or Perses and Asteria, and hence called Perseis. She is also described as a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Ceres (Demeter), or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Pheræa or Juno (Hera), or of Latona (Leto) or Tartarus. Homer does not mention her. According to the most genuine traditions, she appears to have been an ancient Thracian divinity, and a Titan, who ruled in heaven, on the earth, and in the sea, bestowing on mortals wealth, victory, wisdom, good luck to sailors and hunters, and prosperity to youth and to the flocks of cattle. She was the only one among the Titans who retained this power under the rule of Jupiter (Zeus), and she was honored by all the immortal gods. The extensive power possessed by Hecate was probably the reason that she was subsequently identified with several other divinities, and at length became a mystic goddess, to whom mysteries were celebrated in Samothrace and in Ægina. In the Homeric hymn to Ceres (Demeter) she is represented as taking an active part in the search after Proserpina (Persephone), and when the latter was found, as remaining with her as her attendant and companion. Vid. p. 248, a. She thus became a deity of the lower world, and is described in this capacity as a mighty and formidable divinity. In consequence of her being identified with other divinities, she is said to have been Selene or Luna in heaven, Artemis or Diana in earth, and Persephone or Proserpina in the lower world. Being thus, as it were, a three-fold goddess, she is described with three bodies or three heads, the one of a horse, the second of a dog, and the third of a lion. Hence her epithets Tergemina, Triformis, Triceps, &c. From her being an infernal divinity, she came to be regarded as a spectral being, who sent at night all kinds of demons and terrible phantoms from the lower world, who taught sorcery and witchcraft, and dwelt at places where two roads crossed, on tombs, and near the blood of murdered persons. She herself wandered about with the souls of the dead, and her approach was announced by the whining and howling of dogs. At Athens there were very many small statues or symbolical representations of Hecate (ἑκάταια), placed before or in houses, and on spots where two roads crossed: it would seem that people consulted such Hecatæa as oracles. At the close of every month dishes with food were set out for her and other averters of evil at the points where two roads crossed; and the food was consumed by poor people. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of dogs, honey, and black female lambs.

HECATOMNUS (Ἑκατόμνως), king or dynast of Caria in the reign of Artaxerxes III. He left three sons, Mausselus, Idrieus, and Pixodarus, all of whom, in their turn, succeeded him in the sovereignty; and two daughters, Artemisia and Ada.

[HECATOMPOLIS (Ἑκατόμπολις, i. e., having one hundred cities), appellation of the island Crete, from the one hundred cities it was said to have had in ancient times.]

HECATOMPY̆LOS (Ἑκατόμπυλος, i. e., having one hundred gates). 1. An epithet of Thebes in Egypt. Vid. THEBÆ.—2. A city in the middle of Parthia, twelve hundred and sixty stadia or one hundred and thirty-three Roman miles from the Caspiæ Pylæ; enlarged by Seleucus, and afterward used by the Parthian kings as a royal residence.

HĔCĂTON (Ἑκάτων), a Stoic philosopher, a native of Rhodes, studied under Panætius, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost.

HECATONNĒSI (Ἑκατόννησοι: now Mosko nisi), a group of small islands, between Lesbos and the coast of Æolis, on the southern side of the mouth of the Gulf of Adramyttium. The name, one hundred islands, was indefinite; the real number was reckoned by some at twenty, by others at forty. Strabo derives the name, not from ἑκατόν, one hundred, but from Ἕκατος, a surname of Apollo.

HECTOR (Ἕκτωρ), the chief hero of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks, was the eldest son of Priam and Hecuba, the husband of Andromache, and father of Scamandrius. He fought with the bravest of the Greeks, and at length slew Patroclus, the friend of Achilles. The death of his friend roused Achilles to the fight. The other Trojans fled before him into the city. Hector alone remained without the walls, though his parents implored him to return; but when he saw Achilles his heart fail on him, and he took to flight. Thrice did he race round the city, pursued by the swift-footed Achilles, and then fell pierced by Achilles's spear. Achilles tied Hector's body to his chariot, and thus dragged him into the camp of the Greeks; but later traditions relate that he first dragged the body thrice around the walls of Ilium. At the command of Jupiter (Zeus), Achilles surrendered the body to the prayers of Priam, who buried it at Troy with great pomp. Hector is one of the noblest conceptions of the Iliad. He is the great bulwark of Troy, and even Achilles trembles when he approaches him. He has a presentiment of the fall of his country, but he perseveres in his heroic resistance, preferring death to slavery and disgrace. Besides these virtues of a warrior, he is distinguished also by those of a man: his heart is open to the gentle feelings of a son, a husband, and a father.

Hecŭba (Ἑκάβη), daughter of Dymas in Phrygia, or of Cisseus, king of Thrace. She was the wife of Priam, king of Troy, to whom she bore Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Cassandra, and many other children. On the capture of Troy, she was carried away as a slave by the Greeks. According to the tragedy of Euripides, which bears her name, she was carried by the Greeks to Chersonesus, and there saw her daughter Polyxena sacrificed. On the same day the waves of the sea washed on the coast the body of her last son Polydorus, who had been murdered by Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whose care he had been intrusted by Priam. Hecuba thereupon killed the children of Polymestor, and tore out the eyes of their father. Agamemnon pardoned her the crime, and Polymestor prophesied that she should be metamorphosed into a she-dog, and should leap into the sea at a place called Cynossema. It was added that the inhabitants of Thrace endeavored to stone her, but that she was metamorphosed into a dog, and in this form howled through the country for a long time. According to other accounts she was given as a slave to Ulysses, and in despair leaped into the Hellespont; or, being anxious to die, she uttered such invectives against the Greeks, that the warriors put her to death, and called the place where she was buried Cynossema, with reference to her impudent invectives.

Hēdȳlĭus Mons (Ἡδύλειον), a range of mountains in Bœotia, west of the Cephisus.

Hēdȳlus (Ἥδυλος), son of Melicertus, was a native of Samos or of Athens, and an epigrammatic poet. Eleven of his epigrams are in the Greek Anthology. He was a contemporary and rival of Callimachus, and lived, therefore, about the middle of the third century B.C.

[Hedymeles, a celebrated performer on the lyre in the time of Domitian (Juv., vi., 382).]

[Hegelŏchus (Ἡγέλοχος). 1. An Athenian officer, sent to protect Mantinea from the threatened attack of Epaminondas, B.C. 362.—2. One of Alexander's officers, who accompanied him into Asia, and perished at the battle of Arbela.]

Hēgēmon (Ἡγήμων), of Thasos, a poet of the old comedy at Athens, but more celebrated for his parodies, of which kind of poetry he was the inventor. He was nicknamed Φακῆ, on account of his fondness for that kind of pulse. He lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war; and his parody of the Gigantomachia was the piece to which the Athenians were listening when the news was brought to them in the theatre of the destruction of the expedition to Sicily.

Hēgēmŏne (Ἡγημόνη), the leader or ruler, is the name of one of the Athenian Charites or Graces. Hegemone was also a surname of Diana (Artemis) at Sparta and in Arcadia.

[Hegesandridas (Ἡγησανδρίδας), a Spartan naval commander during the Peloponnesian war, defeated the Athenian fleet off Oropus, but did not follow up his victory by attacking Athens.]

Hēgēsĭănax (Ἡγησιάναξ), an historian of Alexandrea, is said to have been the real author of the work called Troica, which went under the name of Cephalon or Cephalion. He appears to be the same as the Hegesianax who was sent by Antiochus the Great as one of his envoys to the Romans in B.C. 196 and 193.

Hēgēsĭas (Ἡγησίας). 1. Of Magnesia, a rhetorician and historian, lived about B.C. 290, and wrote the history of Alexander the Great. He was regarded by some as the founder of that degenerate style of composition which bore the name of the Asiatic. His own style was destitute of all vigor and dignity, and was marked chiefly by childish conceits and minute prettinesses.—2. Of Salamis, supposed by some to have been the author of the Cyprian poem, which, on better authority, is ascribed to Stasinus.—3. A Cyrenaic philosopher, who lived at Alexandrea in the time of the Ptolemies, perhaps about B.C. 260. He wrote a work containing such gloomy descriptions of human misery that it drove many persons to commit suicide; hence he was surnamed Peisithanatos (Πεισιθάνατος). He was, in consequence, forbidden to teach by Ptolemy.

Hēgēsĭas (Ἡγησίας) and Hēgĭas (Ἡγίας), two Greek statuaries, whom many scholars identify with one another. They lived at the period immediately preceding that of Phidias. The chief work of Hegesias was the statues of Castor and Pollux, which are supposed to be the same as those which now stand on the stairs leading to the Capitol.

Hēgēsīnus (Ἡγησίνους), of Pergamum, the successor of Evander and the immediate predecessor of Carneades in the chair of the Academy, flourished about B.C. 185.

Hegesippus (Ἡγήσιππος). 1. An Athenian orator, and a contemporary of Demosthenes, to whose political party he belonged. The grammarians ascribe to him the oration on Halonesus, which has come down to us under the name of Demosthenes.—2. A poet of the new comedy, flourished about B.C. 300.—3. A Greek historian of Mecyberna, wrote an account of the peninsula of Pallene.

Hēgēsĭpȳla (Ἡγησιπύλη), daughter of Olorus, king of Thrace, and wife of Miltiades.

[Hegesistratus (Ἡγησίστρατος). 1. Natural son of Pisistratus, made by his father tyrant of Sigeum.—2. Son of Aristagoras of Samos, came before the battle of Mycale on an embassy to the Spartan king Leotychides from the Samians to treat for the liberation of his countrymen from the Persian yoke.]

Hēgĭas. Vid. Hegesias.

Hĕlĕna (Ἑλένη), daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Leda, and sister of Castor and Pollux (the Dioscuri). She was of surpassing beauty. In her youth she was carried off by Theseus and Pirithous to Attica. When Theseus was absent in Hades, Castor and Pollux undertook an expedition to Attica, to liberate their sister. Athens was taken, Helen delivered, and Æthra, the mother of Theseus, made prisoner, and carried as a slave of Helen to Sparta. According to some accounts, she bore to Theseus a daughter, Iphigenia. On her return home she was sought in marriage by the noblest chiefs from all parts of Greece. She chose Menelaus for her husband, and became by him the mother of Hermione. She was subsequently seduced and carried off by Paris to Troy. For details, vid. Paris and Menelaus. The Greek chiefs who had been her suitors resolved to revenge her abduction, and accordingly sailed against Troy. Hence arose the celebrated Trojan war, which lasted ten years. During the course of the war she is represented as showing great sympathy with the Greeks. After the death of Paris toward the end of the war, she married his brother Deiphobus. On the capture of Troy, which she is said to have favored, she betrayed Deiphobus to the Greeks, and became reconciled to Menelaus, whom she accompanied to Sparta. Here she lived with him for some years in peace and happiness; and here, according to Homer, Telemachus found her solemnizing the marriage of her daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus. The accounts of Helen's death differ. According to the prophecy of Proteus in the Odyssey, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium. Others relate that she and Menelaus were buried at Therapne in Laconia, where their tomb was seen by Pausanias. Others, again, relate, that after the death of Menelaus she was driven out of Peloponnesus by the sons of the latter and fled to Rhodes, where she was tied to a tree and strangled by Polyxo: the Rhodians expiated the crime by dedicating a temple to her under the name of Helena Dendritis. According to another tradition she married Achilles in the island of Leuce, and bore him a son, Euphorion. The Egyptian priests told Herodotus that Helen never went to Troy, but that when Paris reached Egypt with Helen on his way to Troy, she was detained by Proteus, king of Egypt; and that she was restored to Menelaus when he visited Egypt in search of her after the Trojan war, finding that she had never been at Troy.

Hĕlĕna, Flāvĭa Jūlĭa. 1. The mother of Constantine the Great. When her husband Constantius was raised to the dignity of Cæsar by Diocletian, A.D. 292, he was compelled to repudiate his wife, to make way for Theodora, the step-child of Maximianus Herculius. Subsequently, when her son succeeded to the purple, Helena was treated with marked distinction, and received the title of Augusta. She died about 328. She was a Christian, and is said to have discovered at Jerusalem the sepulchre of our Lord, together with the wood of the true cross.—2. Daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married her cousin Julian the Apostate 355, and died 360.

Hĕlĕna (Ἑλένη). 1. (Now Makronisi) a small and rocky island between the south of Attica and Ceos, formerly called Cranaë.—2. The later name of Illiberris in Gaul.

Hĕlĕnus (Ἕλενος). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, was celebrated for his prophetic powers, and also fought against the Greeks in the Trojan war. In Homer we have no further particulars about Helenus; but in later traditions he is said to have deserted his countrymen and joined the Greeks. There are likewise various accounts respecting his desertion of the Trojans. According to some, he did so of his own accord; according to others, he was ensnared by Ulysses, who was anxious to obtain his prophecy respecting the fall of Troy. Others, again, relate that, on the death of Paris, Helenus and Deiphobus contended for the possession of Helena, and that Helenus being conquered, fled to Mount Ida, where he was taken prisoner by the Greeks. After the fall of Troy he fell to the share of Pyrrhus. He foretold Pyrrhus the sufferings which awaited the Greeks who returned home by sea, and prevailed upon him to return by land to Epirus. After the death of Pyrrhus he received a portion of the country, and married Andromache, by whom he became the father of Cestrinus. When Æneas, in his wanderings, arrived in Epirus, he was hospitably received by Helenus, who also foretold him the future events of his life.—2. Son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by Lanassa, daughter of Agathocles. He accompanied his father to Italy B.C. 280, and was with him when Pyrrhus perished at Argos, 272. He then fell into the hands of Antigonus Gonatas, who, however, sent him back in safety to Epirus.—[3. Son of Œnops, a Greek, slain by Hector before Troy.]

Hēlĭădæ and Hēlĭădes (Ἡλιάδαι and Ἡλιάδες), the sons and daughters of Helios (the Sun). The name Heliades is given especially to Phaëthusa, Lampetia, and Phœbe, the daughters of Helios and the nymph Clymene, and the sisters of Phaëthon. They bewailed the death of their brother Phaëthon so bitterly on the banks of the Eridanus, that the gods, in compassion, changed them into poplar-trees and their tears into amber. Vid. Eridanus.

[Helicaon (Ἑλικάων), son of Antenor, and husband of Laodice; he is said to have founded Patavium in Italy.]

Hĕlĭce (Ἑλίκη), daughter of Lycaon, was beloved by Jupiter (Zeus), but Juno (Hera), out of jealousy, metamorphosed her into a she-bear, whereupon Jupiter (Zeus) placed her among the stars under the name of the Great Bear.

Hĕlĭce (Ἑλίκη: Ἑλικώνιος, Ἑλικεύς). 1. The ancient capital of Achaia, said to have been founded by Ion, possessed a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), which was regarded as the great sanctuary of the Achæan race. Helice was swallowed up by an earthquake together with Bura, B.C. 373. The earth sunk deep into the ground, and the place on which the cities stood was ever afterward covered by the sea.—2. An ancient town in Thessaly, which disappeared in early times.

Hĕlĭcon (Ἑλικών), son of Acesas, a celebrated artist. Vid. Acesas.

Hĕlĭcon (Ἑλικών: now Helicon, Palæo-Buni, Turk. Zagora), a celebrated range of mountains in Bœotia, between the Lake Copais and the Corinthian Gulf, was covered with snow the greater part of the year, and possessed many romantic ravines and lovely valleys. Helicon was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, the latter of whom are hence called Ἑλικώνιαι παρθένοι and Ἑλικωνιάδες νυμφαί by the Greek poets, and Heliconiades and Heliconides by the Roman poets. Here sprung the celebrated fountains of the Muses, AGANIPPE and HIPPOCRENE. At the fountain of Hippocrene was a grove sacred to the Muses, which was adorned with some of the finest works of art. On the slopes and in the valleys of the mountains grew many medicinal plants, which may have given occasion to the worship of Apollo as the healing god.

HĔLIŎDŌRUS (Ἡλιόδωρος). 1. An Athenian surnamed Periegetes (Περιηγητής), probably lived about B.C. 164, and wrote a description of the works of art in the Acropolis at Athens. This work was one of the authorities for Pliny's account of the Greek artists.—2. A rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, whom Horace mentions as the companion of his journey to Brundisium (Sat., i., 5, 2, 3.)—3. A Stoic philosopher at Rome, who became a delator in the reign of Nero. (Juv., Sat., i., 33.)—4. A rhetorician, and private secretary to the Emperor Hadrian.—5. Of Emesa in Syria, lived about the end of the fourth century of our era, and was bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. Before he was made bishop he wrote a romance in ten books, entitled Æthiopica, because the scene of the beginning and the end of the story is laid in Æthiopia. This work has come down to us, and is far superior to the other Greek romances. It relates the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea. Though deficient in those characteristics of modern fiction which appeal to the universal sympathies of our nature, the romance of Heliodorus is interesting on account of the rapid succession of strange and not altogether improbable adventures, the many and various characters introduced, and the beautiful scenes described. The language is simple and elegant. The best editions are by Mitscherlich, in his Scriptores Græci Erotici, Argentorat., 1798, and by Coraë, Paris, 1804.—6. Of Larissa, the author of a short work on optics, still extant, chiefly taken from Euclid's Optics: edited by Mantani, Pistor., 1758.

HELIOGABĂLUS. Vid. ELAGABALUS.

HĔLIOPŎLIS (Ἡλίου πόλις or Ἡλιούπολις, i. e., the City of the Sun). 1. (Heb. Baalath: now Baalbek, ruins), a celebrated city of Syria, a chief seat of the worship of Baal, one of whose symbols was the sun, and whom the Greeks identified with Apollo, as well as with Jupiter (Zeus): hence the Greek name of the city. With the worship of Baal, here as elsewhere, was associated that of Astarte, whom the Greeks identified with Venus (Aphrodite). It was situated in the middle of Cœle-Syria, at the western foot of Anti-Libanus, on a rising ground at the northeastern extremity of a large plain which reaches almost to the sea, and which is well watered by the River Leontes (now Kahr-el-Kasimiyeh), near whose sources Heliopolis was built; the sources of the Orontes also are not far north of the city. The situation of Heliopolis necessarily made it a place of great commercial importance, as it was on the direct road from Egypt and the Red Sea, and also from Tyre to Syria, Asia Minor, and Europe; and hence, probably, the wealth of the city, to which its ruins still bear witness. We know, however, very little of its history. It was made a Roman colony by the name of Colonia Julia Augusta Felix Heliopolitana, and colonized by veterans of the fifth and eighth legions, under Augustus. Antoninus Pius built the great temple of Jupiter (i. e., Baal), of which the ruins still exist; and there are medals which show, in addition to other testimony, that it was favored by several of the later emperors. All the existing ruins are of the Roman period, and most of them probably of later date than the great temple just mentioned; but it is impossible to determine their exact times. They consist of a large quadrangular court in front of the great temple, another hexagonal court outside of this, and in front of all, a portico or propylæa, approached by a flight of steps. Attached to one corner of the quadrangular court is a smaller but more perfect temple, and at some distance from all these buildings there is a circular edifice, of a unique and very interesting architectural form. There is also a single Doric column on a rising ground, and traces of the city walls.—2. (In the Old Testament, On, or Bethshemesh: now Matarieh, ruins northeast of Cairo), a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Heliopolites, stood on the eastern side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, a little below the apex of the Delta, and near the canal of Trajan, and was, in the earliest period of which we have any record, a chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the sun. Here, also, was established the worship of Mnevis, a sacred bull similar to Apis. The priests of Heliopolis were renowned for their learning. It suffered much during the invasion of Cambyses; and by the time of Strabo it was entirely ruined.

HĒLĬOS (Ἥλιος or Ἠέλιος), called SOL by the Romans, the god of the sun. He was the son of Hyperion and Thea, and a brother of Selene and Eos. From his father he is frequently called HYPERIŎNĬDES or HYPERĪON, the latter of which is an abridged form of the patronymic HYPERIONION. In the Homeric hymn on Helios he is called a son of Hyperion and Euryphaëssa. Homer describes Helios as giving light both to gods and men: he rises in the east from Oceanus, traverses the heaven, and descends in the evening into the darkness of the west and Oceanus. Later poets have marvellously embellished this simple notion. They tell of a most magnificent palace of Helios in the east, containing a throne occupied by the god, and surrounded by personifications of the different divisions of time. They also assign him a second palace in the west, and describe his horses as feeding upon herbs growing in the islands of the Blessed. The manner in which Helios during the night passes from the western into the eastern ocean is not mentioned either by Homer or Hesiod, but later poets make him sail in a golden boat, the work of Hephæstus, round one half of the earth and thus arrive in the east at the point from which he has to rise again. Others represent him as making his nightly voyage while slumbering in a golden bed. The horses and chariot with which Helios traverses the heavens are not mentioned in the Iliad and Odyssey, but first occur in the Homeric hymn on Helios, and both are described minutely by later poets. Helios is described as the god who sees and hears every thing, and was thus able to reveal to Vulcan (Hephæstus) the faithlessness of Venus (Aphrodite), and to Ceres (Demeter) the abduction of her daughter. At a later time Helios became identified with Apollo, though the two gods were originally quite distinct; but the identification was never carried out completely, for no Greek poet ever made Apollo ride in the chariot of Helios through the heavens, and among the Romans we find this idea only after the time of Virgil. The representations of Apollo with rays around his head, to characterize him as identical with the sun, belong to the time of the Roman empire. The island of Thrinacia (Sicily) was sacred to Helios, and there he had flocks of sheep and oxen, which were tended by his daughters Phaethusa and Lampetia. Later traditions ascribe to him flocks also in the island of Erythīa; and it may be remarked, in general, that sacred flocks, especially of oxen, occur in most places where the worship of Helios was established. His descendants are very numerous; and the surnames and epithets given him by the poets are mostly descriptive of his character as the sun. Temples of Helios (ἡλιεῖα) existed in Greece at a very early time: and in later times we find his worship established in various places, and especially in the island of Rhodes, where the famous colossus was a representation of the god. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of white rams, boars, bulls, goats, lambs, especially white horses, and honey. Among the animals sacred to him, the cock is especially mentioned. The Roman poets, when speaking of the god of the sun (Sol), usually adopt the notions of the Greeks. The worship of Sol was introduced at Rome, especially after the Romans had become acquainted with the East, though traces of the worship of the sun and moon occur at an early period.

HELISSŌN (Ἑλισσών or Ἑλισσοῦς), a small town in Arcadia, on a river of the same name, which falls into the Alphēus.

[HELIUM OSTIUM, one of the mouths of the Rhine, formed by the union with the Mosa.]

HELLANĪCUS (Ἑλλάνικος). 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the most eminent of the Greek logographers or early Greek historians, was in all probability born about B.C. 496, and died 411. We have no particulars of his life, but we may presume that he visited many of the countries, of whose history he gave an account. He wrote a great number of genealogical, chronological, and historical works, which are cited under the titles of Troica, Æolica, Persica, &c. One of his most popular works was entitled Ἱέρειαι τῆς Ἥρας: it contained a chronological list of the priestesses of Juno (Hera) at Argos, compiled from the records preserved in the temple of the goddess of this place. This work was one of the earliest attempts to regulate chronology, and was made use of by Thucydides, Timæus, and others. The fragments of Hellanicus are collected by Sturz, Hellanici Lesb. Fragmenta, Lips., 1826; and by C. and Th. Müller, Fragm. Histor. Græc., Paris, 1841.—2. A Greek grammarian, a disciple of Agathocles, and apparently a contemporary of Aristarchus, wrote on the Homeric poems.

HELLAS, HELLĒNES. Vid. GRÆCIA.

HELLE (Ἕλλη), daughter of Athamas and Nephĕle, and sister of Phrixus. When Phrixus was to be sacrificed (vid. PHRIXUS), Nephele rescued her two children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Mercury (Hermes); but, between Sigeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea, which was thence called the Sea of Helle (Hellespontus). Her tomb was shown near Pactya on the Hellespont.

HELLEN (Ἕλλην), son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Dorippe, husband of Orseis, and father of Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. He was king of Phthia in Thessaly, and was succeeded by his son Æolus. He is the mythical ancestor of all the Hellenes; from his two sons Æolus and Dorus were descended the Æolians and Dorians; and from his two grandsons Achæus and Ion, the sons of Xuthus, the Achæans and Ionians.

HELLESPONTUS (Ἑλλήσποντος: now Straits of the Dardenelles or of Gallipoli, Turk. Stambol Denghiz), the long narrow strait connecting the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara) with the Ægean Sea, and through which the waters of the Black Sea discharge themselves into the Mediterranean in a constant current. The length of the strait is about fifty miles, and the width varies from six miles at the upper end to two at the lower, and in some places it is only one mile wide, or even less. The narrowest part is between the ancient cities of SESTUS and ABYDUS where Xerxes made his bridge of boats (vid. XERXES), and where the legend related that Leander swam across to visit Hero. Vid. LEANDER. The name of the Hellespont (i. e., the Sea of Helle) was derived from the story of Helle's being drowned in it. Vid. HELLE. The Hellespont was the boundary of Europe and Asia, dividing the Thracian Chersonese in the former from the Troad, and the territories of Abydus and Lampascus in the latter. The district just mentioned, on the southern side of the Hellespont, was also called Ἑλλήσποντος, its inhabitants Ἑλλησπόντιοι, and the cities on its coast Ἑλλησπόντιαι πόλεις.—2. Under the Roman empire, Hellespontus was the name of a proconsular province, composed of the Troad and the northern part of Mysia, and having Cyzicus for its capital.

HELLŎMĔNUM (Ἑλλόμενον), a sea-port town of the Acarnanians on the island Leucas.

HELLŎPĬA. Vid. ELLOPIA.

HELŌRUS or HELŌRUM (ἡ Ἕλωρος: Ἑλωρίτης), a town on the eastern coast of Sicily, south of Syracuse, at the mouth of the River Helorus. There was a road from Helorus to Syracuse (ὁδὸς Ἑλωρίνη, Thuc., vi., 70; vii., 80).

HĔLOS (τὸ Ἕλος: Ἑλεῖος, Ἑλεάτης). 1. A town in Laconia, on the coast, in a marshy situation, whence its name (ἕλος=marsh). The town was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It was commonly said that the Spartan slaves called Helotes (Εἵλωτες), were originally the Achæan inhabitants of this town, who were reduced by the Dorian conquerors to slavery; but this account of the origin of the Helotes seems to have been merely an invention, in consequence of the similarity of their name to that of the town of Helos. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. HELOTES.—2. A town or district of Elis, on the Alphēus.

HELVECŌNÆ, a people in Germany, between the Viadus and the Vistula, south of the Rugii, and north of the Burgundiones, reckoned by Tacitus among the Ligii.

HELVĒTĬI, a brave and powerful Celtic people, who dwelt between Mount Jurassus (now Jura), the Lacus Lemannus (now Lake of Geneva), the Rhone, and the Rhine as far as the Lacus Brigantinus (now Lake of Constance). They were thus bounded by the Sequani on the west, by the Nantuates and Lepontii in Cisalpine Gaul on the south, by the Ræti on the east, and by the German nations on the north beyond the Rhine. Their country, called Ager Helvetiorum (but never Helvetia), thus corresponded to the western part of Switzerland. Their chief town was AVENTICUM. They were divided into four pagi or cantons, of which the Pagus Tigurinus was the most celebrated. We only know the name of one of the three others, namely, the Vicus Verbigenus, or, more correctly, Urbigenus. The Helvetii are first mentioned in the war with the Cimbri. In B.C. 107 the Tigurini defeated and killed the Roman consul L. Cassius Longinus, on the Lake of Geneva, while another division of the Helvetii accompanied the Cimbri and Teutones in their invasion of Gaul. Subsequently the Helvetii invaded Italy along with the Cimbri, and they returned home in safety after the defeat of the Cimbri by Marius and Catulus in 101. About forty years afterward they resolved, upon the advice of Orgetorix, one of their chiefs, to migrate from their country with their wives and children, and seek a new home in the more fertile plains of Gaul. In 58 they endeavored to carry their plan into execution, but they were defeated by Cæsar, and driven back into their own territories. The Romans now planted colonies and built fortresses in their country (Noviodunum, Vindonissa, Aventicum), and the Helvetii gradually adopted the customs and language of their conquerors. They were severely punished by the generals of Vitellius (A.D. 70), whom they refused to recognize as emperor; and after that time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people. The Helvetii were included in Gallia Lugdunensis according to Strabo, but in Gallia Belgica according to Pliny: most modern writers adopt Pliny's statement. When Gaul was subdivided into a great number of provinces under the later emperors, the country of the Helvetii formed, with that of the Sequani and the Rauraci, the province of Maxima Sequanorum.

HEPHÆSTĪON (Ἡφαιστίων). 1. Son of Amyntor, a Macedonian of Pella, celebrated as the friend of Alexander the Great, with whom he had been brought up. Alexander called Hephæstion his own private friend, but Craterus the friend of the king. Hephæstion accompanied Alexander to Asia, and was employed by the king in many important commands. He died at Ecbatana, after an illness of only seven days, B.C. 325. Alexander's grief for his loss was passionate and violent. A general mourning was ordered throughout the empire, and a funeral pile and monument erected to him at Babylon, at a cost of ten thousand talents.—2. A Greek grammarian, who instructed the Emperor Verus in Greek, and accordingly lived about A.D. 150. He was perhaps the author of a Manual on Metres (Ἐγχειρίδιον περὶ μέτρων), which has come down to us under the name of Hephæstion. This work is a tolerably complete manual of Greek metres, and forms the basis of all our knowledge on that subject. Edited by Gaisford, Oxon., 1810.

HEPHÆSTUS (Ἥφαιστος), called VULCĀNUS by the Romans, the god of fire. He was, according to Homer, the son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Hera (Juno). Later traditions state that he had no father, and that Hera (Juno) gave birth to him independent of Zeus (Jupiter), as she was jealous of Zeus (Jupiter) having given birth to Athena (Minerva) independent of her. He was born lame and weak, and was, in consequence, so much disliked by his mother that she threw him down from Olympus. The marine divinities, Thetis and Eurynome, received him, and he dwelt with them for nine years in a grotto, beneath Oceanus, making for them a variety of ornaments. He afterward returned to Olympus, though we are not told through what means, and he appears in Homer as the great artist of the gods of Olympus. Although he had been cruelly treated by his mother, he always showed her respect and kindness, and on one occasion took her part when she was quarrelling with Zeus (Jupiter), which so much enraged the father of the gods that he seized Hephæstus (Vulcan) by the leg and hurled him down from heaven. Hephæstus (Vulcan) was a whole day falling, but in the evening he alighted in the island of Lemnos, where he was kindly received by the Sintians. Later writers describe his lameness as the consequence of this fall, while Homer makes him lame from his birth. He again returned to Olympus, and subsequently acted the part of mediator between his parents. On that occasion he offered a cup of nectar to his mother and the other gods, who burst out into immoderate laughter on seeing him busily hobbling from one god to another. Hephæstus (Vulcan) appears to have been originally the god of fire simply; but as fire is indispensable in working metals, he was afterward regarded as an artist. His palace in Olympus was imperishable and shining like stars. It contained his workshop, with the anvil and twenty bellows, which worked spontaneously at his bidding. It was there that he made all his beautiful and marvellous works, both for gods and men. The ancient poets abound in descriptions of exquisite workmanship which had been manufactured by the god. All the palaces in Olympus were his workmanship. He made the armor of Achilles; the fatal necklace of Harmonia; the fire-breathing bulls of Æëtes, king of Colchis, &c. In later accounts, the Cyclopes are his workmen and servants, and his workshop is no longer in Olympus, but in some volcanic island. In the Iliad the wife of Hephæstus (Vulcan) is Charis: in Hesiod, Aglaia, the youngest of the Charites; but in the Odyssey, as well as in later accounts, Aphrodite (Venus) appears as his wife. Aphrodite (Venus) proved faithless to her husband, and was in love with Ares (Mars); but Helios disclosed their amours to Hephæstus (Vulcan), who caught the guilty pair in an invisible net, and exposed them to the laughter of the assembled gods. The favorite abode of Hephæstus (Vulcan) on earth was the island of Lemnos; but other volcanic islands also, such as Lipara, Hiera, Imbros, and Sicily, are called his abodes or workshops. Hephæstus (Vulcan), like Athena (Minerva), gave skill to mortal artists, and, conjointly with her, he was believed to have taught men the arts which embellish and adorn life. Hence at Athens they had temples and festivals in common. The epithets and surnames by which Hephæstus (Vulcan) is designated by the poets, generally allude to his skill in the plastic arts or to his lameness. The Greeks frequently placed small dwarf-life statues of the god near the hearth. During the best period of Grecian art he was represented as a vigorous man with a beard, and is characterized by his hammer or some other instrument, his oval cap, and the chiton, which leaves the right shoulder and arm uncovered. The Roman Vulcanus was an old Italian divinity. Vid. VULCANUS.

HERA (Ἥρα or Ἥρη), called JUNO by the Romans. The Greek Hera, that is, Mistress, was a daughter of Cronos (Saturn) and Rhea, and sister and wife of Zeus (Jupiter). Some call her the eldest daughter of Cronos (Saturn), but others give this title to Hestia. According to Homer she was brought up by Oceanus and Tethys, and afterward became the wife of Zeus (Jupiter) without the knowledge of her parents. This simple account is variously modified in other traditions. Being a daughter of Cronos (Saturn), she, like his other children, was swallowed by her father, but afterward released, and, according to an Arcadian tradition, she was brought up by Temenus, the son of Pelasgus. The Argives, on the other hand, related that she had been brought up by Eubœa, Prosymna, and Acræa, the three daughters of the River Asterion. Several parts of Greece claimed the honor of being her birth-place, and more especially Argos and Samos, which were the principal seats of her worship. Her marriage with Zeus (Jupiter) offered ample scope for poetical invention, and several places in Greece also claimed the honor of having been the scene of the marriage, such as Eubœa, Samos, Cnossus in Crete, and Mount Thornax in the south of Argolis. Her marriage, called the Sacred Marriage (ἱερὸς γάμος), was represented in many places where she was worshipped. At her nuptials all the gods honored her with presents, and Ge (Terra) presented to her a tree with golden apples, which was watched by the Hesperides, at the foot of the Hyperborean Atlas. In the Iliad Hera (Juno) is treated by the Olympian gods with the same reverence as her husband. Zeus (Jupiter) himself listens to her counsels, and communicates his secrets to her. She is, notwithstanding, far inferior to him in power, and must obey him unconditionally. She is not, like Zeus (Jupiter), the queen of gods and men, but simply the wife of the supreme god. The idea of her being the queen of heaven, with regal wealth and power, is of much later date. Her character, as described by Homer, is not of a very amiable kind; and her jealousy, obstinacy, and quarrelsome disposition sometimes make her husband tremble. Hence arise frequent disputes between Hera (Juno) and Zeus (Jupiter); and on one occasion Hera (Juno), in conjunction with Poseidon (Neptune) and Athena (Minerva), contemplated putting Zeus (Jupiter) into chains. Zeus (Jupiter), in such cases, not only threatens, but beats her. Once he even hung her up in the clouds, with her hands chained, and with two anvils suspended from her feet; and on another occasion, when Hephæstus (Vulcan) attempted to help her, Zeus (Jupiter) hurled him down from Olympus. By Zeus (Jupiter) she was the mother of Ares (Mars), Hebe, and Hephæstus (Vulcan). Hera (Juno) was, properly speaking, the only really married goddess among the Olympians, for the marriage of Aphrodite (Venus) with Hephæstus (Vulcan) can scarcely be taken into consideration. Hence she is the goddess of marriage and of the birth of children. Several epithets and surnames, such as Εἰλείθυια, Γαμηλία, Ζυγία, Τελεία, &c., contain allusions to this character of the goddess, and the Ilithyiæ are described as her daughters. She is represented in the Iliad riding in a chariot drawn by two horses, in the harnessing and unharnessing of which she is assisted by Hebe and the Horæ. Owing to the judgment of Paris (vid. PARIS) she was hostile to the Trojans, and in the Trojan war she accordingly sided with the Greeks. She persecuted all the children of Zeus (Jupiter)

-er) by mortal mothers, and hence appears as the enemy of Dionysus (Bacchus), Hercules, and others. In the Argonautic expedition she assisted Jason. It is impossible here to enumerate all the events of mythical story in which Hera (Juno) acts a part, and the reader must refer to the particular deities or heroes with whose story she is connected. Hera (Juno) was worshipped in many parts of Greece, but more especially at Argos, in the neighborhood of which she had a splendid temple, on the road to Mycenæ. Her great festival at Argos is described in the Dict. of Ant., art. HERÆA. She also had a splendid temple in Samos. The ancients gave several interpretations respecting the real significance of Hera (Juno), but we must in all probability regard her as the great goddess of nature, who was worshipped every where from the earliest times. The worship of the Roman Juno is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. JUNO. Hera (Juno) was usually represented as a majestic woman of mature age, with a beautiful forehead, large and widely-opened eyes, and with a grave expression commanding reverence. Her hair was adorned with a crown or a diadem. A veil frequently hangs down the back of her head, to characterize her as the bride of Zeus (Jupiter), and the diadem, veil, sceptre, and peacock are her ordinary attributes.

HĔRACLĒA (Ἡράκλεια: Ἡρακλεώτης: Heracleōtes). I. In Europe. 1. H., in Lucania, on the River Siris, founded by the Tarentines. During the independence of the Greek states in the south of Italy, congresses were held in this town under the presidency of the Tarentines. It sunk into insignificance under the Romans. —2. In Acarnania, on the Ambracian Gulf.—3. In Pisatis Elis, in ruins in the time of Strabo. —4. The later name of Perinthus in Thrace. Vid. PERINTHUS.—5. H. CACCABARIA PORBARIA, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the coast, a sea-port of the Massilians.—6. H. LYNCESTIS (Λυγκηστίς) also called Pelagonia (now Bitoglia or Bitolia), in Macedonia, on the Via Egnatia, west of the Erigon, the capital of one of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided by the Romans.—7. H. MINŌA (Μινώα: ruins near Torre di Capo Bianco), on the southern coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the River Halycus, between Agrigentum and Selinus. According to tradition it was founded by Minos, when he pursued Dædalus to Sicily, and it may have been an ancient colony of the Cretans. We know, however, that it was afterward colonized by the inhabitants of Selinus, and that its original name was Minoa, which it continued to bear till about B.C. 500, when the town was taken by the Lacedæmonians, under Euryleon, who changed its name into that of Heraclea; but it continued to bear its ancient appellation as a surname, to distinguish it from other places of the same name. It fell at an early period into the hands of the Carthaginians, and remained in their power till the conquest of Sicily by the Romans, who planted a colony there.—8. H. SINTĬCA (Σιντική), in Macedonia, a town of the Sinti, on the left bank of the Strymon, founded by Amyntas, brother of Philip.—9. H. TRACHĬNIÆ, in Thessaly. Vid. TRACHIS.—II. In Asia. 1. H. PONTICA (Ἡ. ἡ Ποντική, or Πόντου, or ἐν Πόντῳ: now Harakli or Eregli), a city on the southern shore of the Pontus Euxinus, on the coast of Bithynia, in the territory of the Mariandyni, was situated twenty stadia north of the River Lycus, upon a little river called Acheron or Soonautes, and near the base of a peninsula called Acherusia, and had a fine harbor. It was founded about B.C. 550 by colonists from Megara and from Tanagra in Bœotia (not, as Strabo says, from Miletus). After various political struggles, it settled down under a monarchical form of government. It reached the height of its prosperity in the reign of Darius Codomannus, when it had an extensive commerce, and a territory reaching from the Parthenius to the Sangarius. It began to decline in consequence of the rise of the kingdom of Bithynia and the foundation of Nicomedia, and the invasion of Asia Minor by the Gauls; and its ruin was completed in the Mithradatic war, when the city was taken and plundered, and partly destroyed, by the Romans under Cotta. It was the native city of HERACLIDES PONTICUS, and perhaps of the painter ZEUXIS.—2. H. AD LATMUM (Ἡ. Λάτμου or ἡ ὑπὸ Λάτμῳ: ruins near the Lake of Baffi), a town of Ionia, southeast of Miletus, at the foot of Mount Latmus, and upon the Sinus Latmicus; formerly called Latmus. Near it was a cave, with the tomb of Endymion. There was another city of the same name in Caria, one in Lydia, two in Syria, one in Media, and one in India, none of which require special notice here.

HĔRACLEOPŎLIS (Ἡρακλεούπολις). 1. PARVA (ἡ μικρά), also called SETHRON, a city of Lower Egypt, in the Nomos Sethroites, twenty-two Roman miles west of Pelusium.—2. MAGNA (ἡ μεγάλη, also ἡ ἄνω), the capital of the fertile Nomos Heracleopolites or Heracleotes, in the Heptanomis or Middle Egypt: a chief seat of the worship of the ichneumon.

[HERACLES (Ἡρακλῆς). Vid. HERCULES.]

HERACLĒUM (Ἡράκλειον), the name of several promontories and towns, of which none require special notice except, 1. A town in Macedonia, at the mouth of the Apilas, near the frontiers of Thessaly.—2. The harbor of Cnosus in Crete. —3. A town on the coast of the Delta of Egypt, a little west of Canopus, from which the Canopic mouth of the Nile was often called also the Heracleotic mouth.—4. A place near Gindarus, in the Syrian province of Cyrrhestice, where Ventidius, the legate of M. Antony, gained his great victory over the Parthians under Pacorus in B.C. 38.

HERACLIĀNUS (Ἡρακλειανός), one of the officers of Honorius, put Stilicho to death (A.D 408), and received, as the reward of that service, the government of Africa. He rendered good service to Honorius during the invasion of Italy by Alaric, and the usurpation of Attalus. In 413 he revolted against Honorius, and invaded Italy; but his enterprise failed, and on his return to Africa he was put to death at Carthage.

HERACLĬDÆ (Ἡρακλεῖδαι), the descendants of Hercules, who, in conjunction with the Dorians, conquered Peloponnesus. It had been the will of Jupiter (Zeus), so ran the legend, that Hercules should rule over the country of the Perseids, at Mycenæ and Tiryns; but, through Juno's (Hera) cunning, Eurystheus had been put into the place of Hercules, who had become the servant of the former. After the death of Hercules, his claims devolved upon his sons and descendants. At the time of his death, Hyllus, the eldest of his four sons by Deianīra, was residing with his brothers at the court of Ceyx at Trachis. As Eurystheus demanded their surrender, and Ceyx was unable to protect them, they fled to various parts of Greece, until they were received as suppliants at Athens, at the altar of Eleos (Mercy). According to the Heraclidæ of Euripides, the sons of Hercules were first staying at Argos, thence went to Trachis in Thessaly, and at length came to Athens. Demophon, the son of Theseus, received them, and they settled in the Attic tetrapolis. Eurystheus, to whom the Athenians refused to surrender the fugitives, now marched against the Athenians with a large army, but was defeated by the Athenians under Iolaus, Theseus, and Hyllus, and was slain with his sons. The battle itself was celebrated in Attic story as the battle of the Scironian rock, on the coast of the Saronic Gulf, though Pindar places it in the neighborhood of Thebes. After the battle the Heraclidæ entered the Peloponnesus, and maintained themselves there for one year. This was their first invasion of Peloponnesus. But a plague, which spread over the whole peninsula, compelled them to return to Attica, where, for a time, they again settled in the Attic tetrapolis. From thence they proceeded to Ægimius, king of the Dorians, whom Hercules had assisted in his war against the Lapithæ, and who had promised to preserve a third of his territory for the children of Hercules. Vid. ÆGIMIUS. The Heraclidæ were hospitably received by Ægimius, and Hyllus was adopted by the latter. After remaining in Doris three years, Hyllus, with a band of Dorians, undertook an expedition against Atreus, who had married a daughter of Eurystheus, and had become king of Mycenæ and Tiryns. Hyllus marched across the Corinthian isthmus, and first met Echemus of Tegea, who fought for the Pelopidæ, the principal opponents of the Heraclidæ. Hyllus fell in single combat with Echemus, and, according to an agreement which had been made before the battle, the Heraclidæ were not to make any further attempt upon Peloponnesus for the next fifty years. Thus ended their second invasion. They now retired to Tricorythus, where they were allowed by the Athenians to take up their abode. During the period which followed (ten years after the death of Hyllus), the Trojan war took place; and thirty years after the Trojan war Cleodæus, son of Hyllus, again invaded Peloponnesus, which was the third invasion; about twenty years later, Aristomachus, the son of Cleodæus, undertook the fourth expedition; but both heroes fell. Not quite thirty years after Aristomachus (that is, about eighty years after the destruction of Troy), the Heraclidæ prepared for their fifth and final attack. Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, the sons of Aristomachus, upon the advice of an oracle, built a fleet on the Corinthian Gulf; but this fleet was destroyed, because Hippotes, one of the Heraclidæ, had killed Carnus, an Acarnanian soothsayer; and Aristodemus was killed by a flash of lightning. An oracle now ordered them to take a three-eyed man for their commander. He was found in the person of Oxylus, the son of Andræmon, an Ætolian, but descended from a family in Elis. The expedition now successfully sailed from Naupactus towards Rhium in Peloponnesus. Oxylus, keeping the invaders away from Elis, led them through Arcadia. The Heraclidæ and Dorians conquered Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, who ruled over Argos, Mycenæ, and Sparta. After this they became masters of the greater part of Peloponnesus, and then distributed by lot the newly-acquired possessions. Temenus obtained Argos; Procles and Eurystheus, the twin sons of Aristodemus, Lacedæmon; and Cresphontes, Messenia. Such are the traditions about the Heraclidæ and their conquest of Peloponnesus. They are not purely mythical, but contain genuine historical substance, notwithstanding the various contradictions in the accounts. They represent the conquest of the Achæan population by Dorian invaders, who henceforward appear as the ruling race in the Peloponnesus. The conquered Achæans became partly the slaves and partly the subjects of the Dorians. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. PERIŒCI.

HERACLĪDES (Ἡρακλείδης). 1. A Syracusan, son of Lysimachus, one of the generals when Syracuse was attacked by the Athenians, B.C. 415.—2. A Syracusan, who held the chief command of the mercenary forces under the younger Dionysius. Being suspected by Dionysius, he fled from Syracuse, and afterward took part with Dion in expelling Dionysius from Syracuse. After the expulsion of the tyrant, a powerful party at Syracuse looked up to Heraclides as their leader, in consequence of which Dion caused him to be assassinated, 354.—3. Son of Agathocles, accompanied his father to Africa, where he was put to death by the soldiers when they were deserted by Agathocles, 307.—4. Of Tarentum, one of the chief counsellors of Philip V., king of Macedonia.—5. Of Byzantium, sent as ambassador by Antiochus the Great to the two Scipios, 190.—6. One of the three ambassadors sent by Antiochus Epiphanes to the Romans, 169. Heraclides was banished by Demetrius Soter, the successor of Antiochus (162), and in revenge gave his support to the imposture of Alexander Balas.—7. Surnamed PONTĬCUS, because he was born at Heraclēa in Pontus. He was a person of considerable wealth, and migrated to Athens, where he became a pupil of Plato. He paid attention also to the Pythagorean system, and afterward attended the instructions of Speusippus, and finally of Aristotle. He wrote a great number of works upon philosophy, mathematics, music, history, politics, grammar, and poetry; but almost all of these works are lost. There has come down to us a small work, under the name of Heraclides, entitled περὶ Πολιτειῶν, of which the best editions are by Köler, Halle, 1804, by Coraë, in his edition of Ælian, Paris, 1805, [and by Schneidewin, 1849]. Another extant work, Ἀλληγορίαι Ὁμηρικαί, which also bears the name of Heraclides, was certainly not written by him. Diogenes Laërtius, in his life of Heraclides, says that "Heraclides made tragedies, and put the name of Thespis to them." This sentence has given occasion to a learned dis-quisition by Bentley (Phalaris, p. 239), to prove that the fragments attributed to Thespis are really cited from these counterfeit tragedies of Heraclides. Some childish stories are told about Heraclides keeping a pet serpent, and ordering one of his friends to conceal his body after his death, and place the serpent on the bed, that it might be supposed that he had been taken to the company of the gods. It is also said that he killed a man who had usurped the tyranny in Heraclea, and there are other traditions about him scarcely worth relating.—8. An historian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (222–205), and wrote several works, quoted by the grammarians.—9. A physician of Tarentum, lived in the third or second century B.C., and wrote some works on Materia Medica, and a commentary on all the works in the Hippocratic Collection.—10. A physician of Erythræ in Ionia, was a pupil of Chrysermus, and a contemporary of Strabo in the first century B.C.

HERACLĪTUS (Ἡράκλειτος). 1. Of Ephesus, a philosopher generally considered as belonging to the Ionian school, though he differed from their principles in many respects. In his youth he travelled extensively, and after his return to Ephesus the chief magistracy was offered him, which, however, he transferred to his brother. He appears afterward to have become a complete recluse, rejecting even the kindnesses offered by Darius, and at last retreating to the mountains, where he lived on pot-herbs; but, after some time, he was compelled by the sickness consequent on such meagre diet to return to Ephesus, where he died. He died at the age of sixty, and flourished about B.C. 513. Heraclitus wrote a work On Nature (περὶ φύσεως), which contained his philosophical views. From the obscurity of his style, he gained the title of the Obscure (σκοτεινός). He considered fire to be the primary form of all matter; but by fire he meant only to describe a clear light fluid, "self-kindled and self-extinguished," and therefore not differing materially from the air of Anaximenes.—2. An Academic philosopher of Tyre, a friend of Antiochus, and a pupil of Clitomachus and Philo.—3. The reputed author of a work, Περὶ Ἀπίστων, published by Westermann in his Mythographi, Brunsvig., 1843.—[4. Of Lesbos, author of a history of Macedonia.—5. An elegiac poet of Halicarnassus, a contemporary and friend of Callimachus, who wrote an epigram on him.]

[HERACLIUS (Ἡράκλειος: Ἡράκλιος). 1. HERBĪTA (Ἕρβιτα: Ἑρβιταῖος, Herbitensis, a town in Sicily, north of Agyrium, in the mountains, was a powerful place in early times under the tyrant Archonides, but afterward declined in importance.

HERCULANĔUM, a town in Samnium, conquered by the consul Carvilius, B.C. 293 (Liv., x., 45), must not be confounded with the more celebrated town of this name mentioned below.

HERCULANĔUM, HERCULANĬUM, HERCULĀNUM, HERCULENSE OPPIDUM, HERCULĔA URBS (Ἡράκλειον), an ancient city in Campania, near the coast, between Neapolis and Pompeii, was originally founded by the Oscans, was next in the possession of the Tyrrhenians, and subsequently was chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who appear to have setted in the place from other cities of Magna Græcia, and to have given it its name. It was taken by the Romans in the Social war (B.C. 89, 88), and was colonized by them. In A.D. 63 a great part of it was destroyed by an earthquake; and in 79 it was overwhelmed, along with Pompeii and Stabiæ, by the great eruption of Mount Vesuvius. It was buried under showers of ashes and streams of lava, from seventy to one hundred feet under the present surface of the ground. On its site stand the modern Portici and part of the village of Resina: the Italian name of Ercolano does not indicate any modern place, but only the part of Herculaneum that has been disinterred. The ancient city was accidentally discovered by the sinking of a well in 1720, since which time the excavations have been carried on at different periods; and many works of art have been discovered, which are deposited in the Royal Museum at Portici. It has been found necessary to fill up again the excavations which were made, in order to render Portici and Resina secure, and therefore very little of the ancient city is to be seen. The buildings that have been discovered are a theatre capable of accommodating about ten thousand spectators, the remains of two temples, a large building, commonly designated as a forum civile, two hundred and twenty-eight feet long and one hundred and thirty-two broad, and some private houses, the walls of which were adorned with paintings, many of which, when discovered, were in a state of admirable preservation. There have been also found at Herculaneum many MSS., written on rolls of papyrus; but the difficulty of unrolling and deciphering them was very great; and the few which have been deciphered are of little value, consisting of a treatise of Philodemus on music, and fragments of unimportant works on philosophy.

HERCŬLES (Ἡρακλῆς), the most celebrated of all the heroes of antiquity. His exploits were celebrated not only in all the countries round the Mediterranean, but even in the most distant lands of the ancient world. I. GREEK LEGENDS. The Greek traditions about Hercules appear in their national purity down to the time of Herodotus. But the poets of the time of Herodotus and of the subsequent periods introduced considerable alterations, which were probably derived from the East or Egypt, for every nation possesses some traditions respecting heroes of superhuman strength and power. Now while in the earliest Greek legends Hercules is a purely human hero, a conqueror of men, and cities, he afterward appears as the subduer of monstrous animals, and is connected in a variety of ways with astronomical phenomena. According to Homer, Hercules was the son of Jupiter (Zeus) by Alcmene of Thebes in Bœotia. His stepfather was Amphitryon. Amphitryon was the son of Alcæus, the son of Perseus; and Alcmene was a grand-daughter of Perseus. Hence Hercules belonged to the family of Perseus. Jupiter (Zeus) visited Alcmene in the form of Amphitryon, while the latter was absent warring against the Taphians; and he, pretending to be her husband, became by her the father of Hercules. For details, vid. ALCMENE, AMPHITRYON. On the day on which Hercules was to be born, Jupiter (Zeus) boasted of his becoming the father of a hero who was to rule over the race of Perseus. Juno (Hera) prevailed upon him to swear that the descendant of Perseus born that day should be the ruler. Thereupon she hastened to Argos, and there caused the wife of Sthenelus to give birth to Eurystheus; whereas, by keeping away the Ilithyiæ, she delayed the birth of Hercules, and thus robbed him of the empire which Jupiter (Zeus) had destined for him. Jupiter (Zeus) was enraged at the imposition practiced upon him, but could not violate his oath. Alcmene brought into the world two boys, Hercules, the son of Jupiter (Zeus), and Iphicles, the son of Amphityron. Nearly all the stories about the childhood and youth of Hercules, down to the time when he entered the service of Eurystheus, seem to be inventions of a later age. At least in Homer and Hesoid we are only told that he grew strong in body and mind; that, confiding in his own powers, he defied even the immortal gods, and wounded Juno (Hera) and Mars (Ares), and that under the protection of Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva (Athena) he escaped the dangers which Juno (Hera) prepared for him. To these simple accounts, various particulars are added in later writers. As he lay in his cradle, Juno (Hera) sent two serpents to destroy him, but the infant hero strangled them with his own hands. As he grew up, he was instructed by Amphitryon in driving a chariot, by Autolycus in wrestling, by Eurytus in archery, by Castor in fighting with heavy armor, and by Linus in singing and playing the lyre. Linus was killed by his pupil with the lyre because he had censured him; and Amphitryon, to prevent similar occurrences, sent him to feed his cattle. In this manner he spent his life till his eighteenth year. His first great adventure happened while he was still watching the oxen of his stepfather. A huge lion, which haunted Mount Cithæron, made great havoc among the flocks of Amphitryon and Thespius (or Thestius), king of Thespiæ. Hercules promised to deliver the country of the monster; and Thespius rewarded Hercules by making him his guest so long as the chase lasted. Hercules slew the lion, and henceforth wore its skin as his ordinary garment, and its mouth and head as his helmet. Others related that the lion's skin of Hercules was taken from the Nemean lion. On his return to Thebes, he met the envoys of King Erginus of Orchomenos, who were going to fetch the annual tribute of a hundred oxen, which they had compelled the Thebans to pay. Hercules cut off the noses and ears of the envoys, and thus sent them back to Erginus. The latter thereupon marched against Thebes; but Hercules defeated and killed Erginus, and compelled the Orchomenians to pay double the tribute which they had formerly received from the Thebans. In the battle against Erginus Hercules lost his stepfather Amphitryon, though the tragedians make him survive the campaign. Creon rewarded Hercules with the hand of his daughter Megara, by whom he became the father of several children. The gods, on the other hand, made him presents of arms: Mercury (Hermes) gave him a sword, Apollo a bow and arrows, Vulcan (Hephæstus) a golden coat of mail, and Minerva (Athena) a peplus. He cut for himself a club in the neighborhood of Nemea, while, according to others, the club was of brass, and the gift of Vulcan (Hephæstus). Soon afterward Hercules was driven mad by Juno (Hera), and in this state he killed his own children by Megara and two of Iphicles. In his grief he sentenced himself to exile, and went to Thespius, who purified him. Other traditions place this madness at a later time, and relate the circumstances differently. He then consulted the oracle of Delphi as to where he should settle. The Pythia first called him by the name of Hercules—for hitherto his name had been Alcides or Alcæus—and ordered him to live at Tiryns, and to serve Eurystheus for the space of twelve years, after which he should become immortal. Hercules accordingly went to Tiryns, and did as he was bid by Eurystheus. The accounts of the twelve labors which Hercules performed at the bidding of Eurystheus are found only in the later writers. The only one of the twelve labors mentioned by Homer is his descent into the lower world to carry off Cerberus. We also find in Homer the fight of Hercules with a sea-monster; his expedition to Troy, to fetch the horses which Laomedon had refused him; and his war against the Pylians, when he destroyed the whole family of their king Neleus, with the exception of Nestor. Hesiod mentions several of the feats of Hercules distinctly, but knows nothing of their number twelve. The selection of these twelve from the great number of feats ascribed to Hercules is probably the work of the Alexandrines. They are usually arranged in the following order. 1. The fight with the Nemean lion. The valley of Nemea, between Cleonæ and Phlius, was inhabited by a monstrous lion, the offspring of Typhon and Echidna. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring him the skin of this monster. After using in vain his club and arrows against the lion, he strangled the animal with his own hands. He returned carrying the dead lion on his shoulders; but Eurystheus was so frightened at the gigantic strength of the hero, that he ordered him in future to deliver the account of his exploits outside the town.—2. Fight against the Lernean hydra. This monster, like the lion, was the ring of Typhon and Echidna, and was ught up by Juno (Hera). It ravaged the ntry of Lerna near Argos, and dwelt in a mp near the well of Amymone. It had nine ds, of which the middle one was immortal. rcules struck off its heads with his club; but the place of the head he cut off, two new s grew forth each time. A gigantic crab o came to the assistance of the hydra, and nded Hercules. However, with the assist- e of his faithful servant Iolaus, he burned ay the heads of the hydra, and buried the th or immortal one under a huge rock. Hav- g thus conquered the monster, he poisoned his ows with its bile, whence the wounds inflict- by them became incurable. Eurystheus de- red the victory unlawful, as Hercules had n it with the aid of Iolaus.—3. Capture of e Arcadian stag. This animal had golden tlers and brazen feet. It had been dedicated Diana (Artemis) by the nymph Taygete, be- use the goddess had saved her from the pur- it of Jupiter (Zeus). Hercules was ordered bring the animal alive to Mycenæ. He pur- sued it in vain for a whole year: at length he wounded it with an arrow, caught it, and car- ried it away on his shoulders. While in Arca- dia he was met by Diana (Artemis), who was angry with him for having outraged the animal sacred to her; but he succeeded in soothing her anger, and carried his prey to Mycenæ. According to some statements he killed the stag. —4. Destruction of the Erymanthian boar. This animal, which Hercules was ordered to bring alive to Eurystheus, had descended from Mount Erymanthus into Psophis. Hercules chased him through the deep snow and having thus worn him out, he caught him in a net, and carried him to Mycenæ. Other traditions place the hunt of the Erymanthian boar in Thessaly, and some even in Phrygia. It must be observed that this and the subsequent labors of Hercules are connected with certain subordinate labors, called Parerga (Πάρεργα). The first of these parerga is the fight of Hercules with the Centaurs. In his pursuit of the boar he came to the centaur Pholus, who had received from Bacchus (Dionysus) a cask of excellent wine. Hercules opened it, contrary to the wish of his host, and the delicious fragrance attracted the other centaurs, who besieged the grotto of Pholus. Hercules drove them away; they fled to the house of Chiron; and Hercules, eager in his pursuit, wounded Chiron, his old friend, with one of his poisoned arrows; in consequence of which Chiron died. Vid. CHIRON. Pholus likewise was wounded by one of the arrows, which by accident fell on his foot and killed him. This fight with the centaurs gave rise to the establishment of mysteries, by which Ceres (Demeter) intended to purify the hero from the blood he had shed against his own will.—5. Cleansing of the stables of Augeas. Eurystheus imposed upon Hercules the task of cleansing in one day the stalls of Augeas, king of Elis. Augeas had a herd of three thousand oxen, whose stalls had not been cleansed for thirty years. Hercules, without mentioning the command of Eurystheus, went to Augeas, and offered to cleanse his stalls in one day, if he would give him the tenth part of his cattle. Augeas agreed to the terms; and Hercules, after taking Phyleus, the son of Augeas, as his witness, led the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through the stalls, which were thus cleansed in a single day. But Augeas, who learned that Hercules had undertaken the work by the command of Eurystheus, refused to give him the reward. His son Phyleus then bore witness against his father, who exiled him from Elis. Eurystheus, however, declared the exploit null and void, because Hercules had stipulated with Augeas for a reward for performing it. At a later time Hercules invaded Elis, and killed Augeas and his sons. After this he is said to have founded the Olympic games.—6. Destruction of the Stymphalian birds. These voracious birds had been brought up by Mars (Ares). They had brazen claws, wings, and beaks, used their feathers as arrows, and ate human flesh. They dwelt on a lake near Stymphalus in Arcadia, from which Hercules was ordered by Eurystheus to expel them. When Hercules undertook the task, Minerva (Athena) provided him with a brazen rattle, by the noise of which he startled the birds; and, as they attempted to fly away, he killed them with his arrows. According to some accounts, he only drove the birds away, and they appeared again in the island of Aretias, where they were found by the Argonauts.—7. Capture of the Cretan bull. According to some, this bull was the one which had carried Europa across the sea. According to others, the bull had been sent out of the sea by Neptune (Poseidon), that Minos might offer it in sacrifice. But Minos was so charmed with the beauty of the animal, that he kept it, and sacrificed another in its stead. Neptune (Poseidon) punished Minos by driving the bull mad, and causing it to commit great havoc in the island. Hercules was ordered by Eurystheus to catch the bull, and Minos willingly allowed him to do so. Hercules accomplished the task, and brought the bull home on his shoulders; but he then set the animal free again. The bull now roamed through Greece, and at last came to Marathon, where we meet it again in the stories of Theseus.—8. Capture of the mares of the Thracian Diomedes. This Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace, fed his horses with human flesh. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring these animals to Mycenæ. With a few companions, he seized the animals, and conducted them to the sea-coast. But here he was overtaken by the Bistones. During the fight he intrusted the mares to his friend Abderus, who was devoured by them. Hercules defeated the Bistones, killed Diomedes, whose body he threw before the mares, built the town of Abdera in honor of his unfortunate friend, and then returned to Mycenæ with the mares, which had become tame after eating the flesh of their master. The mares were afterward set free, and destroyed on Mount Olympus by wild beasts. —9. Seizure of the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, possessed a girdle, which she had received from Mars (Ares). Admete, the daughter of Eurystheus, wished to obtain this girdle, and Hercules was therefore sent to fetch it. He was accompanied by a number of volunteers, and after various adventures in Europe and Asia, he at length reached the country of the Amazons

Hippolyte at first received him kindly, and promised him her girdle; but Juno (Hera) having excited the Amazons against him, a contest ensued, in which Hercules killed their queen. He then took her girdle, and carried it with him. In this expedition Hercules killed the two sons of Boreas, Calais and Zetes; and he also begot three sons by Echidna, in the country of the Hyperboreans. On his way home he landed in Troas, where he rescued Hesione from the monster sent against her by Neptune (Poseidon); in return for which service, her father, Laomedon, promised him the horses he had received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for Ganymedes; but, as Laomedon did not keep his word, Hercules, on leaving, threatened to make war against Troy. He landed in Thrace, where he slew Sarpedon, and at length returned through Macedonia to Peloponnesus. — 10. Capture of the oxen of Geryones in Erythia. Geryones, the monster with three bodies, lived in the fabulous island of Erythia (the reddish), so called because it lay under the rays of the setting sun in the west. This island was originally placed off the coast of Epirus, but was afterward identified either with Gades or the Balearic Islands, and was at all times believed to be in the distant west. The oxen of Geryones were guarded by the giant Eurytion and the two-headed dog Orthrus; and Hercules was commanded by Eurystheus to fetch them. After traversing various countries, he reached at length the frontiers of Libya and Europe, where he erected two pillars (Calpe and Abyla) on the two sides of the Straits of Gibraltar, which were hence called the Pillars of Hercules. Being annoyed by the heat of the sun, Hercules shot at Helios, who so much admired his boldness, that he presented him with a golden cup or boat, in which he sailed to Erythia. He there slew Eurytion and his dog, as well as Geryones, and sailed with his booty to Tartessus, where he returned the golden cup (boat) to Helios. On his way home he passed through Gaul, Italy, Illyricum, and Thrace, and met with numerous adventures, which are variously embellished by the poets. Many attempts were made to deprive him of the oxen, but he at length brought them in safety to Eurystheus, who sacrificed them to Juno (Hera). These ten labors were performed by Hercules in the space of eight years and one month; but as Eurystheus declared two of them to have been performed unlawfully, he commanded him to accomplish two more.—11. Fetching the golden apples of the Hesperides. This was particularly difficult, since Hercules did not know where to find them. They were the apples which Juno (Hera) had received at her wedding from Terra (Ge), and which she had intrusted to the keeping of the Hesperides and the dragon Ladon, on Mount Atlas, in the country of the Hyperboreans. For details, vid. HESPERIDES. After various adventures in Europe, Asia, and Africa, Hercules at lengh arrived at Mount Atlas. On the advice of Prometheus, he sent Atlas to fetch the apples, and in the mean time bore the weight of heaven for him. Atlas returned with the apples, but refused to take the burden of heaven on his shoulders again. Hercules, however, contrived by a stratagem to get the apples, and hastened away. On his return Eurystheus made him a present of the apples; but Herc dedicated them to Minerva (Athena), who stored them to their former place. Some tr tions add that Hercules killed the dragon La —12. Bringing Cerberus from the lower w This was the most difficult of the twelve la of Hercules. He descended into Hades, a Tænarum in Laconia, accompanied by Mer (Hermes) and Minerva (Athena). He deliv Theseus and Ascalaphus from their tor He obtained permission from Pluto to ca Cerberus to the upper world, provided he co accomplish it without force of arms. He cules succeeded in seizing the monster and ca rying it to the upper world; and after he ha shown it to Eurystheus, he carried it back ag to the lower world. Some traditions conn the descent of Hercules into the lower wo with a contest with Hades, as we see even i the Iliad, (v., 397), and more particularly in th Alcestis of Euripides (24, 846). Besides the twelve labors, Hercules performed several oth feats without being commanded by Eurystheus These feats were called Parerga by the ancients Several of them were interwoven with the twelve labors, and have been already described those which had no connection with the twelve labors are spoken of below. After Hercules had performed the twelve labors, he was released from the servitude of Eurystheus, and returned to Thebes. Here there gave Megara in marriage to Iolaus; and he wished to gain in marriage for himself Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Eurytus promised his daughter to the man who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Hercules defeated them; but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give Iole to him, because he had murdered his own children. Soon afterward the oxen of Eurytus were carried off, and it was suspected that Hercules was the offender. Iphitus again defended Hercules, and requested his assistance in searching after the oxen. Hercules agreed; but when the two had arrived at Tiryns, Hercules, in a fit of madness, threw his friend down from the wall, and killed him. Deiphobus of Amyclæ purified Hercules from this murder, but he was, nevertheless, attacked by a severe illness. Hercules then repaired to Delphi to obtain a remedy, but the Pythia refused to answer his questions. A struggle ensued between Hercules and Apollo, and the combatants were not separated till Jupiter (Zeus) sent a flash of lightning between them. The oracle now declared that he would be restored to health if he would serve three years for wages, and surrender his earnings to Eurytus, as an atonement for the murder of Iphitus. Therefore he became servant to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and widow of Tmolus Later writers describe Hercules as living effeminately during his residence with Omphale: he span wool, it is said, and sometimes put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. According to other accounts, he nevertheless performed several great feats during this time. He undertook an expedition to Colchis, which brought him into connection with the Argonauts; he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and met Theseus on his landing from Trœzene on the Corinthian isthmus. An ex

[illegible]tion to India, which was mentioned in some [illegible]itions, may likewise be inserted in this [illegible]. When the time of his servitude had ex[illegible]d, he sailed against Troy, took the city, and [illegible]d Laomedon, its king. On his return from [illegible]y, a storm drove him on the island of Cos, [illegible]re he was attacked by the Meropes; but he [illegible]ated them and killed their king, Eurypylus. [illegible]was about this time that the gods sent for [illegible] in order to fight against the Giants. Vid. [illegible]ANTES. Soon after his return to Argos he [illegible]ched against Augeas, as has been related [illegible]e. He then proceeded against Pylos, which [illegible] took, and killed the sons of Neleus except [illegible]stor. He next advanced against Lacedæ[illegible], to punish the sons of Hippocoon for hav[illegible] assisted Neleus and slain Œonus, the son of [illegible]ymnius. He took Lacedæmon, and assign[illegible] the government of it to Tyndareus. On his [illegible]urn to Tegea, he became, by Auge, the fa[illegible]er of Telephus (vid. AUGE); and he then pro[illegible]eeded to Calydon, where he obtained Deïa[illegible]ira, the daughter of Œneus, for his wife, after [illegible]ghting with Achelous for her. Vid. DEIANI[illegible], ACHELOUS. After Hercules had been married to Deianira nearly three years, he accidentally killed, at a banquet in the house of Œneus, the boy Eunomus. In accordance with the law, Hercules went into exile, taking with him his wife Deianira. On their road they came to the River Evenus, across which the centaur Nessus carried travellers for a small sum of money. Hercules himself forded the river, but gave Deianira to Nessus to carry across. Nessus attempted to outrage her: Hercules heard her screaming, and shot an arrow into the heart of Nessus. The dying centaur called out to Deianira to take his blood with her, as it was a sure means of preserving the love of her husband. He then conquered the Dryopes, and assisted Ægimius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapithæ. Vid. ÆGIMIUS. After this he took up his abode at Trachis, whence he marched against Eurytus of Œchalia. He took Œchalia, killed Eurytus and his sons, and carried off his daughter Iole as a prisoner. On his return home he landed at Cenæum, a promontory of Eubœa, erected an altar to Jupiter (Zeus), and sent his companion Lichas to Trachis, in order to fetch him a white garment, which he intended to use during the sacrifice. Deianira, afraid lest Iole should supplant her in the affections of her husband, steeped the white garment he had demanded in the blood of Nessus. This blood had been poisoned by the arrow with which Hercules had shot Nessus; and, accordingly, as soon as the garment became warm on the body of Hercules, the poison penetrated into all his limbs, and caused him the most excruciating agony. He seized Lichas by his feet, and threw him into the sea. He wrenched off the garment, but it stuck to his flesh, and with it he tore away whole pieces from his body. In this state he was conveyed to Trachis. Deianira, on seeing what she had unwittingly done, hung herself. Hercules commanded Hyllus, his eldest son by Deianira, to marry Iole as soon as he should arrive at the age of manhood. He then ascended Mount Œta, raised a pile of wood, on which he placed himself, and ordered it to be set on fire. No one ventured to obey him, until at length Pœas the shepherd, who passed by, was prevailed upon to comply with the desire of the suffering hero. When the pile was burning, a cloud came down from heaven, and, amid peals of thunder, carried him to Olympus, where he was honored with immortality, became reconciled to Juno (Hera), and married her daughter Hebe, by whom he became the father of Alexiares and Anicetus. Immediately after his apotheosis, his friends offered sacrifices to him as a hero; and he was, in course of time, worshipped throughout all Greece as a god and as a hero. His worship, however, prevailed more extensively among the Dorians than among any other of the Greek races. The sacrifices offered to him consisted principally of bulls, boars, rams, and lambs. The works of art in which Hercules was represented were extremely numerous, and of the greatest variety, for he was represented at all the various stages of his life, from the cradle to his death. But whether he appears as a child, a youth, a struggling hero, or as the immortal inhabitant of Olympus, his character is always one of heroic strength and energy. Specimens of every kind are still extant. The finest representation of the hero that has come down to us is the so-called Farnese Hercules, which was executed by Glycon. The hero is resting, leaning on his right arm, and his head reclining on his left hand: the whole figure is a most exquisite combination of peculiar softness with the greatest strength.—II. ROMAN TRADITIONS. The worship of Hercules at Rome and in Italy is connected by Roman writers with the hero's expedition to fetch the oxen of Geryones. They stated that Hercules, on his return, visited Italy, where he abolished human sacrifices among the Sabines, established the worship of fire, and slew Cacus, a robber, who had stolen his oxen. Vid. CACUS. The aborigines, and especially Evander, honored Hercules with divine worship; and Hercules, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped, and intrusted the care of his worship to two distinguished families, the Potitii and Pinarii. Vid. PINARIA GENS. The Fabia gens traced its origin to Hercules; and Fauna and Acca Laurentia are called mistresses of Hercules. In this manner the Romans connected their earliest legends with Hercules. It should be observed that in the Italian traditions the hero bore the name of Recaranus, and this Recaranus was afterward identified with the Greek Hercules. He had two temples at Rome. One was a small round temple of Hercules Victor, or Hercules Triumphalis, between the river and the Circus Maximus, in front of which was the ara maxima, on which, after a triumph, the tenth of the booty was deposited for distribution among the citizens. The second temple stood near the porta trigemina, and contained a bronze statue and the altar on which Hercules himself was believed to have once offered a sacrifice. Here the city prætor offered every year a young cow, which was consumed by the people within the sanctuary. At Rome Hercules was connected with the Muses, whence he is called Musagetes, and was represented with a lyre, of which there is no trace in Greece. III. TRADITIONS OF OTHER NATIONS. The ancients themselves expressly mention several heroes of the name of Hercules, who occur among the principal nations of the ancient world. 1. The Egyptian Hercules, whose Egyptian name was Som, or Dsom, or Chon, or, according to Pausanias, Maceris, was a son of Amon or Nilus. He was placed by the Egyptians in the second of the series of the evolutions of their gods.—2. The Cretan Hercules, one of the Idæan Dactyls, was believed to have founded the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia, but to have come originally from Egypt. He was worshipped with funeral sacrifices, and was regarded as a magician, like other ancient dæmones of Crete.—3. The Indian Hercules, was called by the unintelligible name Dorsanes (Δορσάνης). The later Greeks believed that he was their own hero, who had visited India; and they related that in India he became the father of many sons and daughters by Pandæa, and the ancestral hero of the Indian kings.—4. The Phœnician Hercules, whom the Egyptians considered to be more ancient than their own, was worshipped in all the Phœnician colonies, such as Carthage and Gades, down to the time of Constantine, and it is said that children were sacrificed to him.—5. The Celtic and Germanic Hercules is said to have founded Alesia and Nemausus, and to have become the father of the Celtic race. We become acquainted with him in the accounts of the expedition of the Greek Hercules against Geryones. We must either suppose that the Greek Hercules was identified with native heroes of those northern countries, or that the notions about Hercules had been introduced there from the East.

HERCŬLES (Ἡρακλῆς), son of Alexander the Great by Barsine, the widow of the Rhodian Memnon. In B.C. 310 he was brought forward by Polysperchon as a pretender to the Macedonian throne; but he was murdered by Polysperchon himself in the following year, when the latter became reconciled to Cassander.

HERCŬLIS PROMONTŌRĬUM (now Cape Spartivento), the most southerly point of Italy in Bruttium.

HERCŬLIS SILVA, a forest in Germany, sacred to Hercules, east of the Visurgis.

HERCYNĬA SILVA, HERCYNĬUS SALTUS, HERCYNĬUM JUGUM, an extensive range of mountains in Germany, covered with forests, is described by Cæsar (B. G., vi., 24) as nine days' journey in breadth, and more than sixty days' journey in length, extending east from the territories of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, parallel to the Danube, to the frontiers of the Dacians. Under this general name Cæsar appears to have included all the mountains and forests in the south and centre of Germany, the Black Forest, Odenwald, Thüringerwald, the Harz, the Erzgebirge, the Riesengebirge, &c. As the Romans became better acquainted with Germany, the name was confined to narrower limits. Pliny and Tacitus use it to indicate the range of mountains between the Thüringerwald and the Carpathian Mountains. The name is still preserved in the modern Harz and Erz.

HERDŌNĬA (Herdoniensis: now Ordona), a town in Apulia, was destroyed by Hannibal, who removed its inhabitants to Thurii and Metapontum; it was rebuilt by the Romans, but remained a place of no importance.

HERDŌNĬUS. 1. TURNUS, of Aricia, in Latium, endeavored to rouse the Latins against Tarquinius Superbus, and was, in consequence, falsely accused by Tarquinius, and put to death.—2. APPĬUS, a Sabine chieftain, who, in B.C. 460, with a band of outlaws and slaves, made himself master of the Capitol. On the fourth day from his entry the Capitol was retaken, and Herdonius and nearly all his followers were slain.

HERENNĬA GENS, originally Samnite, and by the Samnite invasion established in Campania, became at a later period a plebeian house at Rome. The Herennii were a family of rank in Italy, and are frequently mentioned in the time of the Samnite and Punic wars. They were the hereditary patrons of the Marii.

HERILLUS (Ἥριλλος), of Carthage, a Stoic philosopher, was the disciple of Zeno of Citium. He did not, however, confine himself to the opinions of his master, but held some doctrines directly opposed to them. He held that the chief good consisted in knowledge (ἐπιστήμη). This notion is often attacked by Cicero.

[HĔRĬLUS, son of the nymph Feronia, and king of Præneste: his mother had given him three lives, and, accordingly, Evander, who fought with him, had to conquer and despoil him of his armor three times before he fully destroyed him.]

HERMÆUM, or, in Latin, MERCURII PROMONTORĬUM (Ἑρμαία ἄκρα). 1. (Now Cape Bon, Arab. Ras Addar), the headland which forms the eastern extremity of the Sinus Carthaginiensis, and the extreme northeastern point of the Carthaginian territory (later the province of Africa) opposite to Lilybæum, the space between the two being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa.—2. (Now Ras el Ashan), a promontory on the coast of the Greater Syrtis, fifty stadia west of Leptis. There were other promontories of the name on the coast of Africa.

HERMĂGŎRAS (Ἑρμαγόρας). 1. Of Temnos, a distinguished Greek rhetorician of the time of Cicero. He belonged to the Rhodian school of oratory, but is known chiefly as a teacher of rhetoric. He devoted particular attention to what is called the invention, and made a peculiar division of the parts of an oration, which differed from that adopted by other rhetoricians.—2. Surnamed Carion, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Augustus. He was a disciple of Theodorus of Gadara.

HERMAPHRŎDĪTUS (Ἑρμαφρόδιτος), son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus), and consequently great-grandson of Atlas, whence he is called Atlantiades or Atlantius. (Ov., Met., iv., 368.) He had inherited the beauty of both his parents, and was brought up by the nymphs of Mount Ida. In his fifteenth year he went to Caria. In the neighborhood of Halicarnassus he lay down by the fountain of Salmacis. The nymph of the fountain fell in love with him, and tried in vain to win his affections. Once when he was bathing in the fountain she embraced him, and prayed to the gods that she might be united with him forever. The gods granted the request, and the bodies of the youth and the nymph became united together, but retained the characteristics of each sex. Hermaphroditus, on becoming aware of the change, prayed that, in future, every one who bathed in the well might be metamorphosed in the same manner.

HERMARCHUS (Ἕρμαρχος), of Mytilene, a rhetorician, became afterward a disciple of Epicurus, who left to him his garden, and appointed him his successor in his school, about B.C. 270. He wrote several works, all of which are lost.

HERMAS (Ἑρμᾶς), a disciple of the Apostle Paul, and one of the apostolic fathers. He is supposed to be the same person as the Hermas who is mentioned in St. Paul's epistle to the Romans (xvi., 14). He wrote in Greek a work entitled The Shepherd of Hermas, of which a Latin translation is still extant. Its object is to instruct persons in the duties of the Christian life. Edited by Coteiler in his Patres Apostol., Paris, 1672.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς, Ἑρμείας, Dor. Ἑρμᾶς), called MERCŬRIUS by the Romans. The Greek Hermes was a son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Maia, the daughter of Atlas, and born in a cave of Mount Cyllene in Arcadia, whence he is called Atlantiades or Cyllenius. A few hours after his birth he escaped from his cradle, went to Pieria, and carried off some of the oxen of Apollo. In the Iliad and Odyssey this tradition is not mentioned, though Hermes (Mercury) is characterized as a cunning thief. That he might not be discovered by the traces of his footsteps, he put on sandals, and drove the oxen to Pylos, where he killed two, and concealed the rest in a cave. The skins of the slaughtered animals were nailed to a rock, and part of their flesh was cooked and eaten, and the rest burned. Thereupon he returned to Cyllene, where he found a tortoise at the entrance of his native cave. He took the animal's shell, drew strings across it, and thus invented the lyre, on which he immediately played. Apollo, by his prophetic power, had meantime discovered the thief, and went to Cyllene to charge Hermes (Mercury) with the crime before his mother Maia. She showed to the god the child in its cradle; but Apollo carried the boy before Zeus (Jupiter), and demanded back his oxen. Zeus (Jupiter) commanded him to comply with the demand of Apollo, but Hermes (Mercury) denied that he had stolen the cattle. As, however, he saw that his assertions were not believed, he conducted Apollo to Pylos, and restored to him his oxen; but when Apollo heard the sounds of the lyre, he was so charmed that he allowed Hermes (Mercury) to keep the animals. Hermes (Mercury) now invented the syrinx, and after disclosing his inventions to Apollo, the two gods concluded an intimate friendship with each other. Apollo presented his young friend with his own golden shepherd's staff, and taught him the art of prophesying by means of dice. Zeus (Jupiter) made him his own herald, and likewise the herald of the gods of the lower world. The principal feature in the traditions about Hermes (Mercury) consists in his being the herald of the gods, and in this capacity he appears even in the Homeric poems. His original character of an ancient Pelasgian, or Arcadian divinity of nature, gradually disappeared in the legends. As the herald of the gods, he is the god of eloquence, for the heralds are the public speakers in the assemblies and on other occasions. The gods especially employed him as messenger when eloquence was required to attain the desired object. Hence the tongues of sacrificial animals were offered to him. As heralds and messengers are usually men of prudence and circumspection, Hermes (Mercury) was also the god of prudence and skill in all the relations of social intercourse. These qualities were combined with similar ones, such as cunning, both in words and actions, and even fraud, perjury, and the inclination to steal; but acts of this kind were committed by Hermes (Mercury) always with a certain skill, dexterity, and even gracefulness. Being endowed with this shrewdness and sagacity, he was regarded as the author of a variety of inventions, and, besides the lyre and syrinx, he is said to have invented the alphabet, numbers, astronomy, music, the art of fighting, gymnastics, the cultivation of the olive-tree, measures, weights, and many other things. The powers which he possessed himself he conferred upon those mortals and heroes who enjoyed his favor; and all who possessed them were under his especial protection or are called his sons. He was employed by the gods, and more especially by Zeus (Jupiter), on a variety of occasions, which are recorded in ancient story. Thus he led Priam to Achilles to fetch the body of Hector; tied Ixion to the wheel; conducted Hera (Juno), Aphrodite (Venus), and Athena (Minerva) to Paris; fastened Prometheus to Mount Caucasus; rescued Dionysus (Bacchus) after his birth from the flames, or received him from the hands of Zeus (Jupiter) to carry him to Athamas; sold Hercules to Omphale; and was ordered by Zeus (Jupiter) to carry off Io, who was metamorphosed into a cow, and guarded by Argus, whom he slew. Vid. ARGUS. From this murder he is very commonly called Ἀργειφόντης. In the Trojan war Hermes (Mercury) was on the side of the Greeks. His ministry to Zeus (Jupiter) was not confined to the offices of herald and messenger, but he was also his charioteer and cup-bearer. As dreams are sent by Zeus (Jupiter), Hermes (Mercury) conducts them to man, and hence he is also described as the god who had it in his power to send refreshing sleep or take it away. Another important function of Hermes (Mercury) was to conduct the shades of the dead from the upper into the lower world, whence he is called ψυχοπομπός, νεκροπομπός, ψυχαγωγός, &c. The idea of his being the herald and messenger of the gods, of his travelling from place to place and concluding treaties, necessarily implied the notion that he was the promoter of social intercourse and of commerce among men. In this capacity he was regarded as the maintainer of peace, and as the god of roads, who protected travellers, and punished those who refused to assist travellers who had mistaken their way. Hence the Athenian generals, on setting out on an expedition, offered sacrifices to Hermes (Mercury), surnamed Hegemonius or Agetor; and numerous statues of the god were erected on roads, at doors and gates, from which circumstance he derived a variety of surnames and epithets. As the god of commerce he was called διέμπορος, ἐμπολαῖος, παλιγκάπηλος, κερδέμπορος, ἀγοραῖος, &c. As commerce is the source of wealth, he was also the god of gain and riches, especially of sudden and unexpected riches, such as are acquired by commerce. As the giver of wealth and good luck (πλουτοδότης), he also presided over the game of dice. Hermes (Mercury) was believed to be the inventor of sacrifices. Hence he not only acts the part of a herald at sacrifices, but is also the protector of sacrificial animals, and was believed in particular to increase the fertility of sheep. For this reason he was especially worshipped by shepherds, and is mentioned in connection with Pan and the Nymphs. This feature in the character of Hermes (Mercury) is a remnant of the ancient Arcadian religion, in which he was the fertilizing god of the earth, who conferred his blessing on man. Hermes (Mercury) was likewise the patron of all the gymnastic games of the Greeks. This idea seems to be of late origin, for in Homer no trace of it is found. Athens appears to have been the first place in which he was worshipped in this capacity. At a later time almost all gymnasia were under his protection; and the Greek artists derived their ideal of the god from the gymnasium, and represented him as a youth whose limbs were beautifully and harmoniously developed by gymnastic exercises. The most ancient seat of the worship of Hermes (Mercury) is Arcadia, the land of his birth, where Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus, is said to have built to him the first temple. From thence his worship was carried to Athens, and ultimately spread through all Greece. The festivals celebrated in his honor were called Hermæa. Vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v. His temples and statues (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v. HERMÆ) were extremely numerous in Greece. Among the things sacred to him were the palm-tree, the tortoise, the number four, and several kinds of fish; and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of incense, honey, cakes, pigs, and especially lambs and young goats. The principal attributes of Hermes (Mercury) are, 1. A travelling hat with a broad brim, which in later times was adorned with two small wings. 2. The staff (ῥάβδος or σκῆπτρον), which he bore as a herald, and had received from Apollo. In late works of art the white ribbons which surrounded the herald's staff were changed into two serpents. 3. The sandals (πέδιλα). They were beautiful and golden, and carried the god across land and sea with the rapidity of wind; at the ankles of the god they were provided with wings, whence he is called πτηνοπέδιλος, or alipes. The Roman MERCURIUS is spoken of separately.

HERMES TRISMEGISTUS (Ἑρμῆς Τρισμέγιστος), the reputed author of a variety of works, some of which are still extant. The Greek God Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Th or Theut as early as the time of Plato. The New Platonists regarded the Egyptian Hermes as the source of all knowledge and thought, the λόγος embodied, and hence called him Trismegistus. A vast number of works on philosophy and religion, written by the New Platonists, were ascribed to this Hermes, from which it was pretended that Pythagoras and Plato had derived all their knowledge. Most of these works were probably written in the fourth century of our era. The most important of them is entitled Pœmander (from ποιμήν, a shepherd, pastor), apparently in imitation of the Pastor of Hermas. Vid. HERMAS. This work is in the form of a dialogue. It treats of nature, the creation of the world, the deity, his nature and attributes, the human soul, knowledge, &c.

HERMĒSIĂNAX (Ἑρμησιάναξ), of Colophon, a distinguished elegiac poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great. His chief work was an elegiac poem, in three books, addressed to his mistress Leontium, whose name formed the title of the poem. His fragments are edited by Rigler and Axt, Colon., 1828, [by Hermann, in a university programme, Lips., 1828, 4to], and by Bailey, London, 1839.

HERMĪAS or HERMĬAS (Ἑρμείας or Ἑρμίας). 1. Tyrant of Atarneus and Assos in Mysia, celebrated as the friend and patron of Aristotle. Aristotle remained with Hermias three years, from B.C. 347 to 344, in the latter of which years Hermias was seized by Mentor, the Greek general of the Persian king, and sent as a captive to the Persian court, where he was put to death. Aristotle married Pythias, the adopted daughter of Hermias, and celebrated the praises of his benefactor in an ode addressed to Virtue, which is still extant.—2. A Christian writer who lived about A.D. 180, was the author of an extant work, entitled Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω φιλοσόφων, in which the Greek philosophers are held up to ridicule. Edited with Tatianus by Worth, Oxon., 1700.

HERMĬNĬA GENS, a very ancient patrician house at Rome, which appears in the first Etruscan war with the republic, B.C. 506, and vanishes from history in 448. T. Herminius was one of the three heroes who kept the Sublician bridge along with Horatius Cocles against the whole force of Porsena.

HERMĬNĬUS MONS (now Sierra de la Estrella), the chief mountain in Lusitania, south of the Durius, from seven thousand to eight thousand feet high, called in the Middle Ages Hermeno or Armiña.

HERMĬŎNE (Ἑρμιόνη), the beautiful daughter of Menelaus and Helena. She had been promised in marriage to Orestes before the Trojan war; but Menelaus, after his return home, married her to Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus). Thereupon Orestes claimed Hermione for himself; but Neoptolemus haughtily refused to give her up. Orestes, in revenge, incited the Delphians against him, and Neoptolemus was slain. Hermione afterward married Orestes, whom she had always loved, and bore him a son Tisamenus. The history of Hermione is related with various modifications. According to some, Menelaus betrothed her at Troy to Neoptolemus; but in the meantime her grandfather, Tyndareus sa, promised her to Orestes, and actually gave her in marriage to him. Neoptolemus, on his return, took possession of her by force, but was slain soon after either at Delphi or in his own home at Phthia.

HERMĬŎNE (Ἑρμιόνη: Ἑρμιονεύς: now Kastri) a town of Argolis, but originally independent of Argos, was situated on a promontory on the eastern coast, and on a bay of the sea, which derived its name from the town (Hermionicus Sinus). Its territory was called HERMĬŎNIS. It was originally inhabited by the Dryopes; and, in consequence of its isolated position, it became a flourishing city at an early period. It contained several temples, and, among them, a celebrated one of (Ceres) Demeter Chthonia. At a later time it joined the Achæan league.

HERMĬŎNES. Vid. GERMANIA.

HERMIPPUS (Ἕρμιππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the old comedy, vehemently attacked Pericles and Aspasia. [The fragments of Hermippus are published collectively by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 138–155, edit. minor.]—2. Of Smyrna, a distinguished philosopher, was a disciple of Callimachus of Alexandrea, and flourished about B.C. 200. He wrote a great biographical work (Βίοι), which is frequently referred to by later writers.—3. Of Berytus, a grammarian, who flourished under Trajan and Hadrian.

HERMĬSĬUM, a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, on the Cimmerian Bosporus.

HERMOCRĂTES (Ἑρμοκράτης), a Syracusan of rank, and an able statesman and orator, was chosen one of the Syracusan generals, B.C. 414, in order to oppose the Athenians. He afterward served under Gylippus, when the latter took the command of the Syracusan forces; and after the destruction of the Athenian armament he attempted to save the lives of Nicias and Demosthenes. He then employed all his influence to induce his countrymen to support with vigor the Lacedæmonians in the war in Greece itself. He was, with two colleagues, appointed to the command of a small fleet, which the Syracusans sent to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians; but, during his absence from home, he was banished by the Syracusans (410). Having obtained support from the Persian satrap Pharnabazus, he returned to Sicily, and endeavored to effect his restoration to his native city by force of arms, but was slain in an attack which he made upon Syracuse in 407.

HERMŎDŌRUS (Ἑρμόδωρος). 1. Of Ephesus, a person of distinction, was expelled by his fellow-citizens, and is said to have gone to Rome, and to have explained to the decemvirs the Greek laws, and thus assisted them in drawing up the laws of the Twelve Tables, B.C. 451.—2. A disciple of Plato, is said to have circulated the works of Plato, and to have sold them in Sicily. He wrote a work on Plato.—3. Of Salamis, the architect of the temple of Mars in the Flaminian Circus.

HERMŎGĔNES (Ἑρμογένης). 1. A son of Hipponicus, and a brother of the wealthy Callias, is introduced by Plato as one of the speakers in his "Cratylus," where he maintains that all the words of a language were formed by an agreement of men among themselves.—2. A celebrated Greek rhetorician, was a native of Tarsus, and lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 161–180. At the age of fifteen his eloquence excited the admiration of Marcus Aurelius. He was shortly afterward appointed public teacher of rhetoric, and at the age of seventeen he began his career as a writer; but, unfortunately, when he was twenty-five, his mental powers gave way, and he never recovered their full use, although he lived to an advanced age. After his death, his heart is said to have been found covered with hair. His works, five in number, which are still extant, form together a complete system of rhetoric, and were for a long time used in all the rhetorical schools as manuals. They are, 1. Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ περὶ τῶν στάσεων. 2. Περὶ εὑρέσεως (De Inventione) 3. Περὶ ἰδεῶν (De Formis Oratoriis). 4. Περὶ μεθόδου δεινότητος (De apto et solerti genere dicendi Methodus.) 5. Προγυμνάσματα. An abridgment of the latter work was made by Aphthonius, in consequence of which the original fell into oblivion. The works of Hermogenes are printed in Walz's Rhetor. Græc.—3. An architect of Alabanda, in Caria, who invented what was called the pseudodipterus, that is, a form of a temple, with apparently two rows of columns. His great object as an architect was to increase the taste for the Ionic form of temples, in preference to Doric temples.

HERMŎGĔNES, M. TIGELLĬUS, a notorious detractor of Horace, who calls him (Sat., i., 3, 129), however, optimus cantor et modulator. He was opposed to satires altogether, was a man without talent, but yet had a foolish fancy for trying his hand at literature. It is conjectured that, under the fictitious name of Pantolabus (Sat., i., 8, 11; ii., 1, 21), Horace alludes to Hermogenes, for the prosody of the two names is the same, so that one may be substituted for the other.

HERMOGENIĀNUS, the latest Roman jurist from whom there is an extract in the Digest, lived in the time of Constantine the Great. It is probable that he was the compiler of the Codex Hermogenianus, but so many persons of the same name lived nearly at the same time that this cannot be affirmed with certainty.

HERMŎLĀUS (Ἑρμόλαος), a Macedonian youth, and a page of Alexander the Great. During a hunting party in Bactria, B.C. 327, he slew a wild boar without waiting to allow Alexander the first blow, whereupon the king ordered him to be flogged. Incensed at this indignity, Hermolaus formed a conspiracy against the king's life; but the plot was discovered, and Hermolaus and his accomplices were stoned to death by the Macedonians.

HERMONASSA. 1. A town of the Sindi at the entrance of the Cimmerian Bosporus, founded by the Mytilenæans, called after Hermonassa, the wife of the founder, who died during its foundation, and left to her the sovereignty.—2. A town on the coast of Pontus, near Trapezus.

HERMONTHIS (Ἕρμωνθις: now Erment, ruins), the chief city of the Nomos Hermonthites, in Upper Egypt, on the west bank of the Nile, a little above Thebes.

HERMŎPŎLIS (Ἑρμόπολις, Ἑρμοῦ πόλις). 1. PARVA (ἡ μικρά: now Damanhour), a city of Lower Egypt, the capital of the Nomos of Alexandrea, stood upon the canal which connected the Canopic branch of the Nile with the Lake Mareotis.—2. Magna (ἡ μεγαλή: ruins near Eshmounein), the capital of the Nomos Hermopolites, in the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, and one of the oldest cities in the land, stood on the west bank of the Nile, a little below the confines of Upper Egypt. At the boundary line itself was a military station, or custom-house, called Ἑρμοπολιτική φυλακή, for collecting a toll on goods entering the Heptanomis. Hermopolis was a chief seat of the worship of Anubis (Cynocephalus), and it was the sacred burial-place of the Ibis.

Hermos (τὸ Ἕρμος: Ἑρμειος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis, on the road from Athens to Eleusis.

Hermŏtīmus (Ἑρμότιμος). 1. A mathematician of Colophon, was one of the immediate predecessors of Euclid, and the discoverer of several geometrical propositions.—2. Of Clazomenæ, an early Greek philosopher of uncertain date, belonged to the Ionic school. Some traditions represent him as a mysterious person, gifted with supernatural power, by which his soul, apart from the body, wandered from place to place, bringing tidings of distant events in incredibly short spaces of time. At length his enemies burned his body, in the absence of the soul, which put an end to his wanderings.

Hermundūri, one of the most powerful nations of Germany, belonged to the Suevic race, dwelt between the Main and the Danube, and were bounded by the Sudeti Mountains in the north, the Agri Decumates of the Romans in the west and south, the Narisci on the east, the Cherusci on the northeast, and the Catti on the northwest. They were for a long time the allies of the Romans; but along with the other German tribes they assisted the Marcomanni in the great war against the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius. After this time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people, but are included under the general name of Suevi.

Hermus (Ἕρμος: now Ghiediz-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises in Mount Dindymene (now Morad-Dagh) in Phrygia; flows through Lydia, watering the plain north of Sardis, which was hence called Ἕρμου πεδίον; passes by Magnesia and Temnus, and falls into the Gulf of Smyrna between Smyrna and Phocæa. It formed the boundary between Æolis and Ionia. Its chief tributaries were the Hyllus, Cogamus, Pactolus, and Phrygnus.

Hernĭci, a people in Latium, belonged to the Sabine race, and are said to have derived their name from the Marsic (Sabine) word herna, "rock." According to this etymology, their name would signify "mountaineers." They inhabited the mountains of the Apennines between the Lake Fucinus and the River Trerus, and were bounded on the north by the Marsi and Æqui, and on the south by the Volsci. Their chief town was Anagnia. They were a brave and warlike people, and long offered a formidable resistance to the Romans. The Romans formed a league with them on equal terms in the third consulship of Sp. Cassius, B.C. 486. They were finally subdued by the Romans, 306.

Hero. Vid. Leander.

Hero (Ἥρων). 1. The Elder, a celebrated mathematician, was a native of Alexand[ria], and lived in the reigns of the Ptolemies Phi[la]delphus and Evergetes (B.C. 285–232). [He was] celebrated on account of his mechanical in[ven]tions, of which one of the best known is [the] common pneumatic experiment called He[ro's] fountain, in which a jet of water is maintai[ned] by condensed air. We also find in his w[orks] a description of a steam-engine, and of a [double] forcing pump used for a fire-engine. The [fol]lowing works of Hero are extant, though n[ot in] a perfect form: 1. Χειροβαλλίστρας κατασκ[ευὴ] καὶ συμμετρία, de Constructione et Mensura M[an]ubalistæ. 2. Βελοποιϊκά, on the manufacture [of] darts. 3. Πνευματικά, or Spiritalia, the m[ost] celebrated of his works. 4. Περὶ αὐτοματοπ[οιη]τικῶν, de Automatorum Fabrica Libri duo. [All] these works are published in the Mathem[atici] Veteres, Paris, 1693.—2. The Younger, a mat[h]ematician, is supposed to have lived under He[r]aclius (A.D. 610–641). The principal ext[ant] works assigned to him are, 1. De Machinis Be[l]licis. 2. Geodæsia, on practical geometry. [3.] De Obsidione repellenda. Published in the Ma[th]ematici Veteres.

Hērōdes I. (Ἡρώδης), commonly called He[r]od. 1. Surnamed the Great, king of the Jew[s], was the second son of Antipater, and conse[]quently of Idumæan origin. Vid. Antipate[r], No. 3. When his father was appointed by Cæ[]sar procurator of Judæa, in B.C. 47, Herod, though only twenty-five years of age, obtained the government of Galilee. In 46 he obtained the government of Cœle-Syria. After the death of Cæsar (44), Herod first supported Cassius; but upon the arrival of Antony in Syria, in 41 he exerted himself to secure his favor, and completely succeeded in his object. In 40 he went to Rome, and obtained from Antony and Octavianus a decree of the senate, constituting him king of Judæa. He supported Antony in the civil war against Octavianus; but after the battle of Actium (31) he was pardoned by Octavianus and confirmed in his kingdom. During the remainder of his reign he cultivated with assiduity the friendship of Augustus and his counsellor Agrippa, and enjoyed the highest favor both of the one and the other. He possessed a jealous temper and ungovernable passions. He put to death his beautiful wife Mariamne whom he suspected, without cause, of adultery, and with whom he was violently in love; and at a later period he also put to death his two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus. His government, though cruel and tyrannical, was vigorous; and he was both feared and respected by his subjects and the surrounding nations. He especially loved to display his power and munificence by costly and splendid public works. He commenced rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem; he rebuilt the city of Samaria, and bestowed on it the name of Sebaste; while he converted a small town on the sea-coast into a magnificent city, to which he gave the name of Cæsarea. He adorned these new cities with temples, theatres, gymnasia, and other buildings in the Greek style; and he even ventured to erect a theatre at Jerusalem itself, and an amphitheatre without the walls, in which he exhibited combats of wild beasts and gladiators. In the last year of his reign Jesus Christ was born; and it must have been on his deathbed that he ordered that massacre of the children at Bethlehem which is recorded by the Evangelist (Matth., ii., 16). He died in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, and the seventieth of his age, B.C. 4.*—2. HERODES ANTIPAS, son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan, obtained the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa on his father's death, while the kingdom of Judæa devolved on his elder brother Archelaus. He married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Herod Philip, she having, in defiance of the Jewish law, divorced her first husband. He had been previously married to a daughter of the Arabian prince Aretas, who quitted him in disgust at this new alliance. Aretas thereupon invaded the dominions of Antipas, and defeated the army which was opposed to him. In A.D. 38, after the death of Tiberius, Antipas went to Rome to solicit from Caligula the title of king, which had just been bestowed upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa; but, through the intrigues of Agrippa, who was high in the favor of the Roman emperor, Antipas was deprived of his dominions, and sent into exile at Lyons (39); he was subsequently removed to Spain, where he died. It was Herod Antipas who imprisoned and put to death John the Baptist, who had reproached him with his unlawful connection with Herodias. It was before him also that CHRIST was sent by Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem, as belonging to his jurisdiction, on account of his supposed Galilean origin.—3. HERODES AGRIPPA. Vid. AGRIPPA.—4. Brother of Herod Agrippa I., obtained the kingdom of Chalcis from Claudius at the request of Agrippa, 41. After the death of Agrippa (44), Claudius bestowed upon him the superintendence of the temple of Jerusalem, together with the right of appointing the high priests. He died in 48, when his kingdom was bestowed by Claudius upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa II.—5. HERODES ATTICUS, the rhetorician. Vid. ATTICUS.

HĒRŌDĬĀNUS (Ἡρωδιανός). 1. An historian, who wrote in Greek a history of the Roman empire in eight books, from the death of M. Aurelius to the commencement of the reign of Gordianus III. (A.D. 180–238). He himself informs us that the events of this period had occurred in his own lifetime; but beyond this we know nothing respecting his life. He appears to have had Thucydides before him as a model, both for style and for the general composition of his work, like him, introducing here and there speeches wholly or in part imaginary. In spite of occasional inaccuracies in chronology, his narrative is in the main truthful and impartial. Edited by Irmisch, Lips., 1789–1805, 5 vols., and by Bekker, Berlin, 1826.—2. ÆLIUS HERODIANUS, one of the most celebrated grammarians of antiquity, was the son of Apollonius Dyscolus (vid. APOLLONIUS, No. 4), and was born at Alexandrea. From that place he removed to Rome, where he gained the favor of the emperor M. Aurelius, to whom he dedicated his work on prosody. This work seems to have embraced not merely prosody, but most of those subjects now included in the etymological portion of grammar. The estimation in which he was held by subsequent grammarians was very great. Priscian styles him maximus auctor artis grammaticæ. He was a very voluminous writer; but none of his works have come down to us complete, though several extracts from them are preserved by later grammarians.

HĒRŎDĬCUS (Ἡρόδικος). 1. Of Babylon, a grammarian, was one of the immediate successors of Crates of Mallus, and an opponent of the followers of Aristarchus, against whom he wrote an epigram, which is still extant and included in the Greek Anthology.—2. A celebrated physician of Selymbria in Thrace, lived in the fifth century B.C., and was one of the tutors of Hippocrates.

HĒRŎDŌRUS (Ἡρόδωρος), of Heraclea, in Pontus, a contemporary of Hecatæus and Pherecydes, about B.C. 510, wrote a work on Hercules and his exploits.

HĒRŎDŎTUS (Ἡρόδοτος). 1. A Greek historian, and the father of history, was born at Halicarnassus, a Doric colony in Caria, B.C. 484. He belonged to a noble family at Halicarnassus. He was the son of Lyxes and Dryo; and the epic poet Panyasis was one of his relations. Herodotus left his native city at an early age, in order to escape from the oppressive government of Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, who put to death Panyasis. He probably settled at Samos for some time, and there became acquainted with the Ionic dialect; but he spent many years in his extensive travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, of which we shall speak presently. At a later time he returned to Halicarnassus, and took a prominent part in expelling Lygdamis from his native city. In the contentions which followed the expulsion of the tyrant, Herodotus was exposed to the hostile attacks of one of the political parties, whereupon he again left Halicarnassus, and settled at Thurii, in Italy, where he died. Whether he accompanied the first colonists to Thurii in 443, or followed them a few years afterward, is a disputed point, and can not be determined with certainty, though it appears probable, from a passage in his work, that he was at Athens at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war (431). It is also disputed where Herodotus wrote his history. Lucian relates that Herodotus read his work to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, which was received with such universal applause that the nine books of the work were in consequence honored with the names of the nine muses. The same writer adds that the young Thucydides was present at this recitation, and was moved to tears. But this celebrated story, which rests upon the authority of Lucian alone, must be rejected for many reasons. Nor is there sufficient evidence in favor of the tradition that Herodotus read his work at the Panathenæa at Athens in 446 or 445, and received from the Athenians a reward of ten talents. It is far more probable that he wrote his work at Thurii, when he was advanced in years; and it appears that he was engaged upon it, at least in the way of revision, when he was seventy-seven years of age, since he mentions the revolt of the Medes against Darius Nothus, and the death of Amyrtæus, events which belong to the years 409 and 408. Though the work of Herodotus was probably not written till he was advanced in years, yet he was collecting materials for it during a great part of his life. It was apparently with this view that he undertook his extensive travels through Greece and foreign countries, and his work contains on almost every page the results of his personal observations and inquiries. There was scarcely a town of any importance in Greece Proper and on the coasts of Asia Minor with which he was not perfectly familiar; and at many places in Greece, such as Samos, Athens, Corinth, and Thebes, he seems to have stayed some time. The sites of the great battles between the Greeks and barbarians, as Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, and Platææ, were well known to him; and on Xerxes's line of march from the Hellespont to Athens, there was probably not a place which he had not seen with his own eyes. He also visited most of the Greek islands, not only in the Ægean, but even in the west of Greece, such as Zacynthus. Further north in Europe he visited Thrace and the Scythian tribes on the Black Sea. In Asia he travelled through Asia Minor and Syria, and visited the cities of Babylon, Ecbatana, and Susa. He spent some time in Egypt, and travelled as far south as Elephantine. He saw with his own eyes all the wonders of Egypt, and the accuracy of his observations and descriptions still excites the astonishment of travellers in that country. From Egypt he appears to have made excursions to the east into Arabia, and to the west into Libya, at least as far as Cyrene, which was well known to him. The object of his work is to give an account of the struggles between the Greeks and Persians. He traces the enmity between Europe and Asia to the mythical times. He passes rapidly over the mythical ages to come to Crœsus, king of Lydia, who was known to have committed acts of hostility against the Greeks. This induces him to give a full history of Crœsus and of the kingdom of Lydia. The conquest of Lydia by the Persians under Cyrus then leads him to relate the rise of the Persian monarchy, and the subjugation of Asia Minor and Babylon. The nations which are mentioned in the course of this narrative are again discussed more or less minutely. The history of Cambyses and his expedition into Egypt induce him to enter into the details of Egyptian history. The expedition of Darius against the Scythians causes him to speak of Scythia and the north of Europe. In the mean time the revolt of the Ionians breaks out, which eventually brings the contest between Persia and Greece to an end. An account of this insurrection is followed by the history of the invasion of Greece by the Persians; and the history of the Persian war now runs in a regular channel until the taking of Sestos by the Greeks, B.C. 478, with which event his work concludes. It will be seen from the preceding sketch that the history is full of digressions and episodes; but those do not impair the unity of the work, for one thread, as it were, runs through the whole, and the episodes are only like branches of the same tree. The structure of the work thus bears a strong resemblance to a grand epic poem. The work is pervaded by a deep religious sentiment. Herodotus shows the a profound reverence for every thing which conceives as divine, and rarely ventures to express an opinion on what he considers a sa[cred] or religious mystery. In order to form a [just] judgment of the historical value of the work [of] Herodotus, we must distinguish between the parts in which he speaks from his own observations and those in which he merely repeats what he was told by priests and others. [In] the latter case he was undoubtedly often deceived; but whenever he speaks from his own observations, he is a real model of truthfulness and accuracy; and the more the countries which he describes have been explored by modern travellers, the more firmly has his authority been established. Many things which used [to] be laughed at as impossible or paradoxical are found now to be strictly in accordance with truth. The dialect in which he wrote is the Ionic, intermixed with epic or poetical expressions, and sometimes even with Attic and Doric forms. The excellences of his style consist in its antique and epic coloring, its transparent clearness, and the lively flow of the narration. But, notwithstanding all the merits of Herodotus, there were certain writers in antiquity who attacked him both in regard to the form and the substance of his work; and there is still extant a work ascribed to Plutarch, entitled "On the Malignity of Herodotus," full of the most futile accusations of every kind. The best editions of Herodotus are by Schweighæuser, Argentor., 1806, often reprinted; *by Gais*ford, Oxon., 1824; and by Bähr, Lips., 18[illegible].—2. A Greek physician, who practiced at Rome with great reputation, about A.D. 100. He wrote some medical works, which are several times quoted by Galen.—3. Also a Greek physician, a native either of Tarsus or *Philadel*phia, taught Sextus Empiricus.

* The death of Herod took place in the same year with the actual birth of Christ, as is mentioned above, but it is well known that this is to be placed four years before the date in general use as the Christian era.

HERŎŎPŎLIS or HERO (Ἡρώων πόλις, Ἡρώ: in the Old Testament, Raamses or Rameses: ruins near Abou-Keshid?), the capital of the Nomos Heroöpolites or Arsinoïtes in Lower Egypt, stood on the border of the Desert east of the Delta, upon the canal connecting the Nile with the western head of the Red Sea, which was called from it Sinus Heroöpoliticus (κόλπος Ἡρώων, Ἡρωοπολίτης or -ιτικός). The country about it is supposed to be the Goshen of Scripture.

[HERŎPHANTUS (Ἡρόφαντος), tyrant at Parium in the time of Darius Hystaspis.]

HERŎPHĬLUS (Ἡρόφιλος), one of the most celebrated physicians of antiquity, was born at *Chal*cedon in Bithynia, was a pupil of Praxagoras, and lived at Alexandrea under the first Ptolemy, who reigned B.C. 323–285. Here he soon acquired a great reputation, and was one of the founders of the medical school in that city. He seems to have given his chief attention to anatomy and physiology, which he studied not merely from the dissection of animals, but also from that of human bodies. He is even said to have carried his ardor in his anatomical pursuits so far as to have dissected criminals alive. He was the author of several medical and anatomical works, of which nothing but the titles and a few fragments remain. These have been collected and published by Marx, De Herophili Vita, &c., Gotting., 1840.

HEROSTRĂTUS (Ἡρόστρατος), an Ephesian, set fire to the temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus on the same night that Alexander the Great was born, B.C. 356. He was put to the torture, and confessed that he had fired the temple to immortalize himself. The Ephesians passed a decree condemning his name to oblivion; but it has been, as might have been expected, handed down by history.

HERSE (Ἕρση), daughter of Cecrops and sister f Agraulos, was beloved by Mercury (Hermes), by whom she became the mother of Cephalus. Respecting her story, vid. AGRAULOS. At Athens sacrifices were offered to her, and the maidens who carried the vessels containing the libation (ἕρση) were called ἑῤῥηφόροι.

HERSILĬA, the wife of Romulus, was the only married woman carried off by the Romans in the rape of the Sabine maidens. As Romulus after death became Quirinus, so Hersilia his wife became a goddess, Hora or Horta. Some writers, however, made Hersilia the wife of Hostus, grandfather of Tullus Hostilius.

HERTHA (containing probably the same elements as the words earth, erde), the goddess of the earth among the ancient Germans HERULI or ERULI, a powerful German race, are said to have come originally from Scandinavia, but they appear on the shores of the Black Sea in the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 262), when, in conjunction with the Goths, they invaded the Roman empire. They were conquered by the Ostrogoths, and afterward formed part of the great army of Attila, with which he invaded Gaul and Italy. After the death of Attila (453) a portion of the Heruli united with other German tribes; and under the command of Odoacer, who is said to have been an Herulian, they destroyed the Western Empire, 476. Meantime the remainder of the nation formed a powerful kingdom on the banks of the Theiss and the Danube, which was eventually destroyed by the Langobardi or Lombards. Some of the Heruli were allowed by Anastasius to settle in Pannonia, and they served with great distinction in the armies of Justinian.

HĒSĬŎDUS (Ἡσίοδος) one of the earliest Greek poets, of whose personal history we possess little authentic information. He is frequently mentioned along with Homer; as Homer represents the Ionic school of poetry in Asia Minor, so Hesiod represents the Bœotian school of poetry, which spread over Phocis and Eubœa. The only points of resemblance between the two schools consist in their versification and dialect. In other respects they entirely differ. The Homeric school takes for its subjects the restless activity of the heroic age, while the Hesiodic turns its attention to the quiet pursuits of ordinary life, to the origin of the world, the gods and heroes. Hesiod lived about a century later than Homer, and is placed about B.C. 375. We learn from his own poem on Works and Days that he was born in the village of Ascra in Bœotia, whither his father had emigrated from the Æolian Cyme in Asia Minor. After the death of his father he was involved in a dispute with his brother Perses about his small patrimony, which was decided in favor of his brother. He then emigrated to Orchomenos, where he spent the remainder of his life. This is all that can be said with certainty about the life of Hesiod. Many of the stories related about him refer to his school of poetry, and not to the poet personally. In this light we may regard the tradition that Hesiod had a poetical contest with Homer, which is said to have taken place at Chalcis during the funeral solemnities of King Amphidamas, or, according to others, at Aulis or Delos. The story of this contest gave rise to a composition still extant under the title of Ἀγὼν Ὁμήρου καὶ Ἡσιόδου, the work of a grammarian who lived toward the end of the first century of our era, in which the two poets are represented as engaged in the contest, and answering one another. The following works were attributed to Hesiod in antiquity: 1. Ἔργα or Ἔργα καὶ ἡμέραι, Opera et Dies, Works and Days. It is written in the most homely style, with scarcely any poetical imagery or ornament, and must be looked upon as the most ancient specimen of didactic poetry. It contains ethical, political, and economical precepts, the last of which constitute the greater part of the work, consisting of rules about choosing a wife, the education of children, agriculture, commerce, and navigation. It would further seem that three distinct poems have been inserted in it, viz., 1. The fable of Prometheus and Pandora (47–105); 2. On the ages of the world, which are designated by the names of metals (109–201); and, 3. A description of winter (504–558). 2. Θεογονία, a Theogony, was not considered by Hesiod's countrymen to be a genuine production of the poet. This work gives an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods, explaining the whole order of nature in a series of genealogies, for every part of physical as well as moral nature there appears personified in the character of a distinct being. The whole concludes with an account of some of the most illustrious heroes. 3. Ἠοῖαι or ἠοῖαι μεγάλαι, also called κατάλογοι γυναικῶν, Catalogue of Women. This work is lost. It contained accounts of the women who had been beloved by the gods, and had thus become the mothers of the heroes in the various parts of Greece, from whom the ruling families derived their origin. 4. Ἀσπὶς Ἡρακλέους, Shield of Hercules, which is extant, probably formed part of the work last mentioned. It contains a description of the shield of Hercules, and is an imitation of the Homeric description of the shield of Achilles. The best edition of Hesiod is by Göttling, Gotha and Erfurt, 1843, 2d ed.

HĒSĬŎNE (Ἡσιόνη). 1. Daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, was chained by her father to a rock, in order to be devoured by a sea-monster, that he might thus appease the anger of Apollo and Neptune (Poseidon). Hercules promised to save her if Laomedon would give him the horses which he had received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for Ganymedes. Hercules killed the monster, but Laomedon refused to keep his promise. Thereupon Hercules took Troy, killed Laomedon, and gave Hesione to his friend and companion Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Teucer. Her brother Priam sent Antenor to claim her back, and the refusal on the part of the Greeks is mentioned as one of the causes of the Trojan war.—[2. Daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Prometheus.]

Hespĕrĭa ('Ἑσπερία), the Western land (from ἕσπερος, vesper), the name given by the Greek poets to Italy, because it lay west of Greece. In imitation of them, the Roman poets gave the name of Hesperia to Spain, which they sometimes called ultima Hesperia (Hor., Carm., i., 36, 4), to distinguish it from Italy, which they occasionally called Hesperia Magna (Virg., Æn., ., 569.)

Hespĕrĭdes ('Ἑσπερίδες), the celebrated guardians of the golden apples which Ge (Earth) gave to Juno (Hera) at her marriage with Jupiter Zeus.) Their parentage is differently related. They are called the daughters either of Night or Erebus, or of Phorcys and Ceto, or of Atlas and Hesperis (whence their names Atlantides or Hesperides), or of Hesperus, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis. Some traditions mentioned three Hesperides, viz., Ægle, Arethusa, and Hesperia others four, Ægle, Erytheia, Hestia, and Arethusa; and others again seven. The poets describe them as possessing the power of sweet song. In the earliest legends, these nymphs are described as living on the River Oceanus, in the extreme west; but the later attempts to fix the geographical position of their garden led poets and geographers to different parts of Libya, as the neighborhood of Cyrene, Mount Atlas, or the islands on the western coast of Libya, or even to the northern extremity of the earth, beyond the wind Boreas, among the Hyperboreans. They were assisted in watching the golden apples by the dragon Ladon. It was one of the labors of Hercules to obtain possession of these apples. (Vid. p. 358, a.)

Hespĕrĭum ('Ἑσπέριον, 'Ἑσπέρου κέρας: now Cape Verde or Cape Roxo), a headland on the western coast of Africa, was one of the furthest points to which the knowledge of the ancients extended along that coast. Near it was a bay called Sinus Hesperius; and a day's journey from it a group of islands called Hesperidum Insulæ, wrongly identified by some with the Fortunatæ Insulæ; they are either the Cape de Verde islands, or, more properly, the Bissagos, at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

[Hesperius Sinus. Vid. Hesperium.]

Hespĕrus ('Ἕσπερος), the evening star, is called by Hesiod a son of Astræus and Aurora (Eos). He was also regarded as the same as the morning star, whence both Homer and Hesiod call him the bringer of light (ἑωςφόρος). A later account makes him a son of Atlas, who was fond of astronomy, and who disappeared after ascending Mount Atlas to observe the stars. He was worshipped with divine honors, and was regarded as the fairest star in the heavens. The Romans designated him by the names Lucifer and Hesperus, to characterize him as the morning or evening star.

Hestĭa ('Ἑστία, Ion. 'Ἱστίη), called Vesta by the Romans, the goddess of the hearth, or, rather, of the fire burning on the hearth, was one of the twelve great divinities of the Greeks. She was a daughter of Saturn (Cronus) and Rhea, and, according to common tradition, was the first-born of Rhea, and consequently the first of the children swallowed by Saturn (Cronus). She was a maiden divinity and when Apollo and Neptune (Poseidon) sued for her hand, she swore by the head of Jupiter (Zeus) to remain a virgin forever. As the hearth was looked upon as the centre of domestic life, so Hestia was the goddess of domestic life and the giver of all domestic happiness; as such she was believed to dwell in the inner part of every house, and to have invented the art of building houses. In this respect she often appears together with Mercury (Hermes), who was likewise a deity of the penetralia. Being the goddess of the sacred fire of the altar, Hestia had a share in the sacrifices offered to all the gods. Hence, when sacrifices were offered, she was invoked first, and the first part of the sacrifice was presented to her. Solemn oaths were sworn by the goddess of the hearth; and the hearth itself was the sacred asylum where suppliants implored the protection of the inhabitants of the house. A town or city is only an extended family, and therefore had likewise its sacred hearth. This public hearth usually existed in the prytaneum of a town, where the goddess had her especial sanctuary (θάλαμος), under the name of Prytanitis (Πρυτανῖτις), with a statue and the sacred hearth. There, as at a private hearth, Hestia protected the suppliants. When a colony was sent out, the emigrants took the fire which was to burn on the hearth of their new home from that of the mother town. If ever the fire of her hearth became extinct, it was not allowed to be lighted again with ordinary fire, but either by fire produced by friction, or by burning glasses drawing fire from the sun. The mystical speculations of later times took their origin from the simple ideas of the ancients, and assumed a sacred hearth not only in the centre of the earth, but even in that of the universe, and confounded Hestia in various ways with other divinities, such as Cybele, Terra (Gæa), Ceres (Demeter), Proserpina (Persephone), and Diana (Artemis). There were but few special temples of Hestia in Greece, since every prytaneum was in reality a sanctuary of the goddess, and since a portion of the sacrifices, to whatever divinity they were offered, belonged to her. The worship of the Roman Vesta is spoken of under Vesta.

Hesychĭus ('Ἡσύχιος). 1. An Alexandrine grammarian, under whose name a large Greek dictionary has come down to us. Respecting his personal history nothing is known, but he probably lived about A.D. 380. The work is based, as the writer himself tells us, upon the lexicon of Diogenianus. Hesychius was probably a pagan: the Christian glosses and the references to Christian writers in the work are interpolations by a later hand. The work is one of great importance, not only on account of its explaining the words of the Greek language, but also from its containing much literary and archæological information, derived from earlier grammarians and commentators, whose works are lost. The arrangement of the work how ever, is very defective. The best edition is by Alberti, completed after Alberti's death by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat., 1746–1766, 2 vols. fol.—2. Of Miletus, surnamed Illustris, from some office which he held, lived about A.D. 540, and wrote, 1. An Onomasticon, or account of illustrious men, published by Orelli, Lips., 1820. 2. A Chronicon, or synoptical view of universal history, in six parts, from the reign of Belus, the reputed founder of the Assyrian empire, to the death of the Byzantine emperor, Anastasius I., A.D. 518. The work itself is lost, but an account of it is preserved by Photius.

Hetricŭlum, a town of the Bruttii.

Hibernĭa, also called Ierne, Iverna or Juverna (Ἰέρνη, Ἰερνὶς νῆσος, Ἰουερνία), the island of Ireland, appears to have derived its name from the inhabitants of its southern coast, called Juverni (Ἰούερνοι) by Ptolemy, but its original name was probably Bergion or Vergion. It is mentioned by Cæsar, and is frequently spoken of by subsequent writers; but the Romans never made any attempt to conquer the island, though they obtained some knowledge of it from the commercial intercourse which was carried on between it and Britain. We have no account of the island except from Ptolemy, who must have derived his information from the statements of the British merchants, who visited its coasts. Ptolemy gives rather a long list of its promontories, rivers, tribes, and towns.

[Hicetāon (Ἱκετάων), son of the Trojan king Laomedon, and brother of Priam.]

Hicĕtas (Ἱκέτας or Ἱκέτης). 1. A Syracusan, contemporary with the younger Dionysius and Timoleon. He was at first a friend of Dion, after whose death (B.C. 353) his wife Arete and his sister Aristomache placed themselves under the care of Hicetas; but he was persuaded, notwithstanding, to consent to their destruction. A few years later he became tyrant of Leontini. He carried on war against the younger Dionysius, whom he defeated, and had made himself master of the whole city, except the island citadel, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, 344. Hicetas then opposed Timoleon, and called in the aid of the Carthaginians, but he was defeated and put to death by Timoleon, 339 or 338.—2. Tyrant of Syracuse, during the interval between the reign of Agathocles and that of Pyrrhus. He defeated Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, and was himself defeated by the Carthaginians. After a reign of nine years (288–279), he was expelled from Syracuse.—3. Of Syracuse, one of the earlier Pythagoreans.

Hiempsal. 1. Son of Micipsa, king of Numidia, and grandson of Masinissa, was murdered by Jugurtha soon after the death of Micipsa, B.C. 118.—2. King of Numidia, grandson or great-grandson of Masinissa, and father of Juba, appears to have received the sovereignty of part of Numidia after the Jugurthine war. He was expelled from his kingdom by Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the leader of the Marian party in Africa, but was restored by Pompey in 81. Hiempsal wrote some works in the Punic language, which are cited by Sallust (Jug., 17).

Hĭĕrăpŏlis (Ἱεράπολις). 1. (Now Bambuk-kalessi ?), a city of Great Phrygia, near the Mæander, celebrated for its hot springs and its temple of Cybele. Like the neighboring cities of Colossæ and Laodicea, it was an early seat of Christianity, and it is mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians (iv., 13).—2. Formerly Bambyce (Βαμβύκη: now Bambuch or Membij), a city in the northeast of Syria, one of the chief seats of the worship of Astarte.

[Hiero. Vid. Hieron.]

Hierocles (Ἱεροκλῆς). 1. A Greek rhetorician of Alabanda in Caria, lived about B.C. 100 and was distinguished, like his brother Menecles, by the Asiatic style of oratory.—2. Governor of Bithynia, and afterward of Alexandrea, is said to have been one of the chief instigators of the persecution of the Christians under Diocletian. He wrote a work against the Christians, entitled Λόγοι φιλαλήθεις πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς, of which we may form an idea from the account of Lactantius and the refutation which Eusebius wrote against it. We see from these writers that Hierocles attacked the character of Jesus Christ and his apostles, and put him on an equality with Apollonius of Tyana.—3. A New Platonist, who lived at Alexandrea about the middle of the fifth century. He wrote 1. A commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras, in which he endeavors to give an intelligible account of the philosophy of Pythagoras. Published by Needham, Cambridge, 1709 and by Warren, London, 1742. 2. A work on Providence, Fate, and the reconciliation of man's free will with the divine government of the world, in seven books. The work is lost, but some extracts from it are preserved in Photius. 3. An ethical work on justice, on reverence toward the gods, parents, relations, &c., which bore the title Τὰ φιλοσοφούμενα. This work is also lost, but there are several extracts from it in Stobæus. The extant work, entitled Ἀστεῖα a collection of ludicrous tales, is erroneously ascribed to Hierocles, the New Platonist. The work is of no merit.—4. A Greek grammarian the author of an extant work, entitled Συνέκδημος, that is, The Travelling Companion, intended as a hand-book for travellers through the provinces of the eastern empire. It was perhaps written at the beginning of the sixth century of our era. It contains a list of sixty eparchiæ or provinces of the Eastern empire, and of nine hundred and thirty-five different towns with brief descriptions. Published by Wesseling, in Veterum Romanorum Itineraria, Amsterdam, 1735.

Hĭĕron (Ἱέρων). 1. Tyrant of Syracuse (B.C. 478–467), was son of Dinomenes and brother of Gelon, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty. In the early part of his reign he became involved in a war with Theron of Agrigentum, who had espoused the cause of his brother Polyzelus, with whom he had quarrelled. But Hieron afterward concluded a peace with Theron, and became reconciled to his brother Polyzelus. After the death of Theron in 472, he carried on war against his son Thrasydæus, whom he defeated in a great battle, and expelled from Agrigentum. But by far the most important event of his reign was the great victory which he obtained over the Etruscan fleet near Cumæ (474), and which appears to have effectually broken the naval power of that nation. Hieron died at Catana in the twelfth year of his reign, 467. His government was much more despotic than that of his brother Gelon. He maintained a large guard of mercenary troops, and employed numerous spies and informers. He was, however, a liberal and enlightened patron of men of letters, and his court became the resort of the most distinguished poets and philosophers of the day. Æschylus, Pindar, and Bacchylides took up their abode with him, and we find him associating in friendly intercourse with Xenophanes, Epicharmus, and Simonides. His intimacy with the latter was particularly celebrated, and has been made the subject by Xenophon of an imaginary dialogue, entitled the Hieron. His love of magnificence was especially displayed in the great contests of the Grecian games, and his victories at Olympia and Delphi have been immortalized by Pindar.—2. King of Syracuse (B.C. 270–216), was the son of Hierocles, a noble Syracusan, descended from the great Gelon, but his mother was a female servant. When Pyrrhus left Sicily (275), Hieron, who had distinguished himself in the wars of that monarch, was declared general by the Syracusan army. He strengthened his power by marrying the daughter of Leptines, at that time the most influential citizen at Syracuse; and after his defeat of the Mamertines, he was saluted by his fellow-citizens with the title of king, 270. It was the great object of Hieron to expel the Mamertines from Sicily; and accordingly, when the Romans, in 264, interposed in favor of that people, Hieron concluded an alliance with the Carthaginians, and, in conjunction with them, carried on war against the Romans. But having been defeated by the Romans, he concluded a peace with them in the following year (263), in virtue of which he retained possession of the whole southeast of Sicily, and the eastern side of the island as far as Tauromenium. From this time till his death, a period of little less than half a century, Hieron continued the steadfast friend and ally of the Romans, a policy of which his subjects as well as himself reaped the benefits, in the enjoyment of a state of uninterrupted tranquillity and prosperity. Even the heavy losses which the Romans sustained in the first three years of the second Punic war did not shake his fidelity; and after their great defeats, he sent them large supplies of corn and auxiliary troops. He died in 216 at the age of ninety-two. His government was mild and equitable: though he did not refuse the title of king, he avoided all external display of the insignia of royalty, and appeared in public in the garb of a private citizen. The care he bestowed upon the financial department of his administration is attested by the laws regulating the tithes of corn and other agricultural produce, which, under the name of Leges Hieronicæ, were retained by the Romans when they reduced Sicily to a province. He adorned the city of Syracuse with many public works. His power and magnificence were celebrated by Theocritus in his sixteenth Idyl. Hieron had only one son, Gelon, who died shortly before his father. H[e was] succeeded by his grandson, Hieronymus.

HIĔRŌNȲMUS (Ἱερώνυμος). 1. Of Cardia, [prob]ably accompanied Alexander the Great to [Asia,] and after the death of that monarch (B.C. ...) served under his countryman Eumenes. [In the] last battle between Eumenes and Anti[gonus] (316), Hieronymus fell into the hands of A[ntig]onus, who treated him with kindness, a[nd to] whose service he henceforth attached hi[mself]. After the death of Antigonus (301), Hiero[nymus] continued to follow the fortunes of his s[on De]metrius, and was appointed by the latter [gov]ernor of Bœotia, after his first conque[st of] Thebes, 292. He continued unshaken i[n his] attachment to Demetrius and to his son A[ntig]onus Gonatas, after him. It appears th[at he] survived Pyrrhus, and died at the advanc[ed age] of 104. Hieronymus wrote a history of [the] events from the death of Alexander to th[at of] Pyrrhus, if not later. This work has not [come] down to us, but it is frequently cited by l[ater] writers as one of the chief authorities for [the] history of Alexander's successors. We are [told] that Hieronymus displayed partiality to An[tigo]nus and Demetrius, and, in consequence, tre[ated] Pyrrhus and Lysimachus with great injus[tice.] —2. King of Syracuse, succeeded his gra[nd]father Hieron II., B.C. 216, at fifteen years [of] age. He was persuaded by the Carthagi[nian] party to renounce the alliance with the Rom[ans,] which his grandfather had maintained for [so] many years. He was assassinated after a s[hort] reign of only thirteen months.—3. Of Rh[odes,] commonly called a peripatetic, though Ci[cero] questions his right to the title, was a disciple [of] Aristotle, and appears to have lived down to [the] time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He held [the] highest good to consist in freedom from p[ain] and trouble, and denied that pleasure was to [be] sought for its own sake.—4. Commonly kn[own] as SAINT JEROME, one of the most celebrated [of] the Christian fathers, was born at Stridon, a town upon the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia, about A.D. 340. His father sent him to Rome for the prosecution of his studies, where he devoted himself with great ardor and success to the Greek and Latin languages, to rhetoric, and to the different branches of philosophy, enjoying the instructions of the most distinguished preceptors of that era, among whom was Ælius Donatus. Vid. DONATUS. After completing his studies he went to Gaul, where he remained some time, and subsequently travelled through various countries in the East. At Antioch he was attacked by a dangerous malady and on his recovery he resolved to withdraw from the world. In 374 he retired to the desert of Chalcis, lying between Antioch and the Euphrates, where he passed four years, adhering strictly to the most rigid observances of monkish ascetism, but at the same time pursuing the study of Hebrew. In 379 he was ordained a presbyter at Antioch by Paulinus. Soon after he went to Constantinople, where he lived for three years, enjoying the instructions and friendship of Gregory of Nazianzus. In 382 he accompanied Paulinus to Rome, where he formed a close friendship with the Pope Damasus. He remained at Rome three years, and there labored in proclaiming the glory and merit of a mo[nastic] templative life and monastic discipline. He had many enthusiastic disciples among the Roman ladies, but the influence which he exercised over them excited the hatred of their relations, and exposed him to attacks against his character. Accordingly, he left Rome in 385, having lost his patron Damasus in the preceding year, and, accompanied by the rich widow Paula, her daughter Eustochium, and a number of devout maidens, he made a tour of the Holy Land, and finally settled at Bethlehem, where Paula erected four monasteries, three for nuns and one for monks. Here he passed the remainder of his life. He died A.D. 420. Jerome wrote a great number of works, most of which have come down to us. Of these the most celebrated are his Commentaries on the various books of the Scriptures. He also translated into Latin the Old and New Testaments: his translation is in substance the Latin version of the Scriptures, known by the name of the Vulgate. The translation of the Old Testament was made by Jerome directly from the Hebrew; but the translation of the New Testament was formed by him out of the old translations, carefully corrected from the original Greek. Jerome likewise translated from the Greek the Chronicle of Eusebius, which he enlarged, chiefly in the department of Roman history, and brought down to A.D. 378. Jerome was the most learned of the Latin fathers. His profound knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, his familiarity with ancient history and philosophy, and his personal acquaintance with the manners and scenery of the East, enabled him to throw much light upon the Scriptures. In his controversial works he is vehement and dogmatical. His language is exceedingly pure, bearing ample testimony to the diligence with which he must have studied the choicest models. The best editions of the works of Jerome are the Benedictine, Paris, 5 vols. fol., 1693–1706, and that by Vallarsi, Veron., 11 vols. fol., 1734–1742; reprinted Venet., 11 vols. 4to, 1766.

Hilārius. 1. A Christian writer, was born of pagan parents at Poitiers. He afterward became a Christian, and was elected bishop of his native place, A.D. 350. From this time he devoted all his energies to check the progress of Arianism, which was making rapid strides in Gaul. He became so troublesome to the Arians, that they induced the Emperor Constantius in 356 to banish him to Phrygia. He was allowed to return to Gaul about 361, and died in his diocese in 368. Several of his works have come down to us. They consist chiefly of polemical treatises against the Arians and addresses to the Emperor Constantius. The best edition of his works is by Constant, Paris, 1693, forming one of the Benedictine series, and reprinted by Scipio Maffei, Veron., 1730.—2. Bishop of Arles, succeeded his master Honoratus in that diocese, A.D. 429, and died in 449. He wrote the life of Honoratus and a few other works.

Himĕra (Ἱμέρα). 1. (Now Fiume Salso,) one of the principal rivers in the south of Sicily, at one time the boundary between the territories of the Carthaginians and Syracusans, receives near Enna the water of a salt spring, and hence has salt water as far as its mouth.—2. A smaller river in the north of Sicily, flows into the sea between the towns of Himera and Thermæ.—3. (Ἱμεραῖος), a celebrated Greek city on the northern coast of Sicily, west of the mouth of the River Himera (No. 2), was founded by the Chalcidians of Zancle, B.C. 648, and afterward received Dorian settlers, so that the inhabitants spoke a mixed dialect, partly Ionic (Chalcidian) and partly Doric. About 560, Himera, being threatened by its powerful neighbors, placed itself under the protection of Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in whose power it appears to have remained till his death. At a later time (500) we find Himera governed by a tyrant Terillus, who was expelled by Theron of Agrigentum. Terillus thereupon applied for assistance to the Carthaginians, who, anxious to extend their influence in Sicily, sent a powerful army into Sicily under the command of Hamilcar. The Carthaginians were defeated with great slaughter at Himera by the united forces of Theron and Gelon of Syracuse on the same day that the battle of Salamis was fought (480). Himera was now governed by Thrasydæus, the son of Theron, in the name of his father; but the inhabitants having attempted to revolt, Theron put to death or drove into exile a considerable part of the population, and repeopled the city with settlers from all quarters, but especially of Dorian origin. After the death of Theron (472), Himera recovered its independence, and for the next sixty years was one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily. It assisted Syracuse against the Athenians in 415. In 409 it was taken by Hannibal, the son of Gisco, who, to revenge the great defeat which the Carthaginians had suffered before this town, levelled it to the ground and destroyed almost all the inhabitants. Himera was never rebuilt; but on the opposite bank of the River Himera, the Carthaginians founded a new town, which, from a warm medicinal spring in its neighborhood, was called Thermæ (Θέρμαι: Θερμίτης, Thermitanus: now Termini). Here the remains of the unfortunate inhabitants of Himera were allowed to settle. The Romans, who highly prized the warm springs of Thermæ, permitted the town to retain its own constitution; and Augustus made it a colony. The poet Stesichorus was born at the ancient Himera, and the tyrant Agathocles at Thermæ.

Himĕrĭus (Ἱμέριος), a celebrated Greek sophist, was born at Prusa in Bithynia, and studied at Athens. He was subsequently appointed professor of rhetoric at Athens, where he gave instruction to Julian, afterward emperor, and the celebrated Christian writers, Basil and Gregory Nazianzen. In 362 the Emperor Julian invited him to his court at Antioch, and made him his secretary. He returned to Athens in 368, and there passed the remainder of his life. Himerius was a pagan; but he does not manifest in his writings any animosity against the Christians. There were extant in the time of Photius seventy-one orations by Himerius; but of these only twenty-four have come down to us complete. Edited by Wernsdorf, Gottingen, 1790.

Himilco (Ἱμίλκων). 1. A Carthaginian, who conducted a voyage of discovery from Gades toward the north, along the western shores of Europe, at the same time that Hanno undertook his voyage to the south along the coast of Africa. Vid. HANNO, No. 10. Himilco represented that his further progress was prevented by the stagnant nature of the sea, loaded with seaweed, and by the absence of wind. His voyage is said to have lasted four months, but it is impossible to judge how far it was extended. Perhaps it was intentionally wrapped in obscurity by the commercial jealousy of the Carthaginians.—2. Son of Hanno, commanded, together with Hannibal, son of Gisco (vid. HANNIBAL, No. 1), a Carthaginian army in Sicily, and laid siege to Agrigentum, B.C. 406. Hannibal died before Agrigentum of a pestilence, which broke out in the camp; and Himilco, now left sole general, succeeded in taking the place, after a siege of nearly eight months. At a later period he carried on war against Dionysius of Syracuse. In 395 he defeated Dionysius, and laid siege to Syracuse; but while pressing the siege of the city, a pestilence carried off a great number of his men. In this weakened condition, Himilco was attacked and defeated by Dionysius, and was obliged to purchase his safety by an ignominious capitulation. Such was his grief and disappointment at this termination to the campaign, that, on his return to Carthage, he put an end to his life by voluntary abstinence.—3. The Carthaginian commander at Lilybæum, which he defended with skill and bravery when it was attacked by the Romans, 250.—4. Commander of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily during a part of the second Punic war, 214–212.—5. Surnamed PHAMÆAS, commander of the Carthaginian cavalry in the the third Punic war. He deserted to the Romans, by whom he was liberally rewarded.

HIPPĂNA (τὰ Ἵππανα), a town in the north of Sicily, near Panormus.

HIPPARCHĬA (Ἱππαρχία), wife of Crates the Cynic. (For details, vid. CRATES, No. 3.)

HIPPARCHUS (Ἵππαρχος). 1. Son of Pisistratus. Vid. PISISTRATIDÆ.—2. A celebrated Greek astronomer, was a native of Nicæa in Bithynia, and flourished B.C. 160–145. He resided both at Rhodes and Alexandrea. He was the true father of astronomy, which he raised to that rank among the applications of arithmetic and geometry which it has always since preserved. He was the first who gave and demonstrated the means of solving all triangles, rectilinear and spherical. He constructed a table of chords, of which he made the same sort of use as we make of our sines. He made more observations than his predecessors, and understood them better. He invented the planisphere, or the mode of representing the starry heavens upon a plane, and of producing the solutions of problems of spherical astronomy. He is also the father of true geography, by his happy idea of marking the position of spots on the earth, as was done with the stars, by circles drawn from the pole perpendicularly to the equator; that is, by latitudes and longitudes. His method of eclipses was the only one by which differences of meridians could be determined. The catalogue which Hipparchus constructed of the stars is preserved in the Almagest of Ptolemy. Hipparchus wrote numerous works, which are all lost with the exception of his commentary on the phenomena of Aratus.

HIPPARĪNUS (Ἱππαρῖνος). 1. A Syra[cusan], father of Dion and Aristomache, supporte[d the] elder Dionysius, who married his daughter [Aris]tomache.—2. Son of Dion, and grandson [of the] preceding, threw himself from the roof [of a] house, and was killed on the spot, whe[n his] father attempted, by restraint, to cure hi[m of] the dissolute habits which he had acquired [while] under the power of Dionysius.—3. Son of [the] elder Dionysius by Aristomache, daughte[r of] No. 1, succeeded Callippus in the tyranny [of] Syracuse, B.C. 352. He was assassinated [after] reigning only two years.

HIPPĂRIS (Ἵππαρις: now Camarina), a [river] in the south of Sicily, which flows into the [sea] near Camarina.

HIPPĂSUS (Ἵππασος), of Metapontum or [Cro]ton, in Italy, one of the elder Pythagore[ans], held the element of fire to be the cause of [all] things. In consequence of his making kn[own] the sphere, consisting of twelve pentag[ons], which was regarded by the Pythagoreans [as a] secret, he is said to have perished in the sea [as] an impious man.

HIPPĬA and HIPPĬUS (Ἱππία and Ἵππιος, Ἵππειος), in Latin Equester and Equestris, [sur]names of several divinities, as of Juno (Her[a]) and Minerva (Athena), of Neptune (Poseid[on]), and of Mars (Ares); and at Rome also of Fortu[na] and Venus.

HIPPĬAS (Ἱππίας). 1. Son of Pisistratus. V[id.] PISISTRATIDÆ.—2. The Sophist, was a nati[ve] of Elis, and the contemporary of Socrates. H[is] fellow-citizens availed themselves of his abili[ties] in political matters, and sent him on a dip[lomatic] mission to Sparta. But he was in every respect like the other sophists of the time. He travelled through Greece for the purpose of acquiring wealth and celebrity by teaching and public speaking. His character as a sophist, his vanity, and his boastful arrogance, are well described in the two dialogues of Plato, Hippias major and Hippias minor. Though his knowledge was superficial, yet it appears that he had paid attention not only to rhetorical, philosophical, and political studies, but also to poetry, music, mathematics, painting, and sculpture; and he must even have acquired some practical skill in the mechanical arts, as he used to boast of wearing on his body nothing that he had not made with his own hands, such as his seal-ring, his cloak, and shoes. He possessed great facility in extempore speaking; and once his vanity led him to declare that he would travel to Olympia, and there deliver before the assembled Greeks an oration on any subject that might be proposed to him.

HIPPO (Ἱππών), in Africa. 1. H. REGIUS (Ἱ. βασιλικός: ruins near Bonah), a city on the coast of Numidia, west of the mouth of the Rubricatus; once a royal residence, and afterward celebrated as the bishopric of St. Augustine.—2. H. DIARRHYTUS or ZARITUS (Ἱ. διάῤῥυτος: now Bizerta), a city on the northern coast of the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), west of Utica, at the mouth of the Sinus Hipponensis.—3. A town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, south of Toletum.

HIPPOCENTAURI. Vid. CENTAURI.

HIPPŎCŎON (Ἱπποκόων). 1. Son of Œbalus and Batea. After his father's death he expelled his brother Tyndareus, in order to secure the kingdom to himself; but Hercules led Tyndareus back, and slew Hippocoon and his sons. Ovid (Met., viii., 314) mentions the sons of Hippocoon among the Calydonian hunters.—[2. A Thracian, follower of Rhesus in the Trojan war.—3. Son of Hyrtacus, a companion of Æneas, distinguished himself in the funeral games celebrated in honor of Anchises.]

HIPPOCRĂTES (Ἱπποκράτης). 1. Father of Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens.—2. An Athenian, son of Megacles, was brother of Clisthenes, the legislator, and grandfather, through his daughter Agariste, of the illustrious Pericles. —3. An Athenian, son of Xanthippus and brother of Pericles. He had three sons, who, as well as their father, are alluded to by Aristophanes as men of a mean capacity, and devoid of education.—4. An Athenian, son of Ariphron, commanded the Athenians, B.C. 424, when he was defeated and slain by the Bœotians at the battle of Delium.—5. A Lacedæmonian, served under Mindarus on the Asiatic coast in 410, and, after the defeat of Mindarus at Cyzicus, became commander of the fleet.—6. A Sicilian, succeeded his brother Cleander as tyrant of Gela, 498. His reign was prosperous; and he extended his power over several other cities of Sicily. He died in 491, while besieging Hybla.—7. A Sicilian, brother of EPICYDES.—8. The most celebrated physician of antiquity He was born in the island of Cos about B.C. 460. He belonged to the family of the Asclepiadæ, and was the son of Heraclides, who was also a physician. His mother's name was Phænarete, who was said to be descended from Hercules. He was instructed in medical science by his father and by Herodicus, and he is said to have been also a pupil of Gorgias of Leontini. He wrote, taught, and practiced his profession at home; travelled in different parts of the continent of Greece; and died at Larissa in Thessaly, about 357, at the age of 104. He had two sons, Thessalus and Dracon, and a son-in-law, Polybus, all of whom followed the same profession, and who are supposed to have been the authors of some of the works in the Hippocratic collection. These are the only certain facts which we know respecting the life of Hippocrates; but to these later writers have added a large collection of stories, many of which are clearly fabulous. Thus he is said to have stopped the plague at Athens by burning fires throughout the city, by suspending chaplets of flowers, and by the use of an antidote. It is also related that Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, invited Hippocrates to come to his assistance during a time of pestilence, but that Hippocrates refused his request on the ground of his being the enemy of his country. The writings which have come down to us under the name of Hippocrates were composed by several different persons, and are of very different merit. They are more than sixty in number, but of these only a few are certainly genuine. They are: 1. Προγνωστικόν, Prænotiones or Prognosticon. 2. Ἀφορισμοί, Aphorismi. 3. Ἐπιδημιῶν Βιβλία, De Morbis Popularibus (or Epidemiorum). 4. Περὶ Διαίτης Ὀξέων, De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis, or De Diæta Acutorum. 5. Περὶ Ἀέρων, Ὑδάτων, Τόπων, De Aëre, Aquis, et Locis. 6. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Κεφαλῇ Τρωμάτων, De Capitis Vulneribus. Some of the other works were perhaps written by Hippocrates; but the great majority of them were composed by his disciples and followers, many of whom bore the name of Hippocrates. The ancient physicians wrote numerous commentaries on the works in the Hippocratic collection Of these the most valuable are the commentaries of Galen. Hippocrates divided the causes of disease into two principal classes; the one comprehending the influence of seasons, climates, water, situation, &c., and the other the influence of food, exercise, &c. He considered that while heat and cold, moisture and dryness, succeeded one another throughout the year, the human body underwent certain analogous changes, which influenced the diseases of the period. He supposed that the four fluids or humors of the body (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile) were the primary seat of disease; that health was the result of the due combination (or crasis) of these, and that, when this crasis was disturbed, disease was the consequence; that, in the course of a disorder that was proceeding favorably, these humors underwent a certain change in quality (or coction), which was the sign of returning health, as preparing the way for the expulsion of the morbid matter, or crisis; and that these crises had a tendency to occur at certain stated periods, which were hence called "critical days." Hippocrates was evidently a person who not only had had great experience, but who also knew how to turn it to the best account; and the number of moral reflections and apophthegms that we meet with in his writings, some of which (as, for example, "Life is short, and Art is long") have acquired a sort of proverbial notoriety, show him to have been a profound thinker. His works are written in the Ionic dialect, and the style is so concise as to be sometimes extremely obscure. The best edition of his works is by Littré, Paris, 1839, seq., with a French translation.

HIPPOCRĒNE (Ἱπποκρήνη), the "Fountain of the Horse," called by Persius Fons Caballinus, was a fountain in Mount Helicon in Bœotia, sacred to the Muses, said to have been produced by the horse Pegasus striking the ground with his feet.

[HIPPODAMAS (Ἱπποδάμας), son of Priam, slain by Achilles.]

HIPPŎDĂMĪA (Ἱπποδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa in Elis. For details, vid. ŒNOMAUS and PELOPS.—2. Wife of Pirithous, at whose nuptials took place the celebrated battle between the Centaurs and Lapithæ. For details, vid. PIRITHOUS.—3. Vid. BRISEIS.—[4. Wife of Amyntor, and mother of Phœnix.—5 Daughter of Anchises, and wife of Alcathous. —6. One of the female attendants of Penelope.]

HIPPŎDĂMUS (Ἱππόδαμος). [1. A Trojan hero, slain by Ulysses.]—2. A distinguished Greek architect, a native of Miletus, and the son of Euryphon or Eurycoön. His fame rests on his construction, not of single buildings, but of whole cities. His first great work was the town of Piræus, which he built under the auspices of Pericles. When the Athenians founded their colony of Thurii (B.C. 443), Hippodamus went out with the colonists, and was the architect of the new city. Hence he is often called a Thurian. He afterwards built Rhodes (408–407).

Hippŏlŏchus (Ἱππόλοχος). 1. Son of Bellerophontes and Philonoë or Anticlea, and father of Glaucus, the Lycian prince.—[2. A Trojan, son of Antimachus, slain by Agamemnon.—3. One of the thirty tyrants at Athens.]

Hippŏlўte (Ἱππολύτη). 1. Daughter of Mars (Ares) and Otrera, was queen of the Amazons, and sister of Antiope and Melanippe. She wore a girdle given to her by her father; and when Hercules came to fetch this girdle, she was slain by Hercules. Vid. p. 357, b. According to another tradition, Hippolyte, with an army of Amazons, marched into Attica, to take vengeance on Theseus for having carried off Antiope; but, being conquered by Theseus, she fled to Megara, where she died of grief, and was buried. In some accounts, Hippolyte, and not Antiope, is said to have been married to Theseus.—2. Or Astydamia, wife of Acastus, fell in love with Peleus. Vid. Acastus.

Hippŏlўtus (Ἱππόλυτος). 1. Son of Theseus by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, or her sister Antiope. Theseus afterwards married Phædra, who fell in love with Hippolytus; but, as her offers were rejected by her step-son, she accused him to his father of having attempted her dishonor. Theseus thereupon cursed his son, and requested his father, Ægeus or Neptune (Poseidon), to destroy him. Accordingly, as Hippolytus was riding in his chariot along the sea-coast, Neptune (Poseidon) sent forth a bull from the water. The horses were frightened, upset the chariot, and dragged Hippolytus along the ground till he was dead. Theseus afterward learned the innocence of his son, and Phædra, in despair, made away with herself. Diana (Artemis) induced Æsculapius to restore Hippolytus to life again; and, according to Italian traditions, she placed him, under the name of Virbius, under the protection of the nymph Egeria, in the grove of Aricia, in Latium, where he was honored with divine worship. Horace, following the more ancient tradition, says that Diana could not restore Hippolytus to life (Carm., iv., 7, 25).—2. An early ecclesiastical writer of considerable eminence, but whose real history is very uncertain. He appears to have lived early in the third century, and is said to have suffered martyrdom under Alexander Severus, being drowned in a ditch or pit full of water. Others suppose that he perished in the Decian persecution. He is said to have been a disciple of Irenæus and a teacher of Origen. His works, which are written in Greek, are edited by Fabricius, Hamb., 1716–718, 2 vols. fol.

[Hippŏmachus (Ἱππόμαχος). 1. A Trojan warrior, son of Antimachus, slain by Leonteus.—2. One of the thirty tyrants at Athens, fell in battle against the patriots under Thrasybulus.]

Hippŏmĕdon (Ἱππομέδων), son of Aristomachus, or, according to Sophocles, of Talaus, was one of the Seven against Thebes, where he was slain during the siege by Hyperbius or Ismarus.

Hippŏtes (Ἱππότης). 1. Father of Æolus. Vid. Æolus, No. 2.—2. Son of Phylas by a [...] daughter of Iolaus, great-grandson of Hercules, and father of Aletes. When the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus, Hippotes killed the seer Carnus. The army, in consequence, began to suffer very severely, and Hippotes, by the command of an oracle, was banished for ten years.

Hippŏthŏon (Ἱπποθόων), an Attic hero, son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Alope, the daughter of Cercyon. He had a heroum at Athens; and one of the Attic phylæ, or tribes, was called after him Hippothoontis.

Hippŏthŏus (Ἱππόθοος). 1. Son of Cercyon and father of Æpytus, succeeded Agapenor as [...]

in Arcadia.—2. Son of Lethus, grandson [T]eutamus, and brother of Pylæus, led a band [of] Pelasgians from Larissa to the assistance of [the] Trojans. He was slain by the Telamonian [Aja]x.

[H]IPPOTION (Ἱπποτίων), a Phrygian, slain by [Mer]iones in the Trojan war.]

[H]IRPINI, a Samnite people, whose name is [said] to come from the Sabine word hirpus, "a [wo]lf," dwelt in the south of Samnium, between [Apu]lia, Lucania, and Campania. Their chief [tow]n was ÆCULANUM.

HIRTIUS, A., belonged to a plebeian family, [wh]ich came probably from Ferentinum in the [ter]ritory of the Hernici. He was the personal [an]d political friend of Cæsar the dictator. In [B.]C. 58 he was Cæsar's legatus in Gaul, and [dur]ing the civil war his name constantly ap[pe]ars in Cicero's correspondence. He was one [of] the ten prætors nominated by Cæsar for 46, [an]d during Cæsar's absence in Africa he lived [pr]incipally at his Tusculan estate, which was [con]tiguous to Cicero's villa. Though politi[ca]lly opposed, they were on friendly terms, and [Ci]cero gave Hirtius lessons in oratory. In 44 [H]irtius received Belgic Gaul for his province, [bu]t he governed it by deputy, and attended Cæsar at Rome, who nominated him and Vibius Pansa consuls for 43. After Cæsar's assassi[n]ation (44) Hirtius first joined Antony, but, being [dis]gusted by the despotic arrogance of the latter, he retired to Puteoli, where he renewed his in[t]ercourse with Cicero. Later in the year he [re]sided at his Tusculan villa, where he was at[t]acked by a dangerous illness, from which he never perfectly recovered. On the first of Jan[u]ary, 43, Hirtius and Pansa entered on their [con]sulship, according to Cæsar's arrangement. The two consuls were sent along with Octavi[a]nus against Antony, who was besieging Dec. Brutus at Mutina. Pansa was defeated by An[t]ony, and died of a wound which he had re[c]eived in the battle. Hirtius retrieved this dis[a]ster by defeating Antony, but he also fell on the 27th of April, in leading an assault on the besieger's camp. Octavianus sent the bodies of the slain consuls to Rome, where they were received with extraordinary honors, and pub[li]cly buried in the Field of Mars. To Octavia[n]us their removal from the scene was so timely, that he was accused by many of murdering them. Hirtius divides with Oppius the claim to the authorship of the eighth book of the Gallic war, as well as that of the Alexandrean, African, and Spanish. It is not impossible that he wrote the first three, but he certainly did not write the Spanish war.

HIRTULEIUS, a distinguished general of Sertorius in Spain. In B.C. 78 he was routed and slain near Italica, in Bætica, by Metellus.

HISPĂLIS, more rarely HISPAL (now Seville), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica, founded by the Phœnicians, was situated on the left bank of the Bætis, and was in reality a sea-port, for, although five hundred stadia from the sea, the river is navigable for the largest vessels up to the town. Under the Romans Hispalis was the third town in the province, Corduba and Gades being the two first. It was patronized by Cæsar, because Corduba had espoused the side of Pompey. He made it a Roman colony, under the name of Julia Romula or Romulensis, and a conventus juridicus or town of assize. Under the Goths and Vandals Hispalis was the chief town in the south of Spain, and under the Arabs was the capital of a separate kingdom.

HISPĀNĬA or IBĒRĬA (Ἰσπανίά, Ἰβηρία: Hispānus, Ibērus: now Spain and Portugal), a peninsula in the southwest of Europe, is connected with the land only on the northeast, where the Pyrenees form its boundary, and is surrounded on all other sides by the sea, on the east and south by the Mediterranean, on the west by the Atlantic, and on the north by the Cantabrian Sea. The Greeks and Romans had no accurate knowledge of the country till the time of the Roman invasion in the second Punic war. It was first mentioned by Hecatæus (about B.C. 500) under the name of Iberia; but this name originally indicated only the eastern coast: the western coast beyond the Pillars of Hercules was called Tartessis (Ταρτησσίς); and the interior of the country Celtica (ἡ Κελτική). At a later time the Greeks applied the name of Iberia, which is usually derived from the River Iberus, to the whole country. The name Hispania, by which the Romans call the country, first occurs at the time of the Roman invasion. It is usually derived from the Punic word Span, "a rabbit," on account of the great number of rabbits which the Carthaginians found in the peninsula; but others suppose the name to be of native origin, and to be the same as the Basque Ezpaña, an edge or border. The poets also called it Hesperia, or, to distinguish it from Italy, Hesperia Ultima. Spain is a very mountainous country. The principal mountains are, in the northeast, the Pyrenees (vid. PYRENÆUS MONS), and in the centre of the country the IDUBEDA, which runs parallel with the Pyrenees from the land of the Cantabri to the Mediterranean, and the OROSPEDA or ORTOSPEDA, which begins in the centre of the Idubeda, runs south west throughout Spain, and terminates at Calpe. The rivers of Spain are numerous. The six most important are the IBERUS (now Ebro), BÆTIS (now Guadalquiver), and ANAS (now Guadiana), in the east and south; and the TAGUS, DURIUS (now Douro), and MINIUS (now Minho), in the west. Spain was considered by the ancients very fertile, but more especially the southern part of the country, Bætica and Lusitania, which were also praised for their splendid climate. The central and northern parts of the country were less productive, and the climate in these districts was very cold in winter. In the south there were numerous flocks of excellent sheep, the wool of which was very celebrated in foreign countries. The Spanish horses and asses were also much valued in antiquity; and on the coast there was abundance of fish. The country produced a great quantity of corn, oil, wine, flax, figs, and other fruits. But the principal riches of the country consisted in its mineral productions, of which the greatest quantity was found in Turdetania. Gold was found in abundance in various parts of the country; and there were many silver mines, of which the most celebrated were near Carthago Nova, Ilipa, Sisapon, and Castulo. The precious stones, copper, lead, tin, and other metals, were also found in more or less abundance. The most ancient inhabitants of Spain were the Iberi, who, as a separate people, must be distinguished from the Iberi, a collective name of all the inhabitants of Spain. The Iberi dwelt on both sides of the Pyrenees, and were found in the south of Gaul as far as the Rhone. Celts afterward crossed the Pyrenees, and became mingled with the Iberi, whence arose the mixed race of the Celtiberi, who dwelt chiefly in the high tableland in the centre of the country. Vid. CELTIBERI. But besides this mixed race of the Celtiberi, there were also several tribes, both of Iberians and Celts, who were never united with one another. The unmixed Iberians, from whom the modern Basques are descended, dwelt chiefly in the Pyrenees and on the coasts, and their most distinguished tribes were the ASTURES, CANTABRI, VACCÆI, &c. The unmixed Celts dwelt chiefly on the River Anas, and in the northwest corner of the country or Gallæcia. Besides these inhabitants, there were Phœnician and Carthaginian settlements on the coasts, of which the most important were GADES and CARTHAGO NOVA; there were likewise Greek colonies, such as EMPORIÆ and SAGUNTUM; and, lastly, the conquest of the country by the Romans introduced many Romans among the inhabitants, whose customs, civilization, and language gradually spread over the whole peninsula, and effaced the national characteristics of the ancient population. The spread of the Latin language in Spain seems to have been facilitated by the schools, established by Sertorius, in which both the language and literature of Greece and Rome were taught. Under the empire some of the most distinguished Latin writers were natives of Spain, such as the two Senecas, Lucan, Martial, Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Pomponius Mela, Prudentius, and others. The ancient inhabitants of Spain were a proud, brave, and warlike race; easily excited and ready to take offence; inveterate robbers; moderate in the use of food and wine; fond of song and of the dance; lovers of their liberty, and ready at all times to sacrifice their lives rather than submit to a foreign master. The Cantabri and the inhabitants of the mountains in the north were the fiercest and most uncivilized of all the tribes; the Vaccæi and the Turdetani were the most civilized; and the latter people were not only acquainted with the alphabet, but possessed a literature which contained records of their history, poems, and collections of laws composed in verse. The history of Spain begins with the invasion of the country by the Carthaginians, B.C. 238; for up to that time hardly any thing was known of Spain except the existence of two powerful commercial states in the west, TARTESSUS and GADES. After the first Punic war, Hamilcar, the son of Hannibal, formed the plan of conquering Spain, in order to obtain for the Carthaginians possessions which might indemnify them for the loss of Sicily and Sardinia. Under his command (238–229), and that of his son-in-law and successor, Hasdrubal (228–221), the Carthaginians conquered the greater part of the southeast of the peninsula as far as the Iberus; and Hasdrubal founded the important city of Carthago Nova. These successes of the Carthaginians excited the jealousy of the Romans, and a treaty was made between the two nations about 228, by which the Carthaginians bound themselves not to cross the Iberus. The town of Saguntum, although on the west side of the river, was under the protection of the Romans; and the capture of this town by Hannibal in 219 was the immediate cause of the second Punic war. In the course of this war the Romans drove the Carthaginians out of the peninsula, and became masters of their possessions in the south of the country. But many tribes in the centre of the country, which had been only nominally subject to Carthage, still retained their virtual independence; and the tribes in the north and northwest of the country had been hitherto quite unknown both to the Carthaginians and Romans. There now arose a long and bloody struggle between the Romans and the various tribes in Spain, and it was nearly two centuries before the Romans succeeded in subduing entirely the whole of the peninsula. The Celtiberians were conquered by the elder Cato (195), and Tib. Gracchus, the father of the two tribunes (179). The Lusitanians, who long resisted the Romans under their brave leader Viriathus, were obliged to submit, about the year 137, to D. Brutus, who penetrated as far as Gallæcia; but it was not till Numantia was taken by Scipio Africanus the younger, in 133, that the Romans obtained the undisputed sovereignty over the various tribes in the centre of the country, and of the Lusitanians to the south of the Tagus. Julius Cæsar, after his prætorship, subdued the Lusitanians north of the Tagus (60). The Cantabri, Astures, and other tribes in the mountains of the north, were finally subjugated by Augustus and his generals. The whole peninsula was now subject to the Romans; and Augustus founded in it several colonies, and caused excellent roads to be made throughout the country. The Romans had, as early as the end of the second Punic war, divided Spain into two provinces, separated from one another by the Iberus, and called Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior, the former being to the east, and the latter to the west of the river. In consequence of there being two provinces, we frequently find the country called Hispaniæ. The provinces were governed by two proconsuls or two proprætors, the latter of whom also frequently bore the title of proconsuls. Augustus made a new division of the country, and formed three provinces Tarraconensis, Bætica, and Lusitania. The province Tarraconensis, which derived its name from Tarraco, the capital of the province, was by far the largest of the three, and comprehended the whole of the north, east, and centre of the peninsula. The province Bætica, which derived its name from the River Bætis, was separated from Lusitania on the north and west by the River Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the east by a line drawn from the River Anas to the promontory Charidemus in the Mediterranean. The province Lusitania, which corresponded very nearly in extent to the modern Portugal, was separated from Tarraconensis on the north by the River Durius, from Bætica on the east by the Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the east by a line drawn from the Durius to the Anas, between the territories of the Vettones and Carpetani. Augustus made Bætica a senatorial province, but reserved the government of the two others for the Cæsar; so that the former was governed by a proconsul appointed by the senate, and the latter by imperial legati. In Bætica, Corduba or Hispalis was the seat of government; in Tarraconensis, Tarraco; and in Lusitania, Augusta Emerita. On the reorganization of the empire by Constantine, Spain, together with Gaul and Britain, was under the general administration of the Præfectus Prætorio Galliæ, one of whose three vicarii had the government of Spain, and usually resided at Hispalis. At the same time, the country was divided into seven provinces: Bætica, Lusitania, Gallæcia, Tarraconensis, Carthaginiensis, Baleares, and Mauretania Tingitana in Africa (which was then reckoned part of Spain). The capitals of these seven provinces were respectively Hispalis, Augusta Emerita, Bracara, Cæsaraugusta, Carthago Nova, Palma, and Tingis. In A.D. 409 the Vandals and Suevi, together with other barbarians, invaded Spain, and obtained possession of the greater part of the country. In 414 the Visigoths, as allies of the Roman empire, attacked the Vandals, and in the course of four years (414–418) compelled a great part of the peninsula to submit again to the Romans. In 429 the Vandals left Spain, and crossed over into Africa under their king Genseric; after which time the Suevi established a powerful kingdom in the south of the peninsula. Soon afterward the Visigoths again invaded Spain, and after many years' struggle, succeeded in conquering the whole peninsula, which they kept for themselves, and continued the masters of the country for two centuries, till they were in their turn conquered by the Arabs, A.D. 712.

HISPELLUM (Hispellas, -ātis: Hispellensis: now Spello), a town in Umbria, and a Roman colony, with the name of Colonia Julia Hispellum.

HISTIÆA. Vid. HESTIÆOTIS.

HISTIÆUS (Ἱστιαῖος), tyrant of Miletus, was left with the other Ionians to guard the bridge of boats over the Danube when Darius invaded Scythia (B.C. 513). He opposed the proposal of Miltiades, the Athenian, to destroy the bridge, and leave the Persians to their fate, and was, in consequence, rewarded by Darius with the rule of Mytilene, and with a district in Thrace, where he built a town called Myrcinus, apparently with a view of establishing an independent kingdom. This excited the suspicions of Darius, who invited Histiæus to Susa, where he treated him kindly, but prohibited him from returning. Tired of the restraint in which he was kept, he induced his kinsman Aristagoras to persuade the Ionians to revolt, hoping that a revolution in Ionia might lead to his release. His design succeeded. Darius allowed Histiæus to depart (496) on his engaging to reduce Ionia. The revolt, however, was nearly put down when Histiæus reached the coast. Here Histiæus threw off the mask, and, after raising a small fleet, carried on war against the Persians for two years, and obtained possession of Chios. In 494 he made a descent upon the Ionian coast, but was defeated and taken prisoner by Harpagus. Artaphernes, the satrap of Ionia, caused him to be put to death by impalement, and sent his head to the king.

HISTŎNIUM (Histoniensis: now Vasto d' Ammone), a town of the Frentani on the coast, and subsequently a Roman colony.

HOMERĪTÆ (Ὁμηρῖται), a people of Arabia Felix, who migrated from the interior to the southern part of the western coast, and established themselves in the territory of the Sabæi (in El. Yemen), where they founded a kingdom, which lasted more than five centuries.

HŎMĒRUS (Ὅμηρος). 1. The great epic poet of Greece. His poems formed the basis of Greek literature. Every Greek who had received a liberal education was perfectly well acquainted with them from his childhood, and had learned them by heart at school; but nobody could state any thing certain about their author. His date and birth-place were equally matters of dispute. Seven cities claimed Homer as their countryman (Smyrna, Rhodus, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athenæ); but the claims of Smyrna and Chios are the most plausible, and between these two we have to decide. It is supposed by the best modern writers that Homer was an Ionian, who settled at Smyrna at the time when the Achæans and Æolians formed the chief part of the population. We can thus explain how Homer became so well acquainted with the traditions of the Trojan war, which had been waged by Achæans and Æolians, but in which the Ionians had not taken part. We know that the Ionians were subsequently driven out of Smyrna; and it is further supposed either that Homer himself fled to Chios, or his descendants or disciples settled there, and formed the famous family of Homerids. According to this account, the time of Homer would be a few generations after the Ionian migration; but, with the exception of the simple fact of his being an Asiatic Greek, all other particulars respecting his life are purely fabulous. The common tradition related that he was the son of Mæon (hence called Mæonides vates), and that in his old age he was blind and poor. Homer was universally regarded by the ancients as the author of the two great poems of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Other poems were also attributed to Homer, the genuineness of which was disputed by some; but the Iliad and Odyssey were ascribed to him by the concurrent voice of antiquity. Such continued to be the prevalent belief in modern times, till 1795, when F. A. Wolf wrote his famous Prolegomena, in which he endeavored to show that the Iliad and Odyssey were not two complete poems, but small, separate, independent epic songs, celebrating single exploits of the heroes, and that these lays were for the first time written down and united, as the Iliad and Odyssey, by Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens. This opinion gave rise to a long and animated controversy respecting the origin of the Homeric poems, which is not yet settled, and which probably never will be. The following, however, may be regarded as the most probable conclusion. An abundance of heroic lays preserved the tales of the Trojan war. Europe must necessarily have been the country where these songs originated, both because the victorious heroes dwelt in Europe, and because so many traces in the poems still point to these regions. These heroic lays were brought to Asia Minor by the Greek colonies, which left the mother country about three ages after the Trojan war. These unconnected songs were, for the first time, united by a great genius, called Homer, and he was the one individual who conceived in his mind the lofty idea of that poetical unity which we must acknowledge and admire in the Iliad and Odyssey. But as writing was not known, or at least little practiced, in the age in which Homer lived, it naturally followed that in such long works many interpolations were introduced, and that they gradually became more and more dismembered, and thus returned into their original state of separate independent songs. They were preserved by the rhapsodists, who were minstrels, and who sung lays at the banquets of the great and at public festivals. A class of rhapsodists at Chios, the Homerids, who called themselves the descendants of the poet, made it their especial business to sing the lays of the Iliad and Odyssey, and to transmit them to their disciples by oral teaching, and not by writing. These rhapsodists preserved the knowledge of the unity of the Homeric poems; and this knowledge was never entirely lost, although the public recitation of the poems became more and more fragmentary, and the time at festivals and musical contests formerly occupied by epic rhapsodists exclusively, was encroached upon by the rising lyrical performances. Solon directed the attention of his countrymen toward the unity of the Homeric poems; but the unanimous voice of antiquity ascribed to Pisistratus the merit of having collected the disjointed poems of Homer, and of having first committed them to writing. From the time of Pisistratus, the Greeks had a written Homer, a regular text, which was the source and foundation of all subsequent editions. We have already stated that the ancients attributed many other poems to Homer besides the Iliad and the Odyssey; but the claims of none of these to this honor can stand investigation. The hymns, which still bear the name of Homer, probably owe their origin to the rhapsodists. They exhibit such a diversity of language and poetical tone, that in all probability they contain fragments from every century from the time of Homer to the Persian war. The Batrachomyomachia, the Battle of the Frogs and Mice, an extant poem, and the Margites, a poem which is lost, and which ridiculed a man who was said to know many things and who knew all badly, were both frequently ascribed by the ancients to Homer, but were clearly of later origin. The Odyssey was evidently composed after the Iliad; and many writers maintain that they are the works of two different authors. But it has been observed in reply that there is not a greater difference in the two poems than we often find in the productions of the same man in the prime of life and in old age; and the chief cause of difference in the two poems is owing to the difference of the subject. We must add a few words on the literary history of the Iliad and Odyssey. From the time of Pisistratus to the establishment of the Alexandrine school, we read of two new editions (διορθώσεις) of the text one made by the poet Antimachus, and the other by Aristotle, which Alexander the Great used to carry about with him in a splendid case (νάρθηξ) on all his expeditions. But it was not till the foundation of the Alexandrine school that the Greeks possessed a really critical edition of Homer. Zenodotus was the first who directed his attention to the study and criticism of Homer. He was followed by Aristophanes and Aristarchus; and the edition of Homer by the latter has been the basis of the text to the present day. Aristarchus was the prince of grammarians, and did more for the text and interpretation of Homer than any other critic in modern times. He was opposed to Crates of Mallus, the founder of the Pergamene school of grammar. Vid. ARISTARCHUS, CRATES. In the time of Augustus, the great compiler, Didymus, wrote comprehensive commentaries on Homer, copying mostly the works of preceding Alexandrine grammarians, which had swollen to an enormous extent. Under Tiberius, Apollonius Sophista lived, whose Lexicon Homericum is very valuable (ed. Bekker, 1833). The most valuable scholia on the Iliad are those which were published by Villoison from a MS. of the tenth century in the library of St. Mark at Venice, 1788, fol. These scholia were reprinted with additions, edited by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1825, 2 vols. 4to. The most valuable scholia to the Odyssey are those published by Buttmann, Berl., 1821. The extensive commentary of Eustathius contains much valuable information from sources which are now lost. Vid. EUSTATHIUS, No. 3. The best critical editions of Homer are by Wolf, Lips., 1804, seq.; by Bothe, Lips., 1832, seq.; and by Bekker, Berlin, 1843; of the Iliad alone, by Heyne, Lips., 1802, sqq. There is a very good edition of the Iliad by Spitzner, Gotha, 1832, seq.; and a valuable commentary on the Odyssey by Nitzsch, Hannov., 1825, seq.—2. A grammarian and tragic poet of Byzantium in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus (about B.C. 280), was the son of the grammarian Andromachus and the poetess Myro. He was one of the seven poets who formed the tragic Pleiad.

HŎMŎLE (Ὁμόλη). 1. A lofty mountain in Thessaly, near Tempe, with a sanctuary of Pan.—2. Or HŎMŎLĬUM (Ὁμόλιον: Ὁμολιεύς: now Lamina), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly, at the foot of Mount Ossa, near the Peneus.

HONOR or HONOS, the personification of honor at Rome. Marcellus had vowed a temple which was to belong to Honor and Virtus in common; but as the pontiffs refused to consecrate one temple to two divinities, he built two temples, one of Honor and the other of Virtus, close together. C. Marius also built a temple to Honor, after his victory over the Cimbri and Teutones. There was also an altar of Honor outside the Colline gate, which was more ancient than either of the temples. Honor is represented on coins as a male figure in armor, and standing on a globe, or with the cornucopia in his left and a spear in his right hand.

HONŌRĬA. Vid. GRATA.

HONŌRĬUS, FLĀVĬUS, Roman emperor of the West, A.D. 395–423, was the second son of Theodosius the Great, and was born 384. On the death of Theodosius in 395, Honorius succeeded peaceably to the sovereignty of the West, which he had received from his father in the preceding year, while his elder brother obtained possession of the East. During the minority of Honorius, the government was entirely in the hands of the able and energetic Stilicho, whose daughter Maria the young emperor married. Stilicho for a time defended Italy against the attacks of the Visigoths under Alaric (402, 403), and the ravages of other barbarians under Radagaisus; but after Honorius had put to death Stilicho, on a charge of treason (408), Alaric again invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410.) Honorius meantime lived an inglorious life at Ravenna, where he continued to reside till his death in 423.

Hōræ (Ὧραι) originally the goddesses of the order of nature and of the seasons, but in later times the goddesses of order in general and of justice. In Homer, who neither mentions their parents nor their number, they are the Olympian divinities of the weather and the ministers of Jupiter (Zeus). In this capacity they guard the doors of Olympus, and promote the fertility of the earth, by the various kinds of weather which they give to mortals. As the weather, generally speaking, is regulated according to the seasons, they are further described as the goddesses of the seasons. The course of the seasons is symbolically described as the dance of the Horæ. At Athens, two Horæ, Thallo (the Hora of spring) and Carpo (the Hora of autumn), were worshipped from very early times. The Hora of spring accompanied Proserpina (Persephone) every year on her ascent from the lower world; and the expression of "The chamber of the Horæ opens" is equivalent to "The spring is coming." The attributes of spring—flowers, fragrance, and graceful freshness—are accordingly transferred to the Horæ. Thus they adorned Venus (Aphrodite) as she rose from the sea, and made a garland of flowers for Pandora. Hence they bear a resemblance to and are mentioned along with the Charites, and both are frequently confounded or identified. As they were conceived to promote the prosperity of every thing that grows, they appear also as the protectresses of youth and newly-born gods. Even in early times ethical notions were attached to the Horæ; and the influence which these goddesses originally exercised on nature was subsequently transferred to human life in particular. Hesiod describes them as giving to a state good laws, justice, and peace; he calls them the daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, and gives them the significant names of Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. The number of the Horæ is different in the different writers, though the most ancient number seems to have been two, as at Athens; but afterward their common number was three, like that of the Mœræ and Charites. In works of art the Horæ were represented as blooming maidens, carrying the different products of the seasons.

Horapollo (Ὡραπόλλων), the name prefixed to an extant work on hieroglyphics, which purports to be a Greek translation, made by one Philippus from the Egyptian. The writer was a native of Egypt, and probably lived about the beginning of the fifth century. The best edition is by Leemans, Amsterdam, 1835.

Horātia Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome. Three brothers of this race fought with the Curiatii, three brothers from Alba, to determine whether Rome or Alba was to exercise the supremacy. The battle was long undecided. Two of the Horatii fell but the three Curiatii, though alive, were severely wounded. Seeing this, the surviving Horatius, who was still unhurt, pretended to fly, and vanquished his wounded opponents by encountering them severally. He returned in triumph, bearing his threefold spoils. As he approached the Capene gate, his sister Horatia met him, and recognized on his shoulders the mantle of one of the Curiatii, her betrothed lover. Her importunate grief drew on her the wrath of Horatius, who stabbed her, exclaiming, "So perish every Roman woman who bewails a foe." For this murder he was adjudged by the duumviri to be scourged with covered head, and hanged on the accursed tree. Horatius appealed to his peers, the burghers or populus; and his father pronounced him guiltless, or he would have punished him by the paternal power. The populus acquitted Horatius, but prescribed a form of punishment. With veiled head, led by his father, Horatius passed under a yoke or gibbet—tigillum sororium, "sister's gibbet."

Horātius Cocles. Vid. Cocles.

Horātius Flaccus, Q., the poet, was born December 8th, B.C. 65, at Venusia in Apulia. His father was a libertinus or freedman. He had received his manumission before the birth of the poet, who was of ingenuous birth, but who did not altogether escape the taunt, which adhered to persons even of remote servile origin. His father's occupation was that of collector (coactor), either of the indirect taxes farmed by the publicans, or at sales by auction. With the profits of his office he had purchased a small farm in the neighborhood of Venusia, where the poet was born. The father, either in his parental fondness for his only son, or discerning some hopeful promise in the boy, determined to devote his whole time and fortune to the education of the future poet. Though by no means rich, he declined to send the young Horace to the common school, kept in Venusia by one Flavius, to which the children of the rural aristocracy resorted. Probably about his twelfth year, his father carried him to Rome, to receive the usual education of a knight's or senator's son. He frequented the best schools in the capital. One of these was kept by Orbilius, a retired military man, whose flogging propensities have been immortalized by his pupil (Epist., ii., 1, 71). The names of his other teachers are not recorded by the poet. He was instructed in the Greek and Latin languages: the poets were the usual school books, Homer in the Greek, and the old tragic writer, Livius Andronicus, in the Latin. In his eighteenth year Horace proceeded to Athens, in order to continue his studies at that seat of learning. He seems chiefly to have attached himself to the opinions which he heard in the Academy, though later in life he inclined to those of Epicurus. When Brutus came to Athens after the death of Cæsar, Horace joined his army, and received at once the rank of a military tribune and the command of a legion. He was present at the battle of Philippi, and shared in the flight at the republican army. In one of his poems he playfully alludes to his flight, and throwing away his shield. (Carm., ii., 7, 9.) He now resolved to devote himself to more peaceful pursuits, and, having obtained his pardon, he ventured at once to return to Rome. He had lost all his hopes in life; his paternal estate had been swept away in the general forfeiture; but he was enabled, however, to obtain sufficient money to purchase a clerkship in the quæstor's office; and on the profits of that place he managed to live with the utmost frugality. Meantime some of his poems attracted the notice of Varius and Virgil, who introduced him to Mæcenas (B.C. 39). Horace soon became the friend of Mæcenas, and his friendship quickly ripened into intimacy. In a year or two after the commencement of their friendship (37), Horace accompanied his patron on that journey to Brundisium, so agreeably described in the fifth satire of the first book. About the year 34 Mæcenas bestowed upon the poet a Sabine farm, sufficient to maintain him in ease, comfort, and even in content (satis beatus unicis Sabinis), during the rest of his life. The situation of this Sabine farm was in the valley of Ustica, within view of the mountain Lucretilis, and near the Digentia, about fifteen miles from Tibur (now Tivoli). A site exactly answering to the villa of Horace, and on which were found ruins of buildings, has been discovered in modern times. Besides this estate, his admiration of the beautiful scenery in the neighborhood of Tibur inclined him either to hire or to purchase a small cottage in that romantic town; and all the later years of his life were passed between these two country residences and Rome. He continued to live on the most intimate terms with Mæcenas, and this intimate friendship naturally introduced Horace to the notice of the other great men of his period, and at length to Augustus himself, who bestowed upon the poet substantial marks of his favor. Horace died on November 17th, B.C. 8, aged nearly fifty-seven. His death was so sudden that he had not time to make his will, but he left the administration of his affairs to Augustus, whom he instituted as his heir. He was buried on the slope of the Esquiline Hill, close to his friend and patron Mæcenas, who had died before him in the same year. Horace has described his own person. He was of short stature, with dark eyes and dark hair, but early tinged with gray. In his youth he was tolerably robust, but suffered from a complaint in his eyes. In more advanced life he grew fat, and Augustus jested about his protuberant belly. His health was not always good, and he seems to have inclined to be a valetudinarian. When young he was irascible in temper, but easily placable. In dress he was rather careless. His habits, even after he became richer, were generally frugal and abstemious; though on occasions, both in youth and maturer age, he seems to have indulged in conviviality. He liked choice wine, and in the society of friends scrupled not to enjoy the luxuries of his time. He was never married. The philosophy of Horace was that of a man of the world. He playfully alludes to his Epicureanism, but it was practical rather than speculative Epicureanism. His mind, indeed, was not in the least speculative. Common-life wisdom was his [illegible] and to this he brought a quickness of obs[illegible] tion and a sterling common sense, which [illegible] made his works the delight of practical [illegible] The Odes of Horace want the higher inspira[illegible] of lyric verse. His amatory verses are ex[illegible] sitely graceful, but they have no strong [illegible] no deep tenderness, nor even much of light [illegible] joyous gayety. But as works of refined art, the most skillful felicities of language and measure, of translucent expression, and [illegible] agreeable images, embodied in words which [illegible] print themselves indelibly on the memory, t[illegible] are unrivalled. According to Quintilian, Hor[illegible] was almost the only Roman lyric poet w[illegible] reading. In the Satires of Horace there is n[illegible] of the lofty moral indignation, the fierce ve[illegible] mence of invective which characterized [illegible] later satirists. It is the folly rather than [illegible] wickedness of vice which he touches with s[illegible] playful skill. Nothing can surpass the keen[illegible] of his observation, or his ease of expressi[illegible] it is the finest comedy of manners, in a descr[illegible] tive instead of a dramatic form. In the Epo[illegible] there is bitterness provoked, it should seem, [illegible] some personal hatred or sense of injury, [illegible] the ambition of imitating Archilochus; but [illegible] these he seems to have exhausted all the mali[illegible] nity and violence of his temper. But the Epis-tles are the most perfect of the Horatian poetry, the poetry of manners and society, the beauty of which consists in a kind of ideality of common sense and practical wisdom. The Epistles of Horace are, with the Poem of Lucretius, the Georgics of Virgil, and perhaps the Satires of Juvenal, the most perfect and most original form of Roman verse. The title of the Art of Poetry for the Epistle to the Pisos is as old as Quintilian, but it is now agreed that it was not intended for a complete theory of the poetic art. It is conjectured with great probability that it was intended to dissuade one of the younger Pisos from devoting himself to poetry, for which he had little genius, or at least to suggest the difficulties of attaining to perfection. The chronology of the Horatian poems is of great importance, as illustrating the life, the times, and the writings of the poet. There has been great dispute upon the subject, but the following view appears the most probable: The first book of Satires, which was the first publication, appeared about B.C. 35, in the thirtieth year of Horace. The second book of Satires was published about 33, in the thirty-second year of Horace. The Epodes appeared about 31, in the thirty-fourth year of Horace. The first three books of the Odes were published about 24 or 23, in the forty-first or forty-second year of Horace. The first book of the Epistles was published about 20 or 19, in the forty-fifth or forty-sixth year of Horace. The Carmen Seculare appeared in 17, in the forty-eighth year of Horace. The fourth book of the Odes was published in 14 or 13, in his fifty-first or fifty-second year. The dates of the second book of Epistles, and of the Ars Poetica, are admitted to be uncertain, though both appeared before the poet's death, B.C. 8. One of the best editions of Horace is by Orelli, Turici, 1843.

Hortensĭus. 1. Q., the orator, was born in B.C. 114, eight years before Cicero. At the early age of nineteen he spoke with great applause in the forum, and at once rose to eminence as an advocate. He served two campaigns in the Social war (90, 89). In the civil wars he joined Sulla, and was afterward a constant supporter of the aristocratical party. His chief professional labors were in defending men of this party when accused of mal-administration and extortion in their provinces, or of bribery and the like in canvassing for public honors. He had no rival in the forum till he encountered Cicero, and he long exercised an undisputed sway over the courts of justice. In 81 he was quæstor; in 75, ædile; in 72, prætor; and in 69, consul with Q. Cæcilius Metellus. It was in the year before his consulship that the prosecution of Verres commenced. Hortensius was the advocate of Verres, and attempted to put off the trial till the next year, when he would be able to exercise all the consular authority in favor of his client. But Cicero, who accused Verres, baffled all the schemes of Hortensius; and the issue of this contest was to dethrone Hortensius from the seat which had been already tottering, and to establish his rival, the despised provincial of Arpinum, as the first orator and advocate of the Roman forum. After his consulship, Hortensius took a leading part in supporting the optimates against the rising power of Pompey. He opposed the Gabinian law, which invested Pompey with absolute power on the Mediterranean, in order to put down the pirates of Cilicia (67); and the Manilian, by which the conduct of the war against Mithradates was transferred from Lucullus to Pompey (66). Cicero in his consulship (63) deserted the popular party, with whom he had hitherto acted, and became one of the supporters of the optimates. Thus Hortensius no longer appears as his rival. We first find them pleading together for C. Rabirius, for L. Muræna, and for P. Sulla. After the coalition of Pompey with Cæsar and Crassus in 60, Hortensius drew back from public life, and confined himself to his advocate's duties. He died in 50. The eloquence of Hortensius was of the florid or (as it was termed) "Asiatic" style, fitter for hearing than for reading. His voice was soft and musical, his memory so ready and retentive that he is said to have been able to come out of a sale-room and repeat the auction-list backward. His action was very elaborate, so that sneerers called him Dionysia—the name of a well-known dancer of the day; and the pains he bestowed in arranging the folds of his toga have been recorded by ancient writers. But in all this there must have been a real grace and dignity, for we read that Æsopus and Roscius, the tragedians, used to follow him into the forum to take a lesson in their own art. He possessed immense wealth, and was keenly alive to all the enjoyments which wealth can give. He had several villas, the most splendid of which was the one near Laurentum. Here he laid up such a stock of wine, that he left ten thousand casks of Chian to his heir. Here he had a park full of all sorts of animals; and it was customary, during his sumptuous dinners, for a slave, dressed like Orpheus, to issue from the woods with these creatures following the sound of his cithara. At his villa at Bauli he had immense fish-ponds, into which the sea came: the fish were so tame that they would feed from his hand; and he was so fond of them that he is said to have wept for the death of a favorite muræna. He was also very curious in trees: he is said to have fed them with wine, and we read that he once begged Cicero to change places in speaking, that he might perform this office for a favorite plane-tree at the proper time. It is a characteristic trait, that he came forward from his retirement (55) to oppose the sumptuary law of Pompey and Crassus, and spoke so eloquently and wittily as to procure its rejection. He was the first person at Rome who brought peacocks to table.—2. Q., surnamed Hortalus, son of the preceding, by Lutatia, the daughter of Catulus. In youth he lived a low and profligate life, and appears to have been at last cast off by his father. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined Cæsar, and fought on his side in Italy and Greece. In 44 he held the province of Macedonia, and Brutus was to succeed him. After Cæsar's assassination, M. Antony gave the province to his brother Caius. Brutus, however, had already taken possession, with the assistance of Hortensius. When the proscription took place, Hortensius was in the list; and, in revenge, he ordered C. Antonius, who had been taken prisoner, to be put to death. After the battle of Philippi, he was executed on the grave of his victim.

Horus (Ὧρος), the Egyptian god of the sun, whose worship was also established in Greece, and afterward at Rome. He was compared with the Greek Apollo, and identified with Harpocrates, the last-born and weakly son of Osiris. Both were represented as youths, and with the same attributes and symbols. He was believed to have been born with his finger on his mouth, as indicative of secresy and mystery. In the earlier period of his worship at Rome he seems to have been particularly regarded as the god of quiet life and silence.

Hostĭlĭa (now Ostiglia), a small town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the Po, and on the road from Mutina to Verona; the birth-place of Corne Nepos.

Hostilĭus Mancīnus. Vid. Mancinus.

Hostilĭus Tullus. Vid. Tullus Hostilius.

Hostĭus, the author of a poem on the Istrian war (B.C. 178), which is quoted by the grammarians. He was probably a contemporary of Julius Cæsar.

Hunneric, king of the Vandals in Africa, A.D. 477–484, was the son of Genseric, whom he succeeded. His reign was chiefly marked by his savage persecution of the Catholics.

Hunni (Οὖννοι), an Asiatic race, who dwelt for some centuries in the plains of Tartary, and were formidable to the Chinese empire long before they were known to the Romans. It was to repel the inroads of the Huns that the Chinese built their celebrated wall, one thousand five hundred miles in length. A portion of the nation afterward migrated west, conquered the Alani, a warlike race between the Volga and the Tanais, and then crossed into Europe about A.D. 375. The appearance of these new barbarians excited the greatest terror both among the Romans and Germans. They are described by the Greek and Roman historians as hideous and repulsive beings, resembling apes, with broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes deeply buried in their head, while their manners and habits were savage to the last degree. They destroyed the powerful monarchy of the Ostrogoths, who were obliged to retire before them, and were allowed by Valens to settle in Thrace, A.D. 376. The Huns now frequently ravaged the Roman dominions. They were joined by many other barbarian nations, and under their king Attila (A.D. 434–453) they devastated the fairest portions of the empire, both in the east and the west. Vid. Attila. On the death of Attila, the various nations which composed his army dispersed, and his sons were unable to resist the arms of the Ostrogoths. In a few years after the death of Attila, the empire of the Huns was completely destroyed. The remains of the nation became incorporated with other barbarians, and never appear again as a separate people.

Hyacinthus (Ὑάκινθος). 1. Son of the Spartan king Amyclas and Diomede, or of Pierus and Clio, or of Œbalus or Eurotas. He was a youth of extraordinary beauty, and was beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the love of Apollo; and as he was once playing at quoit with the god, Zephyrus, out of jealousy, drove the quoit of Apollo with such violence against the head of the youth that he fell down dead. From the blood of Hyacinthus there sprang the flower of the same name (hyacinth), on the leaves of which appeared the exclamation of woe AI, AI, or the letter Υ, being the initial of Ὑάκινθος. According to other traditions, the hyacinth sprang from the blood of Ajax. Hyacinthus was worshipped at Amyclæ as a hero, and a great festival, Hyacinthia, was celebrated in his honor. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.—2. A Lacedæmonian, who is said to have gone to Athens, and to have sacrificed his daughters for the purpose of delivering the city from a famine and plague, under which it was suffering during the war with Minos. His daughters were known in the Attic legends by the name of the Hyacinthides, which they derived from their fathers. Some traditions make them the daughters of Erechtheus, and relate that they received their name from the village of Hyacinthus, where they were sacrificed at the time when Athens was attacked by the Eleusinians and Thracians, or Thebans.

Hy̆ădes (Ὑάδες), that is, the Rainy, the name of nymphs, whose parentage, number, and names are described in various ways by the ancients. Their parents were Atlas and Æthra, or M[…] and Pleione, or Hyas and Bœotia: others […] their father Oceanus, Melisseus, Cadmilus, Erechtheus. Their number differs in various legends; but their most common number is seven, as they appear in the constellation which bears their name, viz., Ambrosia, Eudora, […]dile, Coronis, Polyxo, Phyto, and Thyene or Dione. They were intrusted by Jupiter (Zeus) with the care of his infant son Bacchus (Dionysus), and were afterward placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars. The story which made them the daughters of Atlas relates that their number was twelve or fifteen, and that at first five of them were placed among the stars as Hyades, and the seven (or ten) others afterward under the name of Pleiades, to reward them for the sisterly love they had evinced after the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed in Libya by a wild beast. Their name, Hyades, is derived by the ancients from their father, Hyas, or from Hyes, a mystic surname of Bacchus (Dionysus); or, according to others, from their position in the heavens, where they formed a figure resembling the Greek letter Υ. The Romans, who derived it from ὗς, a pig, translated the name by Suculæ. The most natural derivation is from ὕειν, to rain, as the constellation of the Hyades, when rising simultaneously with the sun, announced rainy weather. Hence Horace speaks of the tristes Hyades (Carm., i., 3, 14).

[Hyæa (Ὑαία: Ὑαῖος), a place in the country of the Locri Ozolæ, northward from Amphissa.]

Hyampĕa. Vid. Parnassus.

Hyampŏlis (Ὑάμπολις: Ὑαμπολίτης), a town in Phocis, east of the Cephisus, near Cleonæ, was founded by the Hyantes when they were driven out of Bœotia by the Cadmeans; was destroyed by Xerxes; afterward rebuilt; and again destroyed by Philip and the Amphictyons. Cleonæ, from its vicinity to Hyampolis, is called by Xenophon (Hell., vi., 4, § 2) Ὑαμπολιτῶν τὸ προάστειον. Strabo speaks of two towns of the name of Hyampolis in Phocis, but it is doubtful whether his statement is correct.

Hyantes (Ὕαντες), the ancient inhabitants of Bœotia, from which country they were expelled by the Cadmeans. Part of the Hyantes emigrated to Phocis (vid. Hyampolis), and part to Ætolia. The poets use the adjective Hyantius as equivalent to Bœotian.

Hyas (Ὕας), the name of the father and the brother of the Hyades. The father was married to Bœotia, and was looked upon as the ancestor of the ancient Hyantes. His son, the brother of the Hyades, was killed in Libya by a serpent, a boar, or a lion.

Hybla (Ὕβλη: Ὑβλαῖος, Hyblensis), three towns in Sicily. 1. Major (ἡ μείζων or μεγάλη), on the southern slope of Mount Ætna and on the River Symæthus, was originally a town of the Siculi.—2. Minor (ἡ μικρά), afterward called Megara. Vid. Megara.—3. Heræa, in the south of the island, on the road from Syracuse to Agrigentum. It is doubtful from which of these three places the Hyblæan honey came, so frequently mentioned by the poets.

[Hyblon (Ὕβλων), an ancient king in Sicily, under whose guidance the Megarians founded Hybla.]

celebrated orator, contemporary with the triumvir Antonius.

[HYBRIAS (Ὑβρίας), an ancient lyric poet of Crete, author of a celebrated scolion, which has been preserved in Athenæus: edited by Graefenhan, Mulhusæ, 1834.]

HYCCĂRA (τὰ Ὕκκαρα: Ὑκκαρεύς: now Muro di Carini), a town of the Sicani on the northern coast of Sicily, west of Panormus, said to have derived its name from the sea-fish ὕκκαι. It was taken by the Athenians, and plundered, and its inhabitants sold as slaves, B.C. 415. Among the captives was the beautiful Timandra, the mistress of Alcibiades and the mother of Lais.

HYDARNES (Ὑδάρνης). 1. One of the seven Persians who conspired against the Magi in B.C. 521.—[2. Son of the foregoing, leader of the select body in the army of Xerxes called the Immortals.]

HYDASPES (Ὑδάσπης: now Jelum), the northernmost of the five great tributaries of the Indus, which, with the Indus itself, water the great plain of Northern India, which is bounded on the north by the Himalaya range, and which is now called the Punjab, i. e., five rivers. The Hydaspes falls into the Acesines (now Chenab), which also receives, from the south, first the Hydraotes (now Ravee), and then the Hyphasis (now Beeas, and lower down, Gharra), which has previously received, on the southern side, the Hesidrus or Zaradrus (now Sutlej or Hesudru); and the Acesines itself falls into the Indus. These five rivers all rise on the southwestern side of the Emodi Mountains (now Himalaya), except the Sutlej, which, like the Indus, rises on the northeastern side of the range. They became known to the Greeks by Alexander's campaign in India: his great victory over Porus (B.C. 327) was gained on the left side of the Hydaspes, near, or perhaps upon, the scene of the recent battle of Chillianwallah; and the Hyphasis formed the limit of his progress. The epithet "fabulosus," which Horace applies to the Hydaspes (Carm., i., 22, 7), refers to the marvellous stories current among the Romans, who knew next to nothing about India; and the "Medus Hydaspes" of Virgil (Georg., iv., 211) is merely an example of the vagueness with which the Roman writers, especially the poets, refer to the countries beyond the eastern limit of the empire.

[HYDE (Ὕδη), a town of Lydia, at the base of Mount Tmolus, according to the scholiast (on Il. xx., 385) the later Sardis.]

HYDRA. Vid. HERCULES, p. 356, b.

HYDRAŌTES (Ὑδραώτης, Strab. Ὑάρωτις: now Ravee), a river of India, falling into the Acesines. Vid. HYDASPES.

HȲDRĔA (Ὑδρέα: Ὑδρεάτης: now Hydra), a small island in the gulf of Hermione off Argolis, of no importance in antiquity, but the inhabitants of which in modern times played a distinguished part in the war of Greek independence, and are some of the best sailors in Greece.

HYDRUNTUM or HYDRŪS (Ὑδροῦς: Hydruntīnus: now Otranto), one of the most ancient towns of Calabria, situated on the southeastern coast, with a good harbor, and near a mountain Hydrus, was in later times a municipium. Persons frequently crossed over to Epirus from this port.

[HYDRUSSA (Ὑδροῦσσα), an island in the Saronic Gulf, off the coast of Attica.]

HYETTUS (Ὑηττός: Ὑήττιος), a small town in Bœotia, on the Lake Copais, and near the frontiers of Locris.

HYGIĒA (Ὑγίεια), also called HYGĪA or HYGIA, the goddess of health, and a daughter of Æsculapius, though some traditions make her the wife of the latter. She was usually worshipped in the temples of Æsculapius, as at Argos, where the two divinities had a celebrated sanctuary, at Athens, at Corinth, &c. At Rome there was a statue of her in the temple of Concordia. In works of art she is represented as a virgin dressed in a long robe, and feeding a serpent from a cup. Although she was originally the goddess of physical health, she is sometimes conceived as the giver or protectress of mental health; that is, she appears as ὑγίεια φρενῶν (Æschyl., Eum., 522), and was thus identified with Minerva (Athena), surnamed Hygiea.

HYGĪNUS. 1. C. JŪLĬUS, a Roman grammarian, was a native of Spain, and lived at Rome in the time of Augustus, whose freedman he was. He wrote several works, all of which have perished.—2. HYGĪNUS GROMĂTĬCUS, so called from gruma, an instrument used by the Agrimensores. He lived in the time of Trajan, and wrote works on land surveying and castrametation, of which considerable fragments are extant.—3. HYGĪNUS, the author of two extant works: 1. Fabularum Liber, a series of short mythological legends, with an introductory genealogy of divinities. Although the larger portion of these narratives has been copied from obvious sources, they occasionally present the tales under new forms or with new circumstances. 2. Poeticon Astronomicon Libri IV. We know nothing of the author of these two works. He is sometimes identified with C. Julius Hyginus, the freedman of Augustus, but he must have lived at a much later period. Both works are included in the Mythographi Latini of Muncker, Amst., 1681, and of Van Staveren, Lugd. Bat., 1742.

HYLÆA (Ὑλαίη, Herod.), a district in Scythia, covered with wood, in the peninsula adjacent to Taurica on the northwest, between the rivers Borysthenes and Hypacyris.

HYLÆUS (Ὑλαῖος), that is, the Woodman, the name of an Arcadian centaur, who was slain by Atalante when he pursued her. According to some legends, Hylæus fell in the battle against the Lapithæ, and others, again, said that he was one of the centaurs slain by Hercules.

HYLAS (Ὕλας), son of Theodamas, king of the Dryopes, by the nymph Menodice; or, according to others, son of Hercules, Euphemus, or Ceyx. He was beloved by Hercules, whom he accompanied in the expedition of the Argonauts. On the coast of Mysia, Hylas went on shore to draw water from a fountain; but his beauty excited the love of the Naiads, who drew him down into the water, and he was never seen again. Hercules endeavored in vain to find him; and when he shouted out to the youth, the voice of Hylas was heard from the bottom of the well only like a faint echo, whence some say that he was actually metamorphosed into an echo. While Hercules was engaged in seeking his favorite, the Argonauts sailed away leaving him and his companion, Polyphemus, behind.—[2. A famous pantomime at Rome, in the time of Augustus, pupil of Pylades, acquired great reputation as well as wealth.]

HŸLE (Ὕλη, also Ὕλαι), a small town in Bœotia, situated on the HYLĬCE, which was called after this town, and into which the River Ismenus flows.

[HYLEUS (Ὑλεύς), a Greek hero engaged in the hunt of the Calydonian boar, by which he was killed.]

HYLĬAS, a river in Bruttium, separating the territories of Sybaris and Croton.

HYLĬCE (ἡ Ὑλικὴ λίμνη: now Lake of Livadhi or Senzina), a lake in Bœotia, south of the Lake Copais. Vid. HYLE.

HYLĬCUS (Ὕλικος, Ὕλλικος), a small river in Argolis, near Trœzen.

HYLLUS (Ὕλλος), son of Hercules by Deianira. For details, vid. HERACLIDÆ.

HYLLUS (Ὕλλος: now Demirji), a river of Lydia, falling into the Hermus on its northern side.

HYMEN or HYMENÆUS (Ὑμήν or Ὑμέναιος), the god of marriage, was conceived as a handsome youth, and invoked in the hymeneal or bridal song. The names originally designated the bridal song itself, which was subsequently personified. He is described as the son of Apollo and a Muse, either Calliope, Urania, or Terpsichore. Others describe him only as the favorite of Apollo or Thamyris, and call him a son of Magnes and Calliope, or of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Venus (Aphrodite). The ancient traditions, instead of regarding the god as a personification of the hymeneal song, speak of him as originally a mortal, respecting whom various legends were related. The Attic legends described him as a youth of such delicate beauty that he might be taken for a girl. He fell in love with a maiden, who refused to listen to him; but, in the disguise of a girl, he followed her to Eleusis to the festival of Ceres (Demeter). The maidens, together with Hymenæus, were carried off by robbers into a distant and desolate country. On their landing, the robbers laid down to sleep, and were killed by Hymenæus, who now returned to Athens, requesting the citizens to give him his beloved in marriage if he restored to them the maidens who had been carried off by the robbers. His request was granted, and his marriage was extremely happy. For this reason he was invoked in the hymeneal songs. According to others, he was a youth who was killed by the fall of his house on his wedding-day, whence he was afterward invoked in bridal songs, in order to be propitiated. Some related that at the wedding of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Ariadne he sang the bridal hymn, but lost his voice. He is represented in works of art as a youth, but taller and with a more serious expression than Eros, and carrying in his hand a bridal torch.

HYMETTUS (Ὑμηττός), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble (Hymettia trabes, Hor., Carm., ii., 18, 3), and more especially for its honey. It is about three miles south of Athens, and forms the commencement of the range of mountains which runs south through Attica. It is now called Telovuni, and by the Franks Monte Matto: the part of the mountain near the promontory Zoster, which was called in an[cient] times ANHYDRUS (ὁ Ἄνυδρος, sc. Ὑμηττό[ς]), the Dry Hymettus, is now called Mavrovun[i].

HYPACYRIS, HYPACĂRIS, or PACĂRIS (now [Ka]nilshak), a river in European Sarmatia, [which] flows through the country of the nomad S[cyth]ians, and falls into the Sinus Carcinites i[n the] Euxine Sea.

HYPÆA. Vid. STŒCHADES.

HYPÆPA (Ὕπαιπα: now Tapaya), a city [of] Lydia, on the south slope of Mount Tm[olus], near the north bank of the Cayster.

HYPĂNA (Ὑπάνη: τὰ Ὕπανα: Ὑπανεύ[ς]), a town in Triphylian Elis, belonging to the [Pen]tapolis.

HYPĂNIS (now Bog), a river in European [Sar]matia, rises, according to Herodotus, in a [lake], flows parallel to the Borysthenes, has at [first] sweet, then bitter water, and falls into the [Eux]ine Sea west of the Borysthenes.

HYPĂTA (τὰ Ὕπατα, ἡ Ὑπάτη: Ὑπατ[αῖος], Ὑπατεύς: now Neopatra, Turk. Batrajik), a town of the Ænianes in Thessaly, south of [the] Spercheus, belonged in later times to the Æ[to]lian league. The inhabitants of this town w[ere] notorious for witchcraft.

HYPATĬA (Ὑπατία), daughter of Theon, [by] whom she was instructed in philosophy a[nd] mathematics. She soon made such imme[nse] progress in these branches of knowledge, th[at] she is said to have presided over the Neo[pla]tonic school of Plotinus at Alexandrea, whe[re] she expounded the principles of his system [to] a numerous auditory. She appears to ha[ve] been most graceful, modest, and beautiful, b[ut] nevertheless to have been a victim to slande[r] and falsehood. She was accused of too muc[h] familiarity with Orestes, prefect of Alexandre[a], and the charge spread among the clergy, wh[o] took up the notion that she interrupted th[e] friendship of Orestes with their archbishop Cyril. In consequence of this, a number of them seized her in the street, and dragged her into one of the churches, where they tore her to pieces, A.D. 415.

HYPATŎDŌRUS (Ὑπατόδωρος), a statuary of Thebes, flourished B.C. 372.

[HYPENOR (Ὑπείνωρ), a Trojan warrior, slain by Diomedes.]

HYPERBŎLUS (Ὑπέρβολος), an Athenian demagogue in the Peloponnesian war, was of servile origin, and was frequently satirized by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. In order to get rid either of Nicias or Alcibiades, Hyperbolus called for the exercise of the ostracism. But the parties endangered combined to defeat him, and the vote of exile fell on Hyperbolus himself: an application of that dignified punishment by which it was thought to have been so debased that the use of it was never recurred to. Some years afterward he was murdered by the oligarchs at Samos, B.C. 411.

HYPERBŎRĔI or ĔI (Ὑπερβόρεοι, Ὑπερβόρειοι), a fabulous people, the earliest mention of whom seems to have been in the sacred legends connected with the worship of Apollo, both at Delos and at Delphi. In the earliest Greek conception of the Hyperboreans, as embodied by the poets, they were a blessed people, living beyond the north wind (ὑπερβόρεοι, fr. ὑπέρ and Βορέας), and therefore not exposed to its cold blasts, is a land of perpetual sunshine, which produced abundant fruits, on which the people lived, abstaining from animal food. In innocence and peace, free from disease, and toil, and care, ignorant of violence and war, they spent a long and happy life in the due and cheerful observance of the worship of Apollo, who visited their country soon after his birth, and spent a whole year among them, dancing and singing, before he returned to Delphi. The poets related further how the sun only rose once a year and set once a year upon the Hyperboreans, whose year was thus divided, at the equinoxes, into a six months' day and a six months' night, and they were therefore said to sow in the morning, to reap at noon, to gather their fruits in the evening, and to store them up at night · how, too, their natural life lasted one thousand years, but if any of them was satiated with its unbroken enjoyment, he threw himself, crowned and anointed, from a sacred rock into the sea. The Delian legends told of offerings sent to Apollo by the Hyperboreans, first by the hands of virgins named Arge and Opis (or Hecaërge), and then by Laodice and Hyperoche, escorted by five men called Perphereës; and, lastly, as their messengers did not return, they sent the offerings packed in wheat-straw, and the sacred package was forwarded from people to people till it reached Delos. If these legends are based on any geographical relations at all, the most probable explanation is that which regards them as pointing to regions north of Greece (the north part of Thessaly especially) as the original seat of the worship of Apollo. Naturally enough, as the geographical knowledge of the Greeks extended, they moved back the Hyperboreans further and further into the unknown parts of the earth; and of those who sought to fix their precise locality, some placed them in the extreme west of Europe, near the Pyrenæan Mountains and the supposed sources of the Ister, and thus they came to be identified with the Celtæ; while others placed them in the extreme north of Europe, on the shores of the Hyperboreus Oceanus, beyond the fabulous Grypes and Arimaspi, who themselves lived beyond the Scythians. The latter opinion at length prevailed; and then, the religious aspect of the fable being gradually lost sight of, the term Hyperborean came to mean only most northerly, as when Virgil and Horace speak of the "Hyperboreæ oræ" and "Hyperborei campi." The fable of the Hyperboreans may probably be regarded as one of the forms in which the tradition of an original period of innocence, happiness, and immortality existed among the nations of the ancient world.

Hyperbŏrĕi Montes was originally the mythical name of an imaginary range of mountains in the north of the earth (vid. Hyperborei), and was afterward applied by the geographers to various chains, as, for example, the Caucasus, the Rhipæi Montes, and others.

[Hyperēnor (Ὑπερήνωρ), a Trojan, son of Panthus, slain by Menelaus in battle.]

[Hyperīa (Ὑπέρεια). 1. A name of several fountains mentioned in Homer, in Thessaly; one near the ancient Hellas, another in the city Pheræ.—2. The earlier place of residence of the Phæacians, whence they removed to Scheria.]

Hyperīdes (Ὑπερείδης or Ὑπερίδης), one of the ten Attic orators, was the son of Glaucippus, and belonged to the Attic demus of Collytus, was a pupil of Plato in philosophy, and of Demosthenes in oratory. He was a friend of Demosthenes, and with him and Lycurgus was at the head of the anti-Macedonian party. He is first mentioned about B.C. 358, when he and his sons equipped two triremes at their own expense in order to serve against Eubœa, and from this time to his death he continued a stead fast friend to the patriotic cause. After the death of Alexander (323), Hyperides took an active part in organizing that confederacy of the Greeks against Antipater which produced the Lamian war. Upon the defeat of the confederates at the battle of Crannon in the following year (322), Hyperides fled to Ægina, where he was slain by the emissaries of Antipater. The number of orations attributed to Hyperides was seventy-seven, but none of them have come down to us. His oratory was graceful and powerful, holding a middle place between that of Lysias and Demosthenes.

Hypĕrīon (Ὑπερίων), a Titan, son of Cœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), and married to his sister Thia or Euryphaessa, by whom he became the father of Helios (Sol), Selene (Luna), and Eos (Aurora). Homer uses the name as a patronymic of Helios, so that it is equivalent to Hyperionion or Hyperionides, and Homer's example is imitated also by other poets. Vid. Helios.

Hypermnestra (Ὑπερμνήστρα). 1. Daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, wife of Oicles, and mother of Amphiaraus.—2. One of the daughters of Danaus, and wife of Lynceus Vid. Danaus, Lynceus.

[Hyperŏchus (Ὑπέροχος, Ep. Ὑπείροχος). 1 A Trojan warrior slain by Ulysses.—2. Of Cumæ, author of a work entitled Κυμαϊκά.]

Hypīus (Ὕπιος), a river and mountain in Bithynia.

Hypsas (Ὕψας), two rivers on the southern coast of Sicily, one between Selinus and Thermæ Selinuntiæ (now Belici), and the other near Agrigentum (now Fiume drago).

[Hypsēnor (Ὑψήνωρ). 1. A Trojan warrior son of Dolopion.—2. Son of Hippasus, a Greek, companion of Antilochus, slain by Deiphobus.]

Hypseus (Ὑψεύς), son of Penēus and Creusa, was king of the Lapithæ, and father of Cyrene.

Hypsicles (Ὑψικλῆς), of Alexandrea, a Greek mathematician, who is usually said to have lived about A.D. 160, but who ought not to be placed earlier than A.D. 550. The only work of his extant is entitled Περί τῆς τῶν ζωδίων ἀναφορᾶς published with the Optics of Heliodorus at Paris 1567. He is supposed, however, to have added the fourteenth and fifteenth books to the Elements of Euclid.

Hypsĭpўle (Ὑψιπύλη), daughter of Thoas, king of Lemnos. When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island because they had taken some female Thracian slaves to their beds, Hypsipyle saved her father. Vid. Thoas. She then became queen of Lemnos; and when the Argonauts landed there shortly afterward she bore twin sons to Jason, Euneus and Nebrophonus, also called Deiphilus or Thoas. The Lemnian women subsequently discovered that Thoas was alive, whereupon they compelled Hypsipyle to quit the island. On her flight she was taken prisoner by pirates and sold to the Nemean king Lycurgus, who intrusted to her care his son Archemorus or Opheltes. Vid. Archemorus.

Hypsūs (Ὑψοῦς -οῦντος), a town in Arcadia, on a mountain of the same name.

Hyrcānia (Ὑρκανία : Ὑρκάνιος, Hyrcānus: now Mazanderan), a province of the ancient Persian empire, on the southern and southeastern shores of the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea, and separated by mountains on the west, south, and east from Media, Parthia, and Margiana. Its valleys were very fertile; and it flourished most under the Parthians, whose kings often resided in it during the summer.

Hyrcānum or -ium Mare. Vid. Caspium Mare.

Hyrcānus (Ὑρκανός). 1. Joannes, prince and high-priest of the Jews, was the son and successor of Simon Maccabæus, the restorer of the independence of Judæa. He succeeded to his father's power B.C. 135. He was at first engaged in war with Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who invaded Judæa, and laid siege to Jerusalem. In 133 he concluded a peace with Antiochus on the condition of paying an annual tribute. Owing to the civil wars in Syria between the several claimants to the throne, the power of Hyrcanus steadily increased; and at length he took Samaria, and razed it to the ground (109), notwithstanding the army which Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus had sent to the assistance of the city. Hyrcanus died in 106. Although he did not assume the title of king, he may be regarded as the founder of the monarchy of Judæa, which continued in his family till the accession of Herod.—2. High-priest and king of the Jews, was the eldest son of Alexander Jannæus and his wife Alexandra. On the death of Alexander (78) the royal authority devolved upon Alexandra, who appointed Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood. Alexandra reigned nine years; and, upon her death in 69, Hyrcanus succeeded to the sovereignty, but was quickly attacked by his younger brother Aristobulus, who possessed more energy and ambition than Hyrcanus. In the following year (68) Hyrcanus was driven from the throne, and took refuge with Aretas, king of Arabia Petræa. That monarch assembled an army, with which he invaded Judæa in order to restore Hyrcanus. He defeated Aristobulus, and blockaded him in the temple of Jerusalem. Aristobulus, however, gained over by bribes and promises Pompey's lieutenant, M. Scaurus, who had arrived at Damascus, and who now ordered Aretas and Hyrcanus to withdraw from Judæa (64). The next year Pompey himself arrived in Syria: he reversed the decision of Scaurus, carried away Aristobulus as a prisoner to Rome, and reinstated Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, with the authority, though not the name of royalty. Hyrcanus, however, did not long enjoy his newly-recovered sovereignty in quiet. Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and subsequently Aristobulus himself, escaped from Rome, excited dangerous revolts, which were quelled by the assistance of the Romans. The real government was now in the able hands of Antipater, the father of Herod, who rendered such important services to Cæsar during the Alexandrean war (47) that Cæsar made him procurator of Judæa, leaving to Hyrcanus the title of high-priest. Although Antipater was poisoned by the contrivance of Hyrcanus (4 the latter was a man of such feeble character that he allowed Herod to take vengeance on the murderer of his father, and to succeed to his father's power and influence. The Parthians in their invasion of Syria, carried away Hyrcanus as prisoner (40). He was treated with much liberality by the Parthian king, and allowed to live in perfect freedom at Babylon. Here he remained for some years; but having at length received an invitation from Herod, who had meanwhile established himself on the throne of Judæa, he returned to Jerusalem with the consent of the Parthian king. He was treated with respect by Herod till the battle of Actium, when Herod, fearing lest Augustus might place Hyrcanus on the throne, accused him of a treasonable correspondence with the king of Arabia, and on this pretext put him to death (30).

[Hyrgis (Ὑργις : now Donetz), a tributary of the Tanais in Asia.]

Hyrīa (Ὑρία : Ὑριεύς, Ὑριάτης). 1. A town in Bœotia, near Tanagra, was in the earliest times a place of importance, but afterward sunk into insignificance.—2. A town in Apulia. Vid. Uria.

Hyrieus (Ὑριεύς), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Alcyone, king of Hyria in Bœotia, husband of Clonia, and father of Nycteus, Lycus, and Orion. Respecting his treasures, vid. Agamedes.

Hyrmīna (Ὑρμίνη), a town in Elis, mentioned by Homer, but of which all trace had disappeared in the time of Strabo. Near it was the promontory Hyrmina or Hormina (now Cape Chiarenza).

Hyrmīne (Ὑρμίνη), daughter of Neleus, or Nycteus, wife of Phorbas, and mother of Actor.

Hyrtăcus (Ὕρτακος), a Trojan, to whom Priam gave his first wife Arisba, when he married Hecuba. Homer makes him the father of Asius, hence called Hyrtacides. In Virgil, Nisus and Hippocoon are also represented as sons of Hyrtacus.

[Hyrtius (Ὕρτιος), a leader of the Mysians, slain in the Trojan war by Ajax, son of Telamon.]

Hysĭæ (Ὑσιαί). 1. (Ὑσιάτης), a town in Argolis, south of Argos, destroyed by the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war.—2. (Ὑσιεύς), a town in Bœotia, east of Platææ, called by Herodotus (v., 74) a demus of Attica, but probably belonging to Platææ.

Hystaspes (Ὑστάσπης; in Persian, Goshtasp, Gustasp, Histasp, or Wistasp). 1. Son of Arsames, and father of Darius I., was a member of the Persian royal house of the Achæmenidæ. He was probably satrap of Persis under Cambyses, and probably under Cyrus also.—2. Son of Darius I. and Atossa, commanded the Bactrians and Sacæ in the army of his brother Xerxes.

I.

[IABADII INSULA ('Ιαβαδίου νῆσος: now probably Java, though Von Humboldt and others regard it as Sumatra), a large and fruitful island of the Indian Sea, southeast of the Aurea Chersonesus, with a capital city called Argyre ('Αργυρῆ).]

IACCHUS ('Ιακχος), the solemn name of Bacchus in the Eleusinian mysteries, whose name was derived from the boisterous song called Iacchus. In these mysteries Iacchus was regarded as the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Ceres (Demeter), and was distinguished from the Theban Bacchus (Dionysus), the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Semele. In some traditions Iacchus is even called a son of Bacchus, but in others the two are identified. On the sixth day of the Eleusinian festival (the twentieth of Boëdromion), the statue of Iacchus was carried from the temple of Ceres (Demeter) across the Thriasian plain to Eleusis, accompanied by a numerous and riotous procession of the initiated, who sang the Iacchus, carried mystic baskets, and danced to the sound of cymbals and trumpets.

IADĔRA or IADER (Iadertīnus: now Old Zara), a town on the coast of Illyricum, with a good harbor, and a Roman colony under the name of "Colonia Claudia Augusta Felix."

[IAĔRA ('Ιάειρα). 1. A daughter of Nereus and Doris.—2. A wood nymph, who reared the sons of Alcanor, Pandarus and Bitias.]

IALĔMUS ('Ιάλεμος), a similar personification to that of Linus, and hence called a son of Apollo and Calliope, and the inventor of the song Ialemus, which was a kind of dirge, and is only mentioned as sung on most melancholy occasions.

IALMĔNUS ('Ιάλμενος), son of Mars (Ares) and Astyoche, and brother of Ascalaphus, was a native of the Bœotian Orchomenos. He was one of the Argonauts and a suitor of Helena. After the destruction of Troy, he wandered about with the Orchomenians, and founded colonies in Colchis.

IĀLȲSUS ('Ιάλυσος: now Ialyso), one of the three very ancient Dorian cities in the island of Rhodes, and one of the six original members of the Dorian Hexapolis (vid. DORIS), stood on the northwestern coast of the island, about sixty stadia southwest of Rhodes. It is said to have derived its name from the mythical Ialysus, son of Cercaphus, and grandson of Helios.

IAMBE ('Ιάμβη), a Thracian woman, daughter of Pan and Echo, and a slave of Metanīra. When Ceres (Demeter), in search of her daughter, arrived in Attica, and visited the house of Metanira, Iambe cheered the mournful goddess by her jokes.

IAMBLĬCHUS ('Ιάμβλιχος). 1. A Syrian, who lived in the time of the Emperor Trajan, wrote a romance in the Greek language entitled Babylonica. The work itself is lost, but an epitome of it is preserved by Photius.—2. A celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher, was born at Chalcis in Cœle-Syria. He resided in Syria during the greater part of his life, and died in the reign of Constantine the Great, probably before A.D. 333. He was inferior in judgment and learning to the earlier Neo-Platonists, Plotinus and Porphyry; and he introduced into his system many of the superstitions and mysteries of the East, by means of which he endeavored to check the progress of Christianity. The extant works of Iamblichus are, I. Περὶ Πυθαγόρου αἱρέσεως, on the philosophy of Pythagoras. It was intended as a preparation for the study of Plato, and consisted originally of ten books, of which five only are extant. 1. The first book contains an account of the life of Pythagoras, and though compiled without care, it is yet of value, as the other works, from which it is taken, are lost. Edited by Kuster, Amsterd., 1707; and by Kiessling, Lips., 1815. 2. Προτρεπτικοὶ λόγοι εἰς φιλοσοφίαν, forms a sort of introduction to the study of Plato. Edited by Kiessling, Lips., 1813, 8vo. 3. Περὶ κοινῆς μαθηματικῆς ἐπιστήμης, contains many fragments of the works of early Pythagoreans. Edited by Fries, Copenhagen, 1790. 4. Περὶ τῆς Νικομάχου ἀριθμητικῆς εἰσαγωγῆς. Edited by Tennulius, Deventer and Arnheim, 1668. 5. Τὰ θεολογούμενα τῆς ἀριθμητικῆς. Edited by Ast, Lips., 1817.—II. Περὶ μυστηρίων, written to prove the divine origin of the Egyptian and Chaldæan theology. Edited by Gale, Oxon., 1678. Iamblichus wrote other works which are lost.—3. A later Neo-Platonic philosopher of Apamea, a contemporary of the Emperor Julian and of Libanius.

[IAMENUS ('Ιάμενος), a Trojan warrior, slain by Leonteus during the attack of the Trojans on the camp of the Greeks.]

IAMĬDÆ. Vid. IAMUS.

IAMNIA ('Ιάμνεια; 'Ιαμνία: 'Ιαμνείτης: in Old Testament, Jabneel, Jabneh: now Ibneh or Gabneh), a considerable city of Palestine, between Diospolis and Azotus, near the coast, with a good harbor, was taken by King Uzziah from the Philistines. Pompey united it to the province of Syria. After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Sanhedrim, and of a celebrated school of Jewish learning.

[IAMNO or IAMNA ('Ιαμνα: now Ciudadela), a city in the smaller of the Balearic Islands (Minorca).]

[IAMPHORĪNA, a strong place in the territory of the Mædi in Macedonia.]

IAMUS ('Ιαμος), son of Apollo and Evadne, received the art of prophecy from his father, and was regarded as the ancestor of the famous family of seers, the Iamidæ at Olympia.

[IĀNASSA ('Ιάνασσα), one of the Nereids.]

IANTHE ('Ιάνθη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and one of the playmates of Proserpina (Persephone).—2. Daughter of Telestes of Crete, beloved by IPHIS.

IAPĔTUS ('Ιαπετός), one of the Titans, son of Cœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), married Asia or Clymene, the daughter of his brother Oceanus, and became by her the father of Atlas, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menœtius. He was imprisoned with Saturn (Cronus) in Tartarus. Being the father of Prometheus, he was regarded by the Greeks as the ancestor of the human race. His descendants, Prometheus, Atlas, and others, are often designated by the patronymics Iapetidæ(es), Iapetionidæ(es), and the feminine Iapetionis.

[IĀPIS, son of Iasus, beloved by Apollo, and received from him the knowledge of medicine and the prophetic art: he cured Æneas of the wound received by him in the war against Latinus.]

Iapȳdes (Ἰάπυδες or Ἰάποδες), a warlike and barbarous people in the north of Illyricum, between the Rivers Arsia and Tedanius, were a mixed race, partly Illyrian and partly Celtic, who tattooed their bodies. They were subdued by Augustus. Their country was called Iapydĭa.

Iāpȳgĭa (Ἰαπυγία: Ἰάπυγες), the name given by the Greeks to the south of Apulia, from Tarentum and Brundisium to the Promontorium Iapygium (now Cape Leuca), though it is sometimes applied to the whole of Apulia. Vid. Apulia. The name is derived from the mythical Iapyx.

Iāpyx (Ἰάπυξ). 1. Son of Lycaon and brother of Daunus and Peucetius, who went as leaders of a colony to Italy. According to others, he was a Cretan, and a brother of Icadius, or a son of Dædalus and a Cretan woman, from whom the Cretans who migrated to Italy derived the name of Iapyges.—2. The west-northwestern wind, blowing off the coast of Iapygia (Apulia), in the south of Italy, and consequently, favorable to persons crossing over to Greece. It was the same as the ἀργέστης of the Greeks.

Iarbas or Hiarbas, king of the Gætulians, and son of Jupiter Ammon by a Libyan nymph, sued in vain for the hand of Dido in marriage. For details, vid. Dido.

Iardănes (Ἰαρδάνης), a king of Lydia, and father of Omphale, who is hence called Iardanis.

Iardănes or Iardănus (Ἰαρδάνης, Ἰάρδανος). 1. (Now Jardan), a river in Elis.—2. A river in the north of Crete, which flowed near the town Cydonia.

Iăsĭon or Iăsĭus (Ἰασίων, Ἰάσιος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, or son of Corythus and Electra. At the wedding of his sister Harmonia, Ceres (Demeter) fell in love with him, and in a thrice-ploughed field (τρίπολος) she became by him the mother of Pluton or Plutus in Crete; Jupiter (Zeus), in consequence, killed Iasion with a flash of lightning. Others represent him as living to an advanced age as the husband of Ceres (Demeter). In some traditions Iasion and his brother Dardanus are said to have carried the palladium to Samothrace, and there to have been instructed in the mysteries of Ceres (Demeter) by Jupiter (Zeus). Others relate that Iasion, being inspired by Ceres (Demeter) and Cora (Proserpina), travelled about in Sicily and many other countries, and every where taught the people the mysteries of Ceres (Demeter).

Iasis, i. e., Atalante, the daughter of Iasius.

[Iăsius (Ἰάσιος). 1. King of Orchomenos, father of Amphion.—2. Vid. Iasion.]

Iăso (Ἰασώ), i. e., Recovery, a daughter of Æsculapius or Amphiaraus, and sister of Hygiea, was worshipped as the goddess of recovery.

Iassĭus or Iassĭcus Sinus (Ἰασικὸς κόλπος: now Gulf of Mandeliyeh), a large gulf on the western coast of Caria, between the peninsulas of Miletus and Myndus, named after the city of Iassus, and called also Bargylieticus Sinus (Βαργυλιητικὸς κόλπος) from another city which stood upon it, namely, Bargylia.

Iassus or Iăsus (Ἴασσος, Ἴασος: Ἰασεῖς: ru[ins] at Asyn-Kalessi), a city of Caria, on the Ias[icus] Sinus, founded by Argives and further col[onized] by Milesians.

Iasus (Ἴασος). 1. An Arcadian, son of Ly[curgus] and Cleophile or Eurynome, brother [of] Ancæus, husband of Clymene, the daughter [of] Minyas, and father of Atalante. He is like[wise] called Iasius and Iasion.—2. Father of Amph[ion] and king of the Minyans.—[3. Son of Triop[as], grandson of Phorbas, brother of Agenor, a[nd] father of Io, according to one account, was ki[ng] of Argos.—4. Son of Sphelus, a leader of [the] Athenians before Troy, slain by Æneas.]

Iazȳges (Ἰάζυγες), a powerful Sarmatian pe[o]ple, who originally dwelt on the coast of [the] Pontus Euxinus and the Palus Mæotis, but [in] the reign of Claudius settled near the Quadi [in] Dacia, in the country bounded by the Danub[e], the Theiss, and the Sarmatian Mountains. The[y] are generally called Sarmatæ Iazyges or simpl[y] Sarmatæ, but Ptolemy gives them the name [of] Iazyges Metanastæ, on account of their migr[a]tion. The Iazyges were in close alliance wi[th] the Quadi, along with whom they frequently at[]tacked the Roman dominions, especially Mœsi[a] and Pannonia. In the fifth century they were conquered by the Goths.

Ibērĭa (Ἰβηρία: southern part of Georgia), a country of Asia, in the centre of the isthmus between the Black and Caspian Seas, was bounded on the north by the Caucasus, on the west by Colchis, on the east by Albania, and on the south by Armenia. It was surrounded on every side by mountains, through which there were only four passes. Sheltered by these mountains and watered by the Cyrus (now Kour) and its upper tributaries, it was famed for a fertility of which its modern name (from Γεωργός) remains a witness. Its inhabitants, Ibēres (Ἴβηρες) or Ibēri, were, and are still, among the most perfect specimens of the Caucasian race. The ancients believed them to be of the same family as the Assyrians and Medes, whom they were thought to resemble in their customs. They were more civilized than their neighbors in Colchis and Albania, and were divided into four castes: 1. The nobles, from whom two kings were chosen; 2. The priests, who were also the magistrates; 3. The soldiers and husbandmen; 4. The slaves, who performed all public and mechanical work. The chief employment of the Iberians was agriculture. The Romans first became acquainted with the country through the expedition of Pompey in B.C. 65; and under Trajan it was subjected to Rome. In the fifth century it was conquered by the Persian king Sapor. No connection can be traced between the Iberians of Asia and those of Spain.

Ibērus (Ἴβηρος or Ἴβηρ: now Ebro), the principal river in the northeast of Spain, rises among the mountains of the Cantabri, near Juliobriga, flows southeast through a great plain between the Pyrenees and the Mons Idubeda, and falls into the Mediterranean near Dertosa, after forming a Delta.

Ibȳcus (Ἴβυκος), a Greek lyric poet, was a native of Rhegium, and spent the best part of his life at Samos, at the court of Polycrates, about B.C. 540. It is related that, travelling through a desert place near Corinth, he was murdered by robbers, but before he died he called upon a flock of cranes that happened to fly over him to avenge his death. Soon afterward, when the people of Corinth were assembled in the theatre, the cranes appeared; and one of the murderers, who happened to be present, cried out involuntarily, "Behold the avengers of Ibycus:" and thus were the authors of the crime detected. The phrase αἱ Ἰβύκου γέρανοι passed into a proverb. The poetry of Ibycus was chiefly erotic, and partook largely of the impetuosity of his character. In his dialect there was a mixture of the Doric and Æolic. In antiquity there were seven books of his lyric poems, of which only a few fragments now remain. [These fragments are collected in Schneidewin's Ibyci Carminum Reliquiæ, Göttingen, 1833.]

Icăria or Icărius (Ἰκαρία, Ἰκάριος: Ἰκαριεύς), a mountain and a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeis, where Bacchus (Dionysus) is said to have taught Icarius the cultivation of the vine.

Icărius (Ἰκάριος), also called Icărus or Icărion. 1. An Athenian, who lived in the reign of Pandion, and hospitably received Bacchus (Dionysus) on his arrival in Attica. The god, in return, taught him the cultivation of the vine. Icarius made a present of some wine to peasants, who became intoxicated by it, and thinking that they were poisoned by Icarius, slew him, and threw his body into a well, or buried it under a tree. His daughter Erigone, after a long search, found his grave, to which she was conducted by his faithful dog Mæra. From grief she hung herself on the tree under which he was buried. Jupiter (Zeus) or Bacchus (Dionysus) placed her and Icarius among the stars, making Erigone the Virgin, Icarius Boötes or Arcturus, and Mæra Procyon or the little dog. Hence the latter is called Icarius canis. The god then punished the ungrateful Athenians with madness, in which condition the Athenian maidens hung themselves as Erigone had done. The Athenians propitiated Icarius and Erigone by the institution of the festival of the Æora. Vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.—2. A Lacedæmonian, son of Perieres and Gorgophŏne, and brother of Tyndareus. Others called him grandson of Perieres, and son of Œbalus. When Icarius and Tyndareus were expelled from Lacedæmon by their half-brother Hippocoon, Icarius went to Acarnania, and there became the father of Penelope, and of several other children. He afterward returned to Lacedæmon. Since there were many suitors for the hand of Penelope, he promised to give her to the hero who should conquer in a foot race. Ulysses won the prize, and was betrothed to Penelope. Icarius tried to persuade his daughter to remain with him, and not accompany Ulysses to Ithaca. Ulysses allowed her to do as she pleased, whereupon she covered her face with her veil to hide her blushes, and thus intimated that she would follow her husband. Icarius then desisted from further entreaties, and erected a statue of Modesty on the spot.

Icărus (Ἴκαρος), son of Dædalus. Vid. Dædalus.

Icărus or Icăria (Ἴκαρος, Ἰκαρία: now Nicaria), an island of the Ægean Sea, one of the Sporades, west of Samos, called also Doliche (δολιχή, i. e. long island). Its common name, and that of the surrounding sea, Icarium Mare, were derived from the myth of Icarus. It was first colonized by the Milesians, but afterward belonged to the Samians, who fed their herds on its rich pastures.

Iccĭus. [1. A noble of Rheims in Gallia Belgica, who headed a deputation of his townsmen to Cæsar in B.C. 57, placing their state at Cæsar's disposal, and praying his aid against the other Belgic communities.]—2. A friend of Horace, who addressed him an ode (Carm., i., 29) and an epistle (Ep., i., 12). The ode was written in B.C. 25, when Iccius was preparing to join Ælius Gallus in his expedition to Arabia. The epistle was composed about ten years afterward, when Iccius had become Vipsanius Agrippa's steward in Sicily. In both poems Horace reprehends pointedly, but delicately, in Iccius an inordinate desire for wealth.

Icēni, called Simēni (Σιμενοί) by Ptolemy, a numerous and powerful people in Britain, who dwelt north of the Trinobantes, in the modern counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. Their revolt from the Romans, under their heroic queen Boadicēa, is celebrated in history. Vid. Boadicea. Their chief town was Venta Icenorum (now Caister) about three miles from Norwich.

Ichnæ (Ἴχναι: Ἰχναῖος). 1. A town in Bottiæa in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Axius. —2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, celebrated for its worship of Themis, who was hence surnamed Ichnæa.

Ichnæ or Ischnæ (Ἴχναι, Ἴσχναι), a Greek city in the north of Mesopotamia, founded by the Macedonians, was the scene of the first battle between Crassus and the Parthians, in which the former gained the victory. According to Appian, the Parthians soon after defeated the Romans near the same spot.

[Ichnūsa (Ἰχνοῦσα), the ancient name of Sardinia. Vid. Sardinia.]

Ichthyŏphăgi (Ἰχθυοφάγοι, i. e., Fish-eaters), was a vague descriptive name given by the ancients to various tribes on the coasts of Asia and Africa, of whom they knew but little. Thus we find Ichthyophagi: 1. In the extreme south-east of Asia, in the country of the Sinæ. 2. On the coast of Gedrosia. 3. On the northeastern coast of Arabia Felix. 4. In Africa, on the coast of the Red Sea, above Egypt. 5. On the western coast of Africa.

Icilĭus. 1. Sp., was one of the three envoys sent by the plebeians, after their succession to the Sacred Mount, to treat with the senate, B C. 494. He was thrice elected tribune of the plebs, namely, in 492, 481, and 471.—2. L., a man of great energy and eloquence, was tribune of the plebs 456, when he claimed for the tribunes the right of convoking the senate, and also carried the important law for the assignment of the Aventine (de Aventino publicando) to the plebs. In the following year (455) he was again elected tribune. He was one of the chief leaders in the outbreak against the decemvirs, 449. Virginia had been betrothed to him, and he boldly defended her cause before Appius Claudius and when at length she fell by her father's hand, Icilius hurried to the army which was carrying on war against the Sabines, and prevailed upon them to desert the government.

Icŏnĭum (Ἰκόνιον: Ἰκονιεύς: now Koniyeh), the capital of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor, was, when visited by St. Paul, a flourishing city, with a mixed population of Jews and Greeks; under the later emperors, a colony; and in the Middle Ages, one of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, and important in the history of the crusades.

Ictīnus (Ἰκτῖνος), a contemporary of Pericles, was the architect of two of the most celebrated of the Greek temples, namely, the great temple of Minerva (Athena) in the acropolis of Athens, called the Parthenon, and the temple of Apollo Epicurius, near Phigalia in Arcadia. Callicrates was associated with Ictinus in building the Parthenon.

Ida (Ἴδη, Dor. Ἴδα). 1. (Now Ida or Kas-Dagh,) a mountain range of Mysia, in Asia Minor, which formed the southern boundary of the Troad; extending from Lectum Promontorium in the southwest corner of the Troad, eastward along the northern side of the Gulf of Adramyttium, and further east into the centre of Mysia. Its highest summits were Cotylus on the north and Gargara on the south; the latter is about five thousand feet high, and is often capped with snow. Lower down, the slopes of the mountain are well-wooded; and lower still, they form fertile fields and valleys. The sources of the Scamander and the Æsepus, besides other rivers and numerous brooks, are on Ida. The mountain is celebrated in mythology as the scene of the rape of Ganymede, whom Ovid (Fast., ii., 145) calls Idæus puer, and of the judgment of Paris, who is called Idæus Judex by Ovid (Fast., vi., 44), and Idæus pastor by Cicero (ad. Att., ii., 18). In Homer, too, its summit is the place from which the gods watch the battles in the plain of Troy. Ida was also an ancient seat of the worship of Cybele, who obtained from it the name of Idæa Mater.—2. (Now Psilorati), a mountain in the centre of Crete, belonging to the mountain range which runs through the whole length of the island. Mount Ida is said to be seven thousand six hundred and seventy-four feet above the level of the sea. It was closely connected with the worship of Jupiter (Zeus), who is said to have been brought up in a cave in this mountain.

Idæa Mater. Vid. Ida.

Idæi Dactyli. Vid. Dactyli.

[Idæus (Ἰδαῖος). 1. A herald of the Trojans. —2. Son of Dares, the priest of Vulcan (Hephæstus), slain by Diomede.]

Idălium (Ἰδάλιον), a town in Cyprus, sacred to Venus (Aphrodite), who hence bore the surname Idalia.

Idanthyrsus (Ἰδάνθυρσος), a king of the Scythians, under whom they overran Asia, and advanced as far as Egypt.

Idas (Ἴδας). 1. Son of Aphareus and Arene, the daughter of Œbalus, brother of Lynceus, husband of Marpessa, and father of Cleopatra or Alcyone. From the name of their father, Idas and Lynceus are called Apharetidæ or Apharidæ. Apollo was in love with Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus, but Idas carried her off in a winged chariot which Neptune (Poseidon) had given him. Evenus could not overtake Idas, but Apollo found him in Messene and took the maiden from him. The lovers fought fo[r] possession, but Jupiter (Zeus) separated t[hem], and left the decision with Marpessa, who c[hose] Idas, from fear lest Apollo should desert h[er when] she grew old. The Apharetidæ also took p[art] in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition [of] the Argonauts. But the most celebrated part [of] their story is their battle with the Dioscuri (Cas-tor and Pollux, which is related elsewhere (... 266, b.).—[2. One of the guests at the marri[age] of Perseus, slain by Phineus.—3. One of the co[m]panions of Diomedes, changed by Venus (Aphro-dite) into a bird.—4. A Trojan warrior, menti[on]ed by Virgil, slain by Turnus in Italy.—5. T[wo] heroes in the Theban war, the one from Onc[h]estus, the other from Tænarus.]

[Ide (Ἴδη). 1. Daughter of Corybas and mo[th]er of Minos.—2. A nymph, mother of Nisus [by] Hyrtacus.]

Idistavisus Campus, a plain in Germany ne[ar] the Weser, probably in the neighborhood of t[he] Porta Westphalica, between Rinteln and Ha[us]berge, memorable for the victory of Germanicu[s] over the Cherusci, A. D. 16.

Idmon (Ἴδμων). 1. Son of Apollo and Asteri[a] or Cyrene, was a soothsayer, and accompanie[d] the Argonauts, although he knew beforehand that death awaited him. He was killed in the country of the Mariandynians by a boar or a serpent; or, according to others, he died there of a disease.—[2. A Rutulian, sent by Turnus to Æneas to propose to settle the dispute for the hand of Lavinia by single combat between the heroes.]

Idŏmĕneus (Ἰδομενεύς). 1. Son of the Cretan Deucalion, and grandson of Minos and Pasiphaë, was king of Crete. He is sometimes called Lyctius or Cnosius, from the Cretan towns of Lyctus and Cnosus. He was one of the suitors of Helen; and, in conjunction with Meriones, the son of his half-brother Molus, he led the Cretans in eighty ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and distinguished himself especially in the battle near the ships. According to Homer, Idomeneus returned home in safety after the fall of Troy. Later traditions relate that once in a storm he vowed to sacrifice to Neptune (Poseidon) whatever he should first meet on his landing, if the god would grant him a safe return. This was his own son, whom he accordingly sacrificed. As Crete was thereupon visited by a plague, the Cretans expelled Idomeneus. He went to Italy, where he settled in Calabria, and built a temple to Minerva (Athena). From thence he is said to have migrated again to Colophon on the coast of Asia. His tomb, however, was shown at Cnosus, where he and Meriones were worshipped as heroes.—2. Of Lampsacus, a friend and disciple of Epicurus, flourished about B.C. 310–270. He wrote several philosophical and historical works, all of which are lost. The latter were chiefly devoted to an account of the private life of the distinguished men of Greece.

Idŏthĕa (Εἰδοθέα), daughter of Proteus, taught Menelaus how he might secure her father, and compel him to declare in what manner he might reach home in safety.

Idrĭeus or Hidrĭeus (Ἰδριεύς, Ἱδριεύς) king of Caria, second son of Hecatomnus, succeeded to the throne on the death of Artemisia, the widow of his brother Mausolus, in B.C. 351. He died in 344, leaving the kingdom to his sister ADA, whom he had married.

IDUBĔDA (now Sierra de Oca and Lorenzo), a range of mountains in Spain, begins among the Cantabri, forms the southern boundary of the plain of the Ebro, and runs southeast to the Mediterranean.

IDŪMÆA (Ἰδουμαία), is the Greek form of the scriptural name EDOM, but the terms are not precisely equivalent. In the Old Testament, and in the time before the Babylonish captivity of the Jews, Edom is the district of Mount Seir, that is, the mountainous region extending north and south from the Dead Sea to the eastern head of the Red Sea, peopled by the descendants of Esau, and added by David to the Israelitish monarchy. The decline of the kingdom of Judæa, and at last its extinction by Nebuchadnezzar, enabled the Edomites to extend their power to the northwest over the southern part of Judæa as far as Hebron, while their original territory was taken possession of by the Nabathæan Arabs. Thus the Idumæa of the later Jewish and of the Roman history is the southern part of Judæa and a small portion of the north of Arabia Petræa, extending northwest and southeast from the Mediterranean to the western side of Mount Seir. Under the Maccabees, the Idumæans were again subjected to Judæa (B.C. 129), and governed, under them, by prefects (στρατηγοί), who were very probably descended from the old princes of Edom; but the internal dissensions in the Asmonæan family led at last to the establishment of an Idumæan dynasty on the Jewish throne. Vid. ANTIPATER, Nos. 3, 4, HERODES. The Roman writers of the Augustan age and later use Idumæa and Judæa as equivalent terms. Soon after the destruction of Jerusalem the name of Idumæa disappears from history, and is merged in that of Arabia. Both the old Edomites and the later Idumæans were a commercial people, and carried on a great part of the traffic between the East and the shores of the Mediterranean.

IDȲIA (Ἰδυία), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of the Colchian king ÆETES.

IERNE. Vid. HIBERNIA.

IĔTÆ (Ἰεταί: Ἰετῖνος: now Jato), a town in the interior of Sicily, on a mountain of the same name, southwest of Macella.

[IGILGILI (Ἰγιλγιλί: now Jigelli or Jigel), a city of Mauretania Cæsariensis, west of the River Ampsaga, between the rivers Audus and Gulus.]

IGĪLĬUM (now Giglio), a small island off the Etruscan coast, opposite Cosa.

IGNATĬUS (Ἰγνάτιος), one of the apostolical fathers, was a hearer of the Apostle John, and succeeded Evodius as bishop of Antioch in A.D. 69. He was condemned to death by Trajan at Antioch, and was taken to Rome, where he was thrown to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre. The date of his martyrdom is uncertain. Some place it in 107, but others as late as 116. On his way from Antioch to Rome, Ignatius wrote several epistles in Greek to various churches. There are extant at present fifteen epistles ascribed to Ignatius, but of these only seven are considered to be genuine; and even these seven are much interpolated. The ancient Syriac version of some of these epistles, which has been recently discovered, is free from many of the interpolations found in the present Greek text, and was evidently executed when the Greek text was in a state of greater purity than it is at present. The Greek text has been published in the Patres Apostolici by Cotelerius, Amsterd., 1724, and by Jacobson, Oxon., 1838; and the Syriac version, accompanied with the Greek text, by Cureton, Lond., 1849.

IGUVĬUM (Iguvīnus, Iguvinas, -ātis: now Gubbio or Eugubio), an important town in Umbria, on the southern slope of the Apennines. On a mountain in the neighborhood of this town was a celebrated temple of Jupiter (Zeus), in the ruins of which were discovered, four centuries ago, seven brazen tables, covered with Umbrian inscriptions, and which are still preserved at Gubbio. These tables, frequently called the Eugubian Tables, contain more than one thousand Umbrian words, and are of great importance for a knowledge of the ancient languages of Italy. They are explained by Grotefend, Rudimenta Linguæ Umbricæ, &c., Hannov., 1835, seq., and by Lepsius, Inscriptiones, Umbricæ et Oscæ, Lips., 1841.

ILAĪRA (Ἰλάειρα), daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, and sister of Phœbe. The two sisters are frequently mentioned by the poets under the name of Leucippidæ. Both were carried off by the Dioscuri, and Ilaira became the wife of Castor.

ILERCAONES, ILERCAONENSES, or ILLURGAVONENSES, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the western coast, between the Ibērus and Mons Idubĕda. Their chief town was DERTOSA.

ILERDA (now Lerida), a town of the Ilergētes in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a height above the River Sicoris (now Segre), which was here crossed by a stone bridge. It was afterward a Roman colony, but in the time of Ausonius had ceased to be a place of importance. It was here that Africanus and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, were defeated by Cæsar (B.C. 49).

ILERGĒTES, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees.

ILĬA or RHEA SILVĬA. Vid. ROMULUS.

ILĬCI or ILLĬCE (now Elche), a town of the Contestanti, on the eastern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Carthago Nova to Valentia, was a colonia immunis. The modern Elche lies at a greater distance from the coast than the ancient town.

ILIENSES, an ancient people in SARDINIA.

ILĬŎNA (Ἰλιόνη), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, wife of Polymnestor or Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whom she bore a son Deipylus. At the beginning of the Trojan war her brother Polydorus was intrusted to her care, and she brought him up as her own son. For details, vid. POLYDORUS. Iliona was the name of one of the tragedies of Pacuvius. (Hor., Sat., ii., 3, 61.)

ILĬŎNEUS (Ἰλιονεύς). 1. A son of Niobe, whom Apollo would have liked to save, because he was praying; but the arrow was no longer under the control of the god. Vid. NIOBE.—[2. A Trojan, son of Phorbas, slain in battle by Peneleus.—

3. One of the companions of Æneas.—4. A Trojan warrior, slain by Diomedes.]

ILĬPA (now Pennaflor), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the right bank of the Bætis, which was navigable to this place with small vessels.

[ILIPULA (Ἰλίπουλα). 1. Called MAGNA, a city of Hispania Bætica, between the rivers Anas and Bætis.—2. I. MINOR (now Lepe di Ronda), also in Hispania Bætica, belonging to the district of Astigi.]

ILISSUS (Ἰλισσός more rarely Εἰλισσός), a small river in Attica, rises on the northern slope of Mount Hymettus, receives the brook Eridanus near the Lyceum, outside the walls of Athens, then flows through the eastern side of Athens, and loses itself in the marshes in the Athenian plain. The Ilissus is now usually dry, as its waters are drawn off to supply the city.

ILĪTHȲIA (Εἰλείθυια), also called Elithyia, Ilethyia, or Eleutho, the goddess of birth, who came to the assistance of women in labor. When she was kindly disposed, she furthered the birth; but when she was angry, she protracted the labor. In the Iliad the Ilithyiæ (in the plural) are called the daughters of Hera (Juno). But in the Odyssey and Hesiod, and in the later poets in general, there is only one goddess of this name. Ilithyia was the servant of Hera (Juno), and was employed by the latter to retard the birth of Hercules. Vid. HERCULES. The worship of Ilithyia appears to have been first established among the Dorians in Crete, where she was believed to have been born in a cave in the territory of Cnosus. From thence her worship spread over Delos and Attica. According to a Delian tradition, Ilithyia was not born in Crete, but had come to Delos from the Hyperboreans, for the purpose of assisting Leto (Latona). In an ancient hymn attributed to Olen, which was sung in Delos, Ilithyia was called the mother of Eros (Love). It is probable that Ilithyia was originally a goddess of the moon, and hence became identified with Artemis or Diana. The moon was supposed to exercise great influence over growth in general, and consequently over that of children.

ILĬUM. Vid. TROAS.

ILLIBĔRIS (Ἰλλίβερις). 1. (Now Tech), called TICHIS or TECHUM by the Romans, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, in the territory of the Sardones, rises in the Pyrenees, and falls, after a short course, into the Mare Gallicum.—2. (Now Elne), a town of the Santones, on the above-mentioned river, at the foot of the Pyrenees, was originally a place of importance, but afterward sunk into insignificance. It was restored by Constantine, who changed its name into HELĔNA, after that of his mother, whence the modern Elne.

ILLITURGIS or ILLITURGI (now Andujar), an important town of the Turduli in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a steep rock near the Bætis, and on the road from Corduba to Castulo: it was destroyed by Scipio B.C. 210, but was rebuilt, and received the name of Forum Julium.

ILLȲRĬCUM or ILLȲRIS, more rarely ILLYRĬA (τὸ Ἰλλυρικόν Ἰλλυρίς, Ἰλλυρία), included, in its widest signification, all the land west of Macedonia and east of Italy and Rætia, extending south as far as Epirus, and north as far as the valleys of the Savus and Dravus, and the junction of these rivers with the Danube. This wide extent of country was inhabited by numerous Illyrian tribes, all of whom were more or less barbarous. They were probably of the same origin as the Thracians, but some Celts were mingled with them. The country was divided into two parts: 1. ILLYRIS BARBARA or ROMANA, the Roman province of ILLYRICUM, extended along the Adriatic Sea from Italy (Istria), from which it was separated by the Arsia, to the River Drilo, and was bounded on the east by Macedonia and Mœsia Superior, from which it was separated by the Drinus, and on the north by Pannonia, from which it was separated by the Dravus. It thus comprehended a part of the modern Croatia, the whole of Dalmatia, almost the whole of Bosnia, and a part of Albania. It was divided in ancient times into three districts, according to the tribes by which it was inhabited: Iapydia, the interior of the country on the north, from the Arsia to the Tedanius (vid. IAPYDES); Liburnia, along the coast from the Arsia to the Titius (vid. LIBURNI); and Dalmatia, south of Liburnia, along the coast from the Titius to the Drilo. Vid. DALMATIA. The Liburnians submitted at an early time to the Romans; but it was not till after the conquest of the Dalmatians, in the reign of Augustus, that the entire country was organized as a Roman province. From this time the Illyrians, and especially the Dalmatians, formed an important part of the Roman legions.—2. ILLYRIS GRÆCA, or ILLYRIA proper, also called EPĪRUS NOVA, extended from the Drilo, along the Adriatic, to the Ceraunian Mountains, which separated it from Epirus proper: it was bounded on the east by Macedonia. It thus embraced the greater part of the modern Albania. It was a mountainous country, but possessed some fertile land on the coast. Its principal rivers were the AOUS, APSUS, GENUSUS, and PANYASUS. In the interior was an important lake, the LYCHNITIS. On the coast there were the Greek colonies of Epidamnus, afterward DYRRHACHIUM, and APOLLONIA. It was at these places that the celebrated Via Egnatia commenced, which ran through Macedonia to Byzantium. The country was inhabited by various tribes, ATINTANES, TAULANTII, PARTHINI, DASSARETÆ, &c. In early times they were troublesome and dangerous neighbors to the Macedonian kings. They were subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who defeated and slew in battle their king Bardylis, B.C. 359. After the death of Alexander the Great, most of the Illyrian tribes recovered their independence. At a later time, the injury which the Roman trade suffered from their piracies brought against them the arms of the republic. The forces of their queen Teuta were easily defeated by the Romans, and she was obliged to purchase peace by the surrender of part of her dominions and the payment of an annual tribute, 229. The second Illyrian war was finished by the Romans with the same ease. It was commenced by Demetrius of Pharos, who was guardian of Pineus, the son of Agron, but he was conquered by the consul Æmilius Paulus, 219. Pineus was succeeded by Pleuratus, who cultivated friendly relations with the Romans. His son Gentius formed an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia, against Rome; but he was conquered by the prætor L. Anicius, in the same year as Perseus, 168; whereupon Illyria, as well as Macedonia, became subject to Rome. In the new division of the empire under Constantine, Illyricum formed one of the great provinces of the empire. It was divided into ILLYRICUM OCCIDENTALE, which included Illyricum proper, Pannonia, and Noricum, and ILLYRICUM ORIENTALE, which comprehended Dacia, Mœsia, Macedonia, and Thraca.

ILUS (Ἶλος). 1. Son of Dardanus by Batea, the daughter of Teucer. Ilus died without issue, and left his kingdom to his brother, Erichthonius.—2. Son of Tros and Callirrhoë, grandson of Erichthonius, and great-grandson of Dardanus; whence he is called Dardanides. He was the father of Laomedon and the grandfather of Priam. He was believed to be the founder of Ilion, which was also called Troy, after his father. Jupiter (Zeus) gave him the palladium, a statue of three cubits high, with its feet close together, holding a spear in its right hand, and a distaff in its left, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, the city should be safe. The tomb of Ilus was shown in the neighborhood of Troy.—3. Son of Mermerus, and grandson of Jason and Medea. He lived at Ephyra, between Elis and Olympia; and when Ulysses came to him to fetch the poison for his arrows, Ilus refused it, from fear of the vengeance of the gods.—[4. A Latin warrior, slain by Pallas, son of Evander.]

ILVA. Vid. ÆTHALIA.

ILVĀTES, a people in Liguria, south of the Po, in the modern Montferrat.

IMACHĀRA (Imacharensis: now Maccara), a town in Sicily, in the Heræan Mountains.

[IMANUENTIUS, king of the Trinobantes, slain by Cassivelaunus.]

[IMAON, a Latin warrior, whom Halesus protected when attacked by Pallas, son of Evander.]

IMĀUS (τὸ Ἴμαον ὄρος), the name of a great mountain range of Asia, is one of those terms which the ancient geographers appear to have used indefinitely, for want of exact knowledge. In its most definite application, it appears to mean the western part of the Himalaya, between the Paropamisus and the Emodi Montes; but when it is applied to some great chain, extending much further to the north, and dividing Scythia into two parts, Scythia intra Imaum and Scythia extra Imaum, it must either be understood to mean the modern Moussour or Altai Mountains, or else some imaginary range, which cannot be identified with any actually existing mountains.

IMBRĀSUS (Ἴμβρασος), a river in the island of Samos, formerly called Parthenius, flowing into the sea not far from the city of Samos. The celebrated temple of Juno (Hera) (Ἡραῖον) stood near it, and it gave the epithet of Imbrasia both to Juno (Hera) and to Diana (Artemis).

[IMBRIUS (Ἴμβριος), son of Mentor of Pedasus in Caria, married an illegitimate daughter of Priam (named Medesicaste), and aided Priam against the Greeks: he was slain by Teucer.]

IMBROS (Ἴμβρος: Ἴμβριος: now Embro or Imbrus), an island in the north of the Ægean Sea, near the Thracian Chersonesus, about eighteen miles southeast of Samothrace, and about twenty-two northeast of Lemnos. It is about twenty-five miles in circumference, and is hilly, but contains many fertile valleys. Imbros, like the neighboring island of Samothrace, was in ancient times one of the chief seats of the worship of the Cabiri and Mercury (Hermes). There was a town of the same name on the east of the island, of which there are still some ruins.

INĀCHIS (Ἰναχίς), a surname of Io, the daughter of Inachus. The goddess Isis is also called Inachis, because she was identified with Io; and sometimes Inachis is used as synonymous with an Argive or Greek woman. Inachides in the same way was used as a name of Epaphus, a grandson of Inachus, and also of Perseus, because he was born at Argos, the city of Inachus.

INĀCHUS (Ἴναχος), son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Phoroneus and Ægialeus, to whom others add Io, Argus Panoptes, and Phegeus or Pegeus. He was the first king and the most ancient hero of Argos, whence the country is frequently called the land of Inachus; and he is said to have given his name to the River Inachus. The ancients made several attempts to explain the stories about Inachus: sometimes they looked upon him as a native of Argos, who, after the flood of Deucalion, led the Argives from the mountains into the plains; and sometimes they regarded him as the leader of an Egyptian or Libyan colony, which settled on the banks of the Inachus.

INĀCHUS (Ἴναχος). 1. (Now Planitza or Zeria), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the mountain Lyrceus, on the borders of Arcadia, flows in a southeasterly direction, receives near Argos the Charadrus, and falls into the Sinus Argolicus south of Argos.—2. [Now Krikeli, or, according to Leake, Ariadha], a river in Acarnania, which rises in Mount Lacmon, in the range of Pindus, and falls into the Achelous.

INĂRĪME. Vid. ÆNARIA.

INĂROS (Ἰνάρως, occasionally Ἴναρος), son of Psammitichus, a chief of some Libyan tribes to the west of Egypt, commenced hostilities against the Persians, which ended in a revolt of the whole of Egypt, B.C. 461. In 460 Inaros called in the Athenians, who, with a fleet of two hundred galleys, were then off Cyprus: the ships sailed up to Memphis, and, occupying two parts of the town, besieged the third. In the same year Inaros defeated the Persians in a great battle, in which Achæmenes, the brother of the king Artaxerxes, was slain. But a new army, under a new commander, Megabyzus, was more successful. The Egyptians and their allies were defeated; and Inaros was taken by treachery and crucified, 455.

INDĬA (ἡ Ἰνδία: Ἰνδός, Indus) was a name used by the Greeks and Romans, much as the modern term East Indies, to describe the whole of the southeast part of Asia, to the east, south, and southeast of the great ranges of mountains now called the Soliman and Himalaya Mountains, including the two peninsulas of Hindustan, and of Burmah, Cochin-China, Siam, and Malacca, and also the islands of the Indian Archipelago. There is ample evidence that commercial intercourse was carried on, from a very early time, between the western coast of Hindustan and the western parts of Asia, by the way of the Persian Gulf, the Euphrates, and across the Syrian Desert to Phœnicia, and also by way of the Red Sea and Idumæa, both to Egypt and to Phœnicia; and so on from Phœnicia to Asia Minor and Europe. The direct acquaintance of the western nations with India dates from the reign of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, who added to the Persian empire a part of its northwest regions, perhaps only as far as the Indus, certainly not beyond the limits of the Punjab; and the slight knowledge of the country thus obtained by the Persians was conveyed to the Greeks through the inquiries of travellers, especially Herodotus, and afterward by those Greeks who resided for some time in the Persian empire, such as CTESIAS, who wrote a special work on India (Ἰνδικά). The expedition of ALEXANDER into India first brought the Greeks into actual contact with the country; but the conquests of Alexander only extended within Scinde and the Punjab, as far as the River HYPHASIS, down which he sailed into the Indus, and down the Indus to the sea. The Greek king of Syria, Seleucus Nicator, crossed the Hyphasis, and made war with the Prasii, a people dwelling on the banks of the upper Ganges, to whom he afterward sent ambassadors, named Megasthenes and Daimachus, who lived for several years at Palibothra, the capital of the Prasii, and had thus the opportunity of obtaining much information respecting the parts of India about the Ganges. Megasthenes composed a work on India, which appears to have been the chief source of all the accurate information contained in the works of later writers. After the death of Seleucus Nicator, B.C. 281, the direct intercourse of the Western nations with India, except in the way of commerce, ceased almost entirely; and whatever new information the later writers obtained was often very erroneous. Meanwhile, the foundation of Alexandrea had created an extensive commerce between India and the West, by way of the Indian Ocean, the Red Sea, and Egypt, which made the Greeks better acquainted with the western coast of the peninsula, and extended their knowledge further into the Eastern seas; but the information they thus obtained of the countries beyond Cape Comorin was extremely vague and scanty. Another channel of information, however, was opened, during this period, by the establishment of the Greek kingdom of Bactria, to which a considerable part of Northern India appears to have been subject. The later geographers made two great divisions of India, which are separated by the Ganges, and are called India intra Gangem and India extra Gangem, the former including the peninsula of Hindustan, the latter the Burmese peninsula. They were acquainted with the division of the people of Hindustan into castes, of which they enumerate seven. It is not necessary, for our object, to mention the other particulars which they relate concerning India and its people.

INDIBĬLIS and MANDONĬUS, two brothers, and chiefs of the Spanish tribe of the Ilergetes, who played an important part in the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Spain during the second Punic war. For some years they were faithful allies of the Carthaginians; but in consequence of the generous treatment which the wife of Mandonius and the daughters of Indibilis received from P. Scipio when they fell into his hands, the two brothers deserted the Carthaginian cause, and joined Scipio in 209 with all the forces of their nation. But in 206, the illness and reported death of Scipio gave them hopes of shaking off the yoke of Rome, and they excited a general revolt not only among their own subjects, but the neighboring Celtiberian tribes also. They were defeated by Scipio, and upon sueing for forgiveness were pardoned. But when Scipio left Spain in the next year (205), they again revolted. The Roman generals whom Scipio had left in Spain forthwith marched against them; Indibilis was slain in battle, and Mandonius was taken and afterward and put to death.

INDIGĔTAE or INDIGETES, a people in the northeast corner of Hispania Tarraconensis, close upon the Pyrenees. Their chief town was EMPORIUM.

INDĬCUS OCĔĂNUS. Vid. ERYTHRÆUM MARE.

INDIGĔTES, the name of those indigenous gods and heroes at Rome, who once lived on earth as mortals, and were worshipped after their death as gods, such as Janus, Picus, Faunus, Æneas, Evander, Hercules, Latinus, Romulus, and others. Thus Æneas, after his disappearance on the banks of the Numicus, became a deus Indiges, pater Indiges, or Jupiter Indiges; and in like manner, Romulus became Quirinus, and Latinus Jupiter Latiaris. The Indigetes are frequently mentioned together with the Lares and Penates; and many writers connect the Indigetes with those divinities to whom a share in the foundation of the Latin and Roman state is ascribed, such as Mars, Venus, Vesta, &c.

INDUS or SINDUS (Ἰνδός: now Indus, Sind), a great river of India, rises in the table-land of Thibet, north of the Himalaya Mountains, flows nearly parallel to the great bend of that chain on its northern side, till it breaks through the chain a little east of Attock, in the northwest corner of the Punjab, and then flows southwest through the great plain of the Punjab into the Erythræum Mare (now Indian Ocean), which it enters by several mouths, two according to the earlier Greek writers, six according to the later. Its chief tributaries are the Cophen (now Cabul), which enters it from the northwest at Attock, and the Acesines on the east side. Vid. HYPHASIS. Like the Nile, the Indus overflows its banks, but with a much less fertilizing result, as the country about its lower course is for the most part a sandy desert, and the deposit it brings down is much less rich than that of the Nile. The erroneous notions of the early Greeks respecting the connection between the southeastern parts of the continents of Africa and Asia, led to a confusion between the Indus and the Nile; but this and other mistakes were corrected by the voyage of Alexander's fleet down the Hyphasis and the Indus. The ancient name of India was derived from the native name of the Indus (now Sind).

INDUS (Ἰνδός: now Dollomon-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rising in the southwest of Phrygia, and flowing through the district of Cibyratis and the southeastern corner of Caria into the Mediterranean, opposite to Rhodes.

INDUTIOMĂRUS or INDUCIOMĂRUS, one of the leading chiefs of the Treviri in Gaul. As he was opposed to the Romans, Cæsar induced the leading men of the nation to side with Cingetorix, the son-in-law but rival of Indutiomarus, B.C. 54. Indutiomarus, in consequence, took up arms against the Romans, but was defeated and slain by Labienus.

INESSA. Vid. ÆTNA, No. 2.

INFĔRI, the gods of the Nether World, in contradistinction from the Superi, or the gods of heaven. In Greek the Inferi are called οἱ κάτω, οἱ χθόνιοι, οἱ ὑπὸ γαῖαν, οἱ ἔνερθε, or οἱ ὑπένερθε θεοί; and the Superi, οἱ ἄνω, ὕπατοι and οὐράνιοι. But the word Inferi is also frequently used to designate the dead, in contradistinction from those living upon the earth; so that apud inferos is equivalent to "in Hades," or "in the lower world." The Inferi therefore comprise all the inhabitants of the lower world, the gods, viz., Hades or Pluto, his wife Persephone (Proserpina), the Erinnyes or Furies, and others, as well as the souls of departed men. The gods of the lower world are treated of in separate articles.

INGENŬUS, one of the Thirty Tyrants, was governor of Pannonia when Valerian set out upon his campaign against the Persians, A.D. 258. He assumed the purple in his province, but was defeated and slain by Gallienus.

[INGUIOMERUS, brother of Sigimer and of Arminius: he had been the adherent of Rome, but afterward joined the party of Arminius. After having served for some time with them, envy of the fame or power of Arminius led him to abandon the cause of the Cheruscans: at the head of his clients he deserted to the Suevians, with whom he was defeated by Arminius.]

INO (Ἰνώ), daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, and wife of Athamas. For details, vid. ATHAMAS.

INŌUS, a name both of Melicertes and of Palæmon, because they were the sons of Ino.

INSUBRES, a Gallic people, who crossed the Alps, and settled in Gallia Transpadana, in the north of Italy. Their chief town was MEDIOLANUM. Next to the Boii, they were the most powerful and warlike of the Gallic tribes in Cisalpine Gaul. They were conquered by the Romans shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war.

INTAPHERNES (Ἰνταφέρνης), one of the seven conspirators against the two Magi in Persia, B.C. 522. He was afterward put to death by Darius.

INTĔMĔLII, a people in Liguria, on the coast, whose chief town was ALBIUM INTEMELIUM.

INTERAMNA (Interamnas), the name of several towns in Italy, so called from their lying between two streams. 1. (Now Terni), an ancient municipium in Umbria, situated on the Nar, and surrounded by a canal flowing into this river, whence its inhabitants were called Interamnates Nartes. It was the birth-place of the historian Tacitus, as well as of the emperor of the same name.—2. A town in Latium, on the Via Latina, and at the junction of the Casinus with the Liris, whence its inhabitants are called Interamnates Lirinates. It was made a Roman colony B.C. 312, but subsequently sunk into insignificance.

INTERCATĬA, an important town of the Vaccæi in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Cæsaraugusta.

INTERCĪSA or PETRA PERTUSA, a town in Umbria, so called because a road was here cut through the rocks by order of Vespasian. An ancient inscription on the spot still commemorates this work.

INTERNUM MARE, the Mediterranean Sea, extended on the west from the Straits of Hercules, which separated it from the Atlantic, to the coasts of Syria and Asia Minor on the east. In the northeast it was usually supposed to terminate at the Hellespont. From the Straits of Hercules to the furthest shores of Syria it is two thousand miles in length; and, including the islands, it occupies an area of seven hundred and thirty-four thousand square miles. It was called by the Romans Mare Internum or Intestinum; by the Greeks, ἡ ἔσω θάλαττα or ἡ ἐντὸς θάλαττα, or more fully, ἡ ἐντὸς Ἡρακλείων στηλῶν θάλαττα, and by Herodotus ἥδε ἡ θάλαττα; and from its washing the coasts both of Greece and Italy, it was also called both by Greeks and Romans Our Sea (ἡ ἡμετέρα θάλαττα, ἡ καθ' ἡμᾶς θάλαττα, Mare Nostrum). The term Mare Mediterraneum is not used by the best classical writers, and occurs first in Solinus. Most of the ancients believed that the Mediterranean received its waters from the Atlantic, and poured them through the Hellespont and the Propontis into the Euxine; but others, on the contrary, maintained that the waters came from the Euxine into the Mediterranean. The ebb and flow of the tide are perceptible in only a few parts of the Mediterranean, such as in the Syrtes on the coast of Africa, in the Adriatic, &c. The different parts of the Mediterranean are called by different names, which are spoken of in separate articles. Vid. MARE TYRRHENUM or INFERUM, ADRIA or M. ADRIATĬCUM or M. SUPERUM, M. SICULUM, M. ÆGÆUM, &c.

[INTEROCREA (now Introdoco), a town of the Sabines in the interior of Samnium.]

INTONSUS, the Unshorn, a surname of Apollo and Bacchus, in allusion to the eternal youth of these gods, since the Greek youths allowed their hair to grow until they attained manhood.

INUI CASTRUM. Vid. CASTRUM, No. 1.

INȲCUM (Ἴνυκον or -ος: Ἰνυκῖνος: now Calda Bellota?), a small town in the south of Sicily, not far from Selinus, on the River Hypsas.

IO (Ἰώ), daughter of Inachus, the first king of Argos, or, according to others, of Iasus or Piren. Jupiter (Zeus) loved Io, but, on account of Juno's (Hera) jealousy, he metamorphosed her into a white heifer. The goddess, who was aware of the change, obtained the heifer from Jupiter (Zeus), and placed her under the care of Argus Panoptes; but Jupiter (Zeus) sent Mercury (Hermes) to slay Argus and deliver Io. Vid. ARGUS. Juno (Hera) then tormented Io with a gad-fly, and drove her in a state of phrensy from land to land over the whole earth, until at length she found rest on the banks of the Nile. Here she recovered her original form, and bore a son to Jupiter (Zeus) called Epaphus. Vid. EPAPHUS. This is the common story, which appears to be very ancient, since Homer constantly gives the epithet of Argiphontes (the slayer of Argus) to Mercury (Hermes). The wanderings of Io were very celebrated in antiquity, and were extended and embellished with the increase of geographical knowledge. Of these there is a full account in the Prometheus of Æschylus. The Bosporus is said to have derived its name from her swimming across it. According to some traditions Io married Telegonus, king of Egypt, and was afterward identified with Isis. The legend of Io is difficult to explain. It appears that Io was identical with the moon, which is probably signified by her being represented as a woman, with the horns of a heifer. Her connection with Egypt seems to be an invention of later times, and was probably suggested by the resemblance which was found to exist between the Argive Io and the Egyptian Isis.

IŏBĀTES, king of Lycia. Vid. BELLEROPHON.

IOL. Vid. CÆSAREA, No. 4.

IOLAENSES. Vid. IOLAUS.

IOLĀUS (Ἰόλαος) son of Iphicles and Automedusa. Iphicles was the half-brother of Hercules, and Iolaus was the faithful companion and charioteer of the hero. Vid. HERCULES. He assisted Hercules in slaying the Lernæan Hydra. After Hercules had instituted the Olympic games, Iolaus won the victory with the horses of his master. Hercules sent him to Sardinia at the head of his sons whom he had by the daughters of Thespius. He introduced civilization among the inhabitants of that island, and was worshipped by them. From Sardinia he went to Sicily, and then returned to Hercules shortly before the death of the latter. After the death of the hero, Iolaus was the first who offered sacrifices to him as a demigod. According to Pausanias, Iolaus died in Sardinia, whereas, according to others, he was buried in the tomb of his grandfather, Amphitryon. His descendants in Sardinia were called Ἰολαεῖς and Iolaensis. Vid. SARDINIA. Iolaus, after his death, obtained permission from the gods of the nether world to come to the assistance of the children of Hercules. He slew Eurystheus, and then returned to the shades.

IOLCUS (Ἰωλκός, Ep. Ἰαωλκός, Dor. Ἰαλκός: Ἰώλκιος), an ancient town in Magnesia in Thessaly, at the top of the Pegasæan Gulf, seven stadia from the sea. It is said to have been founded by the mythical Cretheus, and to have been colonized by Minyans from Orchomenus. It was celebrated in mythology as the residence of Pelias and Jason, and as the place from which the Argonauts sailed in quest of the golden fleece. At a later time it fell into decay, and its inhabitants were removed to the neighboring town of Demetrias, which was founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes.

IŏLE (Ἰόλη), daughter of Eurytus of Œchalia, was beloved by Hercules. For details, vid. p. 359, a. After the death of Hercules, she married his son Hyllus.

IOLLAS or IOLĀUS (Ἰόλλας or Ἰόλαος). 1. Son of Antipater, and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He was cup-bearer to Alexander at the period of his last illness. Those wri who adopt the idea of the king having b poisoned, represent Iollas as the person who tually administered the fatal draught.—2. Of thynia, a writer on materia medica, flourished the third century B.C.

ION (Ἴων). 1. The fabulous ancestor of Ionians, is described as the son of Apollo Creusa, the daughter of Erechtheus and w of Xuthus. The most celebrated story ab Ion is the one which forms the subject of Ion of Euripides. Apollo had visited Creusa a cave below the Propylæa, at Athens; when she gave birth to a son, she exposed h in the same cave. The god, however, had child conveyed to Delphi, where he was ed cated by a priestess. Some time afterwa Xuthus and Creusa came to consult the orac about the means of obtaining an heir. Th received for answer that the first human bei which Xuthus met on leaving the temple sh be his son. Xuthus met Ion, and acknowledge him as his son; but Creusa, imagining him be a son of her husband by a former mistre caused a cup to be presented to the you which was filled with the poisonous blood of dragon. However, her object was discovered for as Ion, before drinking, poured out a libation to the gods, a pigeon which drank of it died on the spot. Creusa thereupon fled to the altar of the god. Ion dragged her away, and was on the point of killing her, when a priestess interfered, explained the mystery, and showed that Ion was the son of Creusa. Mother and son thus became reconciled, but Xuthus was not let into the secret. Among the inhabitants of the Ægialus, i. e., the northern coast of Peloponnesus, who were Ionians, there was another tradition current. Xuthus, when expelled from Thessaly, came to the Ægialus. After his death Ion was on the point of marching against the Ægialeans, when their king Selinus gave him his daughter Helice in marriage. On the death of Selinus, Ion succeeded to the throne, and thus the Ægialeans received the name of Ionians, and the town of Helice was built in honor of Ion's wife. Other traditions represent Ion as king of Athens between the reigns of Erechtheus and Cecrops; for it is said that his assistance was called in by the Athenians in their war with the Eleusinians, that he conquered Eumolpus, and then became king of Athens. He there became the father of four sons, Geleon, Ægicores, Argades, and Hoples, whose names were given to the four Athenian classes. After his death he was buried at Potamus.—2. Of Chios, son of Orthomenes, was a celebrated tragic poet. He went to Athens when young, and there enjoyed the society of Æschylus and Cimon. The number of his tragedies is variously stated at twelve, thirty, and forty. We have the titles and a few fragments of eleven. Ion also wrote other kinds of poetry, and prose works both in history and philosophy. [The fragments of his tragedies are contained in Wagner's Fragm. Trag. Græc., p. 21–36.]—3. Of Ephesus, a rhapsodist in the time of Socrates, from whom one of Plato's dialogues is named.

IŏNĬA (Ἰωνία: Ἴωνες) and IŏNIS (Rom. poet) a district on the western coast of Asia Minor

v. called from the Ionian Greeks who colonized it at a time earlier than any distinct historical records. The mythical account of "the great Ionic migration" relates that in consequence of the disputes between the sons of Codrus, king of Athens, about the succession to his government, his younger sons, Neleus and Androclus, resolved to seek a new home beyond the Ægean Sea. Attica was at the time overpeopled by numerous exiles, whom the great revolution, known as "the return of the Heraclidæ," had driven out of their own states, the chief of whom were the Ionians who had been expelled from Peloponnesus by the Dorian invaders. A large portion of this superfluous population went forth as Athenian colonists, under the leadership of Androclus and Neleus, and of other chieftains of other races, and settled on that part of the western shores of Asia Minor, which formed the coast of Lydia and part of Caria, and also in the adjacent islands of Chios and Samos, and in the Cyclades. The mythical chronology places this great movement one hundred and forty years after the Trojan war, or sixty years after the return of the Heraclidæ, that is, in B.C. 1060, or 1044, according to the two chief dates imagined for the Trojan war. Passing from mythology to history, the earliest authentic records show us the existence of twelve great cities on the abovenamed coast, claiming to be (though some of them only partially) of Ionic origin, and all united into one confederacy, similar to that of the twelve ancient Ionian cities on the northern coast of the Peloponnesus. The district they possessed formed a narrow strip of coast, extending between, and somewhat beyond, the mouths of the rivers Mæander on the south, and Hermus on the north. The names of the twelve cities going from south to north, were MILETUS, MYUS, PRIENE, SAMOS (city and island), EPHESUS, COLOPHON, LEBEDUS, TEOS, ERYTHRÆ, CHIOS (city and island), CLAZOMENÆ, and PHOCÆA; the first three on the coast of Caria, the rest on that of Lydia: the city of Smyrna, which lay within this district, but was of Æolic origin, was afterward (about B.C. 700) added to the Ionian confederacy. The common sanctuary of the league was the Panionium (πανιώνιον), a sanctuary of Neptune (Poseidon) Heliconius, on the northern side of the promontory of Mycale, opposite to Samos; and here was held the great national assembly (πανήγυρις) of the confederacy, called Panionia (πανιώνια: vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.). It is very important to observe that the inhabitants of these cities were very far from being exclusively and purely of Ionian descent. The traditions of the original colonization and the accounts of the historians agree in representing them as peopled by a great mixture, not only of Hellenic races, but also of these with the earlier inhabitants, such as Carians, Leleges, Lydians, Cretans, and Pelasgians; their dialects, Herodotus expressly tells us, were very different, and nearly all of them were founded on the sites of pre-existing native settlements. The religious rites, also, which the Greeks of Ionia observed, in addition to their national worship of Neptune (Poseidon), were borrowed in part from the native communities; such were the worship of Apollo Didymæus at Branchidæ near Miletus, of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, and of Apollo Clarius at Colophon. All these facts point to the conclusion that the Greek colonization of this coast was effected, not by one, but by successive emigrations from different states, but chiefly of the Ionic race. The central position of this district, its excellent harbors, and the fertility of its plains, watered by the Mæander, the Cayster, and the Hermus, combined with the energetic character of the Ionian race to confer a high degree of prosperity upon these cities; and it was not long before they began to send forth colonies to many places on the shores of the Mediterranean and the Euxine, and even to Greece itself. During the rise of the Lydian empire, the cities of Ionia preserved their independence until the reign of Crœsus, who subdued those on the main land, but relinquished his design of attacking the islands. When Cyrus had overthrown Crœsus, he sent his general Harpagus to complete the conquest of the Ionic Greeks, B.C. 557. Under the Persian rule they retained their political organization, subject to the government of the Persian satraps, and of tyrants who were set up in single cities, but they were required to render tribute and military service to the king. In B.C. 500 they revolted from Darius Hystaspis, under the leadership of HISTIÆUS, the former tyrant of Miletus, and his brother-in-law ARISTAGORAS, and supported by aid from the Athenians. The Ionian army advanced as far as Sardis, which they took and burned, but they were driven back to the coast, and defeated near Ephesus, B.C. 499. The re-conquest of Ionia by the Persians was completed by the taking of Miletus in 496, and the Ionians were compelled to furnish ships, and to serve as soldiers in the two expeditions against Greece. After the defeat of Xerxes, the Greeks carried the war to the coasts of Asia, and effected the liberation of Ionia by the victories of Mycale (479) and of the Eurymedon (469). In 387 the peace of Antalcidas restored Ionia to Persia; and after the Macedonian conquest, it formed part, successively, of the kingdom of Pergamus, and of the Roman province of Asia. For the history of the several cities, see the respective articles. In no country inhabited by the Hellenic race, except at Athens, were the refinements of civilization, the arts, and literature, more highly cultivated than in Ionia. The restless energy and free spirit of the Ionic race, the riches gained by commerce, and the neighborhood of the great seats of Asiatic civilization, combined to advance with rapidity the intellectual progress and the social development of its people; but these same influences, unchecked by the rigid discipline of the Doric race, or the simple earnestness of the Æolic, imbued their social life with luxury and licence, and invested their works of genius with the hues of enchanting beauty at the expense of severe good taste and earnest purpose. Out of the long list of the authors and artists of Ionia, we may mention Mimnermus of Colophon, the first poet of the amatory elegy; Anacreon of Teos, who sang of love and wine to the music of the lyre; Thales of Miletus, Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, and several other early philosophers; the early annalists, Cadmus, Dionysius, and Hecatæus, all of Miletus; and, in the fine arts, besides being the home of that exquisitely beautiful order of architecture, the Ionic, and possessing many of the most magnificent temples in the world, Ionia was the native country of that refined school of painting, which boasted the names of Zeuxis, Apelles, and Parrhasius. The most flourishing period in the history of Ionia is that during which it was subject to Persia; but its prosperity lasted till the decline of the Roman empire, under which its cities were among the chief resorts of the celebrated teachers of rhetoric and philosophy. The important place which some of the chief cities of Ionia occupy in the early history of Christianity is attested by the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of St. Paul to the Ephesians, and of St. John to the seven churches of Asia.

Iŏnĭum Mare (Ἰόνιος πόντος, Ἰόνιον πέλαγος, Ἰονίη θάλαττα, Ἰόνιος πόρος), a part of the Mediterranean Sea between Italy and Greece, was south of the Adriatic, and began on the west at Hydruntum in Calabria, and on the east at Oricus in Epirus, or at the Ceraunian Mountains. In more ancient times the Adriatic was called Ἰόνιος μύχος or Ἰόνιος κόλπος; while at a later time the Ionium Mare itself was included in the Adriatic. In its widest signification, the Ionium Mare included the Mare Siculum, Creticum, and Icarium. Its name was usually derived by the ancients from the wanderings of Io, but it was more probably so called from the Ionian colonies, which settled in Cephallenia and the other islands off the western coasts of Greece.

[Iŏpas, a bard at the court of Queen Dido, who is represented by Virgil as singing at the entertainment given by the queen to Æneas.]

Iŏphon (Ἰοφῶν), son of Sophocles by Nicostrate, was a distinguished tragic poet. He brought out tragedies during the life of his father, and was still flourishing B.C. 405, the year in which Aristophanes brought out the Frogs. For the celebrated story of his undutiful charge against his father, vid. Sophocles.

[Ios (Ἴος, now Nio), a small island in the cluster of the Sporades, south of Naxos, said to have contained the tomb of Homer.]

[Ioxus (Ἴοξος), son of Melanippus, grandson of Theseus, leader of a colony to Caria.]

[Ipheus (Ἰφεύς), a Lycian warrior, slain by Patroclus.]

[Iphianassa (Ἰφιάνασσα). 1. Daughter of Prœtus. Vid. Prœtus.—2. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytæmnestra, same as Iphigenia.]

Iphĭas (Ἰφιάς), i. e., Evadne, a daughter of Iphis, and wife of Capaneus.

Iphicles, or Iphiclus (Ἰφικλῆς, Ἴφικλος, or Ἰφικλεύς). 1. Son of Amphitryon and Alcmene of Thebes, was one night younger than his half-brother Hercules. He was first married to Automedusa, the daughter of Alcathous, by whom he became the father of Iolaus, and afterward to the youngest daughter of Creon. He accompanied Hercules on several of his expeditions, and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. He fell in battle against the sons of Hippocoon, or, according to another account, was wounded in the battle against the Molionidæ, and was carried to Pheneus, where he died.—2. Son of Thestius by Laophonte, or Deïdamia, or Eurythemis, or Leucippe. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the expedition of the Argonauts.—3. Son of Phylacus, and grandson of Deion and Clymene, or son of Cephalus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. He was married to Diomedia or Astyoche, and was the father of Podarces and Protesilaus. He was also one of the Argonauts; and he possessed large herds of oxen, which he gave to the seer Melampus. He was also celebrated for his swiftness in running.

Iphicrătes (Ἰφικράτης), the famous Athenian general, was the son of a shoemaker. He distinguished himself at an early age by his gallantry in battle; and in B.C. 394, when he was only twenty-five years of age, he was appointed by the Athenians to the command of the forces which they sent to the aid of the Bœotians after the battle of Coronea. In 393 he commanded the Athenian forces at Corinth, and at the same time introduced an important improvement in military tactics, the formation of a body of targeteers (πελτασταί), possessing, to a certain extent, the advantages of heavy and light-armed forces. This he effected by substituting a small target for the heavy shield, adopting a longer sword and spear, and replacing the old coat of mail by a linen corslet. At the head of his targeteers he defeated and nearly destroyed a Spartan Mora in the following year (392), an exploit which became very celebrated throughout Greece. In the same year he was succeeded in the command at Corinth by Chabrias. In 389 he was sent to the Hellespont to oppose Anaxibius, who was defeated by him and slain in the following year. On the peace of Antalcidas in 387, Iphicrates went to Thrace to assist Seuthes, king of the Odrysæ, but he soon afterward formed an alliance with Cotys, who gave him his daughter in marriage. In 377 Iphicrates was sent by the Athenians, with the command of a mercenary force, to assist Pharnabazus in reducing Egypt to subjection; but the expedition failed through a misunderstanding between Iphicrates and Pharnabazus. In 373 Iphicrates was sent to Corcyra, in conjunction with Callistratus and Chabrias, in the command of an Athenian force, and he remained in the Ionian Sea till the peace of 371 put an end to hostilities. About 367 he was sent against Amphipolis, and after carrying on the war against this place for three years, was superseded by Timotheus. Shortly afterward, he assisted his father-in-law Cotys in his war against Athens for the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus. But his conduct in this matter was passed over by the Athenians. After the death of Chabrias (375), Iphicrates, Timotheus, and Menestheus were joined with Chares as commanders in the Social war, and were prosecuted by their unscrupulous colleague, because they had refused to risk an engagement in a storm. Iphicrates was acquitted. From the period of his trial he seems to have lived quietly at Athens. He died before 348. Iphicrates has been commended for his combined prudence and energy as a general. The worst words, he said, that a commander could utter were, "I should not have expected it." His services were highly valued by the Athenians, and were rewarded by them with almost unprecedented honors.

[IPHIDĂMAS (Ἰφιδάμας), son of Antenor and Theano, brother of Coon, came with twelve ships from Thrace to the assistance of the Trojans: was slain, together with his brother, by Agamemnon.]

IPHIGENĪA (Ἰφιγένεια), according to the most common tradition, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytæmnestra, but according to others, a daughter of Theseus and Helena, and brought up by Clytæmnestra as a foster-child. Agamemnon had once killed a stag in the grove of Diana (Artemis); or he had boasted that the goddess herself could not hit better; or he had vowed in the year in which Iphigenia was born to sacrifice the most beautiful production of that year, but had afterward neglected to fulfill his vow. One of these circumstances is said to have been the cause of the calm which detained the Greek fleet in Aulis when the Greeks wanted to sail against Troy. The seer Calchas declared that the sacrifice of Iphigenia was the only means of propitiating Diana (Artemis). Agamemnon was obliged to yield, and Iphigenia was brought to Chalcis under the pretext of being married to Achilles. When Iphigenia was on the point of being sacrificed, Diana (Artemis) carried her in a cloud to Tauris, where she became the priestess of the goddess, and a stag was substituted for her by Diana (Artemis). While Iphigenia was serving Diana (Artemis) as priestess in Tauris, her brother Orestes and his friend Pylades came to Tauris to carry off the image of the goddess at this place, which was believed to have fallen from heaven. As strangers, they were to be sacrificed in the temple of Diana (Artemis); but Iphigenia recognized her brother, and fled with him and the statue of the goddess. In the mean time, Electra, another sister of Orestes, had heard that he had been sacrificed in Tauris by the priestess of Diana (Artemis). At Delphi she met Iphigenia, who, she supposed, had murdered Orestes. She therefore resolved to deprive Iphigenia of her sight, but was prevented by the interference of Orestes; and a scene of recognition took place. All now returned to Mycenæ; but Iphigenia carried the statue of Diana (Artemis) to the Attic town of Brauron, near Marathon. She there died as priestess of the goddess. As a daughter of Theseus, Iphigenia was connected with the heroic families of Attica, and after her death the veils and most costly garments which had been worn by women who had died in childbirth were dedicated to her. According to some traditions, Iphigenia never died, but was changed by Diana (Artemis) into Hecate, or was endowed by the goddess with immortality and eternal youth, and under the name of Orzochia became the wife of Achilles in the island of Leuce. The Lacedæmonians maintained that the image of Diana (Artemis), which Iphigenia and Orestes had carried away from Tauris, was preserved in Sparta and not in Attica, and was worshipped in the former place under the name of Diana (Artemis) Orthia. Both in Attica and in Sparta human sacrifices were offered to Iphigenia in early times. In place of these human sacrifices the Spartan youths were afterward scourged at the festival of Diana (Artemis) Orthia. It appears probable that Iphigenia was originally the same as Diana (Artemis) herself.

IPHIMĔDĪA or IPHIMĔDE (Ἰφιμέδεια, Ἰφιμέδη), daughter of Triops, and wife of Aloeus. Being in love with Neptune (Poseidon), she often walked on the sea-shore, and collected its waters in her lap, whence she became, by Neptune (Poseidon), the mother of the Aloīdæ, Otus and Ephialtes. While Iphimedia and her daughter Pancratis were celebrating the orgies of Bacchus (Dionysus) on Mount Drius, they were carried off by Thracian Pirates to Naxos or Strongyle; but they were delivered by the Aloīdæ.

[IPHIMĔDON (Ἰφιμέδων), a son of Eurystheus slain in battle in the attempt to repel the invasion of Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ.]

[IPHĬNŎUS (Ἰφίνοος), son of Dexius, a Greek slain by the Lycian Glaucus before Troy.]

IPHIS (Ἶφις). 1. Son of Alector, and father of Eteoclus and Evadne, the wife of Capaneus was king of Argus. He advised Polynices to give the celebrated necklace of Harmonia to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband Amphiaraus to take part in the expedition against Thebes. He lost his two children, and therefore left his kingdom to Sthenelus, son of Capaneus. —2. Son of Sthenelus, and brother of Eurystheus, was one of the Argonauts who fell in the battle with Æetes.—3. A youth in love with Anaxarete. Vid. ANAXARETE.—4. Daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Phæstus in Crete. She was brought up as a boy, on the advice of Isis, because her father, previous to her birth, had ordered the child to be killed if it should be a girl. When Iphis had grown up, and was to be betrothed to Ianthe, she was metamorphosed by Isis into a youth.—[5. Daughter of Enyeus of Scyrus, celebrated for her beauty, presented by Achilles to Patroclus.]

[IPHITION (Ἰφιτίων), son of Otrynteus and a Naiad, came from Hyde, at the foot of Tmolus in Lydia, to the Trojan war; slain by Achilles.]

IPHĬTUS (Ἴφιτος) 1. Son of Eurytus of Œchalia, one of the Argonauts, was afterward killed by Hercules. (For details, vid. p. 358, b, 359, a.) —2. Son of Naubolus, and father of Schedius, Epistrophus, and Eurynome, in Phocis, likewise one of the Argonauts.—3. Son of Hæmon, or Praxonides, or Iphitus, king of Elis, restored the Olympic games, and instituted the cessation of all war during their celebration, B.C. 884.

[IPHTHĪME (Ἰφθίμη), daughter of Icarius, sister of Penelope; under her form Minerva appeared to Penelope to console her when disquieted at the departure of Telemachus from Ithaca.]

IPSUS (Ἶψος), a small town in Great Phrygia, celebrated in history as the scene of the decisive battle which closed the great contest between the generals of Alexander for the succession to his empire, and in which Antigonus was defeated and slain, B.C. 301. Vid. ANTIGONUS. The site is unknown, but it appears to have been about the centre of Phrygia, not far from SYNNADA.

IRA (Εἶρα, Ἰρά), a mountain fortress in Messenia, memorable as the place where Aristom ense defended himself for eleven years against the Spartans. Its capture by the Spartans in B.C. 668 put an end to the second Messenian war. It is doubtful whether it is the same as Ira (Il., ix., 150), one of the seven cities which Agamemnon promised to Achilles.

IRENÆUS (Εἰρηναῖος), one of the early Christian fathers, was probably born at Smyrna between A.D. 120 and 140. In his early youth he heard Polycarp. He afterward went to Gaul, and in 177 succeeded Pothinus as bishop of Lyon. He made many converts from heathenism, and was most active in opposing the Gnostics, especially the Valentinians. He seems to have lived till about the end of the second century. The only work of Irenæus now extant, Adversus Hæreses, is intended to refute the Gnostics. The original Greek is lost, with the exception of a few fragments, but the work exists in a barbarous but ancient Latin version. Edited by Grabe, Oxon., 1702; [and by Stieren, Leipzig, 1848, seqq., 2 vols. 8vo.]

IRĒNE (Εἰρήνη), called PAX by the Romans, the goddess of peace, was, according to Hesiod, a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, and one of the Horæ. Vid. HORÆ. After the victory of Timotheus over the Lacedæmonians, altars were erected to her at Athens at the public expense. Her statue at Athens stood by the side of that of Amphiaraus, carrying in its arms Plutus, the god of wealth, and another stood near that of Hestia in the Prytaneum. At Rome, where peace was also worshipped as a goddess, she had a magnificent temple, which was built by the Emperor Vespasian. Pax is represented on coins as a youthful female, holding in her left arm a cornucopia, and in her right hand an olive-branch or the staff of Mercury. Sometimes she appears in the act of burning a pile of arms, or carrying corn-ears in her hand or upon her head.

IRIS (Ἶρις), daughter of Thaumas (whence she is called Thaumantias) and of Electra, and sister of the Harpies. In the Iliad she appears as the messenger of the gods, especially of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera). In the Odyssey, Mercury (Hermes) is the messenger of the gods, and Iris is never mentioned. Iris appears to have been originally the personification of the rainbow, for this brilliant phenomenon in the skies, which vanishes as quickly as it appears, was regarded as the swift messenger of the gods. Some poets describe Iris as the rainbow itself, but other writers represent the rainbow as only the road on which Iris travels, and which therefore appears whenever the goddess wants it, and vanishes when it is no longer needed. In the earlier poets Iris appears as a virgin goddess, but in the later she is the wife of Zephyrus and the mother of Eros. Iris is represented in works of art dressed in a long and wide tunic, over which hangs a light upper garment, with wings attached to her shoulders, carrying the herald's staff in her left hand, and sometimes also holding a pitcher.

IRIS (Ἶρις: now Yeshil-Irmak), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises on the northern side of the northernmost range of the Anti-Taurus, in the south of Pontus, and flows first west past Comana Pontica, then north to Amasia, where it turns to the east of Eupatoria (Megalopolis), where it receives the Lycus, and then flows north through the territory of Themiscyra into the Sinus Amisenus. Xenophon states its breadth at three plethra (three hundred feet).

IRUS (Ἶρος). 1. Son of Actor, and father of Eurydamas and Eurytion. He purified Peleus when the latter had murdered his brother; but during the chase of the Calydonian boar, Peleus unintentionally killed Eurytion, the son of Irus. Peleus endeavored to soothe him by offering him his flocks; but Irus would not accept them, and at the command of an oracle Peleus allowed them to run wherever they pleased. A wolf devoured the sheep, but was thereupon changed into a stone, which was shown, in later times, on the frontier between Locris and Phocis.—2. The well-known beggar of Ithaca. His real name was Arnæus, but he was called Irus because he was the messenger of the suitors of Penelope. He was slain by Ulysses.

IS (Ἴς: now Hit), a city on the south of Mesopotamia, eight days' journey from Babylon, on the western bank of the Euphrates, and upon a little river of the same name. In its neighborhood were the springs of asphaltus, from which was obtained the bitumen that was used, instead of mortar, in the walls of Babylon.

ISÆUS (Ἰσαῖος). 1. One of the ten Attic orators, was born at Chalcis, and came to Athens at an early age. He was instructed in oratory by Lysias and Isocrates. He was afterward engaged in writing judicial orations for others, and established a rhetorical school at Athens, in which Demosthenes is said to have been his pupil. It is further said that Isæus composed for Demosthenes the speeches against his guardians, or at least assisted him in the composition. We have no particulars of his life. He lived between B.C. 420 and 348. Isæus is said to have written sixty-four orations, but of these only eleven are extant. They all relate to questions of inheritance, and afford considerable information respecting this branch of the Attic law. The style of Isæus is clear and concise, and, at the same time, vigorous and powerful. His orations are contained in the collections of the Greek orators. Vid. DEMOSTHENES. There is a good separate edition by Schömann, Greifswald, 1831.—2. A sophist and rhetorician, a native of Assyria, taught at Rome in the time of the younger Pliny.

ISĂGŎRAS (Ἰσαγόρας), the leader of the oligarchical party at Athens, in opposition to Clisthenes, B.C. 510. He was expelled from Athens by the popular party, although supported by Cleomenes and the Spartans.

ISANDER (Ἴσανδρος), son of Bellerophon, killed by Mars (Ares) in the fight with the Solymi.

ISĂRA (now Isère), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, descends from the Graian Alps, flows west with a rapid stream, and flows into the Rhone north of Valentia. At its junction with the Rhone, Fabius Æmilianus defeated the Allobroges and Arverni, B.C. 121.

ISAURĬA (ἡ Ἰσαυρία, ἡ Ἰσαυρική), a district of Asia Minor, on the northern side of the Taurus, between Pisidia and Cilicia, of which the ancients knew little beyond the troublesome fact that its inhabitants, the Isauri (Ἴσαυροι), were daring robbers, whose incursions into the surrounding districts received only a temporary check from the victory over them, which gained for Lucius Servilius the surname of Isauricus (B.C. 75). Their chief city was called Isaura.

Isca. 1. (Now Axminster, or Bridport, or Exeter), the capital of the Damnonii or Dumnonii in the southwest of Britain.—2. (Now Cær Leon, at the mouth of the Usk), a town of the Silures in Britain, and the head-quarters of the Legio II. There are many Roman remains at Cær Leon. The word Leon is a corruption of Legio: Cær is the old Celtic name for "city."

Ischys. Vid. Æsculapius.

Isidōrus (Ἰσίδωρος). 1. Of Ægæ, a Greek poet of uncertain age, five of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology.—2. Of Charax, a geographical writer, who probably lived under the early Roman emperors. His work, Σταθμοὶ Παρθικοί, is printed in the edition of the minor geographers, by Hudson, Oxon., 1703.—3. Of Gaza, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, the friend of Proclus and Marinus, whom he succeeded as chief of the school.—4. Of Pelusium, a Christian exegetical writer, a native of Alexandrea, who spent his life in a monastery near Pelusium, of which he was the abbot. He died about A.D. 450. As many as two thousand and thirteen of his letters are extant. They are almost all expositions of Scripture. Published at Paris, 1638.—5. Bishop of Hispalis (now Seville) in Spain, from A.D. 600 to 636, one of the most learned men of his age, and an ardent cultivator of ancient literature. A great number of his works is still extant, but by far the most important of them is his Originum s. Etymologiarum Libri XX. This work is an Encyclopædia of Arts and Sciences, and treats of all subjects in literature, science, and religion, which were studied at that time. It was much used in the Middle Ages. Published in the Corpus Grammaticorum Veterum, Lindemann, Lips., 1833. A complete collection of the works of Isidorus was published by Arevali, Rom., 1797–1803, 7 vols. 4to.—6. Of Miletus, the elder and younger, were eminent architects in the reign of Justinian.

Isigŏnus (Ἰσίγονος), a Greek writer, of uncertain date, but who lived before the time of Pliny, wrote a work entitled Ἄπιστα, a few fragments of which are extant. Published in Westermann's Paradoxographi, Brunswick, 1839.

Isionda (Ἰσιόνδα: Ἰσιονδεύς, Isiondensis), a city of Pisidia in Asia Minor, east of the district of Cibyra, and five Roman miles northwest of Termessus. Mr. Fellows lately discovered considerable ruins twelve miles from Perge, which he supposes to be those of Isionda.

Isis (Ἶσις), one of the principal Egyptian divinities. The ideas entertained about her underwent very great changes in antiquity. She is described as the wife of Osiris and the mother of Horus. As Osiris, the god of the Nile, taught the people the use of the plough, so Isis invented the cultivation of wheat and barley, which were carried about in the processions at her festival. She was the goddess of the earth, which the Egyptians called their mother: whence she and Osiris were the only divinities that were worshipped by all the Egyptians. This simple and primitive notion of the Egyptians was modified at an early period through the influence of the East, with which Egypt came into contact, and at a later time through the influence of the Greeks. Thus Osiris and Isis came gradually to be considered as divinities of the sun and the moon. The Egyptian priests represented that the principal religious institutions of Greece came from Egypt; and, after the time of Herodotus, this belief became established among the learned men in Greece. Hence Isis was identified with Ceres (Demeter), and Osiris with Bacchus (Dionysus), and the sufferings of Isis were accordingly modified to harmonize with the mythus of the unfortunate Ceres (Demeter). As Isis was the goddess of the moon, she was also identified with Io. Vid. Io. The worship of Isis prevailed extensively in Greece. It was introduced into Rome in the time of Sulla; and though the senate made many attempts to suppress her worship, and ordered her temples to be destroyed, yet the new religious rites took deep root at Rome, and became very popular. In B.C. 43 the triumvirs courted the popular favor by building a new temple of Isis and Serapis. Augustus forbade any temples to be erected to Isis in the city; but this command was afterward disregarded; and under the early Roman emperors the worship of Isis and Serapis became firmly established. The most important temples of Isis at Rome stood in the Campus Martius, whence she was called Isis Campensis. The priests and servants of the goddess wore linen garments, whence she herself is called linigera. Those initiated in her mysteries wore in the public processions masks representing the heads of dogs. In works of art Isis appears in figure and countenance like Juno (Hera): she wears a long tunic, and her upper garment is fastened on her breast by a knot: her head is crowned with a lotus flower, and her right hand holds the sistrum. Her son Horus is often represented with her as a little naked boy, holding the fore-finger on the mouth, with a lotus flower on his head, and a cornucopia in his left hand. The German goddess Isis mentioned by Tacitus is probably the same as Hertha.

[Ismaris. Vid. Ismarus.]

Ismărus (Ἴσμαρος: Ἰσμάριος), a town in Thrace near Maronēa, situated on a mountain of the same name, which produced excellent wine. It is mentioned in the Odyssey as a town of the Cicones. Near it was the Lake Ismăris (Ἰσμαρίς) The poets frequently use the adjective Ismarius as equivalent to Thracian. Thus Ovid calls Tereus, king of Thrace, Ismarius tyrannus (Am., ii., 6, 7), and Polymnestor, king of Thrace, Ismarius rex (Met., xiii., 530).

Ismēne (Ἰσμήνη). 1. Daughter of Asopus, wife of Argus, and mother of Iasus and Io.—2. Daughter of Œdipus and Jocasta, and sister of Antigone.

Ismēnus (Ἰσμηνός), a small river in Bœotia, which rises in Mount Cithæron, flows through Thebes, and falls into the Lake Hylice. The brook Dirce, so celebrated in Theban story, flowed into the Ismenus. From this river Apollo was called Ismenius. His temple, the Ismenium, at which the festival of the Daphnephoria was celebrated, was situated outside the city. The river is said to have been originally called Ladon, and to have derived its subsequent name from Ismenus, a son of Asopus and Metope. According to other traditions, Ismenus was a son of Amphion and Niobe, who, when struck by the arrow of Apollo, leaped into a river near Thebes, which was hence called Ismenus.

Isŏcrătes ('Ισοκράτης). 1. One of the ten Attic orators, was the son of Theodorus, and was born at Athens B.C. 436. Theodorus was a man of wealth, and educated his son with the greatest care. Among his teachers were Tisias, Gorgias, Prodicus, and also Socrates. Since Isocrates was naturally timid, and of a weakly constitution, he did not come forward as a public speaker himself, but devoted himself to giving instruction in oratory, and writing orations for others. He first taught rhetoric in Chios, and afterward at Athens. At the latter place he met with great success, and gradually acquired a large fortune by his profession. He had one hundred pupils, every one of whom paid him one thousand drachmæ. He also derived a large income from the orations which he wrote for others; thus he received twenty talents for the speech which he composed for Nicocles, king of Cyprus. Although Isocrates took no part in public affairs, he was an ardent lover of his country; and, accordingly, when the battle of Chæronea had destroyed the last hopes of freedom, he put an end to his life, B.C. 338, at the age of ninety-eight. The school of Isocrates exercised the greatest influence upon the development of public oratory at Athens. No other rhetorician had so many disciples of celebrity. The language of Isocrates forms a great contrast with the natural simplicity of Lysias, as well as with the sublime power of Demosthenes. His style is artificial. The carefully-rounded periods, and the frequent application of figurative expressions, are features which remind us of the sophists. The immense care he bestowed upon the composition of his orations may be inferred from the statement that he was engaged for ten, or, according to others, fifteen years, upon his Panegyric oration alone. There were in antiquity sixty orations which went under the name of Isocrates, but they were not all recognized as genuine. Only twenty-one have come down to us. Of these, eight were written for the courts; all the others are political discourses, intended to be read by a large public. The most celebrated is his Panegyric oration, in which he shows what services Athens had rendered to Greece in every period of her history, and contends that she, and not Sparta, deserves the supremacy in Greece. The orations are printed in the collections of the Greek orators. The best separate edition is by Baiter and Sauppe, Turici, 1839.—[2. Of Apollonia, a disciple of the foregoing, enjoyed considerable reputation as an orator; the titles of five of his orations are mentioned, but none have come down to us. Some critics have ascribed to him the τέχνη ῥητορική, which was included among the works of Isocrates of Athens.]

Issa ('Ισσα), daughter of Macareus of Lesbos, and beloved by Apollo, from whom the Lesbian town of Issa is said to have received its name.

Issa (Issæus: now Lissa), a small island in the Adriatic Sea, with a town of the same name off the coast of Dalmatia, was colonized at an early period by Greeks. It was inhabited by a [illegible] race of sailors, whose barks (lembi Issaici) were much prized. The Issæi placed themselves under the protection of the Romans when they were attacked by the Illyrian queen Teuta, B.C. [illegible] and their town is spoken of as a place of importance in Cæsar's time.

Issĕdŏnes ('Ισσηδόνες), a Scythian tribe, [illegible] Scythia extra Imaum, the easternmost people with whom the Greeks of the time of Herodotus had any intercourse. Their country was [illegible] Great Tartary, near the Massagetæ, whom they resembled in their manners. They are represented as extending as far as the borders of Serica.

Issĭcus Sinus (ὁ 'Ισσικὸς κόλπος: now Gulf of Iskenderoon), the deep gulf at the northeast corner of the Mediterranean, between Cilicia and Syria, named after the town of Issus. Its width is about eight miles. The coast is [illegible] altered since ancient times.

Issōrĭa ('Ισσωρία), a surname of Diana (Artemis), derived from Mount Issorion, in Laconia, on which she had a sanctuary.

Issus ('Ισσός, also 'Ισσοί, Xen.: [illegible]), a city in the southeastern extremity of Cilicia, near the head of the Issicus Sinus, and at the northern front of the pass of Mons Amanus called the Syrian Gates; memorable for the great battle in which Alexander defeated Darius Codomannus (B.C. 333), which was fought in a narrow valley near the town. It was at that time large and flourishing, but its importance was much diminished by the foundation of Alexandrea in its neighborhood. Its exact site is doubtful.

Ister. Vid. Danubius.

Ister, a Greek historian, was at first a slave of Callimachus, and afterward his friend, and accordingly lived in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes (B.C. 247–222). He wrote a large number of works, the most important of which was an Atthis, or history of Attica. His fragments are published by C. and Th. Müller, Fragmenta Histor. Græc., vol. i., p. 418–427.

Istrĭa or Histrĭa, a peninsula at the northern extremity of the Adriatic, between the Sinus Tergestinus on the west and the Sinus Flanaticus on the east. It was separated from Venetia on the northwest by the River Timavus, and from Illyricum on the east by the River Arsia. Its inhabitants, the Istri or Histri, were a warlike Illyrian race, who carried on several wars with the Romans, till their final subjugation by the consul C. Claudius Pulcher, B.C. 177. Their chief towns were Tergeste and Pola. Istria was originally reckoned part of Illyricum, but from the time of Augustus it formed one of the divisions of Upper Italy. In consequence of its name, it was believed at one time that a branch of the River Ister (Danube) flowed into the Adriatic.

Istrŏpŏlis, Istros or Istrĭa ('Ιστρόπολις, 'Ιστρος, 'Ιστριή, Herod., ii., 33: now Istere), a town in Lower Mœsia, not far from the mouth of the Danube, and at a little distance from the coast, was a colony from Miletus.

[I[illegible]s ('Ισος), a natural son of Priam, who, with [illegible]phus, pastured their flocks on Mount Ida [illegible] were both captured by Achilles [illegible] were ransomed; afterward they were both slain by Agamemnon.]

ITĂLĬA (Ἰταλία), signified, from the time of Augustus, the country which we call Italy. It was bounded on the west by the Mare Ligusticum and Tyrrhenum, Tuscum or Inferum; on the south by the Mare Siculum or Ausonium; on the east by the Mare Adriaticum or Superum; and on the north by the Alps, which sweep round it in a semicircle, the River Varus (now Var, Varo) separating it on the northwest from Transalpine Gaul, and the River Arsia (now Arsa) on the northeast from Illyricum. The name Italia, however, was originally used to indicate a much more limited extent of country. Most of the ancients, according to their usual custom, derived the name from an ancient king Italus; but others, still more absurdly, connected it with the old Italian word Italus (in Oscan, vitlu or vitelu), an ox, because the country was rich in oxen! But there can be no doubt that Italia, or Vitalia, as it was also called, was the land of the Itali, Vitali, Vitelli, or Vituli, an ancient race, who are better known under the name of Siculi. This race was widely spread over the southern half of the peninsula, and may be said to have been bounded on the north by a line drawn from Mount Garganus on the east to Terracina on the west. The Greeks were ignorant of this wide extent of the name. According to them, Italia was originally only the southernmost part of what was afterward called Bruttium, and was bounded on the north by a line drawn from the Lametic to the Scylletic Gulf. They afterward extended the name to signify the whole country south of Posidonia on the west and Tarentum on the east. After the Romans had conquered Tarentum and the southern part of the peninsula, about B.C. 272, the name Italia had a still further extension given to it. It then signified the whole country subject to the Romans, from the Sicilian Straits as far north as the Arnus and the Rubico. The country north of these rivers continued to be called Gallia Cisalpina and Liguria down to the end of the republic. Augustus was the first who extended the name of Italia, so as to comprehend the whole of the basin of the Po and the southern part of the Alps, from the Maritime Alps to Pola in Istria, both inclusive. In the later times of the empire, when Maximian had transferred the imperial residence to Milan, the name Italia was again used in a narrower compass. As it had originally signified only the south of the country, so now it was restricted to the north, comprising the five provinces of Æmilia, Liguria, Flaminia, Venetia, and Istria. Besides Italia, the country was called by various other names, especially by the poets. These were HESPERIA, a name which the Greeks gave to it because it lay to the west of Greece, or HESPERIA MAGNA, to distinguish it from Spain (vid. HESPERIA), and SATURNIA, because Saturn was said to have once reigned in Latium. The names of separate parts of Italy were also applied by the poets to the whole country. Thus it was called ŒNOTRIA, originally the land of the Œnotri, in the country afterward called Bruttium and Lucania: AUSONIA, or OPICA, or OPICIA, originally the land of the Ausones or Ausonii, Opici or Osci, on the western coast, in the country afterward called Campania: TYRRHENIA, properly the land of the Tyrrheni, also on the western coast, north of Ausonia or Opica, and more especially in the country afterward called Etruria: IAPYGIA, properly the land of the Iapyges, on the eastern coast, in the country afterward called Calabria: and OMBRICA, the land of the Umbri, on the eastern coast, alongside of Etruria. Italy was never inhabited by one single race. It contained a great number of different races, who had migrated into the country at a very early period. The most ancient inhabitants were Pelasgians or Œnotrians, a branch of the same great race who originally inhabited Greece and the coasts of Asia Minor. They were also called Aborigines and Siculi, who, as we have already seen, were the same as the Vitali or Itali. At the time when Roman history begins, Italy was inhabited by the following races. From the mouth of the Tiber, between its right bank and the sea, dwelt the Etruscans, who extended as far north as the Alps. Alongside of these, between the left bank of the Tiber and the Adriatic, dwelt the Umbrians. To the south of the Etruscans were the Sacrani, Casci, or Prisci, Oscan tribes, who had been driven out of the mountains by the Sabines, had overcome the Pelasgian tribes of the Siculi, Aborigines, or Latins, and, uniting with these conquered people, had formed the people called Prisci Latini, subsequently simply Latini. South of these again, as far as the River Laus, were the Opici, who were also called Ausones or Aurunci, and to whom the Volsci, Sidicini, Saticuli, and Æqui also belonged. The south of the peninsula was inhabited by the Œnotrians, who were subsequently driven into the interior by the numerous Greek colonies founded along the coasts. South of the Umbrians, extending as far as Mount Garganus, dwelt the various Sabellian or Sabine tribes, the Sabines proper, the Peligni, Marsi, Marrucini, Vestini, and Hernici, from which tribes the warlike race of the Samnites subsequently sprung. From Mount Garganus to the southeastern extremity of the peninsula, the country was inhabited by the Daunians or Apulians, Peucetii, Messapii, and Sallentini. An account of these people is given in separate articles. They were all eventually subdued by the Romans, who became the masters of the whole of the peninsula. At the time of Augustus the following were the chief divisions of Italy, an account of which is also given in separate articles: I. UPPER ITALY, which extended from the Alps to the Rivers Macra on the west and Rubico on the east. It comprehended, 1. LIGURIA. 2. GALLIA CISALPINA. 3. VENETIA, including Carnia. 4. ISTRIA.—II. CENTRAL ITALY, sometimes called ITALIA PROPRIA (a term not used by the ancients), to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina or Upper Italy, and Magna Græcia or Lower Italy, extended from the Rivers Macra on the west and Rubico on the east, to the Rivers Silarus on the west and Frento on the east. It comprehended, 1. ETRURIA. 2. UMBRIA. 3 PICENUM. 4. SAMNIUM, including the country of the Sabini, Vestini, Marrucini, Marsi, Peligni, &c. 5. LATIUM. 6. CAMPANIA.—III. LOWER ITALY, or MAGNA GRÆCIA, included the remaining part of the peninsula, south of the Rivers

Silarus and Frento. It comprehended, 1. APULIA, including Calabria. 2. LUCANIA. 3. BRUTTIUM. Augustus divided Italy into the following eleven Regiones. 1. Latium and Campania. 2. The land of the Hirpini, Apulia and Calabria. 3. Lucania and Bruttium. 4. The land of the Frentani, Marrucini, Peligni, Marsi, Vestini, and Sabini, together with Samnium. 5. Picenum. 6. Umbria and the district of Ariminum, in what was formerly called Gallia Cisalpina. 7. Etruria. 8. Gallia Cispadana. 9. Liguria. 10. The eastern part of Gallia Transpadana, Venetia, Carnia, and Istria. 11. The western part of Gallia Transpadana. The leading features of the physical geography of Italy are so well described by a modern writer, that we can not do better than quote his words. "The mere plan-geography of Italy gives us its shape and the position of its towns; to these it may add a semicircle of mountains round the northern boundary, to represent the Alps; and another long line stretching down the middle of the country, to represent the Apennines. But let us carry this on a little further, and give life and harmony to what is at present at once lifeless and confused. Observe, in the first place, how the Apennine line, beginning from the southern extremity of the Alps, runs across Italy to the very edge of the Adriatic, and thus separates naturally the Italy proper of the Romans from Cisalpine Gaul. Observe, again, how the Alps, after running north and south where they divide Italy from France, turn then away to the eastward, running parallel to the Apennines, till they too touch the head of the Adriatic, on the confines of Istria. Thus between these two lines of mountains there is inclosed one great basin or plain; inclosed on three sides by mountains, open only on the east to the sea. Observe how widely it spreads itself out, and then see how well it is watered. One great river (the Po) flows through it in its whole extent; and this is fed by streams almost unnumbered, descending toward it on either side, from the Alps on one side, and from the Apennines on the other. Then, descending into Italy proper, we find the complexity of its geography quite in accordance with its manifold political divisions. It is not one simple central ridge of mountains, having a broad belt of level country on either side between it and the sea, nor yet is it a chain rising immediately from the sea on one side, like the Andes in South America, and leaving room therefore on the other side for wide plains of table-land, and for rivers with a sufficient length of course to become at last great and navigable. It is a back-bone, thickly set with spines of unequal length, some of them running out at regular distances parallel to each other, but others twisted so strangely that they often run for a long way parallel to the back-bone, or main ridge, and interlace with one another in a maze almost inextricable. And, as if to complete the disorder, in those spots where the spines of the Apennines, being twisted round, run parallel to the sea and to their own central chain, and thus leave an interval of plain between their bases and the Mediterranean, volcanic agency has broken up the space thus left with other and distinct groups of hills of its own creation, as in the case of Vesuvius and of the Alban hills near Rome. Speaking generally, then, Italy is made up of an infinite multitude of valleys pent in between high and steep hills, each forming a country to itself, and cut off by natural barriers from the others. Its several parts are isolated by nature, and no art of man can thoroughly unite them. Hence arises the romantic character of Italian scenery: the constant combination of a mountain outline, and all the wild features of a mountain country, with the wild vegetation of a southern climate in the valleys." More minute details respecting the physical features of the different parts of Italy are given in the articles on the separate provinces into which it is divided.

ITĂLĬCA. 1. (Now Sevilla la vieja, near Santiponce), a municipium in Hispania Bætica, on the western bank of the Bætis, northwest of Hispalis, was founded by Scipio Africanus in the second Punic war, who settled here some of his veterans. It was the birth-place of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian.—2. The name given to Corfinium by the Italian Socii during their war with Rome. Vid. CORFINIUM.

ITALĬCUS, SILĬUS. Vid. SILIUS.

ITĂLUS (Ἰταλός), an ancient king of the Pelasgians, Siculians, or Œnotrians, from whom Italy was believed to have derived its name. Some call him a son of Telegonus by Penelope.

ITĂNUS (Ἴτανος), a town on the eastern coast of Crete, near a promontory of the same name, founded by the Phœnicians.

ITHĂCA (Ἰθάκη: Ἰθακήσιος: now Thiaki), a small island in the Ionian Sea, celebrated as the birth-place of Ulysses, lies off the coast of Epirus, and is separated from Cephalonia by a channel about three or four miles wide. The island is about twelve miles long, and four in its greatest breadth. It is divided into two parts, which are connected by a narrow isthmus, not more than half a mile across. In each of these parts there is a mountain ridge of considerable height, the one in the north called Neritum (Νήριτον, now Anoi), and the one in the south Neium (Νήϊον, now Stefano). The city of Ithaca, the residence of Ulysses, was situated on a precipitous conical hill, now called Aeto, or "eagle's cliff," occupying the whole breadth of the isthmus mentioned above. The acropolis, or castle of Ulysses, crowned the extreme summit of the mountain, and is described by a modern traveller as "about as bleak and dreary a spot as can well be imagined for a princely residence." Hence Cicero (De Orat., i., 44) describes it, in asperrimis saxulis tanquam nidulum affixa. It is at the foot of Mount Neium, and is hence described by Telemachus as "Under-Neïum" (Ἰθάκης Ὑπονηΐου, Hom., Od., iii., 81). The walls of the ancient city are in many places well preserved. Ithaca is one of the seven Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain.

[ITHĂCUS (Ἴθακος), son of Pterelaus, a hero from whom Ithaca was said to have derived its name.]

[ITHÆMĔNES (Ἰθαιμένης), a Trojan or Lycian warrior in the Iliad, father of Sthenelaus.]

ITHŌME (Ἰθώμη: Ἰθωμήτης, Ἰθωμαῖος). 1. A strong fortress in Messenia, situated on a mountain of the same name, which afterward formed the citadel of the town of Messene. On the summit of the mountain stood the ancient tem ple of Jupiter (Zeus), who was hence surnamed Ithometas (Ἰθωμήτης, Dor. Ἰθωμάτας). Ithome was taken by the Spartans B. C. 723, at the end of the first Messenian war, after a heroic defence by Aristodemus, and again in 455, at the end of the third Messenian war.—2. A mountain fortress in Pelasgiotis, in Thessaly, near Metropolis, also called THOME.

ITĬUS PORTUS, a harbor of the Morini, on the northern coast of Gaul, from which Cæsar set sail for Britain. The position of this harbor is much disputed. It used to be identified with Gesoriacum or Boulogne, but it is now usually supposed to be some harbor near Calais, probably Vissant or Witsand.

ITON. Vid. ITONIA.

ITŌNĬA, ITŌNĬAS, or ITŌNIS (Ἰτωνία, Ἰτωνιάς, or Ἰτωνίς), a surname of Minerva (Athena), derived from the town of Iton, in the south of Phthiotis in Thessaly. The goddess there had a celebrated sanctuary and festivals, and hence is called Incola Itoni. From Iton her worship spread into Bœotia and the country about Lake Copais, where the Pambœotia was celebrated, in the neighborhood of a temple and grove of Minerva (Athena). According to another tradition, Minerva, (Athena) received the surname of Itonia from Itonus, a king or priest.

ITUCCI (Ἰτύκκη, App.) a town in Hispania Bætica, in the district of Hispalis, and a Roman colony, under the name of Virtus Julia.

ITŪNA (now Solway Frith), an æstuary on the western coast of Britain, between England and Scotland.

ITŪRÆA, ITȲRÆA (Ἰτουραία: Ἰτουραῖοι, Ituræi, Ityræi: now El-Jeidur), a district on the northeastern borders of Palestine, bounded on the north by the plain of Damascus, on the west by the mountain-chain (now Jebel-Heish) which forms the eastern margin of the valley of the Jordan, on the southwest and south by Gaulanitis, and on the east by Auranitis and Trachonitis. It occupied a part of the elevated plain into which Mount Hermon sinks down on the southeast, and was inhabited by an Arabian people, of warlike and predatory habits, which they exercised upon the caravans from Arabia to Damascus, whose great road lay through their country. In the wars between the Syrians and the Israelites, they are found acting as allies of the kings of Damascus. They are scarcely heard of again till B.C. 105, when they were conquered by the Asmonæan king of Judah, Aristobulus, who compelled them to profess Judaism. Restored to independence by the decline of the Asmonæan house, they seized the opportunity offered, on the other side, by the weakness of the kings of Syria, to press their predatory incursions into Cœle-Syria, and even beyond Lebanon, to Byblos, Botrys, and other cities on the coast of Phœnice. Pompey reduced them again to order, and many of their warriors entered the Roman army, in which they became celebrated for their skill in horsemanship and archery. They were not, however, reduced to complete subjection to Rome until after the civil wars. Augustus gave Ituræa, which had been hitherto ruled by its native princes, to the family of Herod. During the ministry of our Saviour, it was governed by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, as tetrarch. Upon Philip's death in A.D. 37, it was united to the Roman province of Syria, from which it was presently again separated, and assigned partly to Herod Agrippa I., and partly to Soæmus, the prince of Emesa. In A.D. 50 it was finally reunited by Claudius to the Roman province of Syria, and there are inscriptions which prove that the Ituræans continued to serve with distinction in the Roman armies. There were no cities or large towns in the country, a fact easily explained by the unsettled character of the people, who lived in the Arab fashion, in unwalled villages and tents, and even, according to some statements, in the natural caves with which the country abounds.

[ITYMONEUS (Ἰτυμονεύς), son of Hyperochus of Elis, slain by Nestor.]

ITYS. 1. Vid. TEREUS.—[2. A Trojan hero, accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was slain by Turnus.]

IŪLIS (Ἰουλίς: Ἰουλιήτης, Ἰουλιεύς), the chief town in Ceos; the birth-place of Simonides. Vid. CEOS.

IŪLUS. 1. Son of Æneas, usually called Ascanius. Vid. ASCANIUS.—2. Eldest son of Ascanius, who claimed the government of Latium, but was obliged to give it up to his brother Silvius.

IXION (Ἰξίων), son of Phlegyas, or of Antion and Perimela, or of Pasion, or of Mars (Ares). According to the common tradition, his mother was Dia, a daughter of Deïoneus. He was king of the Lapithæ or Phlegyes, and the father of Pirithous. When Deïoneus demanded of Ixion the bridal gifts he had promised, Ixion treacherously invited him to a banquet, and then contrived to make him fall into a pit filled with fire. As no one purified Ixion of this treacherous murder, Jupiter (Zeus) took pity upon him, purified him, carried him to heaven, and caused him to sit down at his table. But Ixion was ungrateful to the father of the gods, and attempted to win the love of Juno (Hera). Jupiter (Zeus) thereupon created a phantom resembling Juno (Hera), and by it Ixion became the father of a Centaur. Vid. CENTAURI. Ixion was fearfully punished for his impious ingratitude. His hands and feet were chained by Mercury (Hermes) to a wheel, which is said to have rolled perpetually in the air or in the lower world. He is further said to have been scourged, and compelled to exclaim, "Benefactors should be honored."

IXIONĪDES, i. e., Pirithous, the son of Ixion. The Centaurs are also called Ixionidæ.

IXIUS (Ἴξιος), a surname of Apollo, derived from a district of the island of Rhodes which was called Ixiæ or Ixia.

IYNX (Ἴυγξ), daughter of Peitho and Pan, or of Echo. She endeavored to charm Jupiter (Zeus,) or make him fall in love with Io; but she was metamorphosed by Juno (Hera) into the bird called Iynx.

JANA. Vid. JANUS.

JĀNUS and JĀNA, a pair of ancient Latin divinities, who were worshipped as the sun and moon. The names Janus and Jana are only other forms of Dianus and Diana, which words contain the same root as dies, day. Janus was worshipped both by the Etruscans and Romans, and occupied an important place in the Roman religion. He presided over the beginning of every thing, and was therefore always invoked first in every undertaking, even before Jupiter. He opened the year and the seasons, and hence the first month of the year was called after him. He was the porter of heaven, and therefore bore the surnames Patulcus or Patulcius, the "opener," and Clusius or Clusivius, the "shutter." In this capacity he is represented with a key in his left hand, and a staff or sceptre in his right. On earth also he was the guardian deity of gates, and hence is commonly represented with two heads, because every door looks two ways (Janus bifrons). He is sometimes represented with four heads (Janus quadrifrons), because he presided over the four seasons. Most of the attributes of this god, which are very numerous, are connected with his being the god who opens and shuts; and this latter idea probably has reference to his original character as the god of the sun, in connection with the alternations of day and night. At Rome, Numa is said to have dedicated to Janus the covered passage bearing his name, which was opened in times of war, and closed in times of peace. This passage is commonly, but erroneously, called a temple. It stood close by the forum. It appears to have been left open in war to indicate symbolically that the god had gone out to assist the Roman warriors, and to have been shut in time of peace, that the god, the safeguard of the city, might not escape. A temple of Janus was built by C. Duilius in the time of the first Punic war: it was restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius. On new year's day, which was the principal festival of the god, people gave presents to one another, consisting of sweetmeats and copper coins, showing on one side the double head of Janus, and on the other a ship. The general name for these presents was strenæ. The sacrifices offered to Janus consisted of cakes (called janual), barley, incense, and wine.

JASON (Ἰάσων). 1. The celebrated leader of the Argonauts, was a son of Æson and Polymede or Alcimede, and belonged to the family of the Æolidæ, at Iolcus in Thessaly. Cretheus, who had founded Iolcus, was succeeded by his son Æson; but the latter was deprived of the kingdom by his half-brother Pelias, who attempted to take the life of the infant Jason. He was saved by his friends, who pretended that he was dead, and intrusted him to the care of the centaur Chiron. Pelias was now warned by an oracle to be on his guard against the one-sandaled man. When Jason had grown up, he came to claim the throne. As he entered the market-place, Pelias, perceiving he had only one sandal, asked him who he was; whereupon Jason declared his name, and demanded the kingdom. Pelias consented to surrender it to him, but persuaded him to remove the curse which rested on the family of the Æolidæ by fetching the golden fleece and s... spirit of Phrixus. Another tradition re... that Pelias, once upon a time, invited al... subjects to a sacrifice, which he intend... offer to Neptune (Poseidon). Jason came w... the rest, but on his journey to Iolcus he l... one of his sandals in crossing the River A... rus. Jason, on t... suggestion of Juno (Hera), who hated Pe... answered, that he would send him to fetch t... golden fleece. Pelias accordingly ordered Ja... to fetch the golden fleece, which was in the p... session of King Æëtes, in Colchis, and w... guarded by an over-watchful dragon. Ja... willingly undertook the enterprise, and set s... in the ship Argo, accompanied by the chi... heroes of Greece. He obtained the fleece wi... the assistance of Medea, whom he made h... wife, and along with whom he returned to Io... cus. The history of his exploits on this me... orable enterprise, and his adventures on his re... turn home, are related elsewhere. Vid. AR... GONAUTÆ. On his arrival at Iolcus, Jason, ac... cording to one account, found his aged father Æson still alive, and Medea made him young again; but, according to the more common tradition, Æson had been slain by Pelias during the absence of Jason, who accordingly called upon Medea to take vengeance on Pelias. Medea thereupon persuaded the daughters of Pelias to cut their father to pieces and boil him, in order to restore him to youth and vigor, as she had before changed a ram into a lamb by boiling the body in a cauldron. But Pelias was never restored to life, and his son Acastus expelled Jason and Medea from Iolcus. They then went to Corinth, where they lived happily for several years, until Jason deserted Medea, in order to marry Glauce or Creusa, daughter of Creon, the king of the country. Medea fearfully revenged this insult. She sent Glauce a poisoned garment, which burned her to death when she put it on. Creon likewise perished in the flames. Medea also killed her children by Jason, viz., Mermerus and Pheres, and then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. Later writers represent Jason as becoming in the end reconciled to Medea, returning with her to Colchis, and there restoring Æëtes to his kingdom, of which he had been deprived. The death of Jason is related differently. According to some, he made away with himself from grief; according to others, he was crushed by the poop of the ship Argo, which fell upon him as he was lying under it.—2. Tyrant of Pheræ and Tagus of Thessaly (vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. TAGUS), was probably the son of Lycophron, who established a tyranny on the ruins of aristocracy at Pheræ. He succeeded his father as tyrant of Pheræ soon after B.C. 395, and in a few years extended his power over almost the whole of Thessaly. Pharsalus was the only city in Thessaly which maintained its independence under the government of Polydamus; but even this place submitted to him in 375. In the following year (374) he was elected Tagus or generalissimo of Thessaly. His power was strengthened by the weakness of the other Greek states, and by the exhaus...

ing contest in which Thebes and Sparta were engaged. He was now in a position which held out to him every prospect of becoming master of Greece; but when at the height of his power, he was assassinated at a public audience, 370. Jason had an insatiable appetite for power, which he sought to gratify by any and every means. With the chief men in the several states of Greece, as, e. g., with Timotheus and Pelopidas, he cultivated friendly relations. He is represented as having all the qualifications of a great general and diplomatist—as active, temperate, prudent, capable of enduring much fatigue, and skillful in concealing his own designs and penetrating those of his enemies. He was an admirer of the rhetoric of Gorgias; and Isocrates was one of his friends.—3. Of Argos, an historian, lived under Hadrian, and wrote a work on Greece in four books.

Javolēnus Priscus, an eminent Roman jurist, was born about the commencement of the reign of Vespasian (A.D. 79), and was one of the council of Antoninus Pius. He was a pupil of Cælius Sabinus, and a leader of the Sabinian or Cassian school. Vid. p. 170, b. There are two hundred and six extracts from Javolenus in the Digest.

Jaxartes (Ἰαξάρτης: now Syr, Syderia, or Syhoun), a great river of Central Asia, about which the ancient accounts are very different and confused. It rises in the Comēdi Montes (now Monssour), and flows northwest into the Sea of Aral: the ancients supposed it to fall into the northern side of the Caspian, not distinguishing between the two seas. It divided Sogdiana from Scythia. On its banks dwelt a Scythian tribe called Jaxartæ.

Jerĭcho or Hiĕrĭchus (Ἱεριχώ, Ἱεριχοῦς: now Er-Riha? ruins), a city of the Canaanites, in a plain on the western side of the Jordan, near its mouth, was destroyed by Joshua, rebuilt in the time of the Judges, and formed an important frontier fortress of Judæa. It was again destroyed by Vespasian, rebuilt under Hadrian, and finally destroyed during the crusades.

Jĕrūsălĕm or Hiĕrŏsŏlȳmă (Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ἱεροσόλυμα: Ἱεροσολυμίτης: now Jerusalem, Arab. El-Kuds, i. e., the Holy City), the capital of Palestine in Asia. At the time of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, under Joshua, Jerusalem, then called Jebus, was the chief city of the Jebusites, a Canaanitish tribe, who were not entirely driven out from it till B.C. 1050, when David took the city, and made it the capital of the kingdom of Israel. It was also established as the permanent centre of the Jewish religion, by the erection of the temple of Solomon. After the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam, it remained the capital of the kingdom of Judah until it was entirely destroyed, and its inhabitants were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B.C. 588. In B.C. 536, the Jewish exiles, having been permitted by Cyrus to return, began to rebuild the city and temple; and the work was completed in about twenty-four years. In B.C. 332 Jerusalem quietly submitted to Alexander. During the wars which followed his death, the city was taken by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus (B.C. 320), and remained subject to the Greek kings of Egypt till the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus III. the Great, king of Syria, B.C. 198. Up to this time the Jews had been allowed the free enjoyment of their religion and their own internal government, and Antiochus confirmed them in these privileges; but the altered government of his son, Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, provoked a rebellion, which was at first put down when Antiochus took Jerusalem and polluted the temple (B.C. 170); but the religious persecution which ensued drove the people to despair, and led to a new revolt under the Maccabees, by whom Jerusalem was retaken, and the temple purified in B.C. 163. Vid. Maccabæi. In B.C. 133 Jerusalem was retaken by Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and its fortifications dismantled, but its government was left in the hands of the Maccabee, John Hyrcanus, who took advantage of the death of Antiochus in Parthia (B.C 128) to recover his full power. His son Aristobulus assumed the title of king of Judæa, and Jerusalem continued to be the capital of the kingdom till B.C. 63, when it was taken by Pompey, and the temple was again profaned. For the events which followed, vid. Hyrcanus, Herodes, and Palæstina. In A.D. 70, the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans was put down, and Jerusalem was taken by Titus, after a siege of several months, during which the inhabitants endured the utmost horrors; the survivors were all put to the sword or sold as slaves, and the city and temple were utterly razed to the ground. In consequence of a new revolt of the Jews, the Emperor Hadrian resolved to destroy all vestiges of their national and religious peculiarities; and, as one means to this end, he established a new Roman colony, on the ground where Jerusalem had stood, by the name of Ælia Capitolina, and built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the temple of Jehovah. A.D. 135. The establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire restored to Jerusalem its sacred character, and led to the erection of several churches; but the various changes which have taken place in it since its conquest by the Arabs under Omar in A.D. 638, have left very few vestiges even of the Roman city. Jerusalem stands due west of the head of the Dead Sea, at the distance of about twenty miles (in a straight line), and about thirty-five miles from the Mediterranean, on an elevated platform, divided, by a series of valleys, from hills which surround it on every side. This platform has a general slope from west to east, its highest point being the summit of Mount Zion, in the southwestern corner of the city, on which stood the original "City of David." The southeastern part of the platform is occupied by the hill called Moriah, on which the temple stood, and the eastern part by the hill called Acra; but these two summits are now hardly distinguishable from the general surface of the platform, probably on account of the gradual filling up of the valleys between. The height of Mount Zion is two thousand five hundred and thirty-five feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and about three hundred feet above the valley below. The extent of the platform is five thousand four hundred feet from north to south, and one thousand one hundred feet from east to west.

JOCASTE (Ἰοκάστη), called EPICASTE in Homer, daughter of Menœceus, and wife of the Theban king Laius, by whom she became the mother of Œdipus. She afterward married Œdipus, not knowing that he was her son; and when she discovered the crime she had unwittingly committed, she put an end to her life. For details, vid. ŒDIPUS.

JOPPE, JOPPA (Ἰόππη: in the Old Testament, Japho: now Jaffa), a very ancient maritime city of Palestine, and, before the building of Cæsarea, the only sea-port of the whole country, and therefore called by Strabo the port of Jerusalem, lay just south of the boundary between Judæa and Samaria, southwest of Antipatris, and northwest of Jerusalem.

JORDĀNES (Ἰορδάνης, Ἰόρδανος: now Jordan, Arab. Esh-Sheriah el-Kebir, or el-Urdun), has its source at the southern foot of Mons Hermon (the southernmost part of Anti-Libanus), [about twenty miles above] Paneas (afterward Cæsarea Philippi), whence it flows south into the little lake Semechonitis (now Bahr el-Huleh), and thence [after a course of twelve miles] into the Sea of Galilee (Lake of Tiberias), and thence through a narrow plain, depressed below the level of the surrounding country, into the Lake Asphaltites (now Dead Sea), where it is finally lost. Vid. PALÆSTINA. Its course, from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea, [in a distance of sixty miles, is, according to Lieutenant Lynch, about two hundred miles, and within that distance there are no less than twenty-seven considerable rapids, with many others of less descent; thus giving an average of five feet descent to the mile in its whole extent]; the depression through which it runs consists, first, of a sandy valley, from five to ten miles broad, within which is a lower valley, in width about half a mile, and, for the most part, beautifully clothed with grass and trees; and, in some places, there is still a lower valley within this. The average width of the river itself is calculated at thirty yards, and its average depth at nine feet. It is fordable in many places in summer, but in spring it becomes much deeper, and often overflows its banks. Its bed is considerably below the level of the Mediterranean.

JORNANDES or JORDĀNES, an historian, lived in the time of Justinian, or in the sixth century of our era. He was a Goth by birth; was secretary to the King of the Alani, adopted the Christian religion, took orders, and was made a bishop in Italy. There is not sufficient evidence for the common statement that he was bishop of Ravenna. He wrote two historical works in the Latin language: 1. De Getarum (Gothorum) Origine et Rebus Gestis, containing the history of the Goths from the earliest times down to their subjugation by Belisarius in 541. The work is abridged from the lost history of the Goths by Cassiodorus, to which Jornandes added various particulars; but it is compiled without judgment, and is characterized by partiality to the Goths. 2. De Regnorum ac Temporum Successione, a short compendium of history from the creation down to the victory obtained by Narses in 552 over King Theodatus. It is only valuable for some accounts of the barbarous nations of the North, and the countries which they inhabited. Edited by Lindenbrog, Hamburg, 1611.

JOSĒPHUS, FLĀVIUS, the Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem A.D. 37. On his mother's side he was descended from the Asmonean princes, while from his father, Matthias, he inherited the priestly office. He enjoyed an excellent education; and at the age of twenty-six he went to Rome to plead the cause of some Jewish priests whom Felix, the procurator of Judæa, had sent thither as prisoners. After a narrow escape from death by shipwreck, he safely landed at Puteoli; and being introduced to Poppæa, he not only effected the release of his friends, but received great presents from the empress. On his return to Jerusalem he found his countrymen eagerly bent on a revolt from Rome, from which he used his best endeavors to dissuade them; but failing in this, he professed to enter into the popular designs. He was chosen one of the generals of the Jews, and was sent to manage affairs in Galilee. When Vespasian and his army entered Galilee, Josephus threw himself into Jotapata, which he defended for forty-seven days. When the place was taken, the life of Josephus was spared by Vespasian through the intercession of Titus. Josephus thereupon assumed the character of a prophet, and predicted to Vespasian that the empire should one day be his and his son's. Vespasian treated him with respect, but did not release him from captivity till he was proclaimed emperor nearly three years afterward (A.D. 70). Josephus was present with Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterward accompanied him to Rome. He received the freedom of the city from Vespasian, who assigned him, as a residence, a house formerly occupied by himself, and treated him honorably to the end of his reign. The same favor was extended to him by Titus and Domitian as well. He assumed the name of Flavius, as a dependent of the Flavian family. His time at Rome appears to have been employed mainly in the composition of his works. He died about 100. The works of Josephus are written in Greek. They are, 1. The History of the Jewish War (Περὶ τοῦ Ἰουδαϊκοῦ πολέμου ἢ Ἰουδαϊκῆς ἱστορίας περὶ ἁλώσεως), in seven books, published about A.D. 75. Josephus first wrote it in Hebrew, and then translated it into Greek. It commences with the capture of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in B.C. 170, runs rapidly over the events before Josephus's own time, and gives a detailed account of the fatal war with Rome. 2. The Jewish Antiquities (Ἰουδαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία), in twenty books, completed about A.D. 93, and addressed to Epaphroditus. The title as well as the number of books may have been suggested by the Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. It gives an account of Jewish history from the creation of the world to A.D. 66, the twelfth year of Nero, in which the Jews were goaded to rebellion by Gessius Florus. In this work Josephus seeks to accommodate the Jewish religion to heathen tastes and prejudices. Thus he speaks of Moses and his law in a tone which might be adopted by any disbeliever in his divine legation. He says that Abraham went into Egypt (Gen., xii.), intending to adopt the Egyptian views of religion should he find them better than his own. He speaks doubtfully of the preservation of Jonah by the whale. He intimates a doubt of there having been any miracle in the passage of the Red Sea, and compares it with the passage of Alexander the Great along the shore of the sea of Pamphylia. He interprets Exod., xxii., 28, as if it conveyed a command to respect the idols of the heathen. Many similar instances might be quoted from his work. 3. His own Life, in one book. This is an appendage to the Archæologia, and is addressed to the same Epaphroditus. It was not written earlier than A.D. 97, since Agrippa II. is mentioned in it as no longer living. 4. A treatise on the Antiquity of the Jews, or Against Apion, in two books, also addressed to Epaphroditus. It is in answer to such as impugned the antiquity of the Jewish nation on the ground of the silence of Greek writers respecting it. Vid. Apion. The treatise exhibits extensive acquaintance with Greek literature and philosophy. 5. Εἰς Μακκαβαίους ἢ περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ, in one book. Its genuineness is doubtful. It is a declamatory account of the martyrdom of Eleazar (an aged priest), and of seven youths and their mother, in the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes. The best editions of Josephus are by Hudson, Oxon., 1720; by Havercamp, Amst., 1726; [and by W. Dindorf in Didot's Bibliotheca Græca; the best edition of the Jewish War, separately, is by Cardwell, Oxford, 1837, 2 vols.]

Joviānus, Flāvius Claudīus, was elected emperor by the soldiers in June, A.D. 363, after the death of Julian (vid. Julianus), whom he had accompanied in his campaign against the Persians. In order to effect his retreat in safety, Jovian surrendered to the Persians the Roman conquests beyond the Tigris, and several fortresses in Mesopotamia. He died suddenly at a small town on the frontiers of Bithynia and Galatia, February 17, 364, after a reign of little more than seven months. Jovian was a Christian, but he protected the heathens.

Juba (Ἰόβας). 1. King of Numidia, was son of Hiempsal, who was re-established on the throne by Pompey. On the breaking out of the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, he actively espoused the cause of the latter; and, accordingly, when Cæsar sent Curio into Africa (B.C. 49), he supported the Pompeian general Attius Varus with a large body of troops. Curio was defeated by their united forces, and fell in the battle. In 46 Juba fought along with Scipio against Cæsar himself, and was present at the decisive battle of Thapsus. After this defeat he wandered about for some time, and then put an end to his own life.—2. King of Mauretania, son of the preceding, was a mere child at his father's death (46), was carried a prisoner to Rome by Cæsar, and compelled to grace the conqueror's triumph. He was brought up in Italy, where he received an excellent education, and applied himself with such diligence to study, that he turned out one of the most learned men of his day. After the death of Antony (30), Augustus conferred upon Juba his paternal kingdom of Numidia, and, at the same time, gave him in marriage Cleopatra, otherwise called Selene, the daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. At a subsequent period (25), Augustus gave him Mauretania in exchange for Numidia, which was reduced to a Roman province. He continued to reign in Mauretania till his death, which happened about A.D. 19. He was beloved by his subjects, among whom he endeavored to introduce the elements of Greek and Roman civilization; and, after his death, they even paid him divine honors. Juba wrote a great number of works in almost every branch of literature. They are all lost, with the exception of a few fragments. They appear to have been all written in Greek. The most important of them were, 1. A History of Africa (Λιβυκά), in which he made use of Punic authorities. 2. On the Assyrians. 3. A History of Arabia. 4. A Roman History (Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία). 5. Θεατρικὴ ἱστορία, a general treatise on all matters connected with the stage. 6. Περὶ γραφικῆς, or περὶ ζωγράφων, seems to have been a general history of painting. He also wrote some treatises on botany and on grammatical subjects. [The few fragments of Juba's historical works still extant are collected in Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii., p. 465–484.]

Juguнthi, a German people, sometimes described as a Gothic, and sometimes as an Alemannic tribe.

Jugurtha (Ἰουγούρθας Ἰογόρθας), king of Numidia, was an illegitimate son of Mastanabal, and a grandson of Masinissa. He lost his father at an early age, but was adopted by his uncle Micipsa, who brought him up with his own sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha quickly distinguished himself both by his abilities and his skill in all bodily exercises, and rose to so much favor and popularity with the Numidians, that he began to excite the jealousy of Micipsa. In order to remove him to a distance, Micipsa sent him, in B.C. 134, with an auxiliary force, to assist Scipio against Numantia. Here his zeal, courage, and ability gained for him the favor and commendation of Scipio, and of all the leading nobles in the Roman camp. On his return to Numidia he was received with honor by Micipsa, who was obliged to dissemble the fears which he entertained of his ambitious nephew. Micipsa died in 118, leaving the kingdom to Jugurtha and his two sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal, in common. Jugurtha soon showed that he aspired to the sole sovereignty of the country. In the course of the same year he found an opportunity to assassinate Hiempsal at Thirmida, and afterward defeated Adherbal in battle. Adherbal fled to Rome to invoke the assistance of the senate; but Jugurtha, by a lavish distribution of bribes, counteracted the just complaints of his enemy. The senate decreed that the kingdom of Numidia should be equally divided between the two competitors; but the senators intrusted with the execution of this decree were also bribed by Jugurtha, who thus succeeded in obtaining the western division of the kingdom, adjacent to Mauretania, by far the larger and richer portion of the two (117). But this advantage was far from contenting him. Shortly afterward he invaded the territories of Adherbal with a large army, and defeated him. Adherbal made his escape to the strong fortress of Cirta, where he was closely blockaded by Jugurtha. The Romans commanded Jugurtha to abstain from further hostilities, but he paid no attention to their commands, and at length gained possession of Cirta, and put Adherbal to death, 112. War was now declared against Jugurtha at Rome, and the consul, L. Calpurnius Bestia, was sent into Africa, 111. Jugurtha had recourse to his customary arts; and, by means of large sums of money given to Bestia and M. Scaurus, his principal lieutenant, he purchased from them a favorable peace. The conduct of Bestia excited the greatest indignation at Rome, and Jugurtha was summoned to the city under a safe conduct, the popular party hoping to be able to convict the nobility by means of his evidence. The scheme, however, failed; since one of the tribunes, who had been gained over by the friends of Bestia and Scaurus, forbade the king to give evidence. Soon afterward Jugurtha was compelled to leave Italy, in consequence of his having ventured on the assassination of Massiva, whose counter-influence he regarded with apprehension. Vid. MASSIVA. The war was now renewed; but the consul, Sp. Postumius Albinus, who arrived to conduct it (110), was able to effect nothing against Jugurtha. When the consul went to Rome to hold the comitia, he left his brother Aulus in command of the army. Aulus was defeated by Jugurtha; great part of his army was cut to pieces, and the rest only escaped a similar fate by the ignominy of passing under the yoke. But this disgrace at once roused all the spirit of the Roman people: the treaty concluded by Aulus was instantly annulled; and the consul Q. Cæcilius Metellus was sent into Africa at the head of a new army (109). Metellus was an able general and an upright man, whom Jugurtha was unable to cope with in the field, or to seduce by bribes. In the course of two years Metellus frequently defeated Jugurtha, and at length drove him to take refuge among the Gætulians. In 107 Metellus was succeeded in the command by Marius; but the cause of Jugurtha had meantime been espoused by his father-in-law Bocchus, king of Mauretania, who had advanced to his support with a large army. The united forces of Jugurtha and Bocchus were defeated in a decisive battle by Marius; and Bocchus purchased the forgiveness of the Romans by surrendering his son-in-law to Sulla, the quæstor of Marius (106). Jugurtha remained in captivity till the return of Marius to Rome, when, after adorning the triumph of his conqueror (Jan. 1, 104), he was thrown into a dungeon, and there starved to death.

JŪLĬA. 1. Aunt of Cæsar the dictator, and wife of C. Marius the elder. She died B.C. 68, and her nephew pronounced her funeral oration. —2. Mother of M. Antonius the triumvir. In the proscription of the triumvirate (43) she saved the life of her brother, L. Cæsar. Vid. CÆSAR, No. 5.—3. Sister of Cæsar the dictator, and wife of M. Atius Balbus, by whom she had Atia, the mother of Augustus. Vid. ATIA.—4. Daughter of Cæsar the dictator, by Cornelia, and his only child in marriage, was married to Cn. Pompey in 59. She was a woman of beauty and virtue, and was tenderly attached to her husband, although twenty-three years older than herself. She died in childbed in 54.—5. Daughter of Augustus by Scribonia, and his only c[hild], was born in 39. She was educated with g[reat] strictness, but grew up one of the most prof[ligate] women of her age. She was thrice mar[ried]; first, to M. Marcellus, her first cousin, in 25; [sec]ondly, after his death (23) without issue, t[o] Agrippa, by whom she had three sons, C. [and] L. Cæsar, and Agrippa Postumus, and [two] daughters, Julia and Agrippina; and thi[rdly], after Agrippa's death in 12, to Tiberius Nero, [the] future emperor. In B.C. 2 Augustus at l[ength] became acquainted with the misconduct of [his] daughter, whose notorious adulteries had b[een] one reason why her husband Tiberius had q[uit]ted Italy four years before. Augustus wa[s in]censed beyond measure, and banished her [to] Pandataria, an island off the coast of Camp[ania]. At the end of five years she was removed [to] Rhegium, but she was never suffered to [pass] the bounds of the city. Even the testament [of] Augustus showed the inflexibility of his re[sentment]. He bequeathed her no legacy, and forbade [her] ashes to repose in his mausoleum. Tiber[ius], on his accession (A.D. 14), deprived her of all the necessaries of life, and she died in [the] course of the same year.—6. Daughter of [the] preceding, and wife of L. Æmilius Paulus. [She] inherited her mother's licentiousness, and w[as], in consequence, banished by her grandfat[her] Augustus to the little island Tremerus, on [the] coast of Apulia, A.D. 9, where she lived twe[nty] twenty years. She died in 28. It was probabl[y] this Julia whom Ovid celebrated as Corinna [in] his elegies and other erotic poems; and his i[n]trigues with her appear to have been the ca[use] of the poet's banishment in A.D. 9.—7. You[ng]est child of Germanicus and Agrippina, w[as] born A.D. 18; was married to M. She was recall[ed] by Claudius, but was afterward put to death [by] this emperor at Messalina's instigation. T[he] charge brought against her was adultery, a[nd] Seneca, the philosopher, was banished to Co[r]sica as the partner of her guilt.—8. Daughter of Drusus and Livia, the sister of Germanic[us]. She was married, A.D. 20, to her first cousin Nero, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, an[d] after Nero's death, to Rubellius Blandus, b[y] whom she had a son, Rubellius Plautus. Sh[e], too, was put to death by Claudius, at the ins[ti]gation of Messalina, 59.—9. Daughter of Tit[us], the son of Vespasian, married Flavius Sabinus, a nephew of the Emperor Vespasian. JŪLĬA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome, was of Alban origin, and was removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius upon the destruction of Alba Longa. It claimed descent from the mythical Iulus, the son of Venus and Anchises. The most distinguished family in the gens is that of CÆSAR. Under the empire we find an immense number of persons of the name of Julius, the most important of whom are spoken of under their surnames.

JŪLĬĀNUS DIDĬUS. Vid. DIDIUS.

JŪLĬĀNUS, FLAVĬUS CLAUDĬUS, usually called

JULIAN, and surnamed the APOSTATE, Roman emperor A.D. 361–363. He was born at Constantinople A.D. 331, and was the son of Julius Constantius by his second wife, Basilina, and the nephew of Constantine the Great. Julian and his elder brother, Gallus, were the only members of the imperial family whose lives were spared by the sons of Constantine the Great, on the death of the latter in 337. The two brothers were educated with care, and were brought up in the principles of the Christian religion; but as they advanced to manhood, they were watched with jealousy and suspicion by the Emperor Constantius. After the execution of Gallus in 354 (vid. GALLUS), the life of Julian was in great peril; but he succeeded in pacifying the suspicions of the emperor, and was allowed to go to Athens in 355 to pursue his studies. Here he devoted himself with ardor to the study of Greek literature and philosophy, and attracted universal attention both by his attainments and abilities. Among his fellow-students were Gregory of Nazianzus and Basil, both of whom afterward became so celebrated in the Christian church. Julian had already abandoned Christianity in his heart and returned to the pagan faith of his ancestors, but fear of Constantius prevented him from making an open declaration of his apostasy. Julian did not remain long at Athens. In November, 355, he received from Constantius the title of Cæsar, and was sent to Gaul to oppose the Germans, who had crossed the Rhine, and were ravaging some of the fairest provinces of Gaul. During the next five years (356–360) Julian carried on war against the two German confederacies of the Alemanni and Franks with great success, and gained many victories over them. His internal administration was distinguished by justice and wisdom, and he gained the good will and affection of the provinces intrusted to his care. His growing popularity awakened the jealousy of Constantius, who commanded him to send some of his best troops to the East, to serve against the Persians. His soldiers refused to leave their favorite general, and proclaimed him emperor at Paris in 360. After several fruitless negotiations between Julian and Constantius, both parties prepared for war In 361 Julian marched along the valley of the Danube toward Constantinople; but Constantius, who had set out from Syria to oppose his rival, died on his march in Cilicia. His death left Julian the undisputed master of the empire. On the 11th of December Julian entered Constantinople. He lost no time in publicly avowing himself a pagan, but he proclaimed that Christianity would be tolerated equally with paganism. He did not, however, act impartially toward the Christians. He preferred pagans as his civil and military officers, forbade the Christians to teach rhetoric and grammar in the schools, and, in order to annoy them, allowed the Jews to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem. In the following year (362) Julian went to Syria in order to make preparations for the war against the Persians. He spent the winter at Antioch, where he made the acquaintance of the orator Libanius; and in the spring of 363 he set out against the Persians. He crossed the Euphrates and the Tigris; and after burning his fleet on the Tigris, that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy, he boldly marched into the interior of the country in search of the Persian king. His army suffered much from the heat, want of water, and provisions, and he was at length compelled to retreat. The Persians now appeared and fearfully harassed his rear. Still the Romans remained victorious in many a bloody engagement; but in the last battle fought on the 26th of June, Julian was mortally wounded by an arrow, and died in the course of the day. Jovian was chosen emperor in his stead, on the field of battle. Vid. JOVIANUS. Julian was an extraordinary character. As a monarch, he was indefatigable in his attention to business, upright in his administration, and comprehensive in his views; as a man, he was virtuous in the midst of a profligate age, and did not yield to the luxurious temptations to which he was exposed. In consequence of his apostasy he has been calumniated by Christian writers; but, for the same reason, he has been unduly extolled by heathen authors. He wrote a large number of works, many of which are extant. He was a man of reflection and thought, but possessed no creative genius. He did not, however, write merely for the sake of writing, like so many of his contemporaries; his works show that he had his subjects really at heart, and that in literature as well as in business his extraordinary activity arose from the wants of a powerful mind, which desired to improve itself and the world. The style of Julian is remarkably pure, and is a close imitation of the style of the classical Greek writers. The following are his most important works: 1. Letters, most of which were intended for public circulation, and are of great importance for the history of the time. Edited by Heyler, Mainz, 1828.—2. Orations, on various subjects, as, for instance, On the Emperor Constantius, On the worship of the sun, On the mother of the gods (Cybele), On true and false Cynicism, &c.—3. The Cæsars, or the Banquet (Καίσαρες ἢ Συμπόσιον), a satirical composition, which is one of the most agreeable and instructive productions of ancient wit. Julian describes the Roman emperors approaching one after the other to take their seat round a table in the heavens; and as they come up, their faults, vices, and crimes are censured with a sort of bitter mirth by old Silenus, whereupon each Cæsar defends himself as well as he can. Edited by Heusinger, Gotha, 1736, and by Harless, Erlangen, 1785.—4. Misopogon, or the Enemy of the Beard (Μισοπώγων), a severe satire on the licentious and effeminate manners of the inhabitants of Antioch, who had ridiculed Julian, when he resided in the city, on account of his austere virtues, and had laughed at his allowing his beard to grow in the ancient fashion. —5. Against the Christians (Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν). This work is lost, but some extracts from it are given in Cyrill's reply to it, which is still extant. The best edition of the collected works of Julian is by Spanheim, Lips. 1696.

JULIĀNUS, SALVĬUS, an eminent Roman jurist who flourished under Hadrian and the Antonines. He was præfectus urbi, and twice consul, but his name does not appear in the Fasti. By the order of Hadrian, he drew up the edictum perpetuum, which forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. His work appears to have consisted in collecting and arranging the clauses which the prætors were accustomed to insert in their annual edict, in condensing the materials, and in omitting antiquated provisions. He was a voluminous legal writer, and his works are cited in the Digest.

JŪNĬA. 1. Half-sister of M. Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar, and wife of M. Lepidus, the triumvir.—2. TERTĬA or TERTULLA, own sister of the preceding, was the wife of C. Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers. She survived her husband a long while, and did not die till A.D. 22.

JŪNĬA GENS, an ancient patrician house at Rome, to which belonged the celebrated M. Junius Brutus, who took such an active part in expelling the Tarquins. But afterward the gens appears as only a plebeian one. Under the republic the chief families were those of BRUTUS, BUBULCUS, GRACCHANUS, NORBANUS, PULLUS, SILANUS. The Junii who lived under the empire are likewise spoken of under their various surnames.

JŪNO, called HERA by the Greeks. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. HERA. The word Ju-no contains the same root as Ju-piter. As Jupiter is the king of heaven and of the gods, so Juno is the queen of heaven, or the female Jupiter. She was worshipped at Rome as the queen of heaven, from early times, with the surname of Regina. At a later period her worship was solemnly transferred from Veii to Rome, where a sanctuary was dedicated to her on the Aventine. As Jupiter was the protector of the male sex, so Juno watched over the female sex. She was supposed to accompany every woman through life, from the moment of her birth to her death. Hence she bore the special surnames of Virginalis and Matrona, as well as the general ones of Opigena and Sospita, and under the last-mentioned name she was worshipped at Lanuvium. On their birth-day women offered sacrifices to Juno surnamed Natalis, just as men sacrificed to their genius natalis. The great festival, celebrated by all the women, in honor of Juno, was called Matronalia (vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.), and took place on the 1st of March. Her protection of women, and especially her power of making them fruitful, is further alluded to in the festival Populifugia (Dict. of Antiq., s. v.), as well as in the surname of Februlis, Februata, Februta, or Februalis. Juno was further, like Saturn, the guardian of the finances, and under the name of Moneta she had a temple on the Capitoline Hill, which contained the mint. The most important period in a woman's life is that of marriage, and she was therefore believed especially to preside over marriage. Hence she was called Juga or Jugalis, and had a variety of other names, such as Pronuba, Cinxia, Iterduca, &c. The month of June, which is said to have been originally called Junonius, was considered to be the most favorable period for marrying. Women in childbed invoked Juno Lucina to help them, and newly-born children were likewise under her protection; hence she was sometimes confounded with the Greek Artemis or Ilithyia. In Etruria she was worshipped under the name of Cupra. She was also worshipped at Falerii, Lanuvium, Aricia, Tibur, Præneste, and other places. In the representations of the Roman Juno that have come down to us, the type of the Greek Hera is commonly adopted.

JŪPĬTER, called ZEUS by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. ZEUS. Jupiter was originally an elemental divinity, and his name signifies the father or lord of heaven, being a contraction of Diovis pater or Diespiter. Being the lord of heaven, he was worshipped as the god of rain, storms, thunder, and lightning, whence he had the epithets of Pluvius, Fulgurator, Tonitrualis, Tonans, and Fulminator. As the pebble or flint stone was regarded as the symbol of lightning, Jupiter was frequently represented with such a stone in his hand instead of a thunderbolt. In concluding a treaty, the Romans took the sacred symbols of Jupiter, viz., the sceptre and flint stone, together with some grass from his temple, and the oath taken on such an occasion was expressed by per Jovem Lapidem jurare. In consequence of his possessing such powers over the elements, and especially of his always having the thunderbolt at his command, he was regarded as the highest and most powerful among the gods. Hence he is called the Best and Most High (Optimus Maximus). His temple at Rome stood on the lofty hill of the Capitol, whence he derived the surnames of Capitolinus and Tarpeius. He was regarded as the special protector of Rome. As such he was worshipped by the consuls on entering upon their office; and the triumph of a victorious general was a solemn procession to his temple. He therefore bore the surnames of Imperator, Victor, Invictus, Stator, Opitulus, Feretrius, Prædator, Triumphator, and the like. Under all these surnames he had temples or statues at Rome; and two temples, viz., those of Jupiter Stator and of Jupiter Feretrius, were believed to have been built in the time of Romulus. Under the name of Jupiter Capitolinus, he presided over the great Roman games; and under the name of Jupiter Latialis or Latiaris, over the Feriæ Latinæ. Jupiter, according to the belief of the Romans, determined the course of all human affairs. He foresaw the future, and the events happening in it were the results of his will. He revealed the future to man through signs in the heavens and the flight of birds, which are hence called the messengers of Jupiter, while the god himself is designated as Prodigialis, that is, the sender of prodigies.

For the same reason the god was invoked at the beginning of every undertaking, whether sacred or profane, together with Janus, who blessed the beginning itself. Jupiter was further regarded as the guardian of law, and as the protector of justice and virtue. He maintained the sanctity of an oath, and presided over all transactions which were based upon faithfulness and justice. Hence Fides was his companion on the Capitol, along with Victoria; and hence a traitor to his country, and persons guilty of perjury, were thrown down from the Tarpeian rock. As Jupiter was the lord of heaven, and consequently the prince of light, the white color was sacred to him, white animals were sacrificed to him, his chariot was believed to be drawn by four white horses, his priests wore white caps, and the consuls were attired in white when they offered sacrifices in the Capitol the day they entered on their office. The worship of Jupiter at Rome was under the special care of the Flamen Dialis, who was the highest in rank of all the flamens. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. FLAMEN. The Romans, in their representations of the god, adopted the type of the Greek Zeus.

JURA or JURASSUS MONS (now Jura), a range of mountains, which run north of the Lake Lemanus as far as Augusta Rauracorum (now August, near Basle), on the Rhine, forming the boundary between the Sequani and Helvetii.

JUSTĬNĬĀNA. 1. PRIMA, a town in Illyria, near Tauresium, was the birthplace of Justinian, and was built by that emperor; it became the residence of the archbishop of Illyria, and, in the Middle Ages, of the Servian kings.—2. SECUNDA, also a town in Illyria, previously called Ulpiana, was enlarged and embellished by Justinian.

JUSTINIĀNUS, surnamed the GREAT, emperor of Constantinople A.D. 527–565. He was born near Tauresium, in Illyria, A.D. 483; was adopted by his uncle, the Emperor Justinus, in 520; succeeded his uncle in 527; married the beautiful but licentious actress, Theodora, who exercised great influence over him; and died in 565, leaving the crown to his nephew, Justin II. He was, during the greater part of his reign, a firm supporter of orthodoxy, and thus has received from ecclesiastical writers the title of Great; but toward the end of his life he became a heretic, being one of the adherents of Nestorianism. His foreign wars were glorious, but all his victories were won by his generals. The empire of the Vandals in Africa was overthrown by Belisarius, and their king Gelimer led a prisoner to Constantinople; and the kingdom of the Ostrogoths in Italy was likewise destroyed by the successive victories of Belisarius and Narses. Vid. BELISARIUS, NARSES. Justinian adorned Constantinople with many public buildings of great magnificence; but the cost of their erection, as well as the expenses of his foreign wars, obliged him to impose many new taxes, which were constantly increased by the natural covetousness and rapacity of the emperor. The great work of Justinian is his legislation. He resolved to establish a perfect system of written legislation for all his dominions; and, for this end, to make two great collections, one of the imperial constitutions, the other of all that was valuable in the works of jurists. His first work was the collection of the imperial constitutions. This he commenced in 528, in the second year of his reign. The task was intrusted to a commission of ten, who completed their labors in the following year (529); and their collection was declared to be law under the title of Justinianeus Codex. In 530, Tribonian, who had been one of the commission of ten employed in drawing up the Code, was authorized by the emperor to select fellow-laborers to assist him in the other division of the undertaking. Tribonian selected sixteen coadjutors and this commission proceeded at once to lay under contribution the works of those jurists who had received from former emperors "auctoritatem conscribendarum interpretandique legum." They were ordered to divide their materials into fifty books, and to subdivide each book into Titles (Tituli). Nothing that was valuable was to be excluded, nothing that was obsolete was to be admitted, and neither repetition nor inconsistency was to be allowed. This work was to bear the name Digesta or Pandectæ. The work was completed, in accordance with the instructions that had been given, in the short space of three years; and on the 30th of December, 533, it received from the imperial sanction the authority of law. It comprehends upward of nine thousand extracts, in the selection of which the compilers made use of nearly two thousand different books, containing more than three million lines. The Code and the Digest contained a complete body of law; but as they were not adapted to elementary instruction, a commission was appointed, consisting of Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus, to compose an institutional work, which should contain the elements of the law (legum incunabula), and should not be encumbered with useless matter. Accordingly, they produced a treatise under the title of Institutiones, which was based on elementary works of a similar character, but chiefly on the Institutiones of Gaius. Vid. GAIUS. The Institutiones consisted of four books, and were published with the imperial sanction at the same time as the Digest. After the publication of the Digest and the Institutiones, fifty decisiones and some new constitutiones also were promulgated by the emperor. This rendered a revision of the Code necessary; and, accordingly, a new Code was promulgated at Constantinople on the 16th of November, 534, and the use of the decisiones, of the new constitutiones, and of the first edition of the Code was forbidden. The second edition (Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis) is the code that we now possess, in twelve books, each of which is divided into titles. Justinian subsequently published various new constitutiones, to which he gave the name of Novellæ Constitutiones. These Constitutiones form a kind of supplement to the Code, and were published at various times from 535 to 565, but most of them appeared between 535 and 539. It does not seem, however, that any official compilation of these Novellæ appeared in the lifetime of Justinian. The four legislative works of Justinian, the Institutiones, Digesta or Pandectæ, Codex, and Novellæ are included under the general name of Corpus Juris Civilis, and form the Roman law, as received in Europe. The best editions of the Corpus for general use are by Gothofredus and Van Leeuwen, Amst., 1663, 2 vols fol.; by Gebauer and Spangenberg, Gotting., 1776–1797, 2 vols. 4to; and by Beck, Lips., 1836, 2 vols. 4to.

Justīnus. 1. The historian, of uncertain date, but who did not live later than the fourth or fifth century of our era, is the author of an extant work entitled Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV. This work is taken from the Historiæ Philippicæ of Trogus Pompeius, who lived in the time of Augustus. The title Philippicæ was given to it, because its main object was to give the history of the Macedonian monarchy, with all its branches; but in the execution of this design, Trogus permitted himself to indulge in so many excursions, that the work formed a kind of universal history from the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the conquest of the East by Rome. The original work of Trogus, which was one of great value, is lost. The work of Justin is not so much an abridgment of that of Trogus, as a selection of such parts as seemed to him most worthy of being generally known. Edited by Grævius, Lugd. Bat., 1683; by Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1719 and 1760; and by Frotscher, Lips., 1827, 3 vols. — 2. Surnamed the Martyr, one of the earliest of the Christian writers, was born about A.D. 103, at Flavia Neapolis, the Shechem of the Old Testament, a city in Samaria. He was brought up as a heathen, and in his youth studied the Greek philosophy with zeal and ardor. He was afterward converted to Christianity. He retained as a Christian the garb of a philosopher, but devoted himself to the propagation, by writing and otherwise, of the faith which he had embraced. He was put to death at Rome in the persecution under Marcus Antoninus, about 165. Justin wrote a large number of works in Greek, several of which have come down to us. Of these the most important are, 1. An Apology for the Christians, addressed to Antoninus Pius, about 139; 2. A Second Apology for the Christians, addressed to the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus; 3. A Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew, in which Justin defends Christianity against the objections of Tryphon. The best edition of the collected works of Justin is by Otto, Jena, 1842–1844, 2 vols. 8vo; [second edition, Jena, 1848–50, 3 vols. 8vo.]

Justus, a Jewish historian of Tiberias in Galilæa, was a contemporary of the historian Josephus, who was very hostile to him.

Juturna, the nymph of a fountain in Latium, famous for its healing qualities. Its water was used in nearly all sacrifices; a chapel was dedicated to its nymph at Rome in the Campus Martius by Lutatius Catulus; and sacrifices were offered to her on the 11th of January. A pond in the forum, between the temples of Castor and Vesta, was called Lacus Juturnæ, whence we must infer that the name of the nymph Juturna is not connected with jugis, but probably with juvare. She is said to have been beloved by Jupiter, who rewarded her with immortality and the rule over the waters. Some writers call her the wife of Janus and mother of Fontus, but in the Æneid she appears as the affectionate sister of Turnus.

Juvăvum or Juvăvĭa (now Salzburg), a town in Noricum, on the River Jovavus or Isonta (now Salza), was a Roman colony founded by Hadrian, and the residence of the Roman governor of the province. It was destroyed by the Heruli in the fifth century, but was afterward rebuilt.

Jŭvĕnālis, Dĕcĭmus Jūnĭus, the Great Roman satirist, but of whose life we have few authentic particulars. His ancient biographers relate that he was either the son or the "alumnus" of a rich freedman; that he occupied himself till he had nearly reached the term of middle life in declaiming; that, having subsequently composed some clever lines upon Paris the pantomime, he was induced to cultivate assiduously satirical composition; and that, in consequence of his attacks upon Paris becoming known at the court, the poet, although now an old man of eighty, was appointed to the command of a body of troops, in a remote district of Egypt, where he died shortly afterward. It is supposed by some that the Paris who was attacked by Juvenal was the contemporary of Domitian, and that the poet was accordingly banished by that emperor. But this opinion is clearly untenable. 1. We know that Paris was killed in A.D. 83, upon suspicion of an intrigue with the Empress Domitia. 2. The fourth satire, as appears from the concluding lines, was written after the death of Domitian, that is, not earlier than 96. 3. The first satire, as we learn from the forty-ninth line, was written after the condemnation of Marius Priscus, that is, not earlier than 100. These positions admit of no doubt; and hence it is established that Juvenal was alive at least seventeen years after the death of Paris, and that some of his satires were composed after the death of Domitian. The only facts with regard to Juvenal upon which we can implicitly rely are, that he flourished toward the close of the first century; that Aquinum, if not the place of his nativity, was at least his chosen residence (Sat., iii., 319); and that he is, in all probability, the friend whom Martial addresses in three epigrams. There is, perhaps, another circumstance which we may admit. We are told that he declaimed for many years of his life; and every page in his writings bears evidence to the accuracy of this assertion. Each piece is a finished rhetorical essay, energetic, glowing, and sonorous. He denounces vice in the most indignant terms; but the obvious tone of exaggeration which pervades all his invectives leaves us in doubt how far this sustained passion is real, and how far assumed for show. The extant works of Juvenal consist of sixteen satires, the last being a fragment of very doubtful authenticity, all composed in heroic hexameters. Edited by Ruperti, Lips., 1819; and by Heinrich, Bonn, 1839.

When Labdacus had grown up to manhood, Lycus surrendered the government to him; and on the death of Labdacus, which occurred soon after, Lycus undertook the guardianship of his son Laius, the father of Œdipus. LABDĂLUM. Vid. SYRACUSÆ.

LABEĀTES, a warlike people in Dalmatia, whose chief town was Scodra, and in whose territory was the LABEATIS PALUS (now Lake of Scutari), through which the River Barbana (now Bogana) runs.

LABĔO, ANTISTĬUS. 1. A Roman jurist, was one of the murderers of Julius Cæsar, and put an end to his life after the battle of Philippi, B.C. 42.—2. Son of the preceding, and a still more eminent jurist. He adopted the republican opinions of his father, and was, in consequence, disliked by Augustus. It is probable that the Labeone insanior of Horace (Sat., i., 3, 80) was a stroke levelled at the jurist, in order to please the emperor. Labeo wrote a large number of works, which are cited in the Digest. He was the founder of one of the two great legal schools spoken of under CAPITO.

LABĔO, Q. FABĬUS, quæstor urbanus B.C. 196; prætor 189, when he commanded the fleet in the war against Antiochus; and consul 183.

LABERĬUS, DECĬMUS, a Roman eques, and a distinguished writer of mimes, was born about B.C. 107, and died in 43 at Puteoli, in Campania. At Cæsar's triumphal games in October, 45, P. Syrus, a professional mimus, seems to have challenged all his craft to a trial of wit in extemporaneous farce, and Cæsar offered Laberius five hundred thousand sesterces to appear on the stage. Laberius was sixty years old, and the profession of a mimus was infamous, but the wish of the dictator was equivalent to a command, and he reluctantly complied. He had, however, revenge in his power, and took it. His prologue awakened compassion, and perhaps indignation; and, during the performance, he adroitly availed himself of his various characters to point his wit at Cæsar. In the person of a beaten Syrian slave he cried out, "Marry! Quirites, but we lose our freedom" (Porro, Quirites, libertatem perdidimus), and all eyes were turned upon the dictator; and in another mime he uttered the pregnant maxim, "Needs must he fear who makes all else adread" (Necesse est multos timeat quem multi timent). Cæsar, impartially or vindictively, awarded the prize to Syrus. The prologue of Laberius has been preserved by Macrobius (Sat., ii., 7); and, if this may be taken as a specimen of his style, he would rank above Terence, and second only to Plautus, in dramatic vigor. Laberius evidently made great impression on his contemporaries, although he is depreciated by Horace (Sat., i., 10, 6).

LABĬCUM, LABĪCI, LAVĪCUM, LAVĪCI (Labicānus: now Colonna), an ancient town in Latium on one of the hills of the Alban Mountain, fifteen miles southeast of Rome, west of Præneste, and northeast of Tusculum. It was an ally of the Æqui; it was taken and was colonized by the Romans, B.C. 418.

LABIĒNUS. 1. T., tribune of the plebs B.C. 63, the year of Cicero's consulship. Under pretence of avenging his uncle's death, who had joined Saturninus (100), and had perished along with the other conspirators, he accused Rabirius of perduellio or high treason. Rabirius was defended by Cicero. Vid. RABIRIUS. In his tribuneship Labienus was entirely devoted to Cæsar's interests. Accordingly, when Cæsar went into Transalpine Gaul in 58, he took Labienus with him as his legatus. Labienus continued with Cæsar during the greater part of his campaigns in Gaul, and was the ablest officer he had. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he deserted Cæsar and joined Pompey. His defection caused the greatest joy among the Pompeian party; but he disappointed the expectations of his new friends, and never performed any thing of importance. He fought against his old commander at the battle of Pharsalia in Greece, 48, at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, 46, and at the battle of Munda in Spain, 45. He was slain in the last of these battles.—2. Q., son of the preceding, joined the party of Brutus and Cassius after the murder of Cæsar, and was sent by them into Parthia to seek aid from Orodes, the Parthian king. Before he could obtain any definite answer from Orodes, the news came of the battle of Philippi, 42. Two years afterward he persuaded Orodes to intrust him with the command of a Parthian army; and Pacorus, the son of Orodes, was associated with him in the command. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates and met with great success. They defeated Decidius Saxa, the lieutenant of Antony, obtained possession of the two great towns of Antioch and Apamea, and penetrated into Asia Minor. But in the following year, 39, P. Ventidius, the most able of Antony's legates, defeated the Parthians. Labienus fled in disguise into Cilicia, where he was apprehended and put to death.—3. T., a celebrated orator and historian in the reign of Augustus, either son or grandson of No. 1. He retained all the republican feelings of his family, and never became reconciled to the imperial government, but took every opportunity to attack Augustus and his friends. His enemies obtained a decree of the senate that all his writings should be burned; whereupon he shut himself up in the tomb of his ancestors, and thus perished, about A.D. 12.

LABRANDA (τὰ Λάβρανδα: Λαβρανδεύς, Λαβρανδηνός, Labrandēnus), a town in Caria, sixty-eight stadia north of Mylasa, celebrated for its temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Stratios or Labrandenus, on a hill near the city. Mr. Fellowes considers some ruins at Jakli to be those of the temple; but this is doubtful.

LABRO, a sea port in Etruria, mentioned by Cicero along with Pisæ, and supposed by some to be the Liburnum mentioned by Zosimus, and the modern Livorno or Leghorn. Others, however, maintain that the ancient Portus Pisanus corresponds to Leghorn.

LABUS or LABŪTAS (Λάβος or Λαβούτας: now Sobad Koh, part of the Elburz), a mountain of Parthia, between the Coronus and the Sariphi Montes.

Labynētus (Λαβύνητος), a name common to several of the Babylonian monarchs, seems to have been a title rather than a proper name. The Labynetus mentioned by Herodotus (i., 74) as mediating a peace between Cyaxares and Alyattes is the same with Nebuchadnezzar. The Labynetus who is mentioned by Herodotus (i., 77) as a contemporary of Cyrus and Crœsus is the same with the Belshazzar of the prophet Daniel. By other writers he is called Nabonadius or Nabonidus. He was the last king of Babylon. Vid. Cyrus.

Labyrinthus. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

Lacedæmon (Λακεδαίμων), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Taygete, was married to Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he became the father of Amyclas, Eurydice, and Asine. He was king of the country which he called after his own name, Lacedæmon, while he called the capital Sparta after the name of his wife. Vid. Sparta.

Lacedæmŏnĭus (Λακεδαιμόνιος), son of Cimon, so named in honor of the Lacedæmonians.

Lacēdas (Λακήδας) or Leocedes (Herod., vi., 127), king of Argos, and father of Melas.

Lacetāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees.

Lachāres (Λαχάρης). 1. An Athenian demagogue, made himself tyrant of Athens B.C. 296, when the city was besieged by Demetrius. When Athens was on the point of falling into the hands of Demetrius, Lachares made his escape to Thebes.—2. An eminent Athenian rhetorician, who flourished in the fifth century of our era.

Laches (Λάχης), an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war, is first mentioned in B.C. 427. He fell at the battle of Mantinea, 418. In the dialogue of Plato which bears his name, he is represented as not over-acute in argument, and with temper on a par with his acuteness.

Lachĕsis, one of the Fates. Vid. Mœræ.

Lacĭa or Lacĭădæ (Λακία, Λακιάδαι: Λακιάδης, Λακιεύς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Œneis, west of, and near to Athens.

Lacĭnĭum (Λακίνιον ἄκρον), a promontory on the eastern coast of Bruttium, a few miles south of Croton, and forming the western boundary of the Tarentine Gulf. It possessed a celebrated temple of Juno, who was worshipped here under the surname of Lacinia. The remains of this temple are still extant, and have given the modern name to the promontory, Capo delle Colonne or Capo di Nao (ναός). Hannibal dedicated in this temple a bilingual inscription (in Punic and Greek), which recorded the history of his campaigns, and of which Polybius made use in writing his history.

Lacippo (now Alecippe), a town in Hispania Bætica, not far from the sea, and west of Malaca.

Lacmon or Lacmus (Λάκμων, Λάκμος), the northern part of Mount Pindus, in which the River Aous has its origin.

Lacobrīga. 1. (Now Lobera), a town of the Vaccæi in the north of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Tarraco.—2 (Now Lagoa), a town on the southwest o[f Lusi]tania, east of the Promontorium Sacrum.

Lacōnĭca (Λακωνική), sometimes called [Laco]nĭa by the Romans, a country of Pelop[onnesus], was bounded on the north by Argolis a[nd Ar]cadia, on the west by Messenia, and on th[e east] and south by the sea. Laconica was a [long] valley, running southward to the sea, and inclosed on three sides by mountains. O[n the] north it was separated by Mount Parnon [from] Argolis, and by Mount Sciritis from Ar[cadia]. It was bounded by Mount Taygetus on the w[est], and by Mount Parnon on the east, which [are] two masses of mountains extending from [Ar]cadia to the southern extremities of the [Pelo]ponnesus, Mount Taygetus terminating a[t the] Promontorium Tænarum, and Mount P[arnon] continued under the names of Thornax [and] Zarex, terminating at the Promontorium M[alea]. The River Eurotas flows through the v[alley] lying between these mountain masses, and [falls] into the Laconian Gulf. In the upper p[art of] its course the valley is narrow, and near Sp[arta] the mountains approach so close to each o[ther] as to leave little more than room for the c[han]nel of the river. It is for this reason that [we] find the vale of Sparta called the hollow L[ace]dæmon. Below Sparta the mountains re[cede], and the valley opens out into a plain of co[nsid]erable extent. The soil of this plain is p[oor], but on the slopes of the mountains there is [land] of considerable fertility. There were valu[able] marble quarries near Tænarus. Off the c[oast] shell-fish were caught, which produced a pu[rple] dye inferior only to the Tyrian. Laconica [is] well described by Euripides as difficult of acc[ess] to an enemy. On the north the country co[uld] only be invaded by the valleys of the Euro[tas] and the Œnus; the range of Taygetus form[ed] an almost insuperable barrier on the west, a[nd] the want of good harbors on the eastern co[ast] protected it from invasion by sea on that side. Sparta was the only town of importance in the country. Vid. Sparta. The most ancient in[habitants] of the country are said to have been Cynurians and Leleges. They were expelled or conquered by the Achæans, who were the inhabitants of the country in the heroic age. The Dorians afterward invaded Peloponnesus and became the ruling race in Laconica. Some of the old Achæan inhabitants were reduced to slavery; but a great number of them became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Periœci (Περίοικοι). The general name for the inhabitants is Lacōnes (Λάκωνες) or Lacedæmŏnii (Λακεδαιμόνιοι); but the Periœci are frequently called Lacedæmonii, to distinguish them from the Spartans.

Lacōnĭcus Sinus (κόλπος Λακωνικός), a gulf in the south of Peloponnesus, into which the Eurotas falls, beginning west at the Promontorium Tænarum, and east at the Promontorium Malea.

[Lacratides (Λακρατίδης), said to have been an archon at Athens at the time of the Persian invasion: in his archonship there was so heavy a fall of snow, and so intense cold, that the epithet "Lacratidian" became proverbial for intense cold.]

Lactantĭus, a celebrated Christian father; but his exact name, the place of his nativity and the date of his birth, are uncertain. In modern works we find him denominated Lucius Cœlius Firmianus Lactantius; but the two former appellations, in the second of which Cæcilius is often substituted for Cœlius, are omitted in many MSS., while the two latter are frequently presented in an inverted order. Since he is spoken of as far advanced in life about A.D. 315, he must have been born not later than the middle of the third century, probably in Italy, possibly at Firmum, on the Adriatic, and certainly studied in Africa, where he became the pupil of Arnobius, who taught rhetoric at Sicca. His fame became so widely extended, that about 301 he was invited by Diocletian to settle at Nicomedia, and there to practice his art. At this period he appears to have become a Christian. He was summoned to Gaul about 312–318, when now an old man, to superintend the education of Crispus, son of Constantine, and he probably died at Treves some ten or twelve years afterward (325–330). The extant works of Lactantius, are, I. Divinarum Institutionum Libri VII., a sort of introduction to Christianity, intended to supersede the less perfect treatises of Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and Cyprian. Each of the seven books bears a separate title: (1.) De Falsa Religione. (2.) De Origine Erroris. (3.) De Falsa Sapientia. (4.) De Vera Sapientia et Religione. (5.) De Justitia. (6.) De Vero Cultu. (7.) De Vita Beata.—II. An Epitome of the Institutions.—III. De Ira Dei.—IV. De Opificio Dei s. De Formatione Hominis.—V. De Mortibus Persecutorum.—VI. Various Poems, most of which were probably not written by Lactantius. The style of Lactantius, formed upon the model of the great orator of Rome, has gained for him the appellation of the Christian Cicero, and not undeservedly. The best edition of Lactantius is by Le Brun and Lenglet du Fresnoy, Paris, 1748.

Lactārĭus Mons or Lactis Mons, a mountain in Campania, belonging to the Apennines, four miles east of Stabiæ, so called because the cows which grazed upon it produced excellent milk. Here Narses gained a victory over the Goths, A.D. 553.

[Lactodūrum (now probably Towcester), a city of the Catyeuchlani in Britannia Romana, on the way from Londinium to Lindum.]

Lacȳdes (Λακύδης,) a native of Cyrene, succeeded Arcesilaus as president of the Academy at Athens. The place where his instructions were delivered was a garden, named the Lacydeum (Λακύδειον), provided for the purpose by his friend Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamus. This alteration in the locality of the school seems at least to have contributed to the rise of the name of the New Academy. He died about 215 from the effects, it is said, of excessive drinking.

Lade (Λάδη), an island off the western coast of Caria, opposite to Miletus and to the bay into which the Mæander falls.

[Lades, son of Imbrasus, a follower of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

Ladon (Λάδων). 1. The dragon who guarded the apples of the Hesperides, was the offspring of Typhon and Echidna, or of Terra (Ge), or of Phorcys and Ceto. He was slain by Hercules; and the representation of the battle was placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars.—[2. An Arcadian, companion and friend of Æneas, slain by Halesus.]

Ladon (Λάδων). 1. A river in Arcadia, which rose near Clitor, and fell into the Alphēus between Heræ and Phrixa. In mythology Ladon is the husband of Stymphalis, and the father of Daphne and Metope.—2. A small river in Elis, which rose on the frontiers of Achaia and fell into the Penēus.

Læētāni, a people on the eastern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the mouth of the River Rubicatus (now Llobregat), probably the same as the Laletani, whose country, Laletānĭa, produced good wine, and whose chief town was Barcino.

Lælaps (Λαῖλαψ), i. e., the storm wind, personified in the legend of the dog of Procris which bore this name. Procris had received this swift animal from Diana (Artemis), and gave it to her husband Cephalus. When the Teumessian fox was sent to punish the Thebans, Cephalus sent the dog Lælaps against the fox. The dog overtook the fox, but Jupiter (Zeus) changed both animals into a stone, which was shown in the neighborhood of Thebes.

Lælĭānus, one of the thirty tyrants, emperor in Gaul after the death of Postumus, A.D. 267, was slain, after a few months, by his own soldiers, who proclaimed Victorinus in his stead.

Lælĭus. 1. C., was from early manhood the friend and companion of Scipio Africanus the elder, and fought under him in almost all his campaigns. He was consul B.C. 190, and obtained the province of Cisalpine Gaul.—2. C., surnamed Sapiens, son of the preceding. His intimacy with Scipio Africanus the younger was as remarkable as his father's friendship with the elder, and it obtained an imperishable monument in Cicero's treatise Lælius sive de Amicitia. He was born about 186, was tribune of the plebs 151, prætor 145, and consul 140. Though not devoid of military talents, as his campaign against the Lusitanian Viriathus proved, he was more of a statesman than a soldier, and more of a philosopher than a statesman. From Diogenes of Babylon, and afterward from Panætius, he imbibed the doctrines of the Stoic school; his father's friend Polybius was his friend also; the wit and idiom of Terence were pointed and polished by his and Scipio's conversation; and the satirist Lucilius was his familiar companion. The political opinions of Lælius were different at different periods of his life. He endeavored, probably during his tribunate, to procure a redivision of the public land, but he desisted from the attempt, and for his forbearance received the appellation of the Wise or the Prudent. He afterward became a strenuous supporter of the aristocratical party. Several of his orations were extant in the time of Cicero, but were characterized more by smoothness (lenitas) than by power. Lælius is the principal interlocutor in Cicero's dialogue De Amicitia, and is one of the speakers in the De Senectute and in the De Republica. His two daughters were married, the one to Q. Mucius Scævola, the augur, the other to C. Fannius Strabo. The opinion of his worth seems to have been universal, and it is one of Seneca's injunctions to his friend Lucilius "to live like Lælius."

Lænas, Popilius, plebeians. The family was unfavorably distinguished, even among the Romans, for their sternness, cruelty, and haughtiness of character. 1. M., four times consul, B. C. 359, 356, 350, 348. In his third consulship (350) he won a hard-fought battle against the Gauls, for which he celebrated a triumph—the first ever obtained by a plebeian.—2. M., prætor 176, consul 172, and censor 159. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurian mountaineers; and when the remainder of the tribe surrendered to him, he sold them all as slaves.—3. C., brother of No. 2, was consul 172. He was afterward sent as ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, whom the senate wished to abstain from hostilities against Egypt. Antiochus was just marching upon Alexandrea when Popilius gave him the letter of the senate, which the king read, and promised to take into consideration with his friends. Popilius straightway described with his cane a circle in the sand round the king, and ordered him not to stir out of it before he had given a decisive answer. This boldness so frightened Antiochus, that he at once yielded to the demand of Rome.—4. P., consul 132, the year after the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He was charged by the victorious aristocratical party with the prosecution of the accomplices of Gracchus; and in this odious task he showed all the hard-heartedness of his family. He subsequently withdrew himself, by voluntary exile, from the vengeance of C. Gracchus, and did not return to Rome till after his death.

[Laerces (Λαέρκης). 1. Father of Alcimedon, one of the chiefs of the Myrmidons under Achilles.—2. An artist employed by Nestor to gild the horns of the victims sacrificed to the gods.]

Laertes (Λαέρτης), king of Ithaca, was son of Acrisius and Chalcomedusa, and husband of Anticlēa, by whom he became the father of Ulysses and Ctimene. Some writers call Ulysses the son of Sisyphus. Vid. Anticlea. Laertes took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was still alive when Ulysses returned to Ithaca after the fall of Troy.

Laertius, Diogĕnes. Vid. Diogenes.

Læstrygŏnes (Λαιστρυγόνες), a savage race of cannibals, whom Ulysses encountered in his wanderings. They were governed by Antiphates and Lamus. They belong, however, to mythology rather than to history. The modern interpreters of Homer place them on the northwestern coast of Sicily. The Greeks themselves placed them on the eastern coast of the island, in the plains of Leontini, which are therefore called Læstrygonii Campi. The Romans, however, and more especially the Roman poets, who regarded the Promontorium Circeium as the Homeric island of Circe, transplanted the Læstrygones to the southern coast of Latium, in the neighborhood of Formiæ, which they supposed to have been built by Lamus, the king of this people. Hence Horace (Carm., iii., 16, 34) speaks of Læstrigonia Bacchus in amphora, that is, Formian wine; and Ovid (Met., xiv., 233) calls Formiæ Læstrygonis Lami Urbs.

Lævi or Levi, a Ligurian people in Gallia Transpadana, on the River Ticinus, which, in conjunction with the Marici, built the town of Ticinum (now Pavia.)

Lævīnus, Valerius. 1. P., consul B.C. 280, had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king wrote to Lævinus, offering to arbitrate between Rome and Tarentum; but Lævinus bluntly bade him mind his own business, and begone to Epirus. An Epirot spy having been taken in the Roman lines, Lævinus showed him the legions under arms, and bade him tell his master, if he was curious about the Roman arms and tactics, to come and see them himself. In the battle which followed, Lævinus was defeated by Pyrrhus on the banks of the Siris.—2. M., prætor 215, crossed over to Greece and carried on war against Philip. He continued in the command in Greece till 211, when he was elected consul in his absence. In his consulship (210) he carried on the war in Sicily, and took Agrigentum. He continued as proconsul in Sicily for several years, and in 208 made a descent upon the coast of Africa. He died 200, and his sons Publius and Marcus honored his memory with funeral games and gladiatorial combats, exhibited during four successive days in the forum.—3. C., son of No. 2, was by the mother's side brother of M. Fulvius Nobilior, consul 189. Lævinus was himself consul in 176, and carried on war against the Ligurians.

Lagos, a city in great Phrygia.

Lagus (Λάγος), a Macedonian of obscure birth, was the father, or reputed father, of Ptolemy, the founder of the Egyptian monarchy. He married Arsinoē, a concubine of Philip of Macedon, who was said to have been pregnant at the time of their marriage, on which account the Macedonians generally looked upon Ptolemy as the son of Philip.

Lāis (Λαΐς), the name of two celebrated Grecian Hetæræ or courtezans. 1. The elder, a native probably of Corinth, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her age. She was notorious also for her avarice and caprice.—2. The younger, was the daughter of Timandra, and was probably born at Hyccara in Sicily. According to some accounts she was brought to Corinth when seven years old, having been taken prisoner in the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and bought by a Corinthian. This story, however, involves numerous difficulties, and seems to have arisen from a confusion between this Lais and the elder one of the same name. She was a contemporary and rival of Phryne. She became enamored of a Thessalian named Hippolochus or Hippostratus and accompanied him to Thessaly. Here, it is said, some Thessalian women, jealous of her beauty, enticed her into a temple of Venus (Aphrodite), and there stoned her to death.

[Laispodias (Λαισποδίας), an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war. In B.C. 411 one of the envoys sent by the Four Hundred to Sparta.]

Laïus (Λάϊος), son of Labdacus, lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by Lycus. Vid. Labdacus. When Lycus was slain by Amphion and Zethus, Laius took refuge with Pelops in Peloponnesus. After the death of Amphion and Zethus, Laius returned to Thebes and ascended the throne of his father. He married Jocasta, and became by her the father of Œdipus, by whom he was slain. For details, vid. ŒDIPUS.

[LALA, of Cyzicus, a female painter, who lived at Rome about B.C. 74; celebrated especially for her portraits of women.]

LĂLĂGE, a common name of courtezans, from the Greek λαλαγή, prattling, used as a term of endearment, "little prattler."

LALETĀNI. Vid. LÆETANI.

LAMĂCHUS (Λάμαχος), an Athenian, son of Xenophanes, was the colleague of Alcibiades and Nicias in the great Sicilian expedition, B.C. 415. He fell under the walls of Syracuse, in a sally of the besieged. He appears among the dramatis personæ of Aristophanes as the brave and somewhat blustering soldier, delighting in the war, and thankful, moreover, for its pay. Plutarch describes him as brave, but so poor, that on every fresh appointment he used to beg for money from the government to buy clothing and shoes.

[LAMBRUS (now Lambro), a river in Gallia Transpadana, which rose in the Lake Eupilis (now Lago di Pusiano), and fell into the Po between Ticinum and Placentia.]

LAMĒTUS (now Lamata), a river in Bruttium, near Croton, which falls into the LAMETICUS SINUS. Upon it was the town LAMĒTĪNI (now St. Eufemia).

LAMĬA (Λαμία). 1. A female phantom. Vid. EMPUSA.—2. A celebrated Athenian courtezan, was a favorite mistress for many years of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

LAMĬA, ÆLĬUS. This family claimed a high antiquity, and pretended to be descended from the mythical hero LAMUS. 1. L., a Roman eques, supported Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, B.C. 63, and was accordingly banished by the influence of the consuls Gabinius and Piso in 58. He was subsequently recalled from exile, and during the civil wars espoused Cæsar's party.—2. L., son of the preceding, and the friend of Horace, was consul A.D. 3. He was made præfectus urbi in 32, but he died in the following year.—3. L., was married to Domitia Longina, the daughter of Corbulo; but during the lifetime of Vespasian he was deprived of her by Domitian, who first lived with her as his mistress, and subsequently married her. Lamia was put to death by Domitian after his accession to the throne.

LAMĬA (Λαμία : Λαμιεύς, Λαμιώτης : now Zeitun or Zeituni), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, situated on the small river Achelous, and fifty stadia inland from the Maliac Gulf, on which it possessed a harbor, called Phalara. It has given its name to the war, which was carried on by the confederate Greeks against Antipater after the death of Alexander, B.C. 323. The confederates under the command of Leosthenes, the Athenian, defeated Antipater, who took refuge in Lamia, where he was besieged for some months. Leosthenes was killed during the siege; and the confederates were obliged to raise it in the following year (322), in consequence of the approach of Leonnatus. The confederates under the command of Antiphilus defeated Leonnatus, who was slain in the action. Soon afterward Antipater was joined by Craterus; and, thus strengthened, he gained a decisive victory over the confederates at the battle of Cranon, which put an end to the Lamian war.

LAMINĬUM (Laminitānus), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, ninety-five miles southeast of Toletum.

LAMPA or LAPPA (Λάμπη, Λάππη : Λαμπαῖος, Λαμπεύς), a town in the north of Crete, a little inland, south of Hydramum, said to have been built by Agamemnon, but to have been called after Lampus.

LAMPĒA (ἡ Λάμπεια), or LAMPĒUS MONS, a part of the mountain range of Erymanthus, on the frontiers of Achaia and Elis.

LAMPĔTĬA (Λαμπετίη), daughter of Helios by the nymph Neæra. She and her sister Phaethusa tended the flocks of their father in Sicily. In some legends she appears as one of the sisters of Phaethon.

LAMPON (Λάμπων). 1. An Æginetan, son of Pytheas, urged Pausanias, after the battle of Platææ, to avenge the death of Leonidas by insulting the corpse of Mardonius.—2. An Athenian, a celebrated soothsayer and interpreter of oracles. In conjunction with Xenocritus, he led the colony which founded Thurii in Italy, B.C. 443.

LAMPONĬA or -ĬUM (Λαμπώνεια, -ώνιον), an important city of Mysia, in the interior of the Troad, near the borders of Æolis.

[LAMPŌNIUS M., a Lucanian, one of the principal captains of the Italians in the war of the allies with Rome, B.C. 90–88.]

LAMPRA, LAMPRÆ, or LAMPTRÆ (Λαμπρά, Λαμπραί, Λαμπτραί : Λαμπρεύς : now Lamorica), a demus on the western coast of Attica, near the promontory Astypalæa, belonging to the tribe Erechtheis. It was divided into an upper and a lower city.

LAMPRIDĬUS, ÆLĬUS, one of the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ, lived in the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, and wrote the lives of the emperors: 1. Commodus; 2. Antoninus Diadumenus; 3. Elagabalus; and, 4. Alexander Severus. It is not improbable that Lampridius is the same as Spartianus, and that the name of the author in full was Ælius Lampridius Spartianus. For the editions of Lampridius, vid. CAPITOLINUS.

[LAMPROCLES (Λαμπροκλῆς). 1. The eldest son of Socrates.—2. An Athenian dithyrambic poet and musician, who probably flourished at the end of the sixth or beginning of the fifth century B.C.]

LAMPSĂCUS (Λάμψακος : Λαμψακηνός : ruins at Lapsaki) an important city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Hellespont, possessed a good harbor. It was celebrated for its wine; and hence it was one of the cities assigned by Xerxes to Themistocles for his maintenance. It was the chief seat of the worship of Priapus, and the birth-place of the historian Charon, the philosophers Adimantus and Metrodorus, and the rhetorician Anaximenes. Lampsacus was a colony of the Phocæans: the name of the surrounding district, Bebrycia, connects its old inhabitants with the Thracian BEBRYCES.

[LAMPUS (Λάμπος). 1. A son of Laomedon, and father of Dolops, was one of the Trojan elders.—2. The name of two horses, one belonging to Aurora (Eos), the other to Hector.]

Lamus (Λάμος). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon), and king of the Læstrygones, was said to have founded Formiæ in Italy. Vid. Formiæ.—[2. A Rutulian leader, slain by Nisus.]

Lamus (Λάμος: now Lamas), a river of Cilicia, the boundary between Cilicia Aspera and Cilicia Campestris; with a town of the same name.

[Lanassa (Λάνασσα). 1. Grand-daughter of Hercules, carried away from the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) at Dodona by Pyrrhus, son of Achilles, bore him eight children.—2. Daughter of Agathocles, wife of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus; left him to marry Demetrius Poliorcetes.]

Lancia (Lancienses). 1. (Now Sollanco or Sollancia, near Leon), a town of the Astures in Hispania Tarraconensis, nine miles east of Legio, was destroyed by the Romans.—2. Surnamed Oppidana, a town of the Vettones in Lusitania, not far from the sources of the River Munda.—[3. L. Transcudana (now Ciudad Rodrigo), a town of Hispania, east of No. 2, so called from lying on the other side of the river Cuda (now Coa).]

Langobardi or Longobardi, corrupted into Lombards, a German tribe of the Suevic race. They dwelt originally on the left bank of the Elbe, near the River Saale; but they afterward crossed the Elbe, and dwelt on the eastern bank of the river, where they were for a time subject to Maroboduus in the reign of Tiberius. After this they disappear from history for four centuries. Like most of the other German tribes, they migrated southward; and in the second half of the fifth century we find them again on the northern bank of the Danube, in Upper Hungary. Here they defeated and almost annihilated the Heruli. In the middle of the sixth century they crossed the Danube, at the invitation of Justinian, and settled in Pannonia. Here they were engaged for thirty years in a desperate conflict with the Gepidæ, which only ended with the extermination of the latter people. In A.D. 568, Alboin, the king of the Lombards, under whose command they had defeated the Gepidæ, led his nation across the Julian Alps, and conquered the plains of Northern Italy, which received and have ever since retained the name of Lombardy. Here he founded the celebrated kingdom of the Lombards, which existed for upward of two centuries, till its overthrow by Charlemagne. Paulus Diaconus, who was a Lombard by birth, derives their name of Langobardi from their long beards; but modern critics reject this etymology, and suppose the name to have reference to their dwelling on the banks of the Elbe, inasmuch as Börde signifies in low German a fertile plain on the bank of a river, and there is still a district in Magdeburg called the lange Börde. Paulus Diaconus also states that the Lombards came originally from Scandinavia, where they were called Vinili, and that they did not receive the name of Langobardi or Long-Beards till they settled in Germany; but this statement ought probably to be rejected.

Lanice (Λανίκη), nurse of Alexander the Great, and sister of Clitus.

Lanuvium (Lanuvinus: now Lavigna), ancient city in Latium, situated on a hill of Alban Mount, not far from the Appia Via, subsequently a Roman municipium. It possessed an ancient and celebrated temple of Juno Sospita. Under the empire it ci[illegible] some importance as the birth-place of Antoninus Pius. Part of the walls of Lanuvium the substructions of the temple of Juno are remaining.

Laŏcŏon (Λαοκόων), a Trojan, who play[illegible] prominent part in the post-Homeric legend, was a son of Antenor or Acoetes, and a priest of the Thymbræan Apollo. He tried to dissuade his countrymen from drawing into the city the wooden horse, which the Greeks had left behind them when they pretended to sail away from Troy; and, to show the danger from the horse, he hurled a spear into its side. The Trojans, however, would not listen to his advice; and as he was preparing to sacrifice a bull to Neptune (Poseidon), suddenly two fearful serpents were seen swimming toward the Trojan coast from Tenedos. They rushed toward Laocoon, who, while all the people took to flight, remained with his two sons standing by the altar of the god. The serpents first coiled around the two boys, and then around the father, and thus all three perished. The serpents then hastened to the acropolis of Troy, and disappeared behind the shield of Tritonis. The reason why Laocoon suffered this fearful death is differently stated. According to some, it was because he had run his lance into the side of the horse; according to others, because, contrary to the will of Apollo, he had married and begotten children; or, according to others again, because Neptune (Poseidon), being hostile to the Trojans, wanted to show to the Trojans in the person of Laocoon what fate all of them deserved. The story of Laocoon's death was a fine subject for epic and lyric as well as tragic poetry, and was therefore frequently related by ancient poets, such as by Bacchylides, Sophocles, Euphorion, Virgil, and others. His death also formed the subject of many ancient works of art; and a magnificent group, representing the father and his two sons entwined by the two serpents, is still extant, and preserved in the Vatican. Vid. Agesander.

[Laocoosa (Λαοκόωσα), wife of Aphareus, and mother of Idas and Lynceus in Theocritus.]

Laŏdămas (Λαοδάμας). 1. Son of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians, and Arete.—2. Son of Eteocles, and king of Thebes, in whose reign the Epigoni marched against Thebes. In the battle against the Epigoni, he slew their leader Ægialeus, but was himself slain by Alcmæon. Others related, that after the battle was lost, Laodamas fled to the Encheleans in Illyricum.—[3. A son of Antenor, slain before Troy by Ajax, son of Telamon.]

Laodamia (Λαοδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Acastus, and wife of Protesilaus. When her husband was slain before Troy, she begged the gods to be allowed to converse with him for only three hours. The request was granted. Mercury (Hermes) led Protesilaus back to the upper world, and when Protesilaus died a second time, Laodamia died with him. A late tradition states that, after the second death of Protesilaus, Laodamia made an image of her husband, to which she paid divine honors; but as her father Acastus interfered, and commanded her to burn the image, she herself leaped into the fire.—2. Daughter of Bellerophontes, became by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of Sarpedon, and was killed by Diana (Artemis) while she was engaged in weaving.—3. Nurse of Orestes, usually called ARSINOE.

LAŎDĬCE (Λαοδίκη). 1. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and wife of Helicaon. Some relate that she fell in love with Acamas, the son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes as ambassador to Troy, and that she became by Acamas the mother of Munitus. On the death of this son she leaped down a precipice, or was swallowed up by the earth.—2. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytæmnestra (Hom., Il., ix., 146), called Electra by the tragic poets. Vid. ELECTRA.—3. Mother of Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy.—4. Wife of Antiochus II. Theos, king of Syria, and mother of Seleucus Callinicus For details, vid. p. 66, b.—5. Wife of Seleucus Callinicus, and mother of Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great.—6. Wife of Antiochus the Great, was a daughter of Mithradates IV., king of Pontus, and grand-daughter of No. 4.—7. Wife of Achæus, the cousin and adversary of Antiochus the Great, was a sister of No. 6.—8. Daughter of Antiochus the Great by his wife Laodice (No. 6). She was married to her eldest brother Antiochus, who died in his father's lifetime. 195.—9. Daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was married to Perseus, king of Macedonia.—10. Daughter of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, was married to the impostor Alexander Balas. —11. Wife and also sister of Mithradates Eupator (commonly called the Great), king of Pontus. During the absence of her husband, and deceived by a report of his death, she gave free scope to her amours; and, alarmed for the consequences, on his return attempted his life by poison. Her designs were, however, betrayed to Mithradates, who immediately put her to death.—12. Another sister of Mithradates Eupator, married to Ariarathes VI., king of Cappadocia. After the death of her husband she married Nicomedes, king of Bithynia.

LAŎDĬCĒA (Λαοδίκεια: Λαοδικεύς, Laodicensis, Laodicēnus), the name of six Greek cities in Asia, four of which (besides another now unknown) were founded by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honor of his mother Laodice, the other two by Antiochus II. and Antiochus I. or III. Vid. Nos. 1. and 5. 1. L. AD LYCUM (Λ. πρὸς τῷ Λύκῳ, ruins at Eski-Hissar), a city of Asia Minor, stood on a ridge of hills near the southern bank of the River Lycus (now Choruk-Su), a tributary of the Mæander, a little to the west of Colossæ and to the south of Hierapolis, on the borders of Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia, to each of which it is assigned by different writers; but, after the definitive division of the provinces, it is reckoned as belonging to Great Phrygia, and under the later Roman emperors it was the capital of Phrygia Pacatiana. It was founded by Antiochus II. Theos, on the site of a previously existing town, and named in honor of his wife Laodice. It passed from the kings of Syria to those of Pergamus, and from them to the Romans, to whom Attalus III. bequeathed his kingdom. Under the Romans it belonged to the province of Asia. At first it was comparatively an insignificant place, and it suffered much from the frequent earthquakes to which its site seems to be more exposed than that of any other city of Asia Minor, and also from the Mithradatic War. Under the later Roman republic and the early emperors, it rose to importance; and, though more than once almost destroyed by earthquakes, it was restored by the aid of the emperors and the munificence of its own citizens, and became, next to Apamea, the greatest city in Phrygia, and one of the most flourishing in Asia Minor. In an inscription it is called "the most splendid city of Asia," a statement confirmed by the magnificent ruins of the city, which comprise an aqueduct, a gymnasium, several theatres, a stadium almost perfect, besides remains of roads, porticoes, pillars, gates, foundations of houses, and sarcophagi. This great prosperity was owing partly to its situation, on the high road for the traffic between the east and west of Asia, and partly to the fertility and beauty of the country round it. Already in the apostolic age it was the seat of a flourishing Christian Church, which, however, became very soon infected with the pride and luxury produced by the prosperity of the city, as we learn from St John's severe Epistle to it (Revel. iii., 14–22) St. Paul also addresses it in common with the neighboring church of Colossæ (Coloss. ii., 1; iv., 13, 16).—2. L. COMBUSTA (Λ. ἡ κατακεκαυμένη or κεκαυμένη, i. e., the burned; the reason of the epithet is doubtful: ruins at Ladik), a city of Lycaonia, north of Iconium, on the high road from the western coast of Asia Minor to the Euphrates.—3. L. AD MARE (Λ. ἐπὶ τῇ θαλάττῃ: now Ladikiyeh), a city on the coast of Syria, about fifty miles south of Antioch, was built by Seleucus I. on the site of an earlier city, called Ramitha, or Λευκὴ Ἀκτή. It had the best harbor in Syria, and the surrounding country was celebrated for its wine and fruits, which formed a large part of the traffic of the city. In the civil contests during the later period of the Syrian kingdom, Laodicea obtained virtual independence, in which it was confirmed probably by Pompey, and certainly by Julius Cæsar, who greatly favored the city. In the civil wars, after Cæsar's death, the Laodiceans were severely punished by Cassius for their adherence to Dolabella, and the city again suffered in the Parthian invasion of Syria, but was recompensed by Antony with exemption from taxation. Herod the Great built the Laodiceans an aqueduct, the ruins of which still exist. It is mentioned occasionally as an important city under the later Roman empire; and, after the conquest of Syria by the Arabs, it was one of those places on the coast which still remained in the hands of the Greek emperors, and with a Christian population. It was taken and destroyed by the Arabs in 1188. It is now a poor Turkish village, with very considerable ruins of the ancient city, the chief of which are a triumphal arch, the remains of the mole of the harbor, of a portico near it, of catacombs on the sea-coast, of the aqueducts and cisterns, and of pillars where the Necropolis is supposed to have stood.—L. AD LIBĂNUM (Λ. Λιβανοῦ, πρὸς Λιβανῷ), a city of Cœle-Syria, at the northern entrance to the narrow valley (αὐλών), between Libanus and Antilibanus, appears to have been, through its favorable situation, a place of commercial importance. During the possession of Cœle-Syria by the Greek kings of Egypt, it was the southwestern border fortress of Syria. It was the chief city of a district called Laodicene.—5. A city in the southeast of Media, near the boundary of Persis, founded either by Antiochus I. Soter, or Antiochus II. the Great: site unknown.—6. In Mesopotamia: site unknown.

LAŎDŎCUS (Λαόδοκος). 1. Son of Bias and Pero, and brother of Talaus, took part in the expeditions of the Argonauts, and of the Seven against Thebes.—2. Son of Antenor.—[3. A Grecian, companion and charioteer of Antilochus in the Trojan war.]

LAŎMĔDON (Λαομέδων). 1. King of Troy, son of Ilus and Eurydice, and father of Priam, Hesione, and other children. His wife is called Strymo, Rhœo, Placia, Thoosa, Zeuxippe, or Leucippe. Neptune (Poseidon) and Apollo, who had displeased Jupiter (Zeus), were doomed to serve Laomedon for wages. Accordingly, Neptune (Poseidon) built the walls of Troy, while Apollo tended the king's flocks on Mount Ida. When the two gods had done their work, Laomedon refused them the reward he had promised them, and expelled them from his dominions. Thereupon Neptune (Poseidon) in wrath let loose the sea over the lands, and also sent a marine monster to ravage the country. By the command of an oracle, the Trojans were obliged, from time to time, to sacrifice a maiden to the monster; and on one occasion it was decided by lot that Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon himself, should be the victim. But it happened that Hercules was just returning from his expedition against the Amazons, and he promised to save the maiden if Laomedon would give him the horses which Tros had once received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for Ganymedes. Laomedon promised them to Hercules, but again broke his word, when Hercules had killed the monster and saved Hesione. Hereupon Hercules sailed with a squadron of six ships against Troy, killed Laomedon, with all his sons, except Podarces (Priam), and gave Hesione to Telamon. Hesione ransomed her brother Priam with her veil. Priam, as the son of Laomedon, is called LAOMEDONTIĂDES; and the Trojans, as the subjects of Laomedon, are called LAOMEDONTIĂDÆ.—2. Of Mytilene, was one of Alexander's generals, and after the king's death (B.C. 323) obtained the government of Syria. He was afterward defeated by Nicanor, the general of Ptolemy, and deprived of Syria.

[LAOTHOE (Λαοθόη), daughter of Altes, the king of the Leleges, and mother of Lycaon by Priam.]

[LAPERSÆ. Vid. LAS.]

LAPĒTHUS or LAPATHUS (Λάπηθος, Λάπαθος: Λαπήθιος, Λαπηθεύς: now Lapitho or Lapta), an important town on the northern coast of Cyprus, on a river of the same name, east of the Promontorium Crommyon.

LAPHRĬA (Λαφρία), a surname of Diana (Artemis) among the Calydonians, from whom the worship of the goddess was introduced into Naupactus and Patræ, in Achaia. The name was traced back to a hero, Laphrius, son of Castalius, who was said to have instituted her worship at Calydon.

LAPHYSTĬUS (Λαφύστιος), a mountain in Bœotia, between Coronea, Lebadea, and Orchomenus, on which was a temple of Jupiter (Zeus), who hence bore the surname Laphystius.

LAPIDĔI CAMPI. Vid. CAMPI LAPIDEI.

LĂPĬTHES (Λαπίθης), son of Apollo and Stilbe, brother of Centaurus, and husband of Orsinome, the daughter of Eurynomus, by whom he became the father of Phorbas, Triopas, and Periphas. He was regarded as the ancestor of the LAPITHÆ in the mountains of Thessaly. The Lapithæ were governed by Pirithous, who, being a son of Ixion, was a half-brother of the Centaurs. The latter, therefore, demanded their share in their father's kingdom, and, as their claims were not satisfied, a war arose between the Lapithæ and Centaurs, which, however, was terminated by a peace. But when Pirithous married Hippodamia, and invited the Centaurs to the marriage feast, the latter, fired by wine and urged on by Mars (Ares), attempted to carry off the bride and the other women. Thereupon a bloody conflict ensued, in which the Centaurs were defeated by the Lapithæ. The Lapithæ are said to have been the inventors of bits and bridles for horses. It is probable that they were a Pelasgian people, who defeated the less civilized Centaurs, and compelled them to abandon Mount Pelion.

[LAPURDUM (now Bayonne), a city of the Tarbelli in Gallia Aquitanica, on the River Aturus.]

LAR or LARS, was an Etruscan prænomen, borne, for instance, by Porsena and Tolumnius. From the Etruscans it passed over to the Romans, whence we read of Lar Herminius, who was consul B.C. 448. This word signified lord, king, or hero in the Etruscan.

LARA. Vid. LARUNDA.

LARANDA (τὰ Λάρανδα: now Larende or Caraman), a considerable town in the south of Lycaonia, at the northern foot of Mount Taurus in a fertile district: taken by storm by Perdiccas, but afterward restored. It was used by the Isaurian robbers as one of their strongholds.

LARENTĬA. Vid. ACCA LARENTIA.

LARES, inferior gods at Rome. Their worship was closely connected with that of the Manes, and was analogous to the hero worship of the Greeks. The Lares may be divided into two classes, the Lares domestici and Lares publici. The former were the Manes of a house raised to the dignity of heroes. The Manes were more closely connected with the place of burial, while the Lares were more particularly the divinities presiding over the hearth and the whole house. It was only the spirits of good men that were honored as Lares. All the domestic Lares were headed by the Lar familiaris na, who was regarded as the founder of the family. He was inseparable from the family; and when the latter changed their abode, he went with them. Among the Lares publici we have mention made of Lares præstites and Lares compitales, who are in reality the same, and differ only in regard to the place or occasion of their worship. Servius Tullius is said to have instituted their worship; and when Augustus improved the regulations of the city, he also renewed the worship of the public Lares. Their name, Lares præstites, characterizes them as the protecting spirits of the city, in which they had a temple in the uppermost part of the Via Sacra, that is, near a compitum, whence they might be called Compitales. This temple (Sacellum Larum or ædes Larum) contained two images, which were probably those of Romulus and Remus. Now, while these Lares were the general protectors of the whole city, the Lares compitales must be regarded as those who presided over the several divisions of the city, which were marked by the compita or the points where two or more streets crossed each other, and where small chapels (ædiculæ) were erected to them. In addition to the Lares præstites and compitales, there are other Lares which must be reckoned among the public ones, viz., the Lares rurales, who were worshipped in the country; the Lares viales, who were worshipped on the high roads by travellers; and the Lares marini or permarini, to whom P. Æmilius dedicated a sanctuary in remembrance of his naval victory over Antiochus. The worship of the domestic Lares, together with that of the Penates and Manes, constituted what are called the sacra privata. The images of the Lares, in great houses, were usually in a separate compartment, called ædiculæ or lararia. They were generally represented in the cinctus Gabinus. Their worship was very simple, especially in early times and in the country. The offerings were set before them in patellæ, whence they themselves were called patellarii. Pious people made offerings to them every day; but they were more especially worshipped on the calends, nones, and ides of every month. When the inhabitants of the house took their meals, some portion was offered to the Lares, and on joyful family occasions they were adorned with wreaths, and the lararia were thrown open. When the young bride entered the house of her husband, her first duty was to offer a sacrifice to the Lares. Respecting the public worship of the Lares, and the festival of the Larentalia, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. LARENTALIA, COMPITALIA.

LARES (Λάρης: now Alarbous), a city of Northern Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena), southwest of Zama; a place of some importance at the time of the war with Jugurtha.

LARGUS, SCRIBONĬUS. Vid. SCRIBONIUS.

LARĪNUM (Larinas, ātis: now Larino), a town of the Frentani (whence the inhabitants are sometimes called Fretani Larinates), on the River Tifernus, and near the borders of Apulia, subsequently a Roman municipium, possessed a considerable territory extending down to the Adriatic Sea. The town of Clitoria, on the coast, was subject to Larinum.

LARISSA (Λάρισσα), the name of several Pelasgian places, whence Larissa is called in mythology the daughter of Pelasgus. I. In Europe. 1. (Now Larissa or Larza), an important town of Thessaly, in Pelasgiotis, situated on the Peneus, in an extensive plain. It was once the capital of the Pelasgi, and had a democratical constitution, but subsequently became subject to the Macedonians. It retained its importance under the Romans, and after the time of Constantine the Great became the capital of the province of Thessaly.—2. Surnamed CREMASTE (ἡ Κρεμαστή), another important town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, situated on a height, whence probably its name, and distant twenty stadia from the Malian Gulf.—II. In Asia. 1. An ancient city on the coast of the Troad, near Hamaxitus; ruined at the time of the Persian war. —2. L. PHRICŌNIS (Λ. ἡ Φρικωνίς, also αἱ Λήρισσαι), a city on the coast of Mysia, near Cyme (hence called ἡ περὶ τὴν Κύμην), of Pelasgian origin, but colonized by the Æolians, and made a member of the Æolic confederacy. It was also called the Egyptian Larissa (ἡ Αἰγυπτία), because Cyrus the Great settled in it a body of his Egyptian mercenary soldiers.—3. L. EPHESIA (Λ. ἡ Ἐφεσία), a city of Lydia, in the plain of the Cayster, on the northern side of Mount Messogis, northeast of Ephesus; with a temple of Apollo Larissæus.—4. In Assyria, an ancient city on the eastern bank of the Tigris, some distance north of the mouth of the River Zabatas or Lycus, described by Xenophon (Anab., iii., 4). It was deserted when Xenophon saw it; but its brick walls still stood, twenty-five feet thick, one hundred feet high, and two parasangs (=sixty stadia=six geographical miles) in circuit, and there was a stone pyramid near it. Xenophon relates the tradition that, when the empire passed from the Medes to the Persians, the city resisted all the efforts of the Persian king (i. e., Cyrus) to take it, until the inhabitants, terrified at an obscuration of the sun, deserted the city. Mr. Layard identifies the site of Larissa with that of the ruins near Nimroud, the very same site as that of Nineveh. The name Larissa is no doubt a corruption of some Assyrian name (perhaps Al-Assur), which Xenophon naturally fell into through his familiarity with the word as the name of cities in Greece.—5. In Syria, called by the Syrians Sizara (Σίζαρα: now Kulat Seijar), a city in the district of Apamene, on the western bank of the Orontes, about half way between Apamea and Epiphania.

LARISSUS or LARISUS (Λάρισσος. Λάρισος: now Risso), a small river forming the boundary between Achaia and Elis, rises in Mount Scollis, and flows into the Ionian Sea.

LARĬUS LACUS (now Lake of Como), a beautiful Lake in Gallia Transpadana, running from north to south, through which the River Adda flows. After extending about fifteen miles, it is divided into two branches, of which the one to the southwest is about eighteen miles in length, and the one to the southeast about twelve miles. At the extremity of the southwestern branch is the town of Comum; and at the extremity of the southeastern branch the River Adda issues out of the lake. The beauty of the scenery of this lake is praised by Pliny. He had several villas on the banks of the lake, of which he mentions two particularly; one called Comœdia, and the other Tragœdia. (Plin., Ep., ix., 7). Some believe Comœdia to have been situated at the modern Bellagio, on the promontory which divides the two branches of the lake; and Tragœdia at Lenno, on the western bank, where the scenery is more wild. The intermitting fountain, of which Pliny gives an account in another letter (Ep., iv., 30), is still called Pliniana.

LARS TOLUMNIUS. Vid. TOLUMNIUS.

LARTĬA GENS, patrician, distinguished at the beginning of the republic through two of its members, T. Lartius, the first dictator, and Sp. Lartius, the companion of Horatius on the wooden bridge. The name soon after disappears entirely from the annals. The Lartii were of Etruscan origin, as is clearly shown by their name, which comes from the Etruscan word Lar or Lars. Vid. LAR.

[LARTOLÆĒTÆ (Λαρτολαιῆται), a people in the northeast of Hispania Tarraconensis.]

LARUNDA or LARA, daughter of Almon, was a nymph who informed Juno of the connection between Jupiter and Juturna; hence her name is connected with λαλεῖν. Jupiter deprived her of her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her into the lower world. On the way thither, Mercury fell in love with her, and she afterward gave birth to two Lares.

LARVÆ. Vid. LEMURES.

LARYMNA (Λάρυμνα), the name of two towns on the River Cephisus, on the borders of Bœotia and Locris, and distinguished as Upper and Lower Larymna. The latter was at the mouth of the river, and the former a little way inland.

[LARYSIUS MONS (Λαρύσιον ὄρος, τό), a mountain of Laconia sacred to Bacchus (Dionysus).]

LAS (Λᾶς: Ep. Λάας: now Passava), an ancient town of Laconia, on the eastern side of the Laconian Gulf, ten stadia from the sea, and south of Gytheum. It is said to have been once destroyed by the Dioscuri, who hence received the Surname of Lapersæ, or the Destroyers of Las. In the time of the Romans it had ceased to be a place of importance.

LASÆA (Λασαία), a town in the east of Crete, not far from the Promontorium Samonium, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (xxvii., 8).

LASĬON (Λασίων: Λασιώνιος: now Lala), a fortified town in Elis, on the frontiers of Arcadia, and not far from the confluence of the Erymanthus and the Alpheus. The possession of this town was a constant source of dispute between the Eleans and Arcadians.

LASTHĔNES (Λασθένης). 1. An Olynthian, who, together with Euthycrates, betrayed his country to Philip of Macedon, by whom he had been bribed, B.C. 347.—2. A Cretan, one of the principal leaders of his countrymen in their war with the Romans. He was defeated and taken prisoner by Q. Metellus, 67.

LASUS (Λᾶσος), one of the principal Greek lyric poets, was a native of Hermione in Argolis. He is celebrated as the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry, and as the teacher of Pindar. He was contemporary with Simonides, like whom he lived at Athens, under the patronage of Hipparchus. It would appear that Lasus introduced a greater freedom, both of rhythm and of music, into the dithyrambic Ode; that he gave it a more artificial and more mimetic character; and that the subjects of poetry embraced a far wider range than had been customary.

[LATAGUS, a Trojan warrior, slain by Mezentius in the wars of Æneas in Italy.]

LATĔRA STAGNUM (now Etang de Maguelonne et de Perols), a lake in the territory of Nemausus in Gallia Narbonensis, connected with the sea by a canal. On this lake was a fortress of the same name (Chateau de la Latte).

[LATERANUS, L. SEXTIUS. 1. The friend and supporter of C. Licinius Stolo in his attempt to throw open the consulship to the plebeians: he was tribune of the plebs with Licinius B.C. 376 to 367, and was elected consul B.C. 366, being the first plebeian who had obtained that dignity.]—2. PLAUTIUS, one of the lovers of Messalina, wife of the Emperor Claudius, and was, in consequence, condemned to death by the emperor, A.D. 48, but afterward pardoned; he subsequently took part in the conspiracy of Piso against Nero, but was seized and put to death.

LATERENSIS, JUVENTĬUS, was one of the accusers of Plancius, whom Cicero defended, B.C. 54. Vid. PLANCIUS. He was prætor in 51. He served as legate in the army of M. Lepidus, and when the soldiers of Lepidus passed over to Antony, Laterensis put an end to his life.

LĀTHON, LĒTHON, LĒTHES, LĒTHÆUS (Λάθων, Doric, Λήθων, Ληθαῖος), a river of Cyrenaica in Northern Africa, falling into a Lacus Hesperidum, near the city of Hesperis or Berenice, in the region which the early Greek navigators identified with the gardens of the Hesperides.

LATIĀLIS or LATIĀRIS, a surname of Jupiter, as the protecting divinity of Latium. The Latin towns and Rome celebrated to him every year the feriæ Latinæ, on the Alban Mount, which were conducted by one of the Roman consuls. Vid. LATINUS.

[LATINI. Vid. LATIUM.

LATĪNUS. 1. King of Latium, son of Faunus and the nymph Marica, brother of Lavinius, husband of Amata, and father of Lavinia, whom he gave in marriage to Æneas. Vid. LAVINIA. This is the common tradition; but, according to Hesiod, he was a son of Ulysses and Circe, and brother of Agrius, king of the Tyrrhenians; according to Hyginus, he was a son of Telemachus and Circe; while others describe him as a son of Hercules by a Hyperborean woman, who was afterward married to Faunus, or as a son of Hercules by a daughter of Faunus. According to one account, Latinus, after his death, became Jupiter Latiaris, just as Romulus became Quirinus.—2. A celebrated player in the farces called mimes (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.) in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was a great favorite, and whom he served as a delator. He frequently acted as mimus with Thymele as mima.

LATĬUM (ἡ Λατίνη), a country in Italy, inhabited by the LATĪNI. The origin of the name is uncertain. Most of the ancients derived it from a king Latinus, who was supposed to have been a contemporary of Æneas (vid. LATINUS); but there can be no doubt that the name of the people was transferred to this fictitious king. Other ancient critics connected the name with the verb latere, either because Saturn had been hidden in the country, or because Italy is hidden between the Alps and the Apennines! But neither of these explanations deserves a serious refutation. A modern writer derives Latium from latus (like Campania from campus), and supposes it to mean the "flat land;" but the quantity of the a in lātus is opposed to this etymology. The boundaries of Latium varied at different periods. 1. In the most ancient times it reached only from the River Tiber on the north, to the River Numicus and the town of Ardea on the south, and from the sea-coast on the west to the Alban Mount on the east. 2. The territory of Latium was subsequently extended southward; and long before the conquest of the Latins by the Romans, it stretched from the Tiber on the north, to the Promontorium Circeium and Anxur or Tarracina on the south. Even in the treaty of peace made between Rome and Carthage in B.C. 509, we find Antium, Circeii, and Tarracina mentioned as belonging to Latium. The name of Latium antiquum or vetus was subsequently given to the country from the Tiber to the Promontorium Circeium. 3. The Romans still further extended the territories of Latium by the conquest of the Hernici, Æqui, Volsci, and Aurunci, as far as the Liris on the south, and even beyond this river to the town Sinuessa and to Mount Massicus. This new accession of territory was called Latium novum or adjectum. Latium, therefore, in its widest signification, was bounded by Etruria on the north, from which it was separated by the Tiber; by Campania on the south, from which it was separated by the Liris; by the Tyrrhene Sea on the west, and by the Sabine and Samnite tribes on the east. The greater part of this country is an extensive plain of volcanic origin, out of which rises an isolated range of mountains known by the name of MONS ALBANUS, of which the Algidus and the Tusculan hills are branches. Part of this plain, on the coast between Antium and Tarracina, which was at one time well cultivated, became a marsh in consequence of the rivers Nymphæus, Ufens, and Amasenus finding no outlet for their waters (vid. POMPTINÆ PALUDES); but the remainder of the country was celebrated for its fertility in antiquity. The Latini were some of the most ancient inhabitants of Italy. They appear to have been a Pelasgian tribe, and are frequently called Aborigines. At a period long anterior to the foundation of Rome, these Pelasgians or Aborigines descended into the narrow plain between the Tiber and the Numicus, expelled or subdued the Siculi, the original inhabitants of that district, and there became known under the name of Latini. These ancient Latins, who were called Prisci Latini, to distinguish them from the later Latins, the subjects of Rome, formed a league or confederation, consisting of thirty states. The town of Alba Longa subsequently became the head of the league. This town, which founded several colonies, and among others Rome, boasted of a Trojan origin; but the whole story of a Trojan settlement in Italy is probably an invention of later times. Although Rome was a colony from Alba, she became powerful enough in the reign of her third king, Tullus Hostilius, to take Alba and raze it to the ground. In this war Alba seems to have received no assistance from the other Latin towns. Ancus Marcius and Tarquinius Priscus carried on war successfully with several other Latin towns. Under Servius Tullius Rome was admitted into the Latin league; and his successor Tarquinius Superbus compelled the other Latin towns to acknowledge Rome as the head of the league, and to become dependent upon the latter city. But upon the expulsion of the kings the Latins asserted their independence, and commenced a struggle with Rome, which, though frequently suspended and apparently terminated by treaties, was as often renewed, and was not brought to a final close till B.C. 340, when the Latins were defeated by the Romans at the battle of Mount Vesuvius. The Latin league was now dissolved, and the Latins became the subjects of Rome. The following were the most important institutions of the Latins during the time of their independence: The towns of Latium were independent of one another, but formed a league for purposes of mutual protection. This league consisted, as we have already seen, of thirty cities, a number which could not be exceeded. Each state sent deputies to the meetings of the league, which were held in a sacred grove at the foot of the Alban Mount, by the fountain of Ferentina. On the top of the mountain was a temple of Jupiter Latiaris, and a festival was celebrated there in honor of this god from the earliest times. This festival, which was called the Feriæ Latinæ, is erroneously said to have been instituted by Tarquinius Superbus, in commemoration of the alliance between the Romans and Latins. It is true, however, that the festival was raised into one of much greater importance when Rome became the head of the league; for it was now a festival common both to Rome and Latium, and served to unite the two nations by a religious bond. Having thus become a Roman as well as a Latin festival, it continued to be celebrated by the Romans after the dissolution of the Latin league. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. FERIÆ. The chief magistrate in each Latin town appears to have borne the title of dictator. He was elected annually, but might be re-elected at the close of his year of office. Even in the time of Cicero we find dictators in the Latin towns, as, for instance, in Lanuvium. (Cic., pro Mil., 10). In every Latin town there was also a senate and a popular assembly, but the exact nature of their powers is unknown. The old Latin towns were built for the most part on isolated hills, the sides of which were made by art very steep and almost inaccessible. They were surrounded by walls built of great polygonal stones, the remains of which still excite our astonishment. On the conquest of the Latins in 340, several of the Latin towns, such as Lanuvium, Aricia, Nomentum, Pedum, and Tusculum, received the Roman franchise. All the other towns became Roman Socii, and are mentioned in history under the general name of Nomen Latinum or Latini. The Romans, however granted to them from time to time certain rights and privileges, which the other Socii did not enjoy; and, in particular, they founded many colonies, consisting of Latins, in various parts of Italy. These Latin colonies formed a part of the Nomen Latinum, although they were not situated in Latium. Thus the Latini came eventually to hold a certain status intermediate between that of Roman citizens and peregrini. (For details, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. Latini.)

Latmĭcus Sinus (ὁ Λατμικὸς κόλπος), a gulf on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor, into which the River Mæander fell, named from Mount Latmus, which overhangs it. Its width from Miletus, which stood on its southern side, to Pyrrha, was about thirty stadia. Through the changes effected on this coast by the Mæander, the gulf is now an inland lake, called Akees-Chai or Ufa-Bassi.

Latmus (Λάτμος: now Monte di Palatia), a mountain in Caria, extending in a southeastern direction from its commencement on the southern side of the Mæander, northeast of Miletus and the Sinus Latmicus. It was the mythological scene of the story of Luna and Endymion, who is hence called by the Roman poets "Latmius heros" and "Latmius venator:" he had a temple on the mountain, and a cavern in its side was shown as his grave.

Latobrigi, a people in Gallia Belgica, who are mentioned, along with the Tulingi and Rauraci, as neighbors of the Helvetii. They probably dwelt near the sources of the Rhine, in Switzerland.

Latōna. Vid. Leto.

Latŏpŏlis (Λατόπολις: ruins at Esneh), a city of Upper Egypt, on the west bank of the Nile, between Thebes and Apollonopolis; the seat of the worship of the Nile-fish called latus, which was the symbol of the goddess Neith, whom the Greeks identified with Athena.

Latovĭci, a people in the southwest of Pannonia, on the River Savus, in the modern Illyria and Croatia.

Latro, M. Porcĭus, a celebrated Roman rhetorician in the reign of Augustus, was a Spaniard by birth, and a friend and contemporary of the elder Seneca, by whom he is frequently mentioned. His school was one of the most frequented at Rome, and he numbered among his pupils the Poet Ovid. He died B.C. 4. Many modern writers suppose that he was the author of the Declamations of Sallust against Cicero, and of Cicero against Sallust.

Laurentum (Laurens, -ntis: now Casale di Copocotta, not Paterno), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, was situated on a height between Ostia and Ardea, not far from the sea, and was surrounded by a grove of laurels, from which the place was supposed to have derived its name. According to Virgil, it was the residence of King Latinus and the capital of Latium; and it is certain that it was a place of importance in the time of the Roman kings, as it is mentioned in the treaty concluded between Rome and Carthage in B.C. 509. Lausus. 1. Son of Mezentius, king of the Etruscans, slain by Æneas.—2. Son of Numitor and brother of Ilia, killed by Amulius.

Lautŭlæ, a village of the Volsci in Latium, in a narrow pass between Tarracina and Fundi.

Laverna, the Roman goddess of thieves and impostors. A grove was sacred to her on the Via Salaria, and she had an altar near the Porta Lavernalis, which derived its name from her.

Lavīcum. Vid. Labicum.

Lavīnĭa, daughter of Latinus and Amata, was betrothed to Turnus (vid. Turnus), but was afterward given in marriage to Æneas, by whom she became the mother of Æneas Silvius.

Lavīnĭum (Laviniensis: now Pratica), an ancient town of Latium, three miles from the sea and six miles east of Laurentum, on the Via Appia, and near the River Numicus, which divided its territory from that of Ardea. It is said to have been founded by Æneas, and to have been called Lavinium in honor of his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus. It possessed a temple of Venus, common to all the Latins, of which the inhabitants of Ardea had the oversight. It was at Lavinium that the king Titus Tatius was said to have been murdered. Lavinium was at a later time united with Laurentum; respecting which, vid. Laurentum.

LAZÆ or LAZI (Λάζαι, Λάζοι), a people of Colchis, south of the Phasis.

[LEA (now probably Piana or Pianosa), a small island in the southern part of the Ægean Sea.]

[LEADES (Λεάδης), son of Astacus, according to Apollodorus slew Eteocles at the attack on Thebes, while Æschylus makes Eteocles to have fallen by the hand of Megareus.]

LEÆNA (Λέαινα), an Athenian hetæra, beloved by Aristogīton or Harmodius. On the murder of Hipparchus she was put to the torture; but she died under her sufferings without making any disclosure, and, if we may believe one account, she bit off her tongue that no secret might be wrung from her. The Athenians honored her memory greatly, and, in particular, by a bronze statue of a lioness (λέαινα) without a tongue, in the vestibule of the Acropolis.

[LEAGRUS (Λέαγρος), son of Glaucon, one of the commanders of the Athenians in the attempt to colonise Amphipolis, B.C. 465, perished in a battle with the Thracians at Drabescus or Datus.]

LEANDER (Λείανδρος or Λέανδρος), the famous youth of Abydos, who was in love with Hero, the priestess of Venus (Aphrodite) in Sestus, and swam every night across the Hellespont to visit her, and returned before daybreak. Once during a stormy night he perished in the waves. Next morning his corpse was washed on the coast of Sestus, whereupon Hero threw herself into the sea. This story is the subject of the poem of Musæus, entitled De Amore Herûs et Leandri (vid. MUSÆUS), and is also mentioned by Ovid (Her., xviii., 19) and Virgil (Georg., iii., 258).

LEARCHUS (Λέαρχος). 1. Vid. ATHAMAS.—2. Of Rhegium, one of those Dædalean artists who stand on the confines of the mythical and historical periods, and about whom we have extremely uncertain information. One account made him a pupil of Dædalus, another of Dipœnus and Scyllis.

LEBADĒA (Λεβάδεια: now Livadhia), a town in Bœotia, west of the Lake Copais, between Chæronēa and Mount Helicon, at the foot of a rock from which the River Hercyna flows. In a cave of this rock, close to the town, was the celebrated oracle of Trophonius, to which the place owed its importance.

[LEBÆA (Λεβαίη), an ancient city in Upper Macedonia, mentioned only by Herodotus (viii., 137); not a trace of it now exists.]

LĔBĔDOS (Λέβεδος: Λεβέδιος), one of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy, in Asia Minor, stood on the coast of Lydia, between Colophon and Teos, ninety stadia east of the promontory of Myonnesus. It was said to have been built at the time of the Ionian migration, on the site of an earlier Carian city; and it flourished, chiefly by commerce, until Lysimachus transplanted most of its inhabitants to Ephesus. Near it were some mineral springs, which still exist near Ekklesia, but no traces remain of the city itself.

LĔBĒN or LĔBĒNA (Λεβήν, Λεβήνα), a town on the southern coast of Crete, ninety stadia south east of Gortyna, of which it was regarded as the harbor It possessed a celebrated temple of Æsculapius.

LEBINTHUS (Λέβινθος: now Lebitha), an island in the Ægæan Sea, one of the Sporades, west of Calymna, east of Amorgos, and north of Astypalæa.

LECHÆUM (τὸ Λεχαῖον: Λεχαῖος), one of the two harbors of Corinth, with which it was connected by two long walls. It was twelve stadia from Corinth, was situated on the Corinthian Gulf, and received all the ships which came from Italy and Sicily. It possessed a temple of Neptune (Poseidon), who was hence surnamed Lechæus.

LECTUM (τὸ Λεκτόν: now Cape Baba or S. Maria), the southwestern promontory of the Troad, is formed where the western extremity of Mount Ida juts out into the sea, opposite to the northern side of the island of Lesbos. It was the southern limit of the Troad; and, under the Byzantine emperors, the northern limit of the province of Asia. An altar was shown here in Strabo's time, which was said to have been erected by Agamemnon to the twelve chief gods of Greece.

LEDA (Λήδα), daughter of Thestius, whence she is called Thestias, and wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta. One night she was embraced both by her husband and by Jupiter (Zeus); by the former she became the mother of Castor and Clytæmnestra, by the latter of Pollux and Helena. According to Homer (Od., xi., 298), both Castor and Pollux were sons of Tyndareus and Leda, while Helena is described as a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus). Other traditions reverse the story, making Castor and Pollux the sons of Jupiter (Zeus), and Helena the daughter of Tyndareus. According to the common legend, Jupiter (Zeus) visited Leda in the form of a swan; and she brought forth two eggs, from the one of which issued Helena, and from the other Castor and Pollux. The visit of Jupiter (Zeus) to Leda in the form of a swan was frequently represented by ancient artists. The Roman poets sometimes call Helena Ledæa, and Castor and Pollux Ledæi Dii.

LĔDON (Λέδων), a town in Phocis, northwest of Tithorea; the birth-place of Philomelus, the commander of the Phocians in the Sacred war: it was destroyed in this war.

LEDUS or LEDUM (now Les or Lez, near Montpellier), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis.

LĒGÆ (Λῆγαι or Λῆγες), a people on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea, belonging to the same race as the Cadusii. A branch of them was found by the Romans in the northern mountains of Albania, at the time of Pompey's expedition into those regions.

LEGIO SEPTIMA GEMINA (now Leon), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, in the country of the Astures, which was originally the head-quarters of the legion so called.

LĒĬTUS (Λήϊτος), son of Alector or Alectryon by Cleobule, and father of Peneleus, was one of the Argonauts, and commanded the Bœotians in the war against Troy.

LELANTUS CAMPUS (τὸ Λήλαντον πεδίον), a plain in Eubœa, between Eretria and Chalcis, for the possession of which these two cities often contended. It contained warm springs and mines of iron and copper, but was subject to frequent earthquakes.

LĔLĔGES (Λέλεγες), an ancient race which is habited Greece before the Hellenes. They are frequently mentioned along with the Pelasgians as the most ancient inhabitants of Greece. Some writers erroneously identify them with the Pelasgians, but their character and habits were essentially different: the Pelasgians were a peaceful and agricultural people, whereas the Leleges were a warlike and migratory race. They appear to have first taken possession of the coasts and the islands of Greece, and afterward to have penetrated into the interior. Piracy was probably their chief occupation; and they are represented as the ancestors of the Teleboans and the Taphians, who sailed as far as Phœnicia, and were notorious for their piracies. The coasts of Acarnania and Ætolia appear to have been inhabited by Leleges at the earliest times, and from thence they spread over other parts of Greece. Thus we find them in Phocis and Locris, in Bœotia, in Megaris, in Laconia, which is said to have been more anciently called Lelegia, in Elis, in Eubœa, in several of the islands of the Ægæan Sea, and also on the coasts of Asia Minor, in Caria, Ionia, and the south of Troas. The origin of the Leleges is uncertain. Many of the ancients connected them with the Carians, and according to Herodotus (i., 171), the Leleges were the same as the Carians; but whether there was any real connection between these people can not be determined. The name of the Leleges was derived, according to the custom of the ancients, from an ancestor Lelex, who is called king either of Megaris or of Lacedæmon. According to some traditions, this Lelex came from Egypt, and was the son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Libya: but the Egyptian origin of the people was evidently an invention of later times. The Leleges must be regarded as a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who became gradually incorporated with the Hellenes, and thus ceased to exist as an independent people.

Lelex. Vid. Leleges.

Lemannus or Lemānus Lacus (now Lake of Geneva), a large lake formed by the River Rhodanus, was the boundary between the old Roman province in Gaul and the land of the Helvetii. Its greatest length is fifty-five miles, and its greatest breadth six miles.

[Lemanus Portus, a harbor on the southern coast of Britain, directly south of Durovernum, and supposed to correspond to the modern Lymne.]

Lemnos (Λῆμνος: Λήμνιος, fem. Φημνιάς: now Stalimene, i. e., εἰς τὰν Λῆμνον), one of the largest islands in the Ægæan Sea, was situated nearly midway between Mount Athos and the Hellespont, and about twenty-two miles southwest of Imbros. Its area is about one hundred and forty-seven square miles. In the earliest times it appears to have contained only one town, which bore the same name as the island (Hom., Il., xiv., 299); but at a later period we read of two towns, Myrina (now Palæo Castro) on the west of the island, and Hephæstia or Hephæstias (near Rapanidi) on the northwest, with a harbor. Lemnos was sacred to Hephæstus (Vulcan), who is said to have fallen here when Zeus (Jupiter) hurled him down from Olympus. Hence the workshop of the god is sometimes placed in this island. The legend appears to have arisen from the volcanic na[ture] of Lemnos, which possessed in antiquity a vol[-]cano called Mosychlus (Μόσυχλος). The isl[and] still bears traces of having been subject to t[he] action of volcanic fire, though the volcano h[as] long since disappeared. The most ancient i[n-]habitants of Lemnos, according to Homer, w[ere] the Thracian Sinties; a name, however, wh[ich] probably only signifies robbers (Σίντιες, fr[om] σίνομαι). When the Argonauts landed at Le[m-]nos, they are said to have found it inhabi[ted] only by women, who had murdered all th[eir] husbands, and had chosen as their queen Hy[p-]sipyle, the daughter of Thoas, the king of t[he] island. Vid. Hysipyle. Some of the Ar[go-]nauts settled here, and became by the Lemni[an] women the fathers of the Minyæ, the later i[n-]habitants of the island. The Minyæ are sa[id] to have been driven out of the island by t[he] Pelasgians, who had been expelled from Atti[ca]. These Pelasgians are further said to have ca[r-]ried away from Attica some Athenian wome[n], but, as the children of these women despis[ed] their half-brothers, born of Pelasgian wome[n], the Pelasgians murdered both them and thei[r] children. In consequence of this atrocity, a[nd] of the former murder of the Lemnian husband[s] by the wives, Lemnian Deeds became a prover[b] in Greece for all atrocious acts. Lemnos wa[s] afterward conquered by one of the generals o[f] Darius; but Miltiades delivered it from the Per[-]sians, and made it subject to Athens, in whose power it remained for a long time. Pliny speak[s] of a remarkable labyrinth at Lemnos, but no traces of it have been discovered by modern travellers. The principal production of the isl[and] was a red earth called terra Lemnia or sigil[-]lata, which was employed by the ancient physi[-]cians as a remedy for wounds and the bites of serpents, and which is still much valued by the Turks and Greeks for its supposed medicinal virtues.

Lemonĭa, one of the country tribes of Rome, named after a village Lemonium, situated on the Via Latina, before the Porta Capena.

Lemovīces, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, between the Bituriges and Arverni, whose chief town was Augustoritum, subsequently called Lemovices, the modern Limoges.

Lemovĭi, a people of Germany, mentioned along with the Rugii, who inhabited the shores of the Baltic in the modern Pomerania.

Lemŭres, the spectres or spirits of the dead. Some writers describe Lemures as the common name for all the spirits of the dead, and divide them into two classes; the Lares, or the souls of good men, and the Larvæ, or the souls of wicked men. But the common idea was that the Lemures and Larvæ were the same. They were said to wander about at night as spectres, and to torment and frighten the living. In order to propitiate them, the Romans celebrated the festival of the Lemuralia or Lemuria. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

L., prætor in Sardinia 211, succeeded Scipio as proconsul in Spain, where he remained for eleven years, and on his return was only allowed an ovation, because he only held proconsular rank. He was consul 199, and the next year proconsul in Gaul.—7. L., curule ædile 163, consul 156, censor 147.—8. P., curule ædile with Scipio Nasica 169, consul suffectus with C. Domitius 162, the election of the former consuls being declared informal. He became princeps senatus, and must have lived to a good old age, since he was wounded in the contest with C. Gracchus in 121.—9. P., surnamed SURA, the man of chief note in Catiline's crew. He was quæstor to Sulla in 81: before him and L. Triarius, Verres had to give an account of the moneys he had received as quæstor in Cisalpine Gaul. He was soon after himself called to account for the same matter, but was acquitted. It is said that he got his cognomen of Sura from his conduct on this occasion; for when Sulla called him to account, he answered by scornfully putting out his leg, "like boys," says Plutarch, "when they make a blunder in playing at ball." Other persons, however, had borne the name before, one perhaps of the Lentulus family. In 75 he was prætor; and Hortensius, pleading before such a judge, had no difficulty in procuring the acquittal of Terentius Varro when accused of extortion. In 71 he was consul. But in the next year he was ejected from the senate, with sixty-three others, for infamous life and manners. It was this, probably, that led him to join Catiline and his crew. From his distinguished birth and high rank he calculated on becoming chief of the conspiracy; and a prophecy of the Sibylline books was applied by flattering haruspices to him. Three Cornelii were to rule Rome, and he was the third after Sulla and Cinna; the twentieth year after the burning of the Capitol, &c., was to be fatal to the city. To gain power, and recover place in the senate, he became prætor again in 63. When Catiline quitted the city for Etruria, Lentulus was left as chief of the home conspirators, and his irresolution probably saved the city from being fired, for it was by his over-caution that the negotiation with the ambassadors of the Allobroges was entered into these unstable allies revealed the secret to the consul Cicero, who directed them to feign compliance with the conspirators' wishes, and thus to obtain written documents which might be brought in evidence against them. The well-known sequel will be found under the life of Catiline. Lentulus was deposed from the prætorship, and was strangled in the Capitoline prison on the 5th of December His step-son Antony pretended that Cicero refused to deliver up his corpse for burial.—10. P., surnamed SPINTHER. He received this nickname from his resemblance to the actor Spinther. Cæsar commonly calls him by this name: not so Cicero; but there could be no harm in it, for he used it on his coins when proprætor in Spain, simply to distinguish himself from the many of the same family; and his son bore it after him. He was curule ædile in 63, the year of Cicero's consulship, and was intrusted with the care of the apprehended conspirator, P. Sura (vid. No. 9). His games were long remembered for their splendor; but his toga, edged with Tyrian purple, gave offence. He was prætor in 60, and by Cæsar's interests he obtained Hither Spain for his next year's province, where he remained into part of 58. In 57 he was consul, which dignity he also obtained by Cæsar's support. In his consulship he moved for the immediate recall of Cicero, brought over his colleague Metellus Nepos to the same views, and his services were gratefully acknowledged by Cicero Now, therefore, notwithstanding his obligations to Cæsar, he had openly taken part with the aristocracy. He received Cilicia as his province, but he attempted in vain to obtain a decree of the senate charging him with the office of restoring Ptolemy Auletes, the exiled king of Egypt. He remained as proconsul in Cilicia from 56 till July, 53, and obtained a triumph, though not till 51. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he joined the Pompeian party. He fell into Cæsar's hands at Corfinium, but was dismissed by the latter uninjured. He then joined Pompey in Greece; and after the battle of Pharsalia, he followed Pompey to Egypt, and got safe to Rhodes.—11. P., surnamed SPINTHER, son of No. 10, followed Pompey's fortunes with his father. He was pardoned by Cæsar, and returned to Italy. In 45 he was divorced from his abandoned wife, Metella. (Comp. Hor., Serm., ii., 3, 239.) After the murder of Cæsar (44) he joined the conspirators He served with Cassius against Rhodes; with Brutus in Lycia.—12. CN., surnamed CLODIANUS, a Claudius adopted into the Lentulus family. He was consul in 72 with L. Gellius Publicola. In the war with Spartacus both he and his colleague were defeated, but after their consulship. With the same colleague he held the censorship in 70, and ejected sixty-three members from the senate for infamous life, among whom were Lentulus Sura (vid. No. 9) and C. Antonius, afterward Cicero's colleague in the consulship. Yet the majority of those expelled were acquitted by the courts, and restored; and Lentulus supported the Manilian law, appointing Pompey to the command against Mithradates. As an orator he concealed his want of talent by great skill and art, and by a good voice. —13. L., surnamed CRUS, appeared in 61 as the chief accuser of P. Clodius for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. In 58 he was prætor, and in 49 consul with C. Marcellus. He was raised to the consulship in consequence of his being a known enemy of Cæsar. He did all he could to excite his wavering party to take arms and meet Cæsar: he called Cicero cowardly; blamed him for seeking a triumph at such a time; urged war at any price, in the hope, says Cæsar (B.C., i., 4), of retrieving his ruined fortunes, and becoming another Sulla. It was mainly at Lentulus's instigation that the violent measures passed the senate early in the year, which gave the tribunes a pretence for flying to Cæsar at Ravenna. He himself fled from the city at the approach of Cæsar, and afterward crossed over to Greece. After the battle of Pharsalia he fled to Egypt, and arrived there the day after Pompey's murder. On landing he was apprehended by young Ptolemy's ministers, and put to death in prison.—14. L., surnamed NIGER, flamen of Mars. In 57 he was one of the priests to whom was referred the question whether the site of Cicero's house was consecrated ground. In 56 he was one of the judges in the case of P. Sextius, and he died in the same year, much praised by Cicero.—15. L., son of the last, and also flamen of Mars. He defended M. Scaurus in 54, when accused of extortion he accused Gabinius of high treason about the same time, but was suspected of collusion. In the Philippics he is mentioned as a friend of Antony's.—16. COSSUS, surnamed GÆTULICUS, consul B.C. 1, was sent into Africa in A.D. 6, where he defeated the Gætuli; hence his surname. On the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14, he accompanied Drusus, who was sent to quell the mutiny of the legions in Pannonia. He died 25, at a very great age, leaving behind him an honorable reputation.—17. CN., surnamed GÆTULICUS, son of the last, consul A.D. 26. He afterward had the command of the legions of Upper Germany for ten years, and was very popular among the troops. In 39 he was put to death by order of Caligula, who feared his influence with the soldiers. He was an historian and a poet; but we have only three lines of his poems extant, unless he is the author of nine epigrams in the Greek Anthology, inscribed with the name of Gætulicus.

LEO or LEON (Λεών). 1. Also called LEONIDES (Λεωνίδης), of Heraclea on the Pontus, disciple of Plato, was one of the conspirators who, with their leader Chion, assassinated Clearchus, tyrant of Heraclea. B.C. 353.—2. Of Byzantium, a rhetorician and historical writer of the age of Philip and Alexander the Great.—3. Diaconus or the Deacon, Byzantine historian of the tenth century. His history, in ten books, includes the period from the Cretan expedition of Nicephorus Phocas, in the reign of the Emperor Romanus II., A.D. 959, to the death of Joannes I. Zimisces, 975. The style of Leo is vicious: he employs unusual and inappropriate words (many of them borrowed from Homer, Agathias the historian, and the Septuagint), in the place of simple and common ones; and he abounds in tautological phrases. His history, however, is a valuable contemporary record of a stirring time, honestly and fearlessly written. Edited for the first time by Hase, Paris, 1818.—4. Grammaticus, one of the continuators of Byzantine history from the period when Theophanes leaves off. His work, entitled Chronographia, extends from the accession of Leo V. the Armenian, 813, to the death of Romanus Lecapenus, 948. Edited with Theophanes by Combéfis, Paris, 1655; [reprinted in the collection of the Byzantine Historians with an emended text by Bekker, Bonn., 1842.]—5. Archbishop of Thessalonica, an eminent Byzantine philosopher and ecclesiastic of the ninth century. His works are lost, but he is frequently mentioned in terms of the highest praise by the Byzantine writers, especially for his knowledge of geometry and astronomy.—6. Magentenus, a commentator on Aristotle, flourished during the first half of the fourteenth century. He was a monk, and afterward archbishop of Mytilene. Several of his commentaries on Aristotle are extant, and have been published.—7. Leo was also the name of six Byzantine emperors. Of these, Leo VI., surnamed the philosopher, who reigned 886–911, is celebrated in the history of the later Greek literature. He wrote a treatise on Greek tactics, seventeen oracles, thirty-three orations, and several other works, which are still extant. He is also celebrated in the history of legislation. As the Latin language had long ceased to be the official language of the Eastern empire, Basil, the father of Leo, had formed and partly executed the plan of issuing an authorized Greek version of Justinian's legislation. This plan was carried out by Leo. The Greek version is known under the title of Βασιλικαὶ Διατάξεις, or, shortly, Βασιλικαί; in Latin Basilica, which means "Imperial Constitutions" or "Laws." It is divided into sixty books, subdivided into titles, and contains the Institutes, the Digest, the Codex, and the Novellæ; and likewise such constitutions as were issued by the successors of Justinian down to Leo VI. There are, however, many laws of the Digest omitted in the Basilica, which contain, on the other hand, a considerable number of laws or extracts from ancient jurists which are not in the Digest. The publication of this authorized body of law in the Greek language led to the gradual disuse of the original compilations of Justinian in the East. But the Roman law was thus more firmly established in Eastern Europe and Western Asia, where it has maintained itself among the Greek population to the present day. The best edition of the Basilica is the one now publishing by Heimbach, Lips. 1833, seq.

LEOBŌTES. Vid. LABOTAS.

[LEOCEDES (Λεωκήδης) son of Phidon. Vid. PHIDON.]

[LEŌCHĂRES (Λεωχάρης), an Athenian statuary and sculptor, was one of the great artists of the later Athenian school, at the head of which were Scopas and Praxiteles. He flourished B.C. 352–338. The master-piece of Leochares seems to have been his statue of the rape of Ganymede. The original work was in bronze. Of the extant copies in marble, the best is one, half the size of life, in the Museo Pio-Clementino.

LEOCŎRĪUM (Λεωκόριον), a shrine in Athens, in the Ceramicus, erected in honor of the daughters of Leos. Hipparchus was murdered here.

LEŌDĀMAS (Λεωδάμας), a distinguished Attic orator, was educated in the school of Isocrates, and is greatly praised by Æschines.

[LEODAMAS (Λεωδάμας), one of the Theban chieftains who defended Thebes against the attack of the Argives; he slew Ægialeus, and was himself slain by Alcmæon.]

[LEON (Λέων), a village on the eastern coast of Sicily, near Syracuse, occupied by both the Athenians and the Romans in their respective operations against that city.]

[LEODES (Λειώδης), son of Œnops, one of the suitors of Penelope, hated by the rest as an unwelcome warner; he was slain by Ulysses.]

LEONĪCA, a town of the Edetani in the west of Hispania Tarraconensis.

LEŌNĬDAS (Λεωνίδας). 1. I. King of Sparta B.C. 491–480, was one of the sons of Anaxandrides by his first wife, and, according to some accounts, was twin-brother to Cleombrotus. He succeeded his half-brother Cleomenes I., B.C. 491, his elder brother Dorieus also having previously died. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, 480, Leonidas was sent with a small army to make a stand against the enemy at the pass of Thermopylæ. The number of his army is variously stated: according to Herodotus, it amounted to somewhat more than five thousand men, of whom three hundred were Spartans; in all probability, the regular band of (so called) knights (ἱππεῖς). The Persians in vain attempted to force their way through the pass of Thermopylæ. They were driven back by Leonidas and his gallant band with immense slaughter. At length the Malian Ephialtes betrayed the mountain path of the Anopæa to the Persians, who were thus able to fall upon the rear of the Greeks. When it became known to Leonidas that the Persians were crossing the mountain, he dismissed all the other Greeks except the Thespian and Theban forces, declaring that he and the Spartans under his command must needs remain in the post they had been sent to guard. Then, before the body of Persians, who were crossing the mountain under Hydarnes, could arrive to attack him in the rear, he advanced from the narrow pass and charged the myriads of the enemy with his handful of troops, hopeless now of preserving their lives, and anxious only to sell them dearly. In the desperate battle which ensued, Leonidas himself fell soon. His body was rescued by the Greeks, after a violent struggle. On the hillock in the pass, where the remnant of the Greeks made their last stand, a lion of stone was set up in his honor.—2. II. King of Sparta, was son of the traitor Cleonymus. He acted as guardian to his infant relative, Areus II., on whose death he ascended the throne, about 256. Being opposed to the projected reforms of his contemporary, Agis IV., he was deposed, and the throne was transferred to his son-in-law Cleombrotus; but he was soon afterward recalled, and caused Agis to be put to death, 240. He died about 236, and was succeeded by his son, Cleomenes III.—3. A kinsman of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, was intrusted with the main superintendence of Alexander's education in his earlier years, before he became the pupil of Aristotle. Leonidas was a man of austere character, and trained the young prince in hardy and self-denying habits. They were two excellent cooks (said Alexander afterward) with which Leonidas had furnished him—a night's march to season his breakfast, and a scanty breakfast to season his dinner.—4. Of Tarentum, the author of upward of one hundred epigrams in the Doric dialect. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager. They are chiefly inscriptions for dedicatory offerings and works of art, and, though not of a very high order of poetry, are usually pleasing, ingenious, and in good taste. Leonidas probably lived in the time of Pyrrhus.—5. Of Alexandrea, also an epigrammatic poet, flourished under Nero and Vespasian. In the Greek Anthology, forty-three epigrams are ascribed to him: they are of a very low order of merit.

LEONNĀTUS (Λεοννᾶτος). 1. A Macedonian of Pella, one of Alexander's most distinguished officers. His father's name is variously given, as Anteas, Anthes, Onasus, and Eunus. He saved Alexander's life in India in the assault on the city of the Malli. After the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he obtained the satrapy of the Lesser or Hellespontine Phrygia, and in the following year he crossed over into Europe, to assist Antipater against the Greeks; but he was defeated by the Athenians and their allies, and fell in battle.—[2. Another officer in the service of Alexander, a native of Ægæ, and son of Antipater.—3. A Macedonian officer in the service of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who saved the life of that monarch at the battle of Heraclea, B.C. 280.]

[LEONORIUS (Λεονόριος), one of the leaders of the Gauls in their invasion of Macedonia and the adjacent countries.]

[LEONTEUS (Λεοντεύς), son of Coronus, led the Lapithæ to Troy in forty ships; one of the combatants at the funeral games in honor of Patroclus.]

LEONTĬĀDES (Λεοντιάδης). 1. A Theban, commanded at Thermopylæ the forces supplied by Thebes to the Grecian army, B.C. 480.—2. A Theban, assisted the Spartans in seizing the Cadmea, or citadel of Thebes, in 382. He was slain by Pelopidas in 379, when the Theban exiles recovered possession of the Cadmea.

LEONTĪNI (οἱ Λεοντῖνοι: Λεοντῖνος: now Lentini), a town in the east of Sicily, about five miles from the sea, northwest of Syracuse, was situated upon the small river Lissus. It was built upon two hills, which were separated from one another by a valley, in which were the forum, the senate house, and the other public buildings, while the temples and the private houses occupied the hills. The rich plains north of the city, called Leontini Campi, were some of the most fertile in Sicily, and produced abundant crops of most excellent wheat. Leontini was founded by Chalcidians from Naxos B.C. 730, only six years after the foundation of Naxos itself. It never attained much political importance in consequence of its proximity to Syracuse, to which it soon became subject, and whose fortunes it shared. At a later time it joined the Carthaginians, and was, in consequence, taken and plundered by the Romans. Under the Romans it sunk into insignificance. Gorgias was a native of Leontini.

Leontes (Λεοντίς), one of the ten Attic tribes formed by Clisthenes, and deriving its name from the hero Leos. Vid. Leos.]

Leontīum (Λεόντιον), an Athenian hetæra, the disciple and mistress of Epicurus, wrote a treatise against Theophrastus. She had a daughter, Danaë, who was also an hetæra of some notoriety.

Leontīum (Λεόντιον), a town in Achaia, between Pharæ and Ægium.

Leontŏpŏlis (Λεοντόπολις, Λεόντων πόλις). 1. A city in the Delta of Egypt south of Thmuïs, and northwest of Athribis, was the capital of the Nomos Leontopolites, and probably of late foundation, as no writer before Strabo mentions it. Its site is uncertain.—2. Vid. Nicephorium.

Leoprepīdes, i. e., Simonides, the son of Leoprepes.

Leos (Λεώς), one of the heroes eponymi of the Athenians, said to have been a son of Orpheus. The phyle or tribe of Leontis derived its name from him. Once, when Athens was suffering from famine or plague, the Delphic oracle demanded that the daughters of Leos should be sacrificed, and the father complied with the command of the oracle. The maidens were afterward honored by the Athenians, who erected the Leocorium (from Λεώς and κόραι) to them. Their names were Praxithea, Theope, and Eubule.

Leosthĕnes (Λεωσθένης), an Athenian commander of the combined Greek army in the Lamian war. In the year after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he defeated Antipater near Thermopylæ; Antipater thereupon threw himself into the small town of Lamia. Leosthenes pressed the siege with the utmost vigor, but was killed by a blow from a stone. His loss was mourned by the Athenians as a public calamity. He was honored with a public burial in the Ceramicus, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Hyperides.

Leotychĭdes (Λεωτυχίδης, Λευτυχίδης, Herod). 1. King of Sparta, B.C. 491–469. He commanded the Greek fleet in 479, and defeated the Persians at the battle of Mycale. He was afterward sent with an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the Persians; but, in consequence of his accepting the bribes of the Aleuadæ, he was brought to trial on his return home, and went into exile to Tegea, 469, where he died. He was succeeded by his grandson, Archidamus II.—2. Grandson of Archidamus II., and son of Agis II. There was, however, some suspicion that he was, in reality, the fruit of an intrigue of Alcibiades with Timæa, the queen of Agis; in consequence of which he was excluded from the throne, mainly through the influence of Lysander, and his uncle, Agesilaus II., was substituted in his room.

Lepĭdus Æmilius, a distinguished patrician family. 1. M., ædile B.C. 192; prætor 191, with Sicily as his province; consul 187, when he defeated the Ligurians; pontifex maximus 180; censor 179 with M. Fulvius Nobilior; consul a second time 175. He was six times chosen by the censors princeps senatus, and died 152, full of years and honors. Lepidus the triumvir is called by Cicero (Phil. xiii., 7) pronepos of this Lepidus; but he would seem more probably to have been his abnepos, great-great-grandson.—2. M., consul 13?, carried on war in Spain against the Vaccæi, but unsuccessfully. Since he had attacked the Vaccæi in opposition to the express orders of the senate, he was deprived of his command, and condemned to pay a fine. He was a man of education and refined taste. Cicero, who had read his speeches, speaks of him as the greatest orator of his age. He helped to form the style of Tiberius Gracchus and C. Carbo, who were accustomed to listen to him with great care.—3. M., the father of the triumvir, was prætor in Sicily in 81, where he earned a character for his oppressions only second to that of Verres. In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla he belonged at first to the party of the latter, but he afterward came forward as a leader of the popular party. In his consulship, 78, he attempted to rescind the laws of Sulla, who had lately died, but he was opposed by his colleague Catulus, who received the powerful support of Pompey. In the following year (77) Lepidus took up arms and marched against Rome. He was defeated by Pompey and Catulus, under the walls of the city, in the Campus Martius, and was obliged to take to flight. Finding it impossible to hold his ground in Italy, Lepidus sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia; but repulsed even in this island by the proprætor, he died shortly afterward of chagrin and sorrow, which is said to have been increased by the discovery of his wife's infidelity.—4. Mam., surnamed Livianus, because he belonged originally to the Livia gens, consul 77, belonged to the aristocratical party, and was one of the influential persons who prevailed upon Sulla to spare the life of the young Julius Cæsar.—5. M., consul 66, with L. Volcatus Tullus, the same year in which Cicero was prætor. He belonged to the aristocratical party, but on the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he retired to his Formian villa to watch the progress of events.—6. L. Æmilius Paulus, son of No. 3, and brother of M. Lepidus, the triumvir. His surname of Paulus was probably given him by his father, in honor of the celebrated Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia: but, as he belonged to the family of the Lepidi, and not to that of the Pauli, he is inserted in this place, and not under Paulus. Æmilius Paulus did not follow the example of his father, but commenced his public career by supporting the aristocratical party. His first public act was the accusation of Catiline in 63. He was quæstor in Macedonia 59; ædile 55; prætor 53; and consul 50, along with M. Claudius Marcellus. Paulus was raised to the consulship on account of his being one of the most determined enemies of Cæsar, but Cæsar gained him over to his side by a bribe of fifteen hundred talents, which he is said to have expended on the completion of a magnificent basilica which he had commenced in his ædileship. After the murder of Cæsar (44), Paulus joined the senatorial par ty. He was one of the senators who declared M. Lepidus a public enemy on account of his having joined Antony; and, accordingly, when the triumvirate was formed, his name was set down first in the proscription list by his own brother. The soldiers, however, who were appointed to kill him, allowed him to escape. He passed over to Brutus in Asia, and after the death of the latter repaired to Miletus. Here he remained, and refused to go to Rome, although he was pardoned by the triumvirs.—7. M. Æmilius Lepidus, the Triumvir, brother of the last. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), Lepidus, who was then prætor, joined Cæsar's party; and as the consuls had fled with Pompey from Italy, Lepidus, as prætor, was the highest magistrate remaining in Italy. During Cæsar's absence in Spain, Lepidus presided at the comitia in which the former was appointed dictator. In the following year (48) he received the province of Nearer Spain. On his return to Rome in 47, Cæsar granted him a triumph, and made him his magister equitum; and in the next year (46), his colleague in the consulship. In 44 he received from Cæsar the government of Narbonese Gaul and Nearer Spain, but had not quitted the neighborhood of Rome at the time of the dictator's death. Having the command of an army near the city, he was able to render M. Antony efficient assistance; and the latter, in consequence, allowed Lepidus to be chosen pontifex maximus, which dignity had become vacant by Cæsar's death. Lepidus soon afterward repaired to his provinces of Gaul and Spain. He remained neutral in the struggle between Antony and the senate; but he subsequently joined Antony, when the latter fled to him in Gaul after his defeat at Mutina. This was in the end of May, 43; and when the news reached Rome, the senate proclaimed Lepidus a public enemy. In the autumn Lepidus and Antony crossed the Alps at the head of a powerful army. Octavianus (afterward Augustus) joined them; and in the month of October the celebrated triumvirate was formed, by which the Roman world was divided between Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus. Vid. p. 129, b. In 42 Lepidus remained in Italy as consul, while the two other triumvirs prosecuted the war against Brutus and Cassius. In the fresh division of the provinces after the battle of Philippi, Lepidus received Africa, where he remained till 36. In this year Octavianus summoned him to Sicily to assist him in the war against Sextus Pompey. Lepidus obeyed, but, tired of being treated as a subordinate, he resolved to make an effort to acquire Sicily for himself and to regain his lost power. He was easily subdued by Octavianus, who spared his life, but deprived him of his triumvirate, his army, and his provinces, and commanded that he should live at Circeii, under strict surveillance. He allowed him, however, to retain his dignity of pontifex maximus. He died B.C. 13. Augustus succeeded him as pontifex maximus. Lepidus was fond of ease and repose, and it is not improbable that he possessed abilities capable of effecting much more than he ever did.—8. Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, son of No. 6, with whom he is frequently confounded. His name is variously given by the ancient writers, Æmilius Paulus or Paulus Æmilius, or Æmilius Lepidus Paulus, but Paulus Æmilius Lepidus seems to be the most correct form. He probably fled with his father to Brutus, but he afterward made his peace with the triumvirs. He accompanied Octavianus in his campaign against Sex. Pompey in Sicily in 36. In 34 he was consul suffectus. In 22 he was censor with L. Munatius Plancus, and died while holding this dignity.—9. M. Æmilius Lepidus, son of the triumvir (No. 7) and Junia, formed a conspiracy in 30 for the purpose of assassinating Octavianus on his return to Rome after the battle of Actium. Mæcenas, who had charge of the city, became acquainted with the plot, seized Lepidus, and sent him to Octavianus in the East, who put him to death. His father was ignorant of the conspiracy, but his mother was privy to it. Lepidus was married twice: his first wife was Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his second Servilia, who put an end to her life by swallowing burning coals when the conspiracy of her husband was discovered.—10. Q. Æmilius Lepidus, consul in 21 with M. Lollius. (Hor., Ep., i., 20, 28.)—11. L. Æmilius Paulus, son of No. 8 and Cornelia, married Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus. Vid. Julia, No. 6. Paulus is therefore called the progener of Augustus. He was consul A.D. 1, with C. Cæsar, his wife's brother. He entered into a conspiracy against Augustus, of the particulars of which we are not informed.—12. M. Æmilius Lepidus, brother of the last, consul A.D. 6 with L. Arruntius. He lived on the most intimate terms with Augustus, who employed him in the war against the Dalmatians in A.D. 9. After the death of Augustus, he was also held in high esteem by Tiberius.—13. M. Æmilius Lepidus, consul with T. Statilius Taurus in A.D. 11, must be carefully distinguished from the last. In A.D. 21 he obtained the province of Asia.—14. Æmilius Lepidus, the son of No. 11 and Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, and consequently the great-grandson of Augustus. He was one of the minions of the Emperor Caligula, with whom he had the most shameful connection. He married Drusilla, the favorite sister of the emperor; but he was, notwithstanding, put to death by Caligula, A.D. 39.

Lepontii, a people inhabiting the Alps, in whose country Cæsar places the sources of the Rhine, and Pliny the sources of the Rhone. They dwelt on the southern slope of the St. Gothard and the Simplon, toward the Lago Maggiore, and their name is still retained in the Val Leventina. Their chief town was Oscela (now Domo d'Ossola).

Leprea (Λεπρέα) daughter of Pyrgeus, from whom the town of Lepreum in Elis was said to have derived its name. Vid. Lepreum. An other tradition derived the name from Lepreus, a son of Caucon, Glaucon, or Pyrgeus, by Astydamia. He was a grandson of Neptune (Poseidon), and a rival of Hercules both in his strength and his powers of eating, but he was conquered and slain by the latter. His tomb was believed to exist in Phigalia.

Lepreum (Λέπρεον, Λέπρεος: Λεπρεάτης: now Strovitzi), a town of Elis in Triphylia, situated forty stadia from the sea, was said to have been founded in the time of Theseus by Minyans from Lemnos. After the Messenian wars it was subdued by the Eleans with the aid of Sparta: but it recovered its independence in the Peloponnesian war, and was assisted by the Spartans against Elis. At the time of the Achæan league it was subject to Elis.

[LEPREUS (Λεπρεύς). Vid. LEPREA.]

LEPTA, Q., a native of Cales in Campania, and præfectus fabrûm to Cicero in Cilicia, B.C. 51. He joined the Pompeian party in the civil war, and is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters.

LEPTĪNES (Λεπτίνης). 1. A Syracusan, son of Hermocrates, and brother of Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He commanded his brother's fleet in the war against the Carthaginians, B.C. 397, but was defeated by Mago with great loss. In 390 he was sent by Dionysius with a fleet to the assistance of the Lucanians against the Italian Greeks. Some time afterward he gave offence to the jealous temper of the tyrant by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Philistus, without any previous intimation to Dionysius, and on this account he was banished from Syracuse, together with Philistus. He thereupon retired to Thurii, but was subsequently recalled by Dionysius to Syracuse. Here he was completely reinstated in his former favor, and obtained one of the daughters of Dionysius in marriage. In 383 he again took an active part in the war against the Carthaginians, and commanded the right wing of the Syracusan army in the battle near Cronium, in which he was killed.—2. A Syracusan, who joined with Calippus in expelling the garrison of the younger Dionysius from Rhegium, 351. Soon afterward he assassinated Calippus, and then crossed over to Sicily, where he made himself tyrant of Apollonia and Engyum. He was expelled in common with the other tyrants by Timoleon; but his life was spared, and he was sent into exile at Corinth, 342.—3. An Athenian, known only as the proposer of a law taking away all special exemptions from the burden of public charges (ἀτέλειαι τῶν λειτουργιῶν), against which the celebrated oration of Demosthenes is directed, usually known as the oration against Leptines. This speech was delivered 355; and the law must have been passed above a year before, as we are told that the lapse of more than that period had already exempted Leptines from all personal responsibility. Hence the efforts of Demosthenes were directed solely to the repeal of the law, not to the punishment of its proposer. His arguments were successful, and the law was repealed.—4. A Syrian Greek, who assassinated with his own hand, at Laodicea, Cn. Octavius, the chief of the Roman deputies, who had been sent into Syria, 162. Demetrius caused Leptines to be seized, and sent as a prisoner to Rome; but the senate refused to receive him, being desirous to reserve this cause of complaint as a public grievance.

LEPTIS (Λεπτίς). 1. LEPTIS MAGNA or NEAPOLIS (ἡ Λεπτὶς μεγάλη, Νεάπολις), a city on the coast of Northern Africa, between the Syrtes, east of Abrotonum, and west of the mouth of the little river Cinyps, was a Phœnician colony, with a flourishing commerce, though it possessed no harbor. With Abrotonum and Œa it formed the African Tripolis. The Romans made it a colony: it was the birth-place of the Emperor Septimius Severus; and it continued to flourish till A.D. 366, when it was almost ruined by an attack from a Libyan [illegible] Justinian did something toward its restoration, but the Arabian invasion completed its destruction. Its ruins are still considerable.—2. LEPTIS MINOR or PARVA (Λεπτὶς ἡ μικρά: now Lamta), usually called simply Leptis, a Phœnician colony on the coast of Byzacium, in Northern Africa, between Hadrumetum and Thapsus: an important place under both the Carthaginians and the Romans.

LERINA (now St. Honorat), an island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, opposite Antipolis (now Antibes).

LERNA or LERNE (Λέρνη), a district in Argolis, not far from Argos, in which was a marsh and a small river of the same name. It is celebrated as the place where Hercules killed the Lernean Hydra. Vid. p. 357, a.

LERO (now St. Marguerite), a small island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis.

LĔROS (Λέρος: Λέριος), a small island of the Sporades, opposite to the mouth of the Sinus Iassius, on the coast of Caria. Its inhabitants, who came originally from Miletus, had a bad character. Besides a city of the same name, it had in it a temple of Diana (Artemis), where the transformation of the sisters of Meleager into Guinea-fowls was said to have taken place, in memory of which Guinea fowls were kept in the court of that temple.

LESBŌNAX (Λεσβῶναξ). 1. Son of Potamon, of Mytilene, a philosopher and sophist in the time of Augustus. He was the father of Potamon, the teacher and friend of the Emperor Tiberius. Lesbonax wrote several political orations, of which two have come down to us, one entitled περὶ τοῦ πολέμου Κορινθίων, the other προτρεπτικὸς λόγος, both of which are not unsuccessful imitations of the Attic orators of the best times. They are printed in the collections of the Greek orators (vid. DEMOSTHENES), and separately by Orelli, Lips., 1820.—2. A Greek grammarian, of uncertain age, but later than No. 1, the author of an extant work on grammatical figures (περὶ σχημάτων), published by Valckenaer in his edition of Ammonius.

LESBOS (Λέσβος: Λέσβιος, Lesbius: now Mytilene, Metelin), the largest, and by far the most important, of the islands of the Ægean along the coast of Asia Minor, lay opposite to the Gulf of Adramyttium, off the coast of Mysia, the direction of its length being northwest and southeast. It is intersected by lofty mountains, and indented with large bays, the chief of which, on the western side, runs more than half way across the island. It had three chief headlands, Argenum, on the northeast, Sigrium on the west, and Malea on the south. Its valleys were very fertile, especially in the northern part, near Methymna; and it produced corn, oil, and wine renowned for its excellence. In early times it was called by various names, the chief of which were Issa, Pelasgia, Mytanis, and Macaria: the late Greek writers called it Mytilene, from its chief city, and this name has been preserved to modern tions. The earliest reputed inhabitants were Pelasgians; the next, an Ionian colony, who were said to have settled it in two generations before the Trojan war; lastly, at the time of the great Æolic migration (one hundred and thirty years after the Trojan war, according to the mythical chronology), the island was colonized by Æolians, who founded in it an Hexapolis, consisting of the six cities, Mytilene, Methymna, Eresus, Pyrrha, Antissa, and Arisbe, afterward reduced to five through the destruction of Arisbe by the Methymnæans. The Æolians of Lesbos afterward founded numerous settlements along the coast of the Troad and in the region of Mount Ida, and at one time a great part of the Troad seems to have been subject to Lesbos. The chief facts in the history of the island are connected with its principal city, Mytilene, which was the scene of the struggles between the nobles and the commons, in which ALCÆUS and PITTACUS took part. At the time of the Peloponnesian war, Lesbos was subject to Athens. After various changes, it fell under the power of Mithradates, and passed from him to the Romans. The island is most important in the early history of Greece, as the native region of the Æolian school of lyric poetry. It was the birth-place of the musician and poet TERPANDER, of the lyric poets ALCÆUS, SAPPHO, and others, and of the dithyrambic poet ARION. Other forms of literature and philosophy early and long flourished in it: the sage and statesman PITTACUS, the historians HELLANICUS and Theophanes, and the philosophers Theophrastus and Phanias, were all Lesbians.

LESBŎTHĒMIS (Λεσβόθεμις), a statuary of ancient date, and a native of Lesbos.

LESCHES or LESCHEUS (Λέσχης, Λέσχεως), one of the so-called cyclic poets, son of Æschylinus, a native of Pyrrha, in the neighborhood of Mytilene, and hence called a Mytilenean or a Lesbian. He flourished about B.C. 708, and was usually regarded as the author of the Little Iliad (Ἰλιὰς ἡ ἐλάσσων or Ἰλιὰς μικρά), though this poem was also ascribed to various other poets. It consisted of four books, and was intended as a supplement to the Homeric Iliad. It related the events after the death of Hector, the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Philoctetes, Neoptolemus, and Ulysses, and the final capture and destruction of Troy, which part of the poem was called The destruction of Troy (Ἰλίου πέρσις). There was no unity in the poem, except that of historical and chronological succession. Hence Aristole remarks that the little Iliad furnished materials for eight tragedies, while only one could be based upon the Iliad or Odyssey of Homer.

[LETANDROS, a small island of the Ægean Sea, classed among the Cyclades, lying near Gyaros.]

LETHÆUS (Ληθαῖος). 1. A river of Ionia, in Asia Minor, flowing south past Magnesia into the Mæander.—2. A river in the south of Crete, flowing past Gortyna.—3. Vid. LATHON.

LETHE (Λήθη), the personification of oblivion, called by Hesiod a daughter of Eris. A river in the lower world was likewise called Lethe. The souls of the departed drank of this river, and thus forgot all they had said or done in the upper world; [and, according to Virgil (Æn., vi., 713), the souls destined by the Fates to inhabit new bodies on earth also drank of its waters, to remove the remembrance of the joys of Elysium.]

LETHE, a river in Spain. Vid. LIMÆA.

LĒTO (Λητώ), called LATŌNA by the Romans, is described by Hesiod as a daughter of the Titan Cœus and Phœbe, a sister of Asteria, and the mother of Apollo and Diana (Artemis) by Jupiter (Zeus), to whom she was married before Juno (Hera). Homer likewise calls her the mother of Apollo and Diana (Artemis) by Jupiter (Zeus); he mentions her in the story of Niobe, who paid so dearly for her conduct toward Latona (Leto) (vid. NIOBE), and he also describes her as the friend of the Trojans in the war with the Greeks. In later writers these elements of her story are variously embellished, for they do not describe her as the lawful wife of Jupiter (Zeus), but merely as his mistress, who was persecuted by Juno (Hera) during her pregnancy. All the world being afraid of receiving Latona (Leto) on account of Juno (Hera), she wandered about till she came to Delos, which was then a floating island, and bore the name of Asteria or Ortygia. When Latona (Leto) arrived there, Jupiter (Zeus) fastened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting-place for his beloved, and here she gave birth to Apollo and Diana (Artemis). The tradition is also related with various other modifications. Some said that Jupiter (Zeus) changed Latona (Leto) into a quail (ὄρτυξ), and that in this state she arrived in the floating island, which was hence called Ortygia. Others related that Jupiter (Zeus) was enamored with Asteria, but that she, being metamorphosed into a bird, flew across the sea; that she was then changed into a rock, which for a long time lay under the surface of the sea; and that this rock arose from the waters and received Latona (Leto) when she was pursued by Python. Latona (Leto) was generally worshipped only in conjunction with her children. Delos was the chief seat of her worship. Vid. APOLLO. It is probable that the name of Leto belongs to the same class of words as the Greek λήθη and the Latin lateo. Leto would therefore signify "the obscure" or "concealed," not as a physical power, but as a divinity yet quiescent and invisible, from whom issued the visible divinity with all his splendor and brilliancy. This view is supported by the account of her genealogy given by Hesiod. From their mother Apollo is frequently called Letoïus or Latoïus, and Artemis (Diana) Letoïa Letoïs, Latoïs, or Latoë.

LEUCA (τὰ Λευκά), town at the extremity of the Iapygian promontory in Calabria, with a fetid fountain, under which the giants who were vanquished by Hercules are said to have been buried. The promontory is still called Capo di Leuca.

[LEUCADIA. Vid. LEUCAS.]

LEUCÆ, LEUCA (Λεῦκαι, Λεύκη: now Lefke), a small town on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor near Phocæa, built by the Persian general Tachos in B.C. 352, and remarkable as the scene of the battle between the consul Licinius Crassus and Aristonicus in 131.

Leucas or Leucădĭa [Λευκάς, Λευκαδία: Λευκάδιος: now Santa Maura), an island in the Ionian Sea off the western coast of Acarnania, about twenty miles in length, and from five to eight miles in breadth. It has derived its name from the numerous calcareous hills which cover its surface. It was originally united to the main land at its northeastern extremity by a narrow isthmus. Homer speaks of it as a peninsula and mentions its well-fortified town Nericus (Νήρικος). It was at that time inhabited by the Teleboans and Leleges. Subsequently the Corinthians under Cypselus, between B.C. 665 and 625, founded a new town, called Leucas, in the northeast of the country, near the isthmus, in which they settled one thousand of their citizens, and to which they removed the inhabitants of Nericus, which lay a little to the west of the new town. The Corinthians also cut a canal through the isthmus, and thus converted the peninsula into an island. This canal was afterward filled up by deposits of sand; and in the Peloponnesian war it was no longer available for ships, which during that period were conveyed across the isthmus on more than one occasion (Thuc., iii., 81; iv., 8). The canal was opened again by the Romans. At present the channel is dry in some parts, and has from three to four feet of water in others. The town of Leucas was a place of importance, and during the war between Philip and the Romans was at the head of the Acarnanian league, and the place where the meetings of the league were held. It was, in consequence, taken and plundered by the Romans, B.C. 197. The remains of this town are still to be seen. The other towns in the island were Hellomĕnum (Ἑλλόμενον) on the southeastern coast, and Phara (Φαρά) on the southwestern coast. At the southern extremity of the island, opposite Cephallenia, was the celebrated promontory, variously called Leucas, Leucătas, Leucătes, or Leucăte (now Cape Ducato), on which was a temple of Apollo, who hence had the surname of Leucadius. At the annual festival of the god it was the custom to cast down a criminal from this promontory into the sea: to break his fall, birds of all kinds were attached to him, and if he reached the sea uninjured, boats were ready to pick him up. This appears to have been an expiatory rite; and it gave rise to the well known story that lovers leaped from this rock in order to seek relief from the pangs of love. Thus Sappho is said to have leaped down from this rock when in love with Phaon; but this well-known story vanishes at the first approach of criticism.

[Leucasia (Λευκασία). Vid. Leucosia.]

[Leucatas (now Akrita), also called Acritas, a promontory of Bithynia, west of Nicomedia.]

Leuce (Λευκή). 1. An island in the Euxine Sea, near the mouth of the Borysthenes, sacred to Achilles. Vid. Achilleus Dromos.—[2. A small island on the eastern coast of Crete, south of the Promontory Itanum.]

[Leuce Acte (Λευκή Ἀκτή: now St Georgio), a town and roadstead of Thrace, on the Propontis.]

[Leuce Come (Λευκὴ Κώμη), a fortified place in the north of Arabia Felix, on the Arabicus Sinus, which served as a depôt for goods sent to Petra and Northern Arabia.]

Leuci, a people in the southeast of Gallia Belgica, south of the Mediomatrici, between the Matrona and Mosella. Their chief town was Tullum (now Toul).

Leuci Montes, called by the Romans Albi Montes, a range of mountains in the west of Crete. Vid. Albi Montes.

Leucippe. Vid. Alcathoe.

Leucippĭdes (Λευκιππίδης), i. e., Phœbe and Hilaira, the daughters of Leucippus. They were priestesses of Minerva (Athena) and Diana (Artemis), and betrothed to Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus; but Castor and Pollux, being charmed with their beauty, carried them off and married them.

Leucippus (Λεύκιππος). 1. Son of Œnomaus. For details, vid. Daphne.—2. Son of Perieres and Gorgophone, brother of Aphareus, and prince of the Messenians, was one of the Calydonian hunters. By his wife Philodice he had two daughters, Phœbe and Hilaira, usually called Leucippides.—3. A Grecian philosopher, the founder of the atomic theory of the ancient philosophy, which was more fully developed by Democritus. Where and when he was born we have no data for deciding. Miletus, Abdera, and Elea have been assigned as his birth-place: the first, apparently, for no other reason than that it was the birth-place of several natural philosophers; the second, because Democritus came from that town; the third, because he was looked upon as a disciple of the Eleatic school. The period when he lived is equally uncertain. He is called the teacher of Democritus, the disciple of Parmenides, or according to other accounts, of Zeno, of Melissus, nay, even of Pythagoras. With regard to his philosophical system it is impossible to speak with certainty, since the writers who mention him either mention him in conjunction with Democritus, or attribute to him doctrines which are in like manner attributed to Democritus. Vid. Democritus.

Leucon (Λεύκων). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) or Athamas and Themisto, and father of Erythrus and Evippe.—2. A powerful king of Bosporus, who reigned B.C. 393–353. He was in close alliance with the Athenians, whom he supplied with corn in great abundance, and who, in return for his services, admitted him and his sons to the citizenship of Athens.—3. An Athenian poet, of the old comedy, a contemporary and rival of Aristophanes. [A fragment preserved in Hesychius is given in Meineke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 428.]

Leucōnĭum (Λευκώνιον), a place in the island of Chios. (Thuc., viii., 24.)

Leucŏnŏe (Λευκονόη), daughter of Minyas, usually called Leucippe. Vid. Alcathoe.

Leucopetra (Λευκόπετρα: now Cape dell' Armi), a promontory in the southwest of Bruttium, on the Sicilian Straits, and a few miles south of Rhegium, to whose territory it belonged. It was regarded by the ancient writers as the termination of the Apennines, and it derived its name from the white color of its rocks.

Leucophryne. Vid. Leucophrys.

LEUCOPHRYS (Λευκόφρυς). 1. A city of Caria, in the plain of the Mæander, close to a curious lake of warm water, and having a renowned temple of Diana (Artemis) Leucophryne.—2. A name given to the island of TENEDOS, from its white cliffs.

LEUCŌSĬA or LEUCASĬA (now Piana), a small island in the south of the Gulf of Pæstum, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the Promontory Posidium, said to have been called after one of the Sirens.

LEUCŌSȲRI (Λευκόσυροι, i. e., White Syrians), was a name early applied by the Greeks to the inhabitants of Cappadocia, who were of the Syrian race, in contradistinction to the Syrian tribes of a darker color beyond the Taurus. Afterward, when Cappadoces came to be the common name for the people of Southern Cappadocia, the word Leucosyri was applied specifically to the people in the north of the country (afterward Pontus) on the coast of the Euxine, between the rivers Halys and Iris: these are the White Syrians of Xenophon (Anab., v., 6). After the Macedonian conquest the name appears to have fallen into disuse.

LEUCŌTHĔA (Λευκοθέα), a marine goddess, was previously Ino, the wife of Athamas. For details, vid. ATHAMAS.

LEUCŌTHŎE, daughter of the Babylonian king Orchamus and Eurynome, was beloved by Apollo. Her amour was betrayed by the jealous Clytia to her father, who buried her alive; whereupon Apollo metamorphosed her into an incense shrub. Leucothoe is in some writers only another form for Leucothea.

LEUCTRA (τὰ εὔκτρα: now Lefka or Lefkra). 1. A small town in Bœotia, on the road from Platææ to Thespiæ, memorable for the victory which Epaminondas and the Thebans here gained over Cleombrotus and the Spartans, B.C. 371.—[2. Vid. LEUCTRUM.]

LEUCTRUM (Λεῦκτρον). 1. Or LEUCTRA (now Leftro), a town in Messenia, on the eastern side of the Messenian Gulf, between Cardamyle and Thalama, on the small river Pamisus. The Spartans and Messenians disputed for the possession of it.—2. A small town in Achaia, dependent on Rhypæ.

[LEUCUS (Λεῦκος) a companion of Ulysses in the Trojan war, slain by Antiphus.]

[LEUCYANIAS (Λευκυανίας), a small river of Elis, that flows from Mount Pholoe, and empties into the Alpheus. On its banks was a temple of Bacchus (Dionysus) Leucyanites.]

LEXOVĬI or LEXOBĬI, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Ocean, west of the mouth of the Sequana. Their capital was Noviomagus (now Lisieux).

LIBA (ἡ Λίβα), a city of Mesopotamia, between Nisibis and the Tigris.

LIBANĬUS (Λιβάνιος), a distinguished Greek sophist and rhetorician, was born at Antioch, on the Orontes, about A.D. 314. He studied at Athens, where he imbibed an ardent love for the great classical writers of Greece; and he afterward set up a private school of rhetoric at Constantinople, which was attended by so large a number of pupils that the classes of the public professors were completely deserted. The latter, in revenge, charged Libanius with being a magician, and obtained his expulsion from Constantinople about 346. He then went to Nicomedia, where he taught with equal success, but also drew upon himself an equal degree of malice from his opponents. After a stay of five years at Nicomedia, he was recalled to Constantinople. Eventually he took up his abode at Antioch, where he spent the remainder of his life. Here he received the greatest marks of favor from the Emperor Julian, 362. In the reign of Valens he was at first persecuted, but he afterward succeeded in winning the favor of that monarch also. The Emperor Theodosius likewise showed him marks of respect, but his enjoyment of life was disturbed by ill health, by misfortunes in his family, and more especially by the disputes in which he was incessantly involved, partly with rival sophists, and partly with the prefects. It can not, however, be denied, that he himself was as much to blame as his opponents, for he appears to have provoked them by his querulous disposition, and by the pride and vanity which every where appear in his orations, and which led him to interfere in political questions which it would have been wiser to have left alone. He was the teacher of St. Basil and Chrysostom, with whom he always kept up a friendly connection. The year of his death is uncertain, but from one of his epistles it is evident that he was alive in 391, and it is probable that he died a few years after, in the reign of Arcadius. The extant works of Libanius are, 1. Models for rhetorical exercises (Προγυμνασμάτων παραδείγματα). 2. Orations (Λόγοι), sixty-seven in number. 3. Declamations (Μελέται), i. e., orations on fictitious subjects, and descriptions of various kinds, fifty in number. 4. A life of Demosthenes, and arguments to the speeches of the same orator. 5. Letters (Ἐπιστολαί), of which a very large number is still extant. Many of these letters are extremely interesting, being addressed to the most eminent men of his time, such as the Emperor Julian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and others. The style of Libanius is superior to that of the other rhetoricians of the fourth century. He took the best orators of the classic age as his models, and we can often see in him the disciple and happy imitator of Demosthenes; but he is not always able to rise above the spirit of his age, and we rarely find in him that natural simplicity which constitutes the great charm of the best Attic orators. His diction is a curious mixture of the pure old Attic with what may be termed modern. Moreover, it is evident that, like all other rhetoricians, he is more concerned about the form than the substance. As far as the history of his age is concerned, some of his orations, and still more his epistles, are of great value, such as the oration in which he relates the events of his own life, the eulogies on Constantius and Constans, the orations on Julian, several orations describing the condition of Antioch, and those which he wrote against his professional and political opponents. There is no complete edition of all the works of Libanius. The best edition of the orations and declamations is by Reiske, Altenburg, 1791–97, 4 vols. 8vo, and the best edition of the epistles is by Wolf, Amsterdam, 1738, fol.

LĬBĂNUS (ὁ Λίβανος, τὸ Λίβανον: Heb. Leb nus, i. e., the White Mountain: now Jebel Libnan), a lofty and steep mountain range on the confines of Syria and Palestine, dividing Phœnice from Cœle-Syria. It extends from above Sidon, about latitude 33½° north, in a direction north-northeast as far as about latitude 34½°. Its highest summits are covered with perpetual snow; its sides were in ancient times clothed with forests of cedars, of which only scattered trees now remain, and on its lower slopes grow vines, figs, mulberries, and other fruits: its wines were highly celebrated in ancient times. It is considerably lower than the opposite range of ANTILIBANUS. In the Scriptures the word Lebanon is used for both ranges, and for either of them; but in classical authors the names Libanus and Antilibanus are distinctive terms, being applied to the western and eastern ranges respectively.

LIBARNA or LIBARNUM, a town of Liguria, on the Via Aurelia, northwest of Genua.

LIBENTĪNA, LUBENTĪNA, LUBENTĪA, a surname of Venus among the Romans, by which she is described as the goddess of sexual pleasure (dea libidinis).

LIBER, or LIBER PATER, a name frequently given by the Roman poets to the Greek Bacchus or Dionysus, who was accordingly regarded as identical with the Italian Liber. But the god LIBER and the goddess LIBERA were ancient Italian divinities, presiding over the cultivation of the vine and the fertility of the fields. Hence they were worshipped even in early times in conjunction with Ceres. A temple to these three divinities was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius in B.C. 496, and was built near the Circus Flaminius; it was afterward restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius. The name Liber is probably connected with liberare. Hence Seneca says, Liber dictus est quia liberat servitio curarum animi; while others, who were evidently thinking of the Greek Bacchus, found in the name an allusion to licentious drinking and speaking. Poets usually called him Liber Pater, the latter word being very commonly added by the Italians to the names of gods. The female Libera was identified by the Romans with Cora or Proserpina, the daughter of Demeter (Ceres); whence Cicero calls Liber and Libera children of Ceres; whereas Ovid calls Ariadne Libera. The festival of the Liberalia was celebrated by the Romans every year on the 17th of March.

LIBERA. Vid. LIBER.

[LIBERALIS. Vid. ANTONINUS LIBERALIS.]

LIBERTAS, the personification of Liberty, was worshipped at Rome as a divinity. A temple was erected to her on the Aventine by Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. Another was built by Clodius on the spot where Cicero's house had stood. A third was erected after Cæsar's victories in Spain. From these temples we must distinguish the Atrium Libertatis, which was in the north of the forum, toward the Quirinal. This building, under the republic, served as an office of the censors, and also contained tables with laws inscribed upon them. It was rebuilt by Asinius Pollio, and then became the repository of the first public library at Rome. Libertas is usually represented in works of art as a matron, with the pileus, the symbol of liberty, or a wreath of laurel. Sometimes she appears holding the Phrygian cap in her hand.

LIBĒTHRĬDES. Vid. LIBETHRUM.

LIBETHRĬUS MONS (τὸ Λιβήθριον ὄρος), a mountain in Bœotia, a branch of Mount Helicon, [illegible] stadia from Coronea, possessing a grotto of the Libethrian nymphs, adorned with their statues, and two fountains Libethrias and Petra.

LIBETHRUM (Λείβηθρον, τὰ Λείβηθρα, [illegible] θρα), an ancient Thracian town in Pieria in Macedonia, on the slope of Olympus, and southwest of Dium, where Orpheus is said to have [illegible]. This town and the surrounding country was sacred to the Muses, who were hence called Libēthrĭdes; and it is probable that the worship of the Muses under this name was transferred from this place to Bœotia.

[LIBISSONIS TURRIS (Λιβίσσωνος πύργος), a town on the northern coast of Sardinia, and, according to Pliny, the only Roman colony in the island; probably the usual landing place for ships coming from Corsica. Its ruins are now seen on a height near a harbor which still bears the name Porto Torre.]

LIBITĪNA, an ancient Italian divinity, who was identified by the later Romans sometimes with Persephone (Proserpina), on account of her connection with the dead and their burial, and sometimes with Aphrodite (Venus). The latter was probably the consequence of etymological speculations on the name of Libitina, which people connected with libido. Her temple at Rome was a repository of every thing necessary for burials, and persons might there either buy or hire those things. Hence a person undertaking the burial of a person (an undertaker) was called libitinarius, and his business libitina; hence the expressions libitinam exercere or facere: and libitina funeribus non sufficiebat, i. e., they could not all be buried. It is related that King Servius Tullius, in order to ascertain the number of deaths, ordained that for every person who died, a piece of money should be deposited in the temple of Libitina. Owing to this connection of Libitina with the dead, Roman poets frequently employ her name in the sense of death itself.

LIBO, SCRIBONĬUS, a plebeian family. 1. L., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 149, accused Ser. Sulpicius Galba on account of the outrages which he had committed against the Lusitanians. Vid. GALBA, No. 6. It was perhaps this Libo who consecrated the Puteal Scribonianum or Puteal Libonis, of which we so frequently read in ancient writers. The Puteal was an inclosed place in the forum, near the Arcus Fabianus, and was so called from its being open at the top, like a puteal or well. It appears that there was only one such puteal at Rome, and not two, as is generally believed. It was dedicated in very ancient times either on account of the whetstone of the augur Navius (comp. Liv., i., 36), or because the spot had been struck by lightning; it was subsequently repaired and re-dedicated by Libo, who erected in its neighborhood a tribunal for the prætor, in consequence of which the place was frequented by persons who had lawsuits, such as money-lenders and the like. (Comp. Hor., Sat., ii., 6, 35; Epist., i., 19, 8.)—2. L., the father-in-law of Sex. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he naturally sided with Pompey, and was intrusted with the command of Etruria. Shortly afterward he accompanied Pompey to Greece, and was actively engaged in the war that ensued. On the death of Bibulus (48) he had the chief command of the Pompeian fleet. In the civil wars which followed Cæsar's death, he followed the fortunes his son-in-law Sex. Pompey. In 40 Octavius married his sister Scribonia, and this marriage was followed by a peace between the triumvirs and Pompey (39). When the war was renewed in 36, Libo for a time continued with Pompey, but, seeing his cause hopeless, he deserted him in the following year. In 34 he was consul with M. Antony.

LIBON (Λίβων), an Elean, the architect of the great temple of Jupiter (Zeus) in the Altis at Olympia, flourished about B.C. 450.

[LIBŎRA (Λίβορα), a town of the Carpetani, same as the ÆBURA (q. v.) of Livy.]

LIBUI, a Gallic tribe in Gallia Cispadana, to whom the towns of Brixia and Verona formerly belonged, from which they were expelled by the Cenomani. They are probably the same people whom we afterward find in the neighborhood of Vercellæ under the name of Lebecii or Libici.

LIBURNĬA, a district of Illyricum, along the coast of the Adriatic Sea, was separated from Istria on the northwest by the River Arsia, and from Dalmatia on the south by the River Titius, thus corresponding to the western part of Croatia and the northern part of the modern Dalmatia. The country is mountainous and unproductive, and its inhabitants, the LIBURNI, supported themselves chiefly by commerce and navigation. They were celebrated at a very early period as bold and skillful sailors, and they appear to have been the first people who had the sway of the waters of the Adriatic. They took possession of most of the islands of this sea as far as Corcyra, and had settlements even on the opposite coast of Italy. Their ships were remarkable for their swift sailing, and hence vessels built after the same model were called Liburnicæ or Liburnæ naves. It was to light vessels of this description that Augustus was mainly indebted for his victory over Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. The Liburnians were the first Illyrian people who submitted to the Romans. Being hard pressed by the Iapydes on the north and by the Dalmatians on the south, they sought the protection of Rome at a comparatively early period. Hence we find that many of their towns were immunes, or exempt from taxes. The islands off the coast were reckoned a part of Liburnia, and are known by the general name of Liburnides or Liburnicæ Insulæ. Vid. ILLYRICUM.

LIBȲA (Λιβύη), daughter of Epaphus and Memphis, from whom Libya (Africa) is said to have derived its name. By Neptune (Poseidon) she became the mother of Agenor, Belus. and Lelex.

LĬBȲA (Λιβύη: Λίβυες, Libyes). 1. The Greek name for the continent of Africa in general. Vid. AFRICA.—2. L. INTERIOR (Λ. ἡ ἐντός), the whole interior of Africa, as distinguished from the well-known regions on the northern and northeastern coasts.—3. LIBYA, specifically, or LIBYÆ NOMOS (Λιβύης νομός), a district of Northern Africa, between Egypt and Marmarica, so called because it once formed an Egyptian Nomos. It is sometimes called Libya Exterior

LĬBȲCI MONTES (τὸ Λιβυκὸν ὄρος: now Jebel Selseleh), the range of mountains which form the western margin of the valley of the Nile Vid. ÆGYPTUS.

LĬBȲCUM MARE (τὸ Λιβυκὸν πέλαγος), the part of the Mediterranean between the island of Crete and the northern coast of Africa.

LIBYPHŒNĪCES (Λιβυφοίνικες, Λιβοφοίνικες), a term applied to the people of those parts of Northern Africa in which the Phœnicians had founded colonies, and especially to the inhabitants of the Phœnician cities on the coast of the Carthaginian territory: it is derived from the fact that these people were a mixed race of the Libyan natives with the Phœnician settlers.

LIBYSSA (Λίβυσσα: now Herekeh? according to Leake, Malsum), a town of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, on the northern coast of the Sinus Astacenus, west of Nicomedia, celebrated as the place where the tomb of Hannibal was to be seen.

LICĀTES or LICĀTĬI, a people of Vindelicia, on the eastern bank of the River Licus or Licia (now Lech), one of the fiercest of the Vindelician tribes.

LICHĂDES (Λιχάδες: now Ponticonesi), three small islands between Eubœa and the coast of Locris, called Scarphia, Caresa, and Phocaria. Vid. LICHAS, No. 1.

LICHAS (Λίχας). 1. An attendant on Hercules, brought his master the poisoned garment which destroyed the hero. (Vid. p. 359, a.) Hercules, in anguish and wrath, threw Lichas into the sea, and the Lichadian islands were believed to have derived their name from him.—2. A Spartan, son of Arcesilaus, was proxenus of Argos, and is frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war. He was famous throughout Greece for his hospitality, especially in his entertainment of strangers at the Gymnopædia.

LICIA or LICUS. Vid. LICATES.

LICINĬA. 1. A Vestal virgin, accused of incest, together with two other Vestals, Æmilia and Marcia, B.C. 114. L. Metellus, the pontifex maximus, condemned Æmilia, but acquitted Licinia and Marcia. The acquittal of the two last caused such dissatisfaction that the people appointed L. Cassius Longinus to investigate the matter, and he condemned both Licinia and Marcia.—2. Wife of C. Sempronius Gracchus, the celebrated tribune.—3. Daughter of Crassus the orator, and wife of the younger Marius.

LICINĬA GENS, a celebrated plebeian house, to which belonged C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, whose exertions threw open the consulship to the plebeians. Its most distinguished families at a later time were those of CRASSUS, LUCULLUS, and MURENA. There were likewise numerous other surnames in the gens, which are also given in their proper places.

LICINĬUS. 1. C. LICINIUS CALVUS, surnamed STOLO, which he derived, it is said, from the care with which he dug up the shoots that sprang up from the roots of his vines. He brought the contest between the patricians and plebeians to a happy termination, and thus became the founder of Rome's greatness. He was tribune of the people from B.C. 376 to 367, and was faithfully supported in his exertions by his colleague

L. Sextius. The laws which he proposed were: 1. That in future no more consular tribunes should be appointed, but that consuls should be elected, one of whom should always be a plebeian. 2. That no one should possess more than five hundred jugera of the public land, or keep upon it more than one hundred head of large and five hundred of small cattle. 3. A law regulating the affairs between debtor and creditor. 4. That the Sibylline books should be intrusted to a college of ten men (decemviri), half of whom should be plebeians. These rogations were passed after a most vehement opposition on the part of the patricians, and L. Sextius was the first plebeian who obtained the consulship, 366. Licinius himself was elected twice to the consulship, 364 and 361. Some years later he was accused by M. Popilius Lænas of having transgressed his own law respecting the amount of public land which a person might possess. He was condemned and sentenced to pay a heavy fine.—2. C. Licinius Macer, an annalist and an orator, was a man of prætorian dignity, who, when impeached (66) of extortion by Cicero, finding that the verdict was against him, forthwith committed suicide before the formalities of the trial were completed, and thus averted the dishonor and loss which would have been entailed upon his family by a public condemnation and by the confiscation of property which it involved. His Annales commenced with the very origin of the city, and extended to twenty-one-books at least; but how far he brought down his history is unknown.—3. C. Licinius Macer Calvus, son of the last, a distinguished orator and poet, was born in 82, and died about 47 or 46, in his thirty-fifth or thirty-sixth year. His most celebrated oration was delivered against Vatinius, who was defended by Cicero, when he was only twenty-seven years of age. So powerful was the effect produced by this speech, that the accused started up in the midst of the pleading, and passionately exclaimed, "Rogo vos, judices, num, si iste disertus est, ideo me damnari oporteat?" His poems were full of wit and grace, and possessed sufficient merit to be classed by the ancients with those of Catullus. His elegies, especially that on the untimely death of his mistress Quintilia, have been warmly extolled by Catullus, Propertius, and Ovid. Calvus was remarkable for the shortness of his stature, and hence the vehement action in which he indulged while pleading was in such ludicrous contrast with his insignificant person, that even his friend Catullus has not been able to resist a joke, and has presented him to us as the "Salaputium disertum," "the eloquent Tom Thumb."

Licinius, Roman emperor A.D. 307–324, whose full name was Publius Flavius Galerius Valerius Licinianus Licinius. He was a Dacian peasant by birth, and the early friend and companion in arms of the Emperor Galerius, by whom he was raised to the rank of Augustus, and invested with the command of the Illyrian provinces at Carmentum, on the 11th of November, A.D. 307. Upon the death of Galerius in 311, he concluded a peaceful arrangement with Maximinus II., in virtue of which the Hellespont and the Bosporus were to form the boundary of the two empires. 313 he married at Milan, Constantia, the of Constantine, and in the same year set encounter Maximinus, who had invaded his minions. Maximinus was defeated by Li near Heraclea, and died a few months ward at Tarsus. Licinius and Const were now the only emperors, and each anxious to obtain the undivided sovere Accordingly, war broke out between the 315. Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in nonia, and afterward at Adrianople, and compelled to purchase peace by ceding to stantine Greece, Macedonia, and Illyri This peace lasted about nine years, at the which time hostilities were renewed. The battle of Adrianople (July, 323), followed by reduction of Byzantium, and a second victory achieved near Chalcedon (Septem placed Licinius at the mercy of Consta who, although he spared his life for the m and merely sentenced him to an honorable prisonment at Thessalonica, soon found a venient pretext for putting him to death. 324.

Licĭnus. 1. A Gaul by birth, was taken oner in war, and became a slave of Julius sar, whose confidence he gained so much as be made his dispensator or steward. C gave him his freedom. He also gained favor of Augustus, who appointed him, in 15, governor of his native country, Gaul. the plunder of Gaul and by other means he quired enormous wealth, and hence his name frequently coupled with that of Crassus. lived to see the reign of Tiberius.—2. The ber (tonsor) Licinus spoken of by Horace (A Poët., 301) must have been a different pers from the preceding, although identified by the Scholiast.—3. Clōdius Licinus, a Roman nalist, who lived about the beginning of the first century B.C., wrote the history of R from its capture by the Gauls to his own time This Clodius is frequently confounded with Q Claudius Quadrigarius. Vid. Quadrigarius.—4. L. Porcius Licinus, plebeian ædile 210, and prætor 207, when he obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province.—5. L. Porcius Licinus, prætor 193, with Sardinia as his province, and consul 184, when he carried on war against the Ligurians.—6. Porcius Licinus, an ancient Roman poet, who probably lived in the latter part of the second century B.C.

[Licus, a river of Vindelicia. Vid. Licatii.]

Licymnĭa, spoken of by Horace (Carm. ii., 12, 13, seq.), is probably the same as Terentia, the wife of Mæcenas.

Licymnĭus (Λικύμνιος). 1. Son of Electryon and the Phrygian slave Midea, and consequently half-brother of Alcmene. He was married to Perimede, by whom he became the father of Œonus, Argeus, and Melas. He was a friend of Hercules, whose son Tlepolemus slew him according to some unintentionally, and according to others in a fit of anger.—2. Of Chios, a distinguished dithyrambic poet, of uncertain date. Some writers place him before Simonides; but it is perhaps more likely that he belonged to the later Athenian dithyrambic school about the end of the fourth century B.C.—3. Of Sicily, a rhetorician, the pupil of Gorgias and the teacher of Polus.

LIDE (Λίδη), a mountain of Caria, above Pedasa.

LIGARĬUS, Q., was legate, in Africa, of C. Considius Longus, who left him in command of the province, B.C. 50. Next year (49) Ligarius resigned the government of the province into the hands of L. Attius Varus. Ligarius fought under Varus against Curio in 49, and against Cæsar himself in 46. After the battle of Thapsus, Ligarius was taken prisoner at Adrumetum; his life was spared, but he was banished by Cæsar. Meantime, a public accusation was brought against Ligarius by Q. Ælius Tubero. The case was pleaded before Cæsar himself in the forum. Cicero defended Ligarius in a speech, still extant, in which he maintains that Ligarius had as much claims to the mercy of Cæsar, as Tubero and Cicero himself. Ligarius was pardoned by Cæsar, who was on the point of setting out for the Spanish war. The speech which Cicero delivered in his defence was subsequently published, and was much admired. Ligarius joined the conspirators who assassinated Cæsar in 44. Ligarius and his two brothers perished in the proscription of the triumvirs in 43.

LIGER or LIGĔRIS (now Loire), one of the largest rivers in Gaul, rises in Mount Cevenna, flows through the territories of the Arverni, Ædui, and Carnutes, and falls into the ocean between the territories of the Namnetes and Pictones.

LIGURĬA (ἡ Λιγυστική, ἡ Λιγυστίνη), a district of Italy, was, in the time of Augustus, bounded on the west by the river Varus and the Maritime Alps, which separated it from Transalpine Gaul, on the southeast by the River Macra, which separated it from Etruria, on the north by the River Po, and on the south by the Mare Ligusticum. The country is very mountainous and unproductive, as the Maritime Alps and the Apennines run through the greater part of it. The mountains run almost down to the coast, leaving only space sufficient for a road, which formed the highway from Italy to the south of Gaul. The chief occupation of the inhabitants was the rearing and feeding of cattle. The numerous forests on the mountains produced excellent timber, which, with the other products of the country, was exported from Genua, the principal town of the country. The inhabitants were called by the Greeks LIGYES (Λίγυες) and LIGYSTĪNI (Λιγυστινοί), and by the Romans LIGŪRES (sing. Ligus, more rarely Ligur). They were in early times a powerful and widely-extended people; but their origin is uncertain, some writers supposing them to be Celts, others Iberians, and others, again, of the same race as the Siculians, or most ancient inhabitants of Italy. It is certain that the Ligurians at one time inhabited the southern coast of Gaul, as well as the country afterward called Liguria, and that they had possession of the whole coast from the mouth of the Rhone to Pisæ in Etruria. The Greeks probably became acquainted with them first from the Samians and Phocæans, who visited their coasts for the purposes of commerce; and so powerful were they considered at this time, that Hesiod names them, along with the Scythians and Ethiopians, as one of the chief people of the earth. Tradition also related that Hercules fought with the Ligurians on the plain of stones near Massilia; and even a writer so late as Eratosthenes gave the name of Ligystice to the whole of the western peninsula of Europe. So widely were they believed to be spread, that the Ligyes in Germany and Asia were supposed to be a branch of the same people. The Ligurian tribes were divided by the Romans into Ligures Transalpini and Cisalpini. The tribes which inhabited the Maritime Alps were called in general Alpini, and also Capillati or Comati, from their custom of allowing their hair to grow long. The tribes which inhabited the Apennines were called Montani. The names of the principal tribes were: on the western side of the Alps, the SALYES or SALLUVII, OXYBII, and DECIATES; on the eastern side of the Alps, the INTEMELII, INGAUNI, and APUANI near the coast, the VAGIENNI, SALASSI, and TAURINI on the upper course of the Po, and the LÆVI and MARICI north of the Po. The Ligurians were small of stature, but strong, active, and brave. In early times they served as mercenaries in the armies of the Carthaginians, and subsequently they carried on a long and fierce struggle with the Romans. Their country was invaded for the first time by the Romans in B.C. 238; but it was not till after the termination of the second Punic war, and the defeat of Philip and Antiochus, that the Romans were able to devote their energies to the subjugation of Liguria. It was many years, however, before the whole country was finally subdued. Whole tribes, such as the Apuani, were transplanted to Samnium, and their place supplied by Roman colonists. The country was divided between the provinces of Gallia Narbonensis and Gallia Cisalpina; and in the time of Augustus and of the succeeding emperors, the tribes in the mountains were placed under the government of an imperial procurator, called Procurator or Præfectus Alpium Maritimarum.

LIGUSTĬCUM MARE, the name originally of the whole sea south of Gaul and of the northwest of Italy, but subsequently only the eastern part of this sea, or the Gulf of Genoa, whence later writers speak only of a Sinus Ligusticus.

[LIGYES (Λίγυες), the inhabitants of Liguria. Vid. LIGURIA.]

LILÆA (Λίλαια: Λιλαιεύς), an ancient town in Phocis, near the sources of the Cephisus.

LILYBÆUM (Λιλύβαιον: now Marsala), a town in the west of Sicily, with an excellent harbor, situated on a promontory of the same name (now Cape Boo or di Marsala), opposite to the Promontorium Hermæum or Mercurii (now Cape Bon) in Africa, the space between the two being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa. The town of Lilybæum was founded by the Carthaginians about B.C. 397, and was made the principal Carthaginian fortress in Sicily. It was surrounded by massive walls and by a trench sixty feet wide and forty feet deep. On the destruction of Selinus in 249, the inhabitants of the latter city were transplanted to Lilybæum, which thus became still more powerful. Lilybæum was besieged by the Romans in the first Punic war, but they were unable to take it; and they only obtained possession of it by the treaty of peace. Under the Romans Lilybæum continued to be a place of importance. At Marsala, which occupies only the southern half of the ancient town, there are the ruins of a Roman aqueduct, and a few other ancient remains.

LIMÆA, LIMIA, LIMIUS, BELION (now Lima), a river in Gallæcia in Spain, between the Durius and the Minius, which flowed into the Atlantic Ocean. It was also called the river of Forgetfulness (ὁ τῆς Λήθης, Flumen Oblivionis); and it is said to have been so called because the Turduli and the Celts on one occasion lost here their commander, and forgot the object of their expedition. This legend was so generally believed that it was with difficulty that Brutus Callaicus could induce his soldiers to cross the river when he invaded Gallæcia, B.C. 136. On the banks of this river dwelt a small tribe called LIMICI.

LIMĪTES ROMĀNI, the name of a continuous series of fortifications, consisting of castles, walls, earthen ramparts, and the like, which the Romans erected along the Rhine and the Danube, to protect their possessions from the attacks of the Germans.

LIMNÆ (Λίμναι, Λιμναῖος). 1. A town in Messenia, on the frontiers of Laconia, with a temple of Diana (Artemis), who was hence surnamed Limnatis. This temple was common to the people of both countries; and the outrage which the Messenian youth committed against some Lacedæmonian maidens, who were sacrificing at this temple, was the occasion of the first Messenian war. Limnæ was situated in the Ager Dentheliatis, which district was a subject of constant dispute between the Lacedæmonians and Messenians after the re-establishment of the Messenian independence by Epaminondas.—2. A town in the Thracian Chersonesus on the Hellespont, not far from Sestus, founded by the Milesians.—3. Vid. SPARTA.

LIMNÆA (Λιμναία: Λιμναῖος), a town in the north of Acarnania, on the road from Argos Amphilochicum to Stratos, and near the Ambracian Gulf, on which it had a harbor.

LIMNÆA, LIMNĒTES, LIMNĒGĔNES (Λιμναία (ος), Λιμνήτης (ις), Λιμνηγενής), i. e., inhabiting or born in a lake or marsh, a surname of several divinities who were believed either to have sprung from a lake, or who had their temples near a lake. Hence we find this surname given to Bacchus (Dionysus) at Athens, and to Diana (Artemis) at various places.

LIMONUM. Vid. PICTONES.

LĬMȲRA (τὰ Λίμυρα: ruins north of Pineka?), a city in the southeast of Lycia, on the River LIMYRUS, twenty stadia from its mouth.

LĬMȲRUS (Λίμυρος: now Phineka?), a river of Lycia, flowing into the bay west of the Sacrum Promontorium (now Phineka Bay): navigable as far up as LIMYRA. The recent travellers differ as to whether the present River Phineka is the Limyrus or its tributary the Arycandus.

LINDUM (now Lincoln), a town of the Coritani in Britain, on the road from Londinium to Eboracum, and a Roman colony. The modern name Lincoln has been formed out of Lindum Colonia.

LINDUS (Λίνδος: Λίνδιος: ruins at Lindo), on the eastern side of the island of Rhodes, was one of the most ancient Dorian colonies on the Asiatic coast. It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii., 656), with its kindred cities Ialysus and Camirus. These three cities, with Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus, formed the original hexapolis, in the southwestern corner of Asia Minor. Lindus stood upon a mountain in a district abounding in vines and figs, and had two celebrated temples, one of Minerva (Athena), surnamed Λινδία, and one of Hercules. It was the birthplace of Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men. It retained much of its consequence even after the foundation of Rhodes. Inscriptions of some importance have lately been found in its Acropolis.

LINGŎNES. 1. A powerful people in Transalpine Gaul, whose territory extended from the foot of Mount Vogesus and the sources of the Matrona and Mosa, north as far as the Treviri, and south as far as the Sequani, from whom they were separated by the River Arar. The Emperor Otho gave them the Roman franchise. Their chief town was Andomatunnum, afterward Lingones (now Langres).—2. A branch of the above-mentioned people, who migrated into Cisalpine Gaul along with the Boii, and shared the fortunes of the latter. Vid. Boii. They dwelt east of the Boii, as far as the Adriatic Sea, in the neighborhood of Ravenna.

LINTERNUM. Vid. LITERNUM.

LINUS (Λίνος), the personification of a dirge or lamentation, and therefore described as a son of Apollo by a Muse (Calliope or Psamathe or Chalciope), or of Amphimarus by Urania. Both Argos and Thebes claimed the honor of his birth. An Argive tradition related that Linus was exposed by his mother after his birth, and was brought up by shepherds, but was afterward torn to pieces by dogs. Psamathe's grief at the occurrence betrayed her misfortune to her father, who condemned her to death. Apollo, indignant at the father's cruelty, visited Argos with a plague; and, in obedience to an oracle, the Argives endeavored to propitiate Psamathe and Linus by means of sacrifices. Matrons and virgins sang dirges which were called λίνοι. According to a Bœotian tradition, Linus was killed by Apollo because he had ventured upon a musical contest with the god; and every year before sacrifices were offered to the Muses, a funeral sacrifice was offered to him, and dirges (λίνοι) were sung in his honor. His tomb was claimed by Argos and by Thebes, and likewise by Chalcis in Eubœa. It is probably owing to the difficulty of reconciling the different mythuses about Linus that the Thebans thought it necessary to distinguish between an earlier and later Linus; the latter is said to have instructed Hercules in music, but to have been killed by the hero. In the time of the Alexandrine grammarians, Linus was considered as the author of apocryphal works, in which the exploits of Bacchus (Dionysus) were described.

[LIOCRITUS (Λειόκριτος). 1. Son of Aristas, a Greek, slain by Æneas.—2. Son of Evenor, one of the suitors of Penelope.]

LIPĂRIS (Λίπαρις), a small river of Cilicia, flowing past Soloë, [deriving its name from the unctuous character of its waters.]

[LIPAXUS (Λίπαξος), a city on the coast of Crossæa, in Macedonia.]

LIQUENTĬA (now Livenza), a river in Venetia, in the north of Italy, between Altinum and Concordia, which flowed into the Sinus Tergestinus.

[LIRIOPE, an ocean nymph, who became by Cephisus the mother of the beautiful Narcissus.]

LIRIS (now Garigliano), more anciently called CLANIS or GLANIS, one of the principal rivers in central Italy, rises in the Apennines west of Lake Fucinus, flows first through the territory of the Marsi in a southeasterly direction, then turns southwest near Sora, and at last flows southeast into the Sinus Caietanus near Minturnæ, forming the boundary between Latium and Campania. Its stream was sluggish, whence the "Liris quieta aqua" of Horace (Carm., i., 31).

LISSUS (Λισσός: Λίσσιος, Λισσεύς). 1. (Now Alessio), a town in the south of Dalmatia, at the mouth of the River Drilon, founded by Dionysius of Syracuse, B.C. 385. It was situated on a hill near the coast, and possessed a strongly fortified acropolis, called ACROLISSUS, which was considered impregnable. The town afterward fell into the hands of the Illyrians, and was eventually colonized by the Romans.—2. A small river in Thrace, west of the Hebrus.

LISTA (now S. Anatoglia), a town of the Sabines, south of Reate, is said to have been the capital of the Aborigines, from which they were driven out by the Sabines, who attacked them in the night.

LITĀNA SILVA (now Silva di Luge), a large forest on the Apennines, in Cisalpine Gaul, southeast of Mutina, in which the Romans were defeated by the Gauls, B.C. 216.

LITERNUM or LINTERNUM (now Patria), a town on the coast of Campania, at the mouth of the River Clanius or Glanis, which in the lower part of its course takes the name of LITERNUS (now Patria or Clanio), and which flows through a marsh to the north of the town called LITERNA PALUS. The town was made a Roman colony B.C. 194, and was re-colonized by Augustus. It was to this place that the elder Scipio Africanus retired when the tribunes attempted to bring him to trial, and here he is said to have died. His tomb was shown at Liternum; but some maintained that he was buried in the family sepulchre near the Porta Capena at Rome.

[LITERNUS. Vid. LITERNUM.]

LIVĬA. 1. Sister of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune, B.C. 91, was married first to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis, and subsequently to Q. Servilius Cæpio, by whom she had a daughter, Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus, who killed Cæsar.—2. LIVIA DRUSILLA, the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus (vid. DRUSUS, No. 3), was married first to Tib. Claudius Nero, and afterward to Augustus, who compelled her husband to divorce her, B.C. 38. She had already borne her husband one son, the future emperor Tiberius, and at the time of her marriage with Augustus was six months pregnant with another, who subsequently received the name of Drusus. She never had any children by Augustus, but she retained his affections till his death. It was generally believed that she caused C. Cæsar and L. Cæsar, the two grandsons of Augustus, to be poisoned, in order to secure the succession for her own children; and she was even suspected of having hastened the death of Augustus. On the accession of her son Tiberius to the throne, she at first attempted to gain an equal share in the government; but this the jealous temper of Tiberius would not brook. He commanded her to retire altogether from public affairs, and soon displayed even hatred toward her. When she was on her death-bed he refused to visit her. She died in A.D. 29, at the age of eighty-two or eighty-six. Tiberius took no part in the funeral rites, and forbade her consecration, which had been proposed by the senate. —3. Or LIVILLA, the daughter of Drusus senior and Antonia, and the wife of Drusus junior, the son of the Emperor Tiberius. She was seduced by Sejanus, who persuaded her to poison her husband, A.D. 23. Her guilt was not discovered till the fall of Sejanus eight years afterward, 31.—3. JULIA LIVILLA, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. Vid. JULIA, No. 7.

LIVĬA GENS, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious houses among the Roman nobility. The Livii obtained eight consulships, two censorships, three triumphs, a dictatorship, and a mastership of the horse. The most distinguished families are those of DRUSUS and SALINATOR.

LIVĬUS, T., the Roman historian, was born at Patavium (now Padua), in the north of Italy, B.C. 59. The greater part of his life appears to have been spent at Rome, but he returned to his native town before his death, which happened at the age of seventy-six, in the fourth year of Tiberius, A.D. 17. We know that he was married, and that he had at least two children, a son and a daughter, married to L. Magius, a rhetorician. His literary talents secured the patronage and friendship of Augustus; he became a person of consideration at court, and by his advice Claudius, afterward emperor, was induced in early life to attempt historical composition; but there is no ground for the assertion that Livy acted as preceptor to the young prince. Eventually his reputation rose so high and became so widely diffused, that a Spaniard travelled from Cadiz to Rome solely for the purpose of beholding him, and, having gratified his curiosity in this one particular, immediately returned home. The great and only extant work of Livy is a History of Rome, termed by himself Annales (xliii., 13), extending from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, B.C. 9, comprised in one hundred and forty-two books. Of these thirty-five have descended to us; but of the whole, with the exception of two, we possess Epitomes, which must have been drawn up by one who was well acquainted with his subject. By some they have been ascribed to Livy himself, by others to Florus; but there is nothing in the language or context to warrant either of these conclusions, and external evidence is altogether wanting. From the circumstance that a short introduction or preface is found at the beginning of books one, twenty-one, and thirty-one, and that each of these marks the commencement of an important epoch, the whole work has been divided into decades, containing ten books each; but the grammarians Priscian and Diomedes, who quote repeatedly from particular books, never allude to any such distribution. The commencement of book forty-one is lost, but there is certainly no remarkable crisis at this place which invalidates one part of the argument in favor of the antiquity of the arrangement. The first decade (books one to ten) is entire. It embraces the period from the foundation of the city to the year B.C. 294, when the subjugation of the Samnites may be said to have been completed. The second decade (books eleven to twenty) is altogether lost. It embraced the period from 294 to 219, comprising an account, among other matters, of the invasion of Pyrrhus and of the first Punic war. The third decade (books twenty-one to thirty) is entire. It embraces the period from 219 to 201, comprehending the whole of the second Punic war. The fourth decade (books thirty-one to forty) is entire, and also one half of the fifth (books forty-one to forty-five.) These fifteen books embrace the period from 201 to 167, and develop the progress of the Roman arms in Cisalpine Gaul, in Macedonia, Greece, and Asia, ending with the triumph of Æmilius Paulus. Of the remaining books nothing remains except inconsiderable fragments, the most notable being a few chapters of the ninety-first book, concerning the fortunes of Sertorius. The composition of such a vast work necessarily occupied many years; and we find indications which throw some light upon the epochs when different sections were composed. Thus, in book first (c. 19), it is stated that the temple of Janus had been closed twice only since the reign of Numa, for the first time in the consulship of T. Manlius (B.C. 235), a few years after the termination of the first Punic war; for the second time by Augustus Cæsar, after the battle of Actium, in 29. But we know that it was shut again by Augustus, after the conquest of the Cantabrians, in 25; and hence it is evident that the first book must have been written between the years 29 and 25. Moreover, since the last book contained an account of the death of Drusus, it is evident that the task must have been spread over seventeen years, and probably occupied a much longer time. The style of Livy may be pronounced almost faultless. The narrative flows on in a calm, but strong current; the diction displays richness without heaviness, and simplicity without tameness. There is, morever, a distinctness of outline and a warmth of coloring in all his delineations, whether of living men in action, or of things inanimate, which never fail to call up the whole scene before our eyes. In judging of the merits of Livy as an historian, we are bound to ascertain, if possible, the end which he proposed to himself. No one who reads Livy with attention can suppose that he ever conceived the project of drawing up a critical history of Rome. His aim was to offer to his countrymen a clear and pleasing narrative, which, while it gratified their vanity, should contain no startling improbabilities nor gross amplifications. To effect this purpose, he studied with care the writings of some of his more celebrated predecessors on Roman history. Where his authorities were in accordance with each other, he generally rested satisfied with this agreement; where their testimony was irreconcilable, he was content to point out their want of harmony, and occasionally to d[…] an opinion of their comparative credibil[…] But in no case did he ever dream of ascendi[…] to the fountain head. He never attempted [..] test the accuracy of his authorities by exami[…]ing monuments of remote antiquity, of wh[…] not a few were accessible to every inhabita[…] of the metropolis. Thus it is perfectly de[…] that he had never read the Leges Regiæ, n[…] the Commentaries of Servius Tullius, nor ev[…] the Licinian Rogations; and that he had ne[…]er consulted the vast collection of decrees [..] the senate, ordinances of the plebs, treati[…] and other state papers, which were preserve[…] in the city. Nay, more, he did not consult ev[…] all the authors to whom he might have resort[…] with advantage, such as the Annals and An[…]quities of Varro, and the Origines of Cato. A[…] even those writers whose authority he followe[…] he did not use in the most judicious manne[…] He seems to have performed his task piecemea[…] A small section was taken in hand, different a[…]counts were compared, and the most plausib[…] was adopted: the same system was adhered t[…] in the succeeding portions, so that each, co[…]sidered by itself, without reference to the re[…] was executed with care; but the witness[…] who were rejected in one place were admitte[…] in another, without sufficient attention bei[…] paid to the dependence and the connection o[…] the events. Hence the numerous contradic[…]tions and inconsistencies which have been de[…]tected by sharp-eyed critics. Other mistake[…] also are found in abundance, arising from hi[…] want of any thing like practical knowledge of the world, from his never having acquired even the elements of the military art, of jurispru[…]dence, or of political economy, and, above all, from his singular ignorance of geography. But while we fully acknowledge these defects in Livy, we cannot admit that his general good faith has ever been impugned with any show of justice. We are assured (Tacit., Ann. iv. 34) that he was fair and liberal upon matters of contemporary history; we know that he prais[…]ed Cassius and Brutus, that his character of Cicero was a high eulogium, and that he spoke so warmly of the unsuccessful leader in the great civil war, that he was sportively styled a Pompeian by Augustus. It is true that, in re[…]counting the domestic strife which agitated the republic for nearly two centuries, he represents the plebeians and their leaders in the most un[…]favorable light. But this arose, not from any wish to pervert the truth, but from ignorance of the exact relation of the contending parties. It is manifest that he never can separate in his own mind the spirited plebeians of the infant commonwealth from the base and venal rabble which thronged the forum in the days of Marius and Cicero; while, in like manner, he confounds those bold and honest tribunes, who were the champions of liberty, with such men as Satur[…]ninus or Sulpicius, Clodius or Vatinius. There remains one topic to which we must advert. We are told by Quintilian (i., 5, § 56: viii. 1, § 3) that Asinius Pollio had remarked a certain Patavinity in Livy. Scholars have given them[…]selves a vast deal of trouble to discover what this term may indicate, and various hypotheses have been propounded; but if there is any truth in the story, it is evident that Pollio must have intended to censure some provincial peculiarities of expression, which we, at all events, are in no position to detect. The best edition of Livy is by Drakenborch, Lugd. Bat., 1738–46, 7 vols. 4to. There is also a valuable edition, now in course of publication, by Alchefski, Berol., 8vo, 1841, seq.

LIVĬUS ANDRONĬCUS. Vid. ANDRONICUS.

LIX, LIXA, LIXUS (Λίξ, Λίξα, Λίξος: now Al-Araish), a city on the western coast of Mauretania Tingitana, in Africa, at the mouth of a river of the same name: it was a place of some commercial importance.

LOCRI (Λοκροί), sometimes called LOCRENSES by the Romans, the inhabitants of LOCRIS (ἡ Λοκρίς), were an ancient people in Greece, descended from the Leleges, with which some Hellenic tribes were intermingled at a very early period. They were, however, in Homer's time regarded as Hellenes; and, according to tradition, even Deucalion, the founder of the Hellenic race, was said to have lived in Locris, in the time of Opus or Cynos. In historical times the Locrians were divided into two distinct tribes, differing from one another in customs, habits, and civilization. Of these, the Eastern Locrians, called Epicnemidii and Opuntii, who dwelt on the eastern coast of Greece, opposite the island of Eubœa, were the more ancient and more civilized, while the Western Locrians, called Ozolæ, who dwelt on the Corinthian Gulf, were a colony of the former, and were more barbarous. Homer mentions only the Eastern Locrians. At a later time there was no connection between the Eastern and Western Locrians; and in the Peloponnesian war we find the former siding with the Spartans, and the latter with the Athenians. 1. EASTERN LOCRIS, extended from Thessaly and the pass of Thermopylæ along the coast to the frontiers of Bœotia, and was bounded by Doris and Phocis on the west. It was a fertile and well-cultivated country. The northern part was inhabited by the LOCRI EPICNĒMĪDĬI (Ἐπικνημίδιοι), who derived their name from Mount Cnemis. The southern part was inhabited by the LOCRI OPUNTĬI (Ὀποὐντιοι), who derived their name from their principal town, Opus. The two tribes were separated by Daphnus, a small slip of land, which at one time belonged to Phocis. These two tribes are frequently confounded with one another; and ancient writers sometimes use the name either of Epicnemidii or of Opuntii alone, when both tribes are intended. The Epicnemidii were for a long time subject to the Phocians, and were included under the name of the latter people, whence the name of the Opuntii occurs more frequently in Greek history.—2. WESTERN LOCRIS, or the country of the LOCRI OZŎLÆ (Ὀζόλαι), was bounded on the north by Doris, on the west by Ætolia, on the east by Phocis, and on the south by the Corinthian Gulf. The origin of the name of Ozolæ is uncertain. The ancients derived it either from the undressed skins worn by the inhabitants, or from ὄζειν, "to smell," on account of the great quantity of asphodel that grew in their country, or from the stench arising from mineral springs, beneath which the centaur Nessus is said to have been buried. The country is mountainous, and for the most part unproductive. Mount Corax from Ætolia, and Mount Parnassus from Phocis, occupy the greater part of it. The Locri Ozolæ, resembled their neighbors, the Ætolians, both in their predatory habits and in their mode of warfare. They were divided into several tribes, and are described by Thucydides as a rude and barbarous people, even in the time of the Peloponnesian war. From B.C. 315 they belonged to the Ætolian league. Their chief town was AMPHISSA.

LOCRI EPIZEPHYRĬI (Λοκροὶ Ἐπιζεφύριοι: now Motta di Burzano), one of the most ancient Greek cities in Lower Italy, was situated in the southeast of Bruttium, north of the promontory of Zephyrium, from which it was said to have derived its surname Epizephyrii, though others suppose this name given to the place simply because it lay to the west of Greece. It was founded by the Locrians from Greece, B.C. 683. Strabo expressly says that it was founded by the Ozolæ, and not by the Opuntii, as most writers related; but his statement is not so probable as the common one. The inhabitants regarded themselves as descendants of Ajax Oileus; and as he resided at the town of Naryx among the Opuntii, the poets gave the name of Narycia to Locris (Ov., Met., xv., 705), and called the founders of the town the Narycii Locri (Virg., Æn., iii., 399). For the same reason, the pitch of Bruttium is frequently called Narycia (Virg., Georg., ii., 438). Locri was celebrated for the excellence of its laws, which were drawn up by Zaleucus soon after the foundation of the city. Vid. ZALEUCUS. The town enjoyed great prosperity down to the time of the younger Dionysius, who resided here for some years after his expulsion from Syracuse and committed the greatest atrocities against the inhabitants. It suffered much in the wars against Pyrrhus, and in the second Punic war. The Romans allowed it to retain its freedom and its own constitution, which was democratical; but it gradually sunk in importance, and is rarely mentioned in later times. Near the town was an ancient and wealthy temple of Proserpina.

[LOCRUS (Λοκρός), son of Physcius and grandson of Amphictyon, became by Cabya the father of Locrus, the mythical ancestor of the Locri Ozolæ.]

LOCUSTA, or, more correctly, LUCUSTA, a woman celebrated for her skill in concocting poisons. She was employed by Agrippina in poisoning the Emperor Claudius, and by Nero for dispatching Britannicus. She was rewarded by Nero with ample estates, but under the Emperor Galba she was executed with other malefactors of Nero's reign.

LOLLĬA PAULĪNA, grand-daughter of M. Lollius mentioned below, and heiress of his immense wealth. She was married to C. Memmius Regulus; but, on the report of her grandmother's beauty, the Emperor Caligula sent for her, divorced her from her husband, and married her but soon divorced her again. After Claudius had put to death his wife Messalina, Lollia was one of the candidates for the vacancy, but she was put to death by means of Agrippina.

LOLLIĀNUS (Λολλιανός), a celebrated Greek sophist in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus

Pius, was a native of Ephesus, and taught at Athens.

Lollĭus. 1. M. Lollius Palicānus, tribune of the plebs B.C. 71, and an active opponent of the aristocracy.—2. M. Lollius, consul 21, and governor of Gaul in 16. He was defeated by some German tribes who had crossed the Rhine. Lollius was subsequently appointed by Augustus as tutor to his grandson, C. Cæsar, whom he accompanied to the East, B.C. 2. Here he incurred the displeasure of C. Cæsar, and is said, in consequence, to have put an end to his life by poison. Horace addressed an Ode (iv., 9) to Lollius, and two Epistles (i., 2, 18) to the eldest son of Lollius.

Londinĭum, also called Oppidum Londiniense, Lundinium, or Londinum (now London), the capital of the Cantii in Britain, was situated on the southern bank of the Thames, in the modern Southwark, though it afterward spread over the other side of the river. It is not mentioned by Cæsar, probably because his line of march led him in a different direction; and its name first occurs in the reign of Nero, when it is spoken of as a flourishing and populous town, much frequented by merchants, although neither a Roman colony nor a municipium. On the revolt of the Britons under Boadicea, A.D. 62, the Roman governor Suetonius Paulinus abandoned Londinium to the enemy, who massacred the inhabitants and plundered the town. From the effects of this devastation it gradually recovered, and it appears again as an important place in the reign of Antoninus Pius. It was surrounded with a wall and ditch by Constantine the Great or Theodosius, the Roman governor of Britain; and about this time it was distinguished by the surname of Augusta, whence some writers have conjectured that it was then made a colony. Londinium had now extended so much on the northern bank of the Thames, that it was called at this period a town of the Trinobantes, from which we may infer that the new quarter was both larger and more populous than the old part on the southern side of the river. The wall built by Constantine or Theodosius was on the northern side of the river, and is conjectured to have commenced at a fort near the present site of the tower, and to have been continued along the Minories, to Cripplegate, Newgate, and Ludgate. London was the central point, from which all the Roman roads in Britian diverged. It possessed a Milliarium Aureum, from which the miles on the roads were numbered; and a fragment of this Milliarium, the celebrated London Stone, may be seen affixed to the wall of Saint Swithin's Church in Cannon Street. This is almost the only monument of the Roman Londinium still extant, with the exception of coins, tesselated pavements, and the like, which have been found buried under the ground.

Longănus (now Saint Lucia), a river in the northeast of Sicily, between Mylæ and Tyndaris, on the banks cf which Hieron gained a victory over the Mamertines.

Longīnus, a distinguished Greek philosopher and grammarian of the third century of our era. His original name seems to have been Dionysius; but he also bore the name of Dionysius Longinus, Cassius Longinus, or Dionysius Cassius Longinus, probably because he or one of his ancestors had received the Roman franchise through the influence of some Cassius Longinus. The place of his birth is uncertain; he was brought up with care by his uncle Fronto, who taught rhetoric at Athens, whence it has been conjectured that he was a native of that city. He afterward visited many countries, and became acquainted with all the illustrious philosophers of his age, such as Ammonius Saccas, Origen, the disciple of Ammonius, not to be confounded with the Christian writer, Plotinus, and Amelius. He was a pupil of the two former, and was an adherent of the Platonic philosophy; but instead of following blindly the system of Ammonius, he went to the fountain head, and made himself thoroughly familiar with the works of Plato. On his return to Athens he opened a school, which was attended by numerous pupils, among whom the most celebrated was Porphyry. He seems to have taught philosophy and criticism, as well as rhetoric and grammar; and the extent of his information was so great that he was called "a living library" and "a walking museum." After spending a considerable part of his life at Athens he went to the East, where he became acquainted with Zenobia of Palmyra, who made him her teacher of Greek literature. On the death of her husband Odenathus, Longinus became her principal adviser. It was mainly through his advice that she threw off her allegiance to the Roman empire. On her capture by Aurelian in 273, Longinus was put to death by the emperor. Longinus was unquestionably the greatest philosopher of his age. He was a man of excellent sense, sound judgment, and extensive knowledge. His work on the Sublime (Περὶ ὕψους), a great part of which is still extant, surpasses in oratorical power every thing written after the time of the Greek orators. There is scarcely any work in the range of ancient literature which, independent of its excellence of style, contains so many exquisite remarks upon oratory, poetry, and good taste in general. The best edition of this work is by Weiske, Lips., 1809, 8vo, reprinted in London, 1820. Longinus wrote many other works, both rhetorical and philosophical, all of which have perished.

Longŭla (Longulānus: now Buon Riposo), a town of the Volsci in Latium, not far from Corioli, and belonging to the territory of Antium, but destroyed by the Romans at an early period.

Longus (Λόγγος), a Greek sophist, of uncertain date, but not earlier than the fourth or fifth century of our era, is the author of an erotic work, entitled Ποιμενικῶν τῶν κατὰ Δάφνιν καὶ Χλόην, or Pastoralia de Daphnide et Chloe, written in pleasing and elegant prose. The best editions are by Villoison, Paris, 1778; Schæfer, Lips., 1803; and Passow, Lips., 1811.

[Longus Æstuarium (Λόγγος εἴσχυσις), a bay of Britannia Barbara, on the western coast, now Linnhe Loch in Scotland.]

Lŏpădūsa (Λοπαδοῦσα: now Lampedusa), an island in the Mediterranean, between Melita (now Malta) and the coast of Byzacium in Africa.

Lorĭum or Lorii, a small place in Etruria with an imperial villa, twelve miles northwest

Rome, on the Via Aurelia, where Antoninus was brought up, and where he died.

LŌRYMA (τὰ Λώρυμα: ruins at Aplotheki), a city on the southern coast of Caria, close to the promontory of Cynossema (now Cape Aloupo), opposite to Ialysus in Rhodes, the space between the two being about the shortest distance between Rhodes and the coast of Caria.

LOTIS, a nymph, who, to escape the embraces of Priapus, was metamorphosed into a tree, called after her Lotus. (Ov., Met., ix., 347.)

LŌTŎPHĂGI (Λωτοφάγοι, i. e., lotus-eaters). Homer, in the Odyssey, represents Ulysses as coming in his wanderings to a coast inhabited by a people who fed upon a fruit called lotus, the taste of which was so delicious that every one who ate it lost all wish to return to his native country, but desired to remain there with the Lotophagi, and to eat the lotus (Od., ix., 94). Afterward, in historical times, the Greeks found that the people on the northern coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, and especially about the Lesser Syrtis, used to a great extent, as an article of food, the fruit of a plant, which they identified with the lotus of Homer, and they called these people Lotophagi. To this day, the inhabitants of the same part of the coast of Tunis and Tripoli eat the fruit of the plant which is supposed to be the lotus of the ancients, and drink a wine made from its juice, as the ancient Lotophagi are also said to have done. This plant, the Zizyphus lotus of the botanists (or jujube-tree), is a prickly branching shrub, with fruit of the size of a wild plum, of a saffron color and a sweetish taste. The ancient geographers also place the Lotophagi in the large island of Meninx or Lotophagitis (now Jerbah), adjacent to this coast. They carried on a commercial intercourse with Egypt and with the interior of Africa by the very same caravan routes which are used to the present day.

LOXĬAS (Λοξίας), a surname of Apollo, derived by some from his intricate and ambiguous oracles (λόξα), but better from λέγειν, as the prophet or interpreter of Jupiter (Zeus).

LOXO (Λοξώ), daughter of Boreas, one of the Hyperborean maidens, who brought the worship of Diana (Artemis) to Delos, whence the name is also used as a surname of Diana (Artemis) herself.

LUA, also called LUA MATER or LUA SATURNI, one of the early Italian divinities, whose worship was forgotten in later times. It may be that she was the same as Ops, the wife of Saturn; but all we know of her is, that sometimes the arms taken from a defeated enemy were dedicated to her, and burned as a sacrifice, with a view of averting calamity.

LUCA (Lucensis: now Lucca), a Ligurian city in Upper Italy, at the foot of the Apennines and on the River Ausus, northeast of Pisa. It was included in Etruria by Augustus, but in the time of Julius Cæsar it was the most southerly city in Liguria, and belonged to Cisalpine Gaul. It was made a Roman colony B.C. 177. The amphitheatre of Lucca may still be seen at the modern town in a state of tolerable preservation, and its great size proves the importance and populousness of the ancient city.

LUCĀNIA (Lucānus), a district in Lower Italy, was bounded on the north by Campania and Samnium, on the east by Apulia and the Gulf of Tarentum, on the south by Bruttium, and on the west by the Tyrrhene Sea, thus corresponding, for the most part, to the modern provinces of Principato, Citeriore, and Basilicata, in the kingdom of Naples. It was separated from Campania by the River Silarus, and from Bruttium by the River Laus, and it extended along the Gulf of Tarentum from Thurii to Metapontum. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through the greater part of it; but toward the Gulf of Tarentum there is an extensive and fertile plain. Lucania was celebrated for its excellent pastures (Hor., Ep., i., 28), and its oxen were the finest and largest in Italy. Hence the elephant was at first called by the Romans a Lucanian ox (Lucas bos). The swine, also, were very good; and a peculiar kind of sausages was celebrated at Rome under the name of Lucanica. The coast of Lucania was inhabited chiefly by Greeks, whose cities were numerous and flourishing. The most important were METAPONTUM, HERACLEA, THURII, BUXENTUM, ELEA or VELIA, POSIDONIA or PÆSTUM. The interior of the country was originally inhabited by the Chones and Œnotrians. The Lucanians proper were Samnites, a brave and warlike race, who left their mother-country and settled both in Lucania and Bruttium. They not only expelled or subdued the Œnotrians, but they gradually acquired possession of most of the Greek cities on the coast. They are first mentioned in B.C. 396 as the allies of the elder Dionysius in his war against Thurii. They were subdued by the Romans after Pyrrhus had left Italy. Before the second Punic war their forces consisted of thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse; but in the course of this war their country was repeatedly laid waste, and never recovered its former prosperity.

LUCĀNUS, M. ANNÆUS, usually called LUCAN, a Roman poet, was born at Corduba in Spain, A.D. 39. His father was L. Annæus Mella, a brother of M. Seneca, the philosopher. Lucan was carried to Rome at an early age, where his education was superintended by the most eminent preceptors of the day. His talents developed themselves at a very early age, and excited such general admiration as to awaken the jealousy of Nero, who, unable to brook competition, forbade him to recite in public. Stung to the quick by this prohibition, Lucan embarked in the famous conspiracy of Piso, was betrayed, and by a promise of pardon, was induced to turn informer. He began by denouncing his own mother Acilia (or Atilia), and then revealed the rest of his accomplices without reserve. But he received a traitor's reward. After the more important victims had been dispatched, the emperor issued the mandate for the death of Lucan, who, finding escape hopeless, caused his veins to be opened. When, from the rapid effusion of blood, he felt his extremities becoming chill, he began to repeat aloud some verses which he had once composed, descriptive of a wounded soldier perishing by a like death, and, with these lines upon his lips, expired, A.D. 65, in the twenty-sixth year of his age. Lucan wrote various poems, the titles of which are preserved, but the only extant production is an heroic poem, in ten books, entitled Pharsalia, in which the progress of the struggle between Cæsar and Pompey is fully detailed, the events, commencing with the passage of the Rubicon, being arranged in regular chronological order. The tenth book is imperfect, and the narrative breaks off abruptly in the middle of the Alexandrean war, but we know not whether the conclusion has been lost, or whether the author ever completed his task. The whole of what we now possess was certainly not composed at the same time, for the different parts do not by any means breathe the same spirit. In the earlier portions we find liberal sentiments expressed in very moderate terms, accompanied by open and almost fulsome flattery of Nero; but, as we proceed, the blessings of freedom are loudly proclaimed, and the invectives against tyranny are couched in language the most offensive, evidently aimed directly at the emperor. The work contains great beauties and great defects. It is characterized by copious diction, lively imagination, and a bold and masculine tone of thought; but it is, at the same time, disfigured by extravagance, far-fetched conceits, and unnatural similes. The best editions are by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat., 1728; by Burmann, 1740; and by Weber, Lips., 1821-1831.

LUCĀNUS, OCELLUS. Vid. OCELLUS.

LUCCEIUS. 1. L., an old friend and neighbor of Cicero. His name frequently occurs at the commencement of Cicero's correspondence with Atticus, with whom Lucceius had quarrelled. Cicero attempted to reconcile his two friends. In B.C. 63 Lucceius accused Catiline; and in 60 he became a candidate for the consulship, along with Julius Cæsar, who agreed to support him; but he lost his election in consequence of the aristocracy bringing in Bibulus as a counterpoise to Cæsar's influence. Lucceius seems now to have withdrawn from public life and to have devoted himself to literature. He was chiefly engaged in the composition of a contemporaneous history of Rome, commencing with the Social or Marsic war. In 56 he had nearly finished the history of the Social and of the first Civil war, when Cicero wrote a most urgent letter to his friend, pressing him to suspend the thread of his history, and to devote a separate work to the period from Catiline's conspiracy to Cicero's recall from banishment (ad Fam., v., 12). Lucceius promised compliance with his request, but he appears never to have written the work. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he espoused the side of Pompey. He was subsequently pardoned by Cæsar and returned to Rome, where he continued to live on friendly terms with Cicero.—2. C., surnamed HIRRUS, of the Pupinian tribe, tribune of the plebs 53, proposed that Pompey should be created dictator. In 52 he was a candidate with Cicero for the augurship, and in the following year a candidate with M. Cælius for the ædileship, but he failed in both. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined Pompey. He was sent by Pompey as ambassador to Orodes, king of Parthia, but he was thrown into prison by the Parthian king. He was pardoned by Cæsar after the battle of Pharsalia, and returned to Rome.

LUCENSES CALLAICI, one of the two chief tribes of the Callaici or Gallæci, on the northern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, deriv[ing] their name from their town Lucus Augusti.

LUCENTUM (now Alicante), a town of the C[on]testani, on the coast of Hispania Tarracon[ensis].

LUCĔRĬA (Lucerinus: now Lucera), someti[mes] called NUCĔRĬA, a town in Apulia, on the bord[ers] of Samnium, southwest of Arpi, was situated [on] a steep hill, and possessed an ancient tem[ple] of Minerva. In the war between Rome a[nd] Samnium, it was first taken by the Samni[tes] (B.C. 321), and next by the Romans (319): h[aving] revolted to the Samnites in 314, all t[he] inhabitants were massacred by the Roma[ns] and their place supplied by two thousand fi[ve] hundred Roman colonists. Having thus beco[me] a Roman colony, it continued faithful to Ro[me] in the second Punic war. In the time of A[u]gustus it had declined greatly in prosperit[y] but it was still of sufficient importance in t[he] third century to be the residence of the prætor of Apulia.

LUCIANUS (Λουκιανός), usually called Luci[an], a Greek writer, born at Samosata, the capit[al] of Commagene, in Syria. The date of his bir[th] and death is uncertain; but it has been conjec[t]ured, with much probability, that he was bor[n] about A.D. 120, and he probably lived till to[]ward the end of this century. We know tha[t] some of his more celebrated works were wri[t]ten in the reign of M. Aurelius. Lucian's par[]ents were poor, and he was at first apprentic[ed] to his maternal uncle, who was a statuary. H[e] afterward became an advocate, and practiced a[t] Antioch. Being unsuccessful in this calling, he employed himself in writing speeches fo[r] others instead of delivering them himself. But he did not remain long at Antioch; and, at an early period of his life, he set out upon his travels, and visited the greater part of Greece, Italy, and Gaul. At that period it was customary for professors of the rhetorical art to proceed to different cities, where they attracted audiences by their displays, much in the same manner as musicians or itinerant lecturers in modern times. He appears to have acquired a good deal of money as well as fame. On his return to his native country, probably about his fortieth year, he abandoned the rhetorical profession, the artifices of which, he tells us, were foreign to his temper, the natural enemy of deceit and pretension. He now devoted most of his time to the composition of his works. He still, however, occasionally travelled; for it appears that he was in Achaia and Ionia about the close of the Parthian war, 160-165; on which occasion, too, he seems to have visited Olympia, and beheld the self-immolation of Peregrinus. About the year 170, or a little previously, he visited the false oracle of the impostor Alexander, in Paphlagonia. Late in life he obtained the office of procurator of part of Egypt, which office was probably bestowed upon him by the Emperor Commodus. The nature of Lucian's writings inevitably procured him many enemies, by whom he has been painted in very black colors. According to Suidas he was surnamed the Blasphemer, and was torn to pieces by dogs as a punishment for his impiety; but on this account no reliance can be placed. Other writers state that Lucian apostatised from Christianity; but there is no proof in support of this charge; and the dialogue entitled Philopatris, which would appear to prove that the author had once been a Christian, was certainly not written by Lucian, and was probably composed in the reign of Julian the Apostate. As many as eighty-two works have come down to us under the name of Lucian; but some of these are spurious. The most important of them are his Dialogues. They are of very various degrees of merit, and are treated in the greatest possible variety of style, from seriousness down to the broadest humor and buffoonery. Their subjects and tendency, too, vary considerably; for, while some are employed in attacking the heathen philosophy and religion, others are mere pictures of manners without any polemic drift. Our limits only allow us to mention a few of the more important of these dialogues. The Dialogues of the Gods, twenty-six in number, consist of short dramatic narratives of some of the most popular incidents in the heathen mythology. The reader, however, is generally left to draw his own conclusions from the story, the author only taking care to put it in the most absurd point of view. In the Jupiter Convicted a bolder style of attack is adopted; and the cynic proves to Jupiter's face, that, every thing being under the dominion of fate, he has no power whatever. As this dialogue shows Jupiter's want of power, so the Jupiter the Tragedian strikes at his very existence, and that of the other deities. The Vitarum Auctio, or Sale of the Philosophers, is an attack upon the ancient philosophers. In this humorous piece the heads of the different sects are put up to sale, Hermes being the auctioneer. The Fisherman is a sort of apology for the preceding piece, and may be reckoned among Lucian's best dialogues. The philosophers are represented as having obtained a day's life for the purpose of taking vengeance upon Lucian, who confesses that he has borrowed the chief beauties of his writings from them. The Banquet, or the Lapithæ, is one of Lucian's most humorous attacks on the philosophers. The scene is a wedding feast, at which a representative of each of the principal philosophic sects is present. A discussion ensues, which sets all the philosophers by the ears, and ends in a pitched battle. The Nigrinus is also an attack on philosophic pride; but its main scope is to satirize the Romans, whose pomp, vain-glory, and luxury are unfavorably contrasted with the simple habits of the Athenians. The more miscellaneous class of Lucian's dialogues, in which the attacks upon mythology and philosophy are not direct, but incidental, or which are mere pictures of manners, contains some of his best. At the head must be placed Timon, which may, perhaps, be regarded as Lucian's master-piece. The Dialogues of the Dead are perhaps the best known of all Lucian's works. The subject affords great scope for moral reflection, and for satire on the vanity of human pursuits. Wealth, power, beauty, strength, not forgetting the vain disputations of philosophy, afford the materials. Among the moderns these dialogues have been imitated by Fontenelle and Lord Lyttleton. The Icaro-Menippus is in Lucian's best vein, and a master-piece of Aristophanic humor. Menippus, disgusted with the disputes and pretensions of the philosophers, resolves on a visit to the stars, for the purpose of seeing how far their theories are correct. By the mechanical aid of a pair of wings he reaches the moon, and surveys thence the miserable passions and quarrels of men. Hence he proceeds to Olympus, and is introduced to the Thunderer himself. Here he is witness of the manner in which human prayers are received in heaven. They ascend by enormous vent-holes, and become audible when Jupiter removes the covers. Jupiter himself is represented as a partial judge, and as influenced by the largeness of the rewards promised to him. At the end he pronounces judgment against the philosophers, and threatens in four days to destroy them all. Charon is a very elegant dialogue, but of a graver turn than the preceding. Charon visits the earth to see the course of life there, and what it is that always makes men weep when they enter his boat. Mercury acts as his cicerone. Lucian's merits as a writer consist in his knowledge of human nature; his strong common sense; the fertility of his invention; the raciness of his humor; and the simplicity and Attic grace of his diction. There was abundance to justify his attacks in the systems against which they were directed. Yet he establishes nothing in their stead. His aim is only to pull down—to spread a universal skepticism. Nor were his assaults confined to religion and philosophy, but extended to every thing old and venerated, the poems of Homer and Hesiod, and the history of Herodotus. The best editions of Lucian are by Hemsterhuis and Reitz, Amst., 1743, 4 vols. 4to; by Lehmann, Lips., 1821–1831, 9 vols. 8vo; and by Dindorf, with a Latin version, but without notes, Paris, 1840, 8vo.

LUCIFER or PHOSPHŎRUS (Φωςφόρος, also by the poets Ἑωςφόρος or Φαεςφόρος), that is, the bringer of light, is the name of the planet Venus, when seen in the morning before sunrise. The same planet was called Hesperus, Vesperugo, Vesper, Noctifer, or Nocturnus, when it appeared in the heavens after sunset. Lucifer, as a personification, is called a son of Astræus and Aurora or Eos, of Cephalus and Aurora, or of Atlas. By Philonis he is said to have been the father of Ceyx. He is also called the father of Dædalion and of the Hesperides. Lucifera is also a surname of several goddesses of light, as Diana (Artemis), Aurora, and Hecate.

LUCILĬUS. 1. C., was born at Suessa of the Aurunci, B.C. 148. He served in the cavalry under Scipio in the Numantine war; lived upon terms of the closest familiarity with Scipio and Lælius; and was either the maternal granduncle, or, which is less probable, the maternal grandfather of Pompey the Great. He died at Naples, 103, in the forty-sixth year of his age. Ancient critics agree that, if not absolutely the inventor of Roman satire, he was the first to mould it into that form which afterward received full development in the hands of Horace Persius, and Juvenal. The first of these three great masters, while he censures the harsh versification and the slovenly haste with which Lucilius threw off his compositions, acknowledges with admiration the fierceness and boldness of his attacks upon the vices and follies of his con temporaries. The Satires of Lucilius were divided into thirty books. Upward of eight hundred fragments from these have been preserved, but the greatest number consist of isolated couplets or single lines. It is clear from these fragments that his reputation for caustic pleasantry was by no means unmerited, and that in coarseness and broad personalities he in no respect fell short of the license of the old comedy, which would seem to have been, to a certain extent, his model. The fragments were published separately, by Franciscus Dousa, Lugd. Bat., 4to, 1597, reprinted by the brothers Volpi, 8vo, Patav., 1735; and, along with Censorinus, by the two sons of Havercamp, Lugd. Bat., 8vo, 1743.—2. Lucilius Junior, probably the author of an extant poem in six hundred and forty hexameters, entitled Ætna, which exhibits throughout great command of language, and contains not a few brilliant passages. Its object is to explain upon philosophical principles, after the fashion of Lucretius, the causes of the various physical phenomena presented by the volcano. Lucilius Junior was the procurator of Sicily, and the friend to whom Seneca addresses his Epistles, his Natural Questions, and his tract on Providence, and whom he strongly urges to select this very subject of Ætna as a theme for his muse.

Lucilla, Annĭa, daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born about A.D. 147. She was married to the Emperor L. Verus, and after his death (169) to Claudius Pompeianus. In 183 she engaged in a plot against the life of her brother Commodus, which having been detected, she was banished to the island of Capreæ, and there put to death.

Lucrētĭa, the wife of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, whose rape by Sextus Tarquinius led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus and the establishment of the republic. For details, vid. Tarquinius.

Lucrētĭa Gens, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. The surname of the patrician Lucretii was Tricipitinus, one of whom, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, the father of Lucretia, was elected consul, with L. Junius Brutus, on the establishment of the republic, B.C. 509. The plebeian families are known by the surnames of Gallus, Ofella, and Vespillo, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require notice.

Lucrētĭlis, a pleasant mountain in the [illegible]try of the Sabines, overhanging Horace's vi[illegible] a part of the modern Monte Gennaro.

Lucrētĭus Carus, T., the Roman poet, [illegible]specting whose personal history our infor[illegible]tion is both scanty and suspicious. The E[illegible]bian Chronicle fixes B.C. 95 as the date of [illegible] birth, adding that he was driven mad by a l[illegible] potion, that during his lucid intervals he co[illegible]posed several works which were revised [illegible] Cicero, and that he perished by his own ha[illegible] in his forty-fourth year, B.C. 52 or 51. Ano[illegible] ancient authority places his death in 55. F[illegible] what source the tale about the philtre may ha[illegible] been derived, we know not, but it is not i[illegible] probable that the whole story was an inve[illegible] of some enemy of the Epicureans. Not a [illegible] is to be found any where which corroborates [illegible] assertion with regard to the editorial labors [illegible] Cicero. The work, which has immortalized [illegible] name of Lucretius, is a philosophical didac[illegible] poem, composed in heroic hexameters, divi[illegible] into six books, containing upward of seven tho[illegible]sand four hundred lines, addressed to C. Mem[illegible]mius Gemellus, who was prætor in 58, and [illegible] entitled De Rerum Natura. It was prob[illegible] published about 57 or 56; for, from the way [illegible] which Cicero speaks of it in a letter to hi[illegible] brother, written in 55, we may conclude that [illegible] had only recently appeared. The poem ha[illegible] been sometimes represented as a complete ex[illegible]position of the religious, moral, and physi[illegible] doctrines of Epicurus, but this is far from be[illegible] a correct description. Epicurus maintaine[illegible] that the unhappiness and degradation of man[illegible]kind arose in a great degree from the slavish [illegible] dread which they entertained of the power of [illegible] the gods, and from terror of their wrath; and [illegible] the fundamental doctrine of his system was, [illegible] that the gods, whose existence he did not deny [illegible] lived in the enjoyment of absolute peace, and [illegible] totally indifferent to the world and its inhabit[illegible]ants. To prove this position, Epicurus adopted the atomic theory of Leucippus, according to which the material universe was not created by the Supreme Being, but was formed by the union of elemental particles which had existed from all eternity, governed by certain simple laws. He further sought to show that all these striking phænomena which had been regarded by the vulgar as direct manifestations of divine power were the natural results of ordinary processes. To state clearly and develop fully the leading principle of this philosophy, in such a form as might render the study attractive to his countrymen, was the object of Lucretius, his work being simply an attempt to show that there is nothing in the history or actual condition of the world which does not admit of explanation without having recourse to the active interposition of divine beings. The poem of Lucretius has been admitted by all modern critics to be the greatest of didactic poems. The most abstruse speculations are clearly explained in majestic verse, while the subject which in itself was dry and dull, is enlivened by digressions of matchless power and beauty. The best editions are by Wakefield, London, 1796, 3 vols. 4to, reprinted at Glasgow, 1813, 4 vols. 8vo; and by Forbiger, Lips., 1828, [illegible]

Lucrīnus Lacus, was [illegible] part of the Sinus Cumanus or Puteolanus, a bay on the coast of Campania, between the promontory Misenum and Puteoli, running a considerable way inland. But at a very early period the Lucrine Lake was separated from the remainder of the bay by a dike eight stadia in length, which was probably formed originally by some volcanic change, and was subsequently rendered more complete by the work of man. Being thus separated from the rest of the sea, it assumed the character of an inland lake, and is therefore called Lacus by the Romans. Its waters still remained salt, and were celebrated for their oyster beds. Behind the Lucrine Lake was another lake called LACUS AVERNUS. In the time of Augustus, Agrippa made a communication between the Lake Avernus and the Lucrine Lake, and also between the Lucrine Lake and the Sinus Cumanus, thus forming out of the three the celebrated Julian Harbor. The Lucrine Lake was filled up by a volcanic eruption in 1538, when a conical mountain rose in its place, called Monte Nuovo. The Avernus has thus become again a separate lake, and no trace of the dike is to be seen in the Gulf of Pozzuoli.

[LUCTERIUS, the Cadurcan, described by Cæsar as a man of the greatest daring, was sent into the country of the Ruteni by Vercingetorix on the breaking out of the great Gallic insurrection in B.C. 52. He at first met with great success, but was compelled by Cæsar's advance to retire; he was afterward defeated by C. Caninius Rebilus.]

LUCULLUS, LICINIUS, a celebrated plebeian family. 1. L., the grandfather of the conqueror of Mithradates, was consul B.C. 151, together with A. Postumius Albinus, and carried on war in Spain against the Vaccæi.—2. L., son of the preceding, was prætor 103, and carried on war unsuccessfully against the slaves in Sicily. On his return to Rome he was accused, condemned, and driven into exile.—3. L., son of the preceding, and celebrated as the conqueror of Mithradates. He was probably born about 110. He served with distinction in the Marsic or Social war, and accompanied Sulla as his quæstor into Greece and Asia, 88. When Sulla returned to Italy after the conclusion of peace with Mithradates in 84, Lucullus was left behind in Asia, where he remained till 80. In 79 he was curule ædile with his younger brother Marcus. So great was the favor at this time enjoyed by Lucullus with Sulla, that the dictator, on his death-bed, not only confided to him the charge of revising and correcting his Commentaries, but appointed him guardian of his son Faustus, to the exclusion of Pompey; a circumstance which is said to have first given rise to the enmity and jealousy that ever after subsisted between the two. In 77 Lucullus was prætor, and at the expiration of this magistracy obtained the government of Africa, where he distinguished himself by the justice of his administration. In 74 he was consul with M. Aurelius Cotta. In this year the war with Mithradates was renewed, and Lucullus received the conduct of it. He carried on this war for eight years with great success. The details are given under MITHRADATES, and it is only necessary to mention here the leading outlines. Lucullus defeated Mithradates with great slaughter, and drove him out of his hereditary dominions, and compelled him to take refuge in Armenia with his son-in-law Tigranes (71). He afterward invaded Armenia, defeated Tigranes, and took his capital Tigranocerta (69). In the next campaign (68) he again defeated the combined forces of Mithradates, and laid siege to Nisibis; but in the spring of the following year (67) a mutiny among his troops compelled him to raise the siege of Nisibis and return to Pontus. Mithradates had already taken advantage of his absence to invade Pontus, and had defeated his lieutenants Fabius and Triarius in several successive actions. But Lucullus, on his arrival, was unable to effect any thing against Mithradates, in consequence of the mutinous disposition of his troops. The adversaries of Lucullus availed themselves of so favorable an occasion, and a decree was passed to transfer to Acilius Glabrio, one of the consuls for the year, the province of Bithynia and the command against Mithradates. But Glabrio was wholly incompetent for the task assigned him; on arriving in Bithynia, he made no attempt to assume the command, but remained quiet within the confines of the Roman province. Mithradates meanwhile ably availed himself of this position of affairs, and Lucullus had the mortification of seeing Pontus and Cappadocia occupied by the enemy before his eyes, without being able to stir a step in their defence. But it was still more galling to his feelings when, in 66, he was called upon to resign the command to his old rival Pompey, who had been appointed by the Manilian law to supersede both him and Glabrio. Lucullus did not obtain his triumph till 63, in consequence of the opposition of his enemies. He was much courted by the aristocratical party, who sought in Lucullus a rival and antagonist to Pompey; but, instead of putting himself prominently forward as the leader of a party, he soon began to withdraw gradually from public affairs, and devote himself more and more to a life of indolence and luxury. He died in 57 or 56. Previous to his death he had fallen into a state of complete dotage, so that the management of his affairs was confined to his brother Marcus. The name of Lucullus is almost as celebrated for the luxury of his later years as for his victories over Mithradates. He amassed vast treasures in Asia; and these supplied him the means, after his return to Rome, of gratifying his natural taste for luxury, together with an ostentatious display of magnificence. His gardens in the immediate suburbs of the city were laid out in a style of extraordinary splendor; but still more remarkable were his villas at Tusculum and in the neighborhood of Neapolis. In the construction of the latter, with its parks, fish-ponds, &c., he had laid out vast sums in cutting through hills and rocks, and throwing out advanced works into the sea. So gigantic, indeed, was the scale of these labors for objects apparently so insignificant, that Pompey called him, in derision, the Roman Xerxes. His feasts at Rome itself were celebrated on a scale of inordinate magnificence: a single supper in the hall, called that of Apollo, was said to have cost the sum of fifty thousand denarii. Even during his campaigns the pleasures of the table had not been forgotten; and it is well known that he was the first to introduce cherries into Italy, which he had brought with him from Cerasus in Pontus. Lucullus was an enlightened patron of literature, and had from his earliest years devoted much attention to literary pursuits. He collected a valuable library, which was opened to the free use of the literary public; and here he himself used to associate with the Greek philosophers and literati, and would enter warmly into their metaphysical and philosophical discussions. Hence the picture drawn by Cicero at the commencement of the Academics was probably, to a certain extent, taken from the reality. His constant companion from the time of his quæstorship had been Antiochus of Ascalon, from whom he imbibed the precepts of the Academic school of philosophy, to which he continued through life to be attached. His patronage of the poet Archias is well known. He composed a history of the Marsic war in Greek. —4. L. or M., son of the preceding and of Servilia, half-sister of M. Cato, was a mere child at his father's death. His education was superintended by Cato and Cicero. After Cæsar's death he joined the republican party, and fell at the battle of Philippi, 42.—5. M., brother of No. 3, was adopted by M. TERENTIUS VARRO LUCULLUS. He fought under Sulla in Italy, 82; was curule ædile with his brother, 79; prætor, 77; and consul, 73. After his consulship he obtained the province of Macedonia. He carried on war against the Dardanians and Bessi, and penetrated as far as the Danube. On his return to Rome he obtained a triumph, 71. He was a strong supporter of the aristocratical party. He pronounced the funeral oration of his brother, but died before the commencement of the civil war, 49.

LUGDŪNUM (Lugdunensis). 1. (Now Lyon), the chief town of Gallia Lugdunensis, situated at the foot of a hill at the confluence of the Arar (now Saône) and the Rhodanus (now Rhone), is said to have been founded by some fugitives from the town of Vienna, further down the Rhone. In the year after Cæsar's death (B.C. 43) Lugdunum was made a Roman colony by L. Munatius Plancus, and became under Augustus the capital of the province and the residence of the Roman governor. Being situated on two navigable rivers, and being connected with the other parts of Gaul by roads, which met at this town as their central point, it soon became a wealthy and populous place, and is described by Strabo as the largest city in Gaul next to Narbo. It received many privileges from the Emperor Claudius; but it was burned down in the reign of Nero. It was, however, soon rebuilt, and continued to be a place of great importance till A.D. 197, when it was plundered and the greater part of it destroyed by the soldiers of Septimius Severus, after his victory over his rival Albinus in the neighborhood of the town. From this blow it never recovered, and was more and more thrown into the shade by Vienna. Lugdunum possessed a vast aqueduct, of which the remains may still be traced for miles, a mint, and an imperial palace, in which Claudius was born, and in which many of the other Roman emperors resided. At the tongue of land between the Rhone and the Arar stood an altar dedicated to Augustus by the different states of Gaul; and here Caligula instituted contests in rhetoric, prizes being given to the victors, but the most ridiculous punishments inflicted on the vanquished. (Comp. Juv., i., 44.) Lugdunum is memorable in the history of the Christian Church as the seat of the bishopric of Irenæus, and on account of the persecutions which the Christians endured here in the second and third centuries. —2. LUNA. Vid. SELENE.

LUNA (Lunensis: now Luni), an Etruscan town, situated on the left bank of the Macra, about four miles from the coast, originally formed part of Liguria, but became the most northerly city of Etruria when Augustus extended the boundaries of the latter country as far as the Macra. The town itself was never a place of importance, but it possessed a large and commodious harbor at the mouth of the river, called LUNÆ PORTUS (now Gulf of Spezzia). In B.C. 177 Luna was made a Roman colony, and two thousand Roman citizens were settled there. In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey it had sunk into utter decay, but was colonized a few years afterward. Luna was celebrated for its white marble, which now takes its name from the neighboring town of Carrara. The quarries from which this marble was obtained appear not to have been worked before the time of Julius Cæsar, but it was extensively employed in the public buildings erected in the reign of Augustus. The wine and the cheeses of Luna also enjoyed a high reputation: some of these cheeses are said to have weighed one thousand pounds. The ruins of Luna are few and unimportant, consisting of the vestiges of an amphitheatre, fragments of columns, &c.

LUNÆ MONTES (τὸ τῆς Σελήνης ὄρος), a range of mountains which some of the ancient geographers believed to exist in the interior of Africa, covered with perpetual snow, and containing the sources of the Nile. Their actual existence is neither proved nor disproved.

LUPERCA or LUPA, an ancient Italian divinity, wife of Lupercus, who, in the shape of a she-wolf, performed the office of nurse to Romulus and Remus. In some accounts she is identified with ACCA LAURENTIA, the wife of Faustulus.

LUPERCUS, an ancient Italian divinity, who was worshipped by the shepherds as the protector of their flocks against wolves. On the northern side of the Palatine Hill there had been in ancient times a cave, the sanctuary of Lupercus, surrounded by a grove, containing an altar of the god and his figure clad in a goat-skin, just as his priests, the Luperci. The Romans sometimes identified Lupercus with the Arcadian Pan. Respecting the festival celebrated in honor of Lupercus and his priests, the Luperci, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. LUPPIA or LUPIA (now Lippe), a navigable river in the northwest of Germany, which falls into the Rhine at Wesel in Westphalia, and on which the Romans built a fortress of the same name. The River Eliso (now Alme) was a tributary of the Luppia, and at the confluence of these two rivers was the fortress of Aliso.

LUPUS, RUTILIUS. 1. P., consul with L. Julius Cæsar in B.C. 90, was defeated by the Marsi, and slain in battle.—2. P., tribune of the plebs 56, and a warm partisan of the aristocracy. He was prætor in 49, and was stationed at Terracina with three cohorts. He afterward crossed over to Greece.—3. Probably a son of the preceding, the author of a rhetorical treatise in two books, entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, which appears to have been originally an abridgment of a work by Gorgias of Athens, one of the preceptors of young M. Cicero, but which has evidently undergone many changes. Its chief value is derived from the numerous translations which it contains of striking passages from the works of Greek orators now lost. Edited by Ruhnken along with Aquila and Julius Ruffinianus, Lugd. Bat., 1768, reprinted by Frotscher, Lips., 1831.

LURCO, M. AUFIDIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 61, the author of a law on bribery (De Ambitu). He was the maternal grandfather of the Empress Livia, wife of Augustus. He was the first person in Rome who fattened peacocks for sale, and he derived a large income from this source.

LYCABETTUS (Λυκαβηττός: now St. George), a mountain in Attica, belonging to the range of Pentelicus, close to the walls of Athens on the northeast of the city, and on the left of the road leading to Marathon. It is commonly, but erroneously, supposed that the small hill north of the Pnyx is Lycabettus, and that St. George is the ancient Anchesmus.

LYCÆUS (Λυκαῖος) or LYCEUS, a lofty mountain in Arcadia, northwest of Megalopolis, from the summit of which a great part of the country could be seen. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Jupiter (Zeus), who was hence surnamed Lycæus. Here was a temple of this god; and here, also, was celebrated the festival of the Lycæa (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.). Pan was likewise called Lycæus, because he was born and had a sanctuary on this mountain.

LYCAMBES. Vid. ARCHILOCHUS.

LYCAON (Λυκάων). 1. King of Arcadia, son of Pelasgus by Melibœa or Cyllene. The traditions about Lycaon represent him in very different lights. Some describe him as the first civilizer of Arcadia, who built the town of Lycosura, and introduced the worship of Jupiter (Zeus) Lycæus. But he is more usually represented as an impious king, with a large number of sons as impious as himself. Jupiter (Zeus) visited the earth in order to punish them. The god was recognized and worshipped by the Arcadian people. Lycaon resolved to murder him; and, in order to try if he were really a god, served before him a dish of human flesh. Jupiter (Zeus) pushed away the table which bore the horrible food, and the place where this happened was afterward called Trapezus. Lycaon and all his sons, with the exception of the youngest (or eldest), Nyctimus, were killed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning, or, according to others, were changed into wolves. Callisto, the daughter of Lycaon, is said to have been changed into the constellation of the Bear, whence she is called by the poets Lycaonis Arctos, Lycaonia Arctos, or Lycaonia Virgo, or by her patronymic Lycaonis.—[2. Ruler in Lycia, father of the celebrated Pandarus.—3. Son of Priam and Laothoë, was taken captive by Achilles, who sold him in Lemnos, he escaped thence, returned to Troy, and was finally slain Lycaŏnĭa (Λυκαονία : Λυκάονες : part of Karaman), a district of Asia Minor, assigned, under the Persian Empire, to the satrapy of Cappadocia, but considered by the Greek and Roman geographers the southeastern part of Phrygia; bounded on the north by Galatia, on the east by Cappadocia, on the south by Cilicia Aspera, on the southwest by Isauria (which was sometimes reckoned as a part of it) and by Phrygia Paroreios, and on the northwest by Great Phrygia. Its boundaries, however, varied much at different times. It was a long, narrow strip of country, its length extending in the direction of northwest and southeast. Xenophon, who first mentions it, describes its width as extending east of Iconium (its chief city) to the borders of Cappadocia, a distance of thirty parasangs, about one hundred and ten miles. It forms a table-land between the Taurus and the mountains of Phrygia, deficient in good water, but abounding in flocks of sheep. The people were, so far as can be traced, an aboriginal race, speaking a language which is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles as a distinct dialect. They were warlike, and especially skilled in archery. After the overthrow of Antiochus the Great by the Romans, Lycaonia, which had belonged successively to Persia and to Syria, was partly assigned to Eumenes and partly governed by native chieftains, the last of whom, Antipater, a contemporary of Cicero, was conquered by Amyntas, king of Galatia, at whose death, in B.C. 25, it passed, with Galatia, to the Romans, and was finally united to the province of Cappadocia. Lycaonia was the chief scene of the labors of the Apostle Paul on his first mission to the Gentiles (Acts, xiv).

[Lycarētus (Λυκάρητος), brother of Mæandrius, tyrant of Samos, the successor of Polycrates, was governor of Lemnos under the Persians, and died in this office.]

Lycēum (τὸ Λύκειον), the name of one of the three ancient gymnasia at Athens, called after the temple of Apollo Lyceus in its neighborhood. It was situated southeast of the city, outside the walls, and just above the River Ilissus. Here the polemarch administered justice. It is celebrated as the place where Aristotle and the Peripatetics taught.

Lycēus (Λύκειος), a surname of Apollo, the meaning of which is not quite certain. Some derive it from λύκος, a wolf, so that it would mean "the wolf-slayer;" others from λύκη, light, according to which it would mean "the giver of light;" and others, again, from the country of Lycia.

Lychnītes. Vid. Lychnidus.

Lychnĭdus, more rarely Lychnĭdium or Lychnis (Λύχνιδος, Λυχνίδιον, Λυχνίς : Λυχνίδιος : now Achrita, Ochrida), a town of Illyricum, was the ancient capital of the Dessaretii, but was in the possession of the Romans as early as their war with King Gentius. It was situated in the interior of the country, on a height on the north bank of the Lake Lychnītis (Λυχνῖτις or ἡ Λυχνιδία λίμνη) from which the River Drilo rises. The town was strongly fortified, and contained many springs within its walls. In the Mi[ddle] Ages it was the residence of the Bulgarian k[ings], and was called Achris or Achrita, whe[nce its] modern name.

Lўcĭa (Λύκια : Λύκιος, Lycius : now M[...]), a small but most interesting district on the s[outh] side of Asia Minor, jutting out into the M[edi]terranean in a form approaching to a r[ude] semicircle, adjacent to parts of Caria and P[am]phylia on the west and east, and on the n[orth] to the district of Cibyratis in Phrygia, to wh[ich], under the Byzantine emperors, it was co[nsid]ered to belong. It was bounded on the n[orth]west by the little river Glaucus and th[e gulf] of the same name, on the northeast by [the] mountain called Climax (the northern part [of] the same range as that called Solyma), and [on] the north its natural boundary was the Ta[urus], but its limits in this direction were not stri[ctly] defined. The northern parts of Lycia and [the] district of Cibyratis form together a high ta[ble]land, which is supported on the north by [the] Taurus, on the east by the mountains cal[led] Solyma (now Taktalu-Dagh), which run fr[om] north to south along the eastern coast of Ly[cia] far out into the sea, forming the southeast[ern] promontory of Lycia, called Sacrum Promo[nto]rium (now Cape Khelidonia); the summit of th[e] range is seven thousand eight hundred feet hig[h], and is covered with snow;* the southwest[ern] and southern sides of this table-land are form[ed] by the range called Massicytus (now Ak[...] Dagh,) which runs southeast from the easte[rn] side of the upper course of the River Xanthus: its summits are about four thousand feet high, and its southern side descends toward the sea in a succession of terraces, terminated by bol[d] cliffs. The mountain system of Lycia is completed by the Cragus, which fills up the space between the western side of the Xanthus and the Gulf of Glaucus, and forms the southwestern promontory of Lycia: its summits are nearly six thousand feet high. The chief rivers are the Xanthus (now Echen-Chai), which has its sources in the table-land south of the Taurus, and flows from north to south between the Cragus and Massicytus, and the Limyrus, which flows from north to south between the Massicytus and the Solyma Mountains. The valleys of these and the smaller rivers, and the terraces above the sea in the south of the country, were fertile in corn, wine, oil, and fruits, and the mountain slopes were clothed with splendid cedars, firs, and plane-trees: saffron also was one chief product of the land. The total length of the coast, from Telmissus on the west to Phaselis on the east, including all windings, is estimated by Strabo at one thousand seven hundred and twenty stadia (one hundred and seventy-two geographical miles), while a straight line drawn across the country, as the chord of this arc, is about eighty geographical miles in length. The general geographical structure of the peninsula of Lycia, as connected with the rest of Asia Minor, bears no little resemblance to that of the peninsula of Asia Minor itself, as connected with the rest of Asia. According to the tradition preserved by Herodotus, the most ancient name of the country was Milyas (ἡ Μιλυάς), and the earliest inhabitants (probably of the Syro-Arabian race) were called Milyæ, and afterward Solymi: subsequently the Termilæ, from Crete, settled in the country; and lastly, the Athenian Lycus, the son of Pandion, fled from his brother Ægeus to Lycia, and gave his name to the country. Homer, who gives Lycia a prominent place in the Iliad, represents its chieftains, Glaucus and Sarpedon, as descended from the royal family of Argos (Æolids): he does not mention the name of Milyas; and he speaks of the Solymi as a warlike race, inhabiting the mountains, against whom the Greek hero Bellerophontes is sent to fight, by his relative the king of Lycia. Besides the legend of Bellerophon and the chimæra, Lycia is the scene of another popular Greek story, that of the Harpies and the daughters of Pandarus; and memorials of both are preserved on the Lycian monuments now in the British Museum. On the whole, it is clear that Lycia was colonized by the Hellenic race (probably from Crete) at a very early period, and that its historical inhabitants were Greeks, though with a mixture of native blood. The earlier names were preserved in the district in the north of the country called Milyas, and in the mountains called Solyma. The Lycians always kept the reputation they have in Homer as brave warriors. They and the Cilicians were the only people west of the Halys whom Crœsus did not conquer, and they were the last who resisted the Persians. Vid. XANTHUS. Under the Persian empire they must have been a powerful maritime people, as they furnished fifty ships to the fleet of Xerxes. After the Macedonian conquest, Lycia formed part of the Syrian kingdom, from which it was taken by the Romans after their victory over Antiochus III. the Great, and given to the Rhodians. It was soon restored to independence, and formed a flourishing federation of cities, each having its own republican form of government, and the whole presided over by a chief magistrate, called Λυκιάρχης. There was a federal council, composed of deputies from the twenty-three cities of the federation, in which the six chief cities, Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, Olympus, Myra, and Tlos, had three votes each, certain lesser cities two each, and the rest one each; this assembly determined matters relating to the general government of the country, and elected the Lyciarches, as well as the judges and the inferior magistrates. Internal dissensions at length broke up this constitution, and the country was united by the emperor Claudius to the province of Pamphylia, from which it was again separated by Theodosius, who made it a separate province, with Myra for its capital. Its cities were numerous and flourishing (vid. the articles), and its people celebrated for their probity. Their customs are said to have resembled those both of the Carians and of the Cretans. Respecting the works of art found by Mr. Fellows in Lycia, and now in the British Museum, vid. XANTHUS.

[LYCIDAS (Λυκίδης), an Athenian, one of the council of the five hundred, stoned to death by his fellow-citizens because he advised them to listen to the proposals of peace offered by Mardonius, B.C. 479.]

LYCIUS (Λύκιος). 1. The Lycian, a surname of Apollo, who was worshipped in several places of Lycia, especially at Patara, where he had an oracle. Hence the Lyciæ sortes are the responses of the oracle at Patara (Virg., Æn., iv., 346).—2. Of Eleutheræ in Bœotia, a distinguished statuary, the disciple or son of Myron, flourished about B.C. 428.

LYCOMĒDES (Λυκομήδης). 1. A king of the Dolopians, in the island of Scyros, near Eubœa. It was to his court that Achilles was sent disguised as a maiden by his mother Thetis, who was anxious to prevent his going to the Trojan war. Here Achilles became by Deidamīa, the daughter of Lycomedes, the father of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. Lycomedes treacherously killed Theseus by thrusting him down a rock.—2. A celebrated Arcadian general, was a native of Mantinea, and one of the chief founders of Megalopolis, B.C. 370. He afterward showed great jealousy of Thebes, and formed a separate alliance between Athens and Arcadia in 366. He was murdered in the same year, on his return from Athens, by some Arcadian exiles.

[LYCON (Λύκων). 1. Son of Hippocoon, slain by Hercules.—2. A Trojan, slain before Troy by Peneleus.]

LYCON (Λύκων). 1. An orator and demagogue at Athens, was one of the three accusers of Socrates, and prepared the case against him. When the Athenians repented of their condemnation of Socrates, they put Meletus to death, and banished Anytus and Lycon.—2. Of Troas, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, and the disciple of Straton, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school, B.C. 272. He held that post for more than forty-four years, and died at the age of seventy-four. He enjoyed the patronage of Attalus and Eumenes. He was celebrated for his eloquence and for his skill in educating boys. He wrote on the boundaries of good and evil (De Finibus).—[3. A celebrated comic actor of Scarphea, who performed before Alexander the Great, and received from him on one occasion a present of ten talents.]

[LYCOPHONTES (Λυκοφόντης). 1. Son of Autophonus, a Theban, who, in conjunction with Maeon, lay in ambush with fifty men against Tydeus, but was slain by him.—2. A Trojan warrior, slain by Teucer.]

LYCŎPHRON (Λυκόφρων). 1. Younger son of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, by his wife Melissa. For details, vid. PERIANDER.—2. A citizen of Pheræ, where he put down the government of the nobles and established a tyranny about B.C. 405. He afterward endeavored to make himself master of the whole of Thessaly, and in 404 he defeated the Larissæans and others of the Thessalians who opposed him. He was probably the father of JASON of Pheræ.—3. A son, apparently, of Jason, and one of the brothers of Thebe, wife of Alexander, the tyrant of Pheræ, in whose murder he took part, together with his sister and his two brothers, Tisiphonus and Pitholaus, 367. On Alexander's death the power appears to have been wielded mainly by Tisiphonus, though Lycophron had an important share in the government. Lycophron succeeded to the supreme power on the death of Tisiphonus, but in 352 he was obliged to surrender

Pheræ to Philip, and withdraw from Thessaly. —4. A grammarian and poet, was a native of Chalcis in Eubœa, and lived at Alexandrea, under Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285–247), who intrusted to him the arrangement of the works of the comic poets in the Alexandrean library. In the execution of this commission Lycophron drew up an extensive work on comedy. Nothing more is known of his life. Ovid (Ibis, 533) states that he was killed by an arrow. As a poet, Lycophron obtained a place in the Tragic Pleiad He also wrote a satyric drama. But the only one of his poems which has come down to us is the Cassandra or Alexandra. This is neither a tragedy nor an epic poem, but a long iambic monologue of one thousand four hundred and seventy-four verses, in which Cassandra is made to prophesy the fall of Troy, the adventures of the Grecian and Trojan heroes, with numerous other mythological and historical events, going back as early as the fables of Io and Europa, and ending with Alexander the Great. The work has no pretensions to poetical merit. It is simply a cumbrous store of traditional learning. Its obscurity is proverbial. Its author obtained the epithet of the Obscure (σκοτεινός). Its stores of learning and its obscurity alike excited the efforts of the ancient grammarians, several of whom wrote commentaries on the poem. The only one of these works which survives is the Scholia of Isaac and John Tzetzes, which are far more valuable than the poem itself. The best editions are by Potter, Oxon., 1697, folio; Reichard, Lips. 1788, 2 vols. 8vo; and Bachmann, Lips., 1828, vols. 8vo.

Lўcŏpŏlis (ἡ Λύκων πόλις; ruins at Siout), a city of Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Ptolemais, said to have derived its name from the circumstance that an Æthiopian army was put to flight near it by a pack of wolves.

Lycorēa (Λυκώρεια: Λυκωρεύς, Λυκώριος, Λυκωρείτης), an ancient town at the foot of Mount Lycorea (now Liakura), which was the southern of the two peaks of Mount Parnassus. Vid. Parnassus. Hence Apollo derived the surname of Lycoreus. The town Lycorea is said to have been the residence of Deucalion, and Delphi is also reported to have been colonized by it.

Lycŏris. Vid. Cytheris.

Lycortas (Λυκόρτας), of Megalopolis, was the father of Polybius the historian, and the close friend of Philopœmen, whose policy he always supported. He is first mentioned, in B.C. 189, as one of the ambassadors sent to Rome; and his name occurs for the last time in 168.

Lycosūra (Λυκόσουρα: Λυκοσουρεύς: now Paleokrambavos or Sidhirokastro, near Stala), a town in the south of Arcadia, and on the northwestern slope of Mount Lycæus, and near the small river Plataniston, said by Pausanias to have been the most ancient town in Greece, and to have been founded by Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus.

Lyctus (Λύκτος: Λύκτιος), sometimes called Lyttus (Λύττος), an important town in the east of Crete, southeast of Cnosus, was situated on a height of Mount Argæus, eighty stadia from the coast. Its harbor was called Chersonesus. It was one of the most ancient cities in the island, and is mentioned in the Iliad. It i[s] generally considered to be a Spartan co[lony], and its inhabitants were celebrated for th[eir] bravery. At a later time it was conquered a[nd] destroyed by the Cnosians, but it was afterw[ard] rebuilt, and was extant in the seventh century [of] our era.

Lycurgus (Λυκοῦργος). 1. Son of Dryas, [a] king of the Edones in Thrace. He is fam[ous] for his persecution of Dionysus (Bacchus) a[nd] his worship in Thrace. Homer relates th[at, in] order to escape from Lycurgus, Bacchus (Di[o]nysus) leaped into the sea, where he was kind[ly] received by Thetis; and that Jupiter (Ze[us]) thereupon blinded the impious king, who di[ed] soon afterward, hated by the immortal go[ds]. This story has received many additions [from] later poets and mythographers. Some rel[ate] that Bacchus (Dionysus), on his expedition, came to the kingdom of Lycurgus, but wa[s] expelled by the impious king. Thereupon th[e] god drove Lycurgus mad, in which condition h[e] killed his son Dryas, and also hewed off one o[f] his legs, supposing that he was cutting do[wn] vines. The country now produced no fruit, and the oracle declaring that fertility should not be restored unless Lycurgus were killed, the Edonians carried him to Mount Pangæus, where he was torn to pieces by horses. According to Sophocles (Antig., 955), Lycurgus was entombed in a rock.—2. King in Arcadia, son of Aleus and Neæra, brother of Cepheus and Auge, husband of Cleophile, Eurynome, or Antinoe, and father of Ancæus, Epochus, Amphidamas, and Iasus. Lycurgus killed Arethous, who used to fight with a club. Lycurgus bequeathed this club to his slave Ereuthalion, his sons having died before him.—3. Son of Pronax and brother of Amphithea, the wife of Adrastus. He took part in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and fought with Amphiaraus. He is mentioned among those whom Æsculapius called to life again after their death.—4. King of Nemea, son of Pheres and Periclymene, brother of Admetus, husband of Eurydice or Amphithea, and father of Opheltes.

Lycurgus. 1. The Spartan legislator. Of his personal history we have no certain information; and there are such discrepancies respecting him in the ancient writers, that many modern critics have denied his real existence altogether. The more generally received account about him was as follows: Lycurgus was the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, and brother of Polydectes. The latter succeeded his father as king of Sparta, and afterward died, leaving his queen with child. The ambitious woman proposed to Lycurgus to destroy her offspring if he would share the throne with her. He seemingly consented; but when she had given birth to a son (Charilaus), he openly proclaimed him king, and as next of kin acted as his guardian. But, to avoid all suspicion of ambitious designs, with which the opposite party charged him, Lycurgus left Sparta, and set out on his celebrated travels, which have been magnified to a fabulous extent. He is said to have visited Crete, and there to have studied the wise laws of Minos. Next he went to Ionia and Egypt, and is reported to have penetrated into Libya, Iberia, and even India. In Ionia he is said to have met either with Homer himself, or at least with the Homeric poems, which he introduced into the mother country. The return of Lycurgus to Sparta was hailed by all parties. Sparta was in a state of anarchy and licentiousness, and he was considered as the man who alone could cure the growing diseases of the state. He undertook the task; yet, before he set to work, he strengthened himself with the authority of the Delphic oracle, and with a strong party of influential men at Sparta. The reform seems not to have been carried altogether peaceably. The new division of the land among the citizens must have violated many existing interests. But all opposition was overborne, and the whole constitution, military and civil, was remodelled. After Lycurgus had obtained for his institutions an approving oracle of the national god of Delphi, he exacted a promise from the people not to make any alteration in his laws before his return. And now he left Sparta to finish his life in voluntary exile, in order that his countrymen might be bound by their oath to preserve his constitution inviolate forever. Where and how he died nobody could tell. He vanished from the earth like a god, leaving no traces behind but his spirit; and he was honored as a god at Sparta with a temple and yearly sacrifices down to the latest times. The date of Lycurgus is variously given, but it is impossible to place it later than B.C. 825. Lycurgus was regarded through all subsequent ages as the legislator of Sparta, and therefore almost all the Spartan institutions were ascribed to him as their author. We therefore propose to give here a sketch of the Spartan constitution, referring for details to the Dict. of Antiq.; though we must not imagine that this constitution was entirely the work of Lycurgus. The Spartan constitution was of a mixed nature: the monarchical principle was represented by the kings, the aristocracy by the senate, and the democratical element by the assembly of the people, and subsequently by their representatives, the ephors. The kings had originally to perform the common functions of the kings of the heroic age. They were high priests, judges, and leaders in war; but in all of these departments they were in course of time superseded more or less. As judges they retained only a particular branch of jurisdiction, that referring to the succession of property. As military commanders, they were restricted and watched by commissioners sent by the senate; the functions of high priest were curtailed least, perhaps because least obnoxious. In compensation for the loss of power, the kings enjoyed great honors, both during their life and after their death. Still the principle of monarchy was very weak among the Spartans. The powers of the senate were very important: they had the right of originating and discussing all measures before they could be submitted to the decision of the popular assembly; they had, in conjunction with the ephors, to watch over the due observance of the laws and institutions; and they were judges in all criminal cases, without being bound by any written code. For all this they were not responsible, holding their office for life. But with all these powers, the elders formed no real aristocracy. They were not chosen either for property qualification or for noble birth. The senate was open to the poorest citizen, who, during sixty years, had been obedient to the laws and zealous in the performance of his duties. The mass of the people, that is, the Spartans of pure Doric descent, formed the sovereign power of the state. The popular assembly consisted of every Spartan of thirty years of age and of unblemished character; only those were excluded who had not the means of contributing their portion to the syssitia. They met at stated times, to decide on all important questions brought before them, after a previous discussion in the senate. They had no right of amendment, but only that of simple approval or rejection, which was given in the rudest form possible, by shouting. The popular assembly, however, had neither frequent nor very important occasions for directly exerting their sovereign power. Their chief activity consisted in delegating it; hence arose the importance of the ephors, who were the representatives of the popular element of the constitution. The ephors answer in every characteristic feature to the Roman tribunes of the people. Their origin was lost in obscurity and insignificance; but at the end they engrossed the whole power of the state. With reference to their subjects, the few Spartans formed a most decided aristocracy. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, part of the ancient inhabitants of the country, under name of the Periœci, were allowed, indeed, to retain their personal liberty, but lost all civil rights, and were obliged to pay to the state a rent for the land that was left them. But a great part of the old inhabitants were reduced to a state of perfect slavery, different from that of the slaves of Athens and Rome, and more similar to the villanage of the feudal ages. These were called Helots They were allotted with patches of land to individual members of the ruling class. They tilled the land, and paid a fixed rent to their masters, not, as the periœci, to the state. The number of these miserable creatures was large. They were treated with the utmost cruelty by the Spartans, and were frequently put to death by their oppressors. The Spartans formed, as it were, an army of invaders in an enemy's country, their city was a camp, and every man a soldier. At Sparta, the citizen only existed for the state; he had no interest but the state's, and no property but what belonged to the state. It was a fundamental principle of the constitution, that all citizens were entitled to the enjoyment of an equal portion of the common property. This was done in order to secure to the commonwealth a large number of citizens and soldiers, free from labor for their sustenance, and able to devote their whole time to warlike exercises, in order thus to keep up the ascendency of Sparta over her periœci and helots. The Spartans were to be warriors, and nothing but warriors. Therefore, not only all mechanical labor was thought to degrade them; not only was husbandry despised and neglected, and commerce prevented, or at least impeded, by prohibitive laws and by the use of iron money, but also the nobler arts and sciences were so effectually stifled, that Sparta is a blank in the history of the arts and literature of Greece. The state took care of a Spartan from his cradle to his grave, and superintended his education in the minutest points. This was not confined to his youth, but extended throughout his whole life. The syssitia, or, as they were called at Sparta, phiditia, the common meals, may be regarded as an educational institution; for at these meals subjects of general interest were discussed and political questions debated. The youths and boys used to eat separately from the men, in their own divisions.—2. A Lacedæmonian, who, though not of the royal blood, was chosen king in B.C. 220, together with Agesipolis III., after the death of Cleomenes. It was not long before he deposed his colleague and made himself sole sovereign, though under the control of the ephori. He carried on war against Philip V. of Macedon and the Achæans. He died about 210, and Machanidas then made himself tyrant. —3. An Attic orator, son of Lycophron, who belonged to the noble family of the Eteobutadæ, was born at Athens about B.C. 396. He was a disciple of Plato and Isocrates. In public life he was a warm supporter of the policy of Demosthenes, and was universally admitted to be one of the most virtuous citizens and upright statesmen of his age. He was thrice appointed Tamias or manager of the public revenue, and held this office each time for five years, beginning with 337. He discharged the duties of this office with such ability and integrity, that he raised the public revenue to the sum of twelve hundred talents. One of his laws enacted that bronze statues should be erected to Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and that copies of their tragedies should be preserved in the public archives. He often appeared as a successful accuser in the Athenian courts, but he himself was as often accused by others, though he always succeeded in silencing his enemies. He died while holding the office of president of the theatre of Dionysus in 323. A fragment of an inscription, containing an account of his administration of the finances, is still extant. There were fifteen orations of Lycurgus extant in antiquity, but only one has come down to us entire, the oration against Leocrates, which was delivered in 330. The style is noble and grand, but neither elegant nor pleasing. The oration is printed in the various collections of the Attic orators. [Separately by A. G. Becker, Magdeburg, 1821; and by Mætzner, Berlin, 1836. The fragments of his other orations are collected by Kiessling, Lycurgi Deperd. Oratt. Fragmenta, Halle, 1847.] Vid. DEMOSTHENES.

LYCUS (Λύκος). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Celæno, who was transferred by his father to the islands of the blessed. By Alcyone, the sister of Celæno, Neptune (Poseidon) begot Hyrieus, the father of the following.—2. Son of Hyrieus and Clonia, and brother of Nycteus. Polydorus, king of Thebes, married the daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a son, Labdacus; and on his death he left the government of Thebes and the guardianship of Labdacus to his father-in-law. Nycteus afterward fell in battle against Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who had carried away his beautiful daughter Antiope. Lycus succeeded his brother in the government of Thebes and in the guardianship of Labdacus. He surrendered the kingdom to Labdacus when the latter had grown up. On the death of Labdacus, soon afterward, Lycus again succeeded to the government of Thebes, and undertook the guardianship of Laius, the son of Labdacus. Lycus marched against Epopeus, whom he put to death (according to other accounts, Epopeus fell in the war with Nycteus), and he carried away Antiope to Thebes. She was treated with the greatest cruelty by Dirce, the wife of Lycus, in revenge for which, her sons by Jupiter (Zeus), Amphion and Zethus, afterward put to death both Lycus and Dirce. Vid. AMPHION.—3. Son of No. 2. or, according to others, son of Neptune (Poseidon), was also king of Thebes. In the absence of Hercules, Lycus attempted to kill his wife Megara and her children, but was afterward put to death by Hercules.—4. Son of Pandion, and brother of Ægeus, Nisus, and Pallas. He was expelled by Ægeus, and took refuge in the country of the Termili, which was called Lycia after him. He was honored at Athens as a hero, and the Lyceum derived its name from him. He is said to have introduced the Eleusinian mysteries into Andania in Messenia. He is sometimes, also, described as an ancient prophet, and the family of the Lycomidæ, at Athens, traced their name and origin from him.—5. Son of Dascylus, and king of the Mariandynians, who received Hercules and the Argonauts with hospitality.—[6. A companion of Æneas in his voyage from Troy to Italy: he was slain by Turnus in Italy.]—7. Of Rhegium, the father, real or adoptive, of the poet Lycophron, was an historical writer in the time of Demetrius Phalereus.

LYCUS (Λύκος), the name of several rivers, which are said to be so called from the impetuosity of their current. 1. (Now Kilij), a little river of Bithynia, falling into the sea south of Heraclea Pontica.—2. (Now Germeneh-Chai), a considerable river of Pontus, rising in the mountains on the north of Armenia Minor, and flowing west into the Iris at Eupatoria.—3. (Now Choruk-Su), a considerable river of Phrygia, flowing from east to west past Colossæ and Laodicea into the Mæander.—4. (Now Nahr-el-Kelb), a river of Phœnicia, falling into the sea north of Berytus.—5. (Now Great Zab or Ulu-Su), a river of Assyria, rising in the mountains on the south of Armenia, and flowing southwest into the Tigris, just below Larissa (now Nimroud). It is undoubtedly the same as the Zabatus of Xenophon.

LYDDA (τὰ Λύδδα, ἡ Λύδδη: now Lud), a town of Palestine, southeast of Joppa and northwest of Jerusalem, at the junction of several roads which lead from the sea-coast, was destroyed by the Romans in the Jewish war, but soon after rebuilt, and called Diospolis.

LȲDĬA (Λυδία: Λυδός, Lydus), a district of Asia Minor, in the middle of the western side of the peninsula, between Mysia on the north and Caria on the south, and between Phrygia on the east and the Ægean Sea on the west. Its boundaries varied so much at different times that they can not be described with any approach to exactness till we come to the time of the Roman rule over Western Asia. At that time the northern boundary, toward Mysia, was the range of mountains which form the northern margin of the valley of the Hermus, called Sardene, a southwestern branch of the Phrygian Olympus; the eastern boundary, toward Phrygia, was an imaginary line; and the southern boundary, toward Caria, was the River Mæander, or, according to some authorities, the range of mountains which, under the name of Messogis (now Kastane Dagh), forms the northern margin of the valley of the Mæander, and is a northwestern prolongation of the Taurus. From the eastern part of this range, in the southeastern corner of Lydia, another branches off to the northwest, and runs to the west far out into the Ægean Sea, where it forms the peninsula opposite to the island of Chios. This chain, which is called Tmolus (now Kisilja Musa Dagh), divides Lydia into two unequal valleys, of which the southern and smaller is watered by the River CAYSTER, and the northern forms the great plain of the HERMUS: these valleys are very beautiful and fertile, and that of the Hermus, especially, is one of the most delicious regions of the earth. The eastern part of Lydia, and the adjacent portion of Phrygia, about the upper course of the Hermus and its tributaries, is an elevated plain, showing traces of volcanic action, and hence called Catacecaumĕne (κατακεκαυμένη). In the boundaries of Lydia, as just described, the strip of coast belonging to IONIA is included, but the name is sometimes used in a narrower signification, so as to exclude Ionia. In early times the country had another name, Mæŏnĭa (Μῃονίη, Μαιονία), by which alone it is known to Homer; and this name was afterward applied specifically to the eastern and southern part of Lydia, and then, in contradistinction to it, the name Lydia was used for the northwestern part. In the mythical legends, the common name of the people and country, Lydi and Lydia, is derived from Lydus, the son of Atys, the first king. The Lydians appear to have been a race closely connected with the Carians and the Mysians, with whom they observed a common worship in the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Carius at Mylasa: they also practiced the worship of Cybele and other Phrygian customs. Amid the uncertainties of the early legends, it is clear that Lydia was a very early seat of Asiatic civilization, and that it exerted a very important influence on the Greeks. The Lydian monarchy, which was founded at Sardis before the time of authentic history, grew up into an empire, under which the many different tribes of Asia Minor west of the River Halys were for the first time united. Tradition mentioned three dynasties of kings: the Atyădæ, which ended (according to the backward computations of chronologers) about B.C. 1221; the Heraclidæ, which reigned five hundred and five years, down to 716; and the Mermnădæ, one hundred and sixty years, down to 556. Only the last dynasty can be safely regarded as historical, and the fabulous element has a large place in the details of their history: their names and computed dates were: (1.) GYGES B.C. 716–678; (2.) ARDYS, 678–629; (3.) SADYATTES, 629–617; (4.) ALYATTES, 617–560; (5.) CRŒSUS, 560 (or earlier)–546; under whose names an account is given of the rise of the Lydian empire in Asia Minor, and of its overthrow by the Persians under Cyrus. Under these kings, the Lydians appear to have been a highly civilized, industrious, and wealthy people, practicing agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and acquainted with various arts; and exercising, through their intercourse with the Greeks of Ionia, an important influence on the progress of Greek civilization. Among the inventions or improvements which the Greeks are said to have derived from them were the weaving and dyeing of fine fabrics; various processes of metallurgy; the use of gold and silver money, which the Lydians are said first to have coined, the former from the gold found on Tmolus and from the golden sands of the Pactolus; and various metrical and musical improvements, especially the scale or mode of music called the Lydian, and the form of the lyre called the magadis. (Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. MUSICA.) The Lydians had, also, public games similar to those of the Greeks. Their high civilization, however, was combined with a lax morality, and, after the Persian conquest, when they were forbidden by Cyrus to carry arms, they sank gradually into a by-word for effeminate luxuriousness, and their very name and language had almost entirely disappeared by the commencement of our era. Under the Persians, Lydia and Mysia formed the second satrapy. After the Macedonian conquest, Lydia belonged first to the kings of Syria, and next (after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans) to those of Pergamus, and so passed, by the bequest of Attalus III., to the Romans, under whom it formed part of the province of Asia.

LYDĬĂDES (Λυδιάδης), a citizen of Megalopolis, who, though of an obscure family, raised himself to the sovereignty of his native city about B.C. 244. In 234 he voluntarily abdicated the sovereignty, and permitted Megalopolis to join the Achæan league as a free state. He was elected several times general of the Achæan league, and became a formidable rival to Aratus. He fell in battle against Cleomenes, 226.

LYDĬAS or LUDIAS (Λυδίας, Ion. Λυδίης, Λουδίας: now Karasmak or Mavronero), a river in Macedonia, rises in Eordæa, passes Edessa, and, after flowing through the lake on which Pella is situated, falls into the Axius a short distance from the Thermaic Gulf. In the upper part of its course it is called the Eordæan River (Ἐορδαϊκὸς ποταμός) by Arrian. Herodotus (vii., 127), by mistake, makes the Lydias unite with the Haliacmon, the latter of which is west of the former.

LYDUS (Λυδός), son of Atys and Callithea, and brother of Tyrrhenus, said to have been the mythical ancestor of the Lydians.

LYDUS, JOANNES LAURENTIUS, was born at Philadelphia, in Lydia (whence he is called Lydus or the Lydian), in A.D. 490. He held various public offices, and lived to an advanced age. He wrote, 1. Περὶ μηνῶν συγγραφή, De Mensibus Liber, of which there are two epitomæ, or summaries, and a fragment extant. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν, κ. τ. λ., De Magistratibus Reipublicæ Romanæ. 3. Περὶ διοσημειῶν, De Ostentis. The work De Mensibus is an historical commentary on the Roman calendar, with an account of the various festivals, derived from a great number of authorities, most of which have perished. Of the two summaries of this curious work, the larger one is by an unknown hand, the shorter one by Maximus Planudes. The work De Magistratibus was thought to have perished, but was discovered by Villoison in the suburbs of Constantinople, in 1785. The best edition of these works is by Bekker, Bonn, 1837.

LYGDĂMIS (Λύγδαμις). 1. Of Naxos, a distinguished leader of the popular party of the island in the struggle with the oligarchy. He conquered the latter, and obtained thereby the chief power in the state. He assisted Pisistratus in his third return to Athens; but, during his absence, his enemies seem to have got the upper hand again; for Pisistratus afterward subdued the island, and made Lygdamis tyrant of it, about B.C. 540. In 532 he assisted Polycrates in obtaining the tyranny of Samos.—2. Father of Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, the contemporary of Xerxes.—3. Tyrant of Halicarnassus, the son of Pisindelis, and the grandson of Artemisia. The historian Herodotus is said to have taken an active part in delivering his native city from the tyranny of this Lygdamis.

LYGĬI or LIGĬI, an important people in Germany, between the Viadus (now Oder) and the Vistula, in the modern Silesia and Posen, were bounded by the Burgundiones on the north, the Goths on the east, the Bastarnæ and Osi on the west, and the Marsingi, Silingæ, and Semnones on the south. They were divided into several tribes, the chief of which were the Manimi, Duni, Elysii, Burii, Arii, Naharvali, and Helvecones. They first appear in history as members of the great Marcomannic league formed by Maroboduus in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. In the third century some of the Lygii migrated with the Burgundians westward, and settled in the country bordering on the Rhine.

[LYGINUS (Λύγινος), a river of Thrace in the territory of the Triballi, emptying into the Pontus Euxinus.]

[LYMAX (Λύμαξ), a small river in the southwest of Arcadia, which empties into the Neda near Phigalēa.]

LYNCESTIS (Λυγκηστίς), a district in the southwest of Macedonia, north of the River Erigon, and upon the frontiers of Illyria. Its inhabitants, the LYNCESTÆ, were Illyrians, and were originally an independent people, who were governed by their own princes, said to be descended from the family of the Bacchiadæ. The Lyncestæ appear to have become subject to Macedonia by a marriage between the royal families of the two countries. The ancient capital of the country was LYNCUS (ἡ Λύγκος), though HERACLEA, at a later time, became the chief town in the district. Near Lyncus was a river, the waters of which are said to have been as intoxicating as wine. (Ov., Met., xv., 329.)

LYNCEUS (Λυγκεύς). 1. One of the fifty sons of Ægyptus, whose life was saved by his Hypermnestra, when all his other brothers murdered by the daughters of Danaus on wedding night. Vid. ÆGYPTUS. Danaus upon kept Hypermnestra in strict confine but was afterward prevailed upon to give to Lynceus, who succeeded him on the th of Argos. According to a different legend ceus slew Danaus and all the sisters of Hyp nestra in revenge for his brothers. Ly was succeeded as king of Argos by his ABAS.—2. Son of Aphareus and Arene, brother of Idas, was one of the Argonauts famous for his keen sight. He is also tioned among the Calydonian hunters, and slain by Pollux. For details respecting death, vid. p. 266, b.—[3. A Trojan, comp of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]—4. ... mos, the disciple of Theophrastus, and the br er of the historian Duris, was a contempo of Menander, and his rival in comic poetry. survived Menander, upon whom he wrot book. He seems to have been more dis guished as a grammarian and historian tha a comic poet.

LYNCUS, king of Scythia, or, according to ers, of Sicily, endeavored to murder Trip mus, who came to him with the gifts of Ce (Demeter), but he was metamorphosed by goddess into a lynx.

[LYNCUS (Λύγκος), capital of Lyncestis. LYNCESTIS.]

LYRCĒA or LYRCĒUM (Λυρκεία, Λύρκειον) small town in Argolis, situated on a mount of the same name.

LYRNESSUS (Λυρνησσός), a town in the in rior of Mysia, in Asia Minor, frequently me tioned by Homer: destroyed before the time Strabo.

LYSANDER (Λύσανδρος), a Spartan, was servile origin, or, at least, the offspring of marriage between a freeman and a woman inferior condition. He obtained the citizensh and became one of the most distinguished the Spartan generals and diplomatists. In B.C. 407, he was sent out to succeed Cratesippida in the command of the fleet off the coasts Asia Minor. He fixed his head-quarters Ephesus, and soon obtained great influence, n only with the Greek cities, but also with Cyru who supplied him with large sums of money t pay his sailors. Next year, 406, he was suc ceeded by Callicratidas. In one year the rep utation and influence of Lysander had becom so great, that Cyrus and the Spartan allies Asia requested the Lacedæmonians to appoi Lysander again to the command of the fle The Lacedæmonian law, however, did not al low the office of admiral to be held twice by the same person; and, accordingly, Aracus was sent out in 405 as the nominal commander-in-chief, while Lysander, virtually invested with the su preme direction of affairs, had the title of vice admiral (ἐπιστολεύς). In this year he brought the Peloponnesian war to a conclusion by the defeat and capture of the Athenian fleet off Ægospotami. Only eight Athenian ships made their escape under the command of Conon. He afterward sailed to Athens, and in the spring of 404 the city capitulated; the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræus were destroyed and an oligarchical form of government established, known by the name of the Thirty Tyrants. Lysander was now by far the most powerful man in Greece, and he displayed more than the usual pride and haughtiness which distinguished the Spartan commanders in foreign countries. He was passionately fond of praise, and took care that his exploits should be celebrated by the most illustrious poets of his time. He always kept the poet Chœrilus in his retinue, and his praises were also sung by Antilochus, Antimachus of Colophon, and Niceratus of Heraclea. He was the first of the Greeks to whom Greek cities erected altars as to a god, offered sacrifices, and celebrated festivals. His power and ambition caused the Spartan government uneasiness, and, accordingly, the ephors recalled him from Asia Minor, to which he had again repaired, and for some years kept him without any public employment. On the death of Agis II. in 397, he secured the succession for Agesilaus, the brother of Agis, in opposition to Leotychides, the reputed son of the latter. He did not receive from Agesilaus the gratitude he had expected. He was one of the members of the council, thirty in number, which was appointed to accompany the new king in his expedition into Asia in 396. Agesilaus purposely thwarted all his designs, and refused all the favors which he asked. On his return to Sparta, Lysander resolved to bring about the change he had long meditated in the Spartan constitution, by abolishing hereditary royalty, and making the throne elective. He is said to have attempted to obtain the sanction of the gods in favor of his scheme, and to have tried in succession the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter (Zeus) Ammon, but without success. He does not seem to have ventured upon any overt act, and his enterprise was cut short by his death in the following year. On the breaking out of the Bœotian war in 395, Lysander was placed at the head of one army and the king Pausanias at the head of another. Lysander marched against Haliartus, and perished in battle under the walls, 395.

LYSANDRA (Λυσάνδρα), daughter of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater. She was married first to Alexander, the son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and after his death to Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus. After the murder of her second husband, B.C. 284 (vid. AGATHOCLES, No. 3), she fled to Asia, and besought assistance from Seleucus. The latter, in consequence, marched against Lysimachus, who was defeated and slain in battle, 281.

LYSANĬAS (Λυσανίας). 1. Tetrarch of Abilene, was put to death by Antony to gratify Cleopatra, B.C. 36.—2. A descendant of the last who was tetrarch of Abilene at the time when our Saviour entered upon his ministry (Luke, iii., 1).

[LYSANĬAS (Λυσανίας), a Greek grammarian, of Cyrene, author of a work περὶ Ἰαμβοποιῶν. Suidas speaks of him as the instructor of Eratosthenes.]

[LYSIADES, an Epicurean philosopher of Athens, son of the celebrated philosopher Phædrus, contemporary with Cicero, who attacks his appointment by Antony as a judge.]

LYSĬAS (Λυσίας). 1. An Attic orator, was born at Athens B.C. 458. He was the son of Cephalus, who was a native of Syracuse, and had taken up his abode at Athens on the invitation of Pericles. At the age of fifteen, Lysias and his brothers joined the Athenians who went as colonists to Thurii in Italy, 443. He there completed his education under the instruction of two Syracusans, Tisias and Nicias. He afterward enjoyed great esteem among the Thurians, and seems to have taken part in the administration of the city. After the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, he was expelled by the Spartan party from Thurii as a partisan of the Athenians. He now returned to Athens, 411. During the rule of the Thirty Tyrants (404), he was looked upon as an enemy of the government, his large property was confiscated, and he was thrown into prison; but he escaped, and took refuge at Megara. He joined Thrasybulus and the exiles, and, in order to render them effectual assistance, he sacrificed all that remained of his fortune. He gave the patriots two thousand drachmas and two hundred shields, and engaged a band of three hundred mercenaries. Thrasybulus procured him the Athenian franchise, which he had not possessed hitherto, since he was the son of a foreigner; but he was afterward deprived of this right because it had been conferred without a probuleuma. Henceforth he lived at Athens as an isoteles, occupying himself, as it appears, solely with writing judicial speeches for others, and died in 378, at the age of eighty. Lysias wrote a great number of orations, and among those which were current under his name, the ancient critics reckoned two hundred and thirty as genuine. Of these, thirty-five only are extant, and even some of these are incomplete, and others are probably spurious. Most of these orations were composed after his return from Thurii to Athens. The only one which he delivered himself is that against Eratosthenes, 403. The language of Lysias is perfectly pure, and may be regarded as one of the best specimens of the Attic idiom. All the ancient writers agreed that his orations were distinguished by grace and elegance. His style is always clear and lucid, and his delineations of character striking and true to life. The orations of Lysias are contained in the collections of the Attic orators. Vid. DEMOSTHENES. The best separate editions are by Foertsch, Lips., 1829; and by Franz, Monac., 1831.—[2. One of the Athenian generals at the battle of the Arginusæ islands: on his return to Athens he was accused of having neglected to carry off the bodies of the dead, was condemned and executed.—3. A general and minister of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was charged with the prosecution of the war against the Jews, but his armies were totally defeated by Judas Maccabæus; he subsequently compelled Maccabæus to retire to Jerusalem, and there shut him up, till the approach of his rival, Philip, made him grant the Jews favorable terms. Lysias subsequently fell into the hands of the young prince Demetrius, whom he had opposed, and was by him put to death.]

[LYSICLES (Λυσικλῆς). 1. Sent out by the Athenians with four colleagues, in command of twelve ships, for raising money among the allies, B.C. 428. He was attacked, in an exped-

tion up the plain of the Mæander, by some Carians and Samians of Anæa, and fell, with many of his men.—2. One of the commanders of the Athenian army at the battle of Chæronea, B.C. 338, was subsequently condemned to death on the accusation of the orator Lycurgus.]

LYSIMACHĬA or -ĒA (Λυσιμαχία, Λυσιμάχεια: Λυσιμαχεύς) 1. (Now Eksemil,) an important town on the northeast of the Gulf of Melas, and on the isthmus connecting the Thracian Chersonesus with the main land, was founded B.C. 309 by Lysimachus, who removed to his new city the greater part of the inhabitants of the neighboring town of Cardia. It was subsequently destroyed by the Thracians, but was restored by Antiochus the Great. Under the Romans it greatly declined; but Justinian built a strong fortress on the spot, which he called HEXAMILIUM (Ἑξαμίλιον), doubtless from the width of the isthmus, under which name it is mentioned in the Middle Ages.—2. A town in the southwest of Ætolia, near Pleuron, situated on a lake of the same name, which was more anciently called Hydra.

LYSIMĂCHUS (Λυσίμαχος), king of Thrace, was a Macedonian by birth, and one of Alexander's generals, but of mean origin, his father Agathocles having been originally a Penest or serf in Sicily. He was early distinguished for his undaunted courage, as well as for his great activity and strength of body. We are told by Q. Curtius that Lysimachus, when hunting in Syria, had killed a lion of immense size single-handed; and this circumstance that writer regards as the origin of a fable gravely related by many authors, that, on account of some offence, Lysimachus had been shut up by order of Alexander in the same den with a lion; but, though unarmed, had succeeded in destroying the animal, and was pardoned by the king in consideration of his courage. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), Thrace, and the neighboring countries as far as the Danube, were assigned to Lysimachus. For some years he was actively engaged in war with the warlike barbarians that bordered his province on the north. At length, in 315, he joined the league which Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander had formed against Antigonus, but he did not take any active part in the war for some time. In 306 he took the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander. In 302 Lysimachus crossed over into Asia Minor to oppose Antigonus, while Seleucus also advanced against the latter from the East. In 301 Lysimachus and Seleucus effected a junction, and gained a decisive victory at Ipsus over Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus fell on the field, and Demetrius became a fugitive. The conquerors divided between them the dominions of the vanquished, and Lysimachus obtained for his share all that part of Asia Minor extending from the Hellespont and the Ægean to the heart of Phrygia. In 291 Lysimachus crossed the Danube and penetrated into the heart of the country of the Getæ; but he was reduced to the greatest distress by want of provisions, and was ultimately compelled to surrender with his whole army. Dromichætes, king of the Getæ, treated him with the utmost generosity, and restored him to liberty. In 288 Lysimachus u[nited] with Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Pyrrhus in a c[om]mon league against Demetrius, who had some years been in possession of Maced[onia], and was now preparing to march into A[sia]. Next year, 287, Lysimachus and Pyrrhus [in]vaded Macedonia. Demetrius was aban[doned] by his own troops, and was compelled to [seek] safety in flight. Pyrrhus for a time obta[ined] possession of the Macedonian throne, but was expelled by Lysimachus in 286. Lys[im]achus was now in possession of all the do[min]ions in Europe that had formed part of the Ma[ce]donian monarchy, as well as of the greater p[art] of Asia Minor. He remained in undist[urbed] possession of these vast dominions till sh[ortly] before his death. His downfall was occasi[oned] by a dark domestic tragedy. His wife Arsi[noë], daughter of Ptolemy Soter, had long hated [his] step-son Agathocles, and at length, by false [ac]cusations, induced Lysimachus to put his so[n to] death. This bloody deed alienated the mi[nds] of his subjects, and many cities of Asia bro[ke] out into open revolt. Lysandra, the widow [of] Agathocles, fled with her children to the court [of] Seleucus, who forthwith invaded the domini[ons] of Lysimachus. The two monarchs met in th[e] plain of Corus (Corupedion), and Lysimach[us] fell in the battle that ensued, B.C. 281. He wa[s] in his eightieth year at the time of his d[eath]. Lysimachus founded LYSIMACHIA, on the He[l]lespont, and also enlarged and rebuilt many othe[r] cities.

LYSIMELĬA (ἡ Λυσιμέλεια λίμνη), a marsh nea[r] Syracuse in Sicily, probably the same as th[e] marsh more anciently called Syraco, from whi[ch] the town of Syracuse is said to have derived it[s] name.

LYSĬNŎĒ (Λυσινόη: now Agelan?), a town [of] Pisidia, south of the Lake Ascania.

LYSIPPUS (Λύσιππος). 1. Of Sicyon, one of the most distinguished Greek statuaries, was a con[-]temporary of Alexander the Great. Originally a simple workman in bronze (faber ærarius), he rose to the eminence which he afterward ob[-]tained by the direct study of nature. He re[-]jected the last remains of the old conventional rules which the early artists followed. In his imitation of nature the ideal appears almost to have vanished, or perhaps it should rather be said that he aimed to idealize merely human beauty. He made statues of gods, it is true; but even in this field of art his favorite subject was the human hero Hercules; while his por[-]traits seem to have been the chief foundation of his fame. The works of Lysippus are said to have amounted to the enormous number of one thousand five hundred. They were almost all, if not all, in bronze; in consequence of which none of them are extant. He made statues of Alex[-]ander at all periods of life, and in many differ[-]ent positions. Alexander's edict is well known that no one should paint him but Apelles, and no one make his statue but Lysippus. The most celebrated of these statues was that in which Alexander was represented with a lance, which was considered as a sort of companion to the picture of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt, by Apelles.—[2. A Lacedæmonian, harmost for a time at Epitalium in Elis: he devastated the Elean territory, and compelled them to sue for peace, B.C. 399.—3. An Arcadian, a comic poet of the old comedy, gained the first prize B.C. 434: a few fragments of his comedies are preserved in Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Graec. vol. i, p. 421–3, edit. minor.]

Lysis (Λῦσις), an eminent Pythagorean philosopher, who, driven out of Italy in the persecution of his sect, betook himself to Thebes, and became the teacher of Epaminondas, by whom he was held in the highest esteem.

Lysis, a river of Caria, only mentioned by Livy (xxxviii, 15).

Lysistrătus, of Sicyon, the brother of Lysippus, was a statuary, and devoted himself to the making of portraits. He was the first who took a cast of the human face in gypsum; and from this mould he produced copies by pouring into it melted wax.

[Lyso. 1. A Sicilian of rank at Lilybæum, plundered by Verres while prætor of Sicily in B.C. 73–71.—2. A native of Patræ, an intimate friend of Cicero's, who intrusted to his care Tullius Tiro during his illness at that place: when Lyso subsequently visited Rome, he received great attention from both Tiro and Cicero.]

Lystra (ἡ Λύστρα, τὰ Λύστρα: ruins probably at Karadagh, called Bin Bir Kilisseh), a city of Lycaonia, on the confines of Isauria, celebrated as one chief scene of the preaching of Paul and Barnabas (Acts, xiv.).

M.

Macæ (Μάκαι). 1. A people on the eastern coast of Arabia Felix, probably about Muscat.—2. An inland people of Libya, in the Regio Syrtica, that is, the part of Northern Africa between the Syrtes.

Macalla, a town on the eastern coast of Bruttium, which was said to possess the tomb and a sanctuary of Philoctetes.

Macăr or Macăreus (Μάκαρ or Μακαρεύς). 1. Son of Helios (or Crinacus) and Rhodos, fled from Rhodes to Lesbos after the murder of Tenages.—2. Son of Æolus. Vid. Canace.—3. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Mermerus or Mormorus.—[4. One of the Lapithæ, slew the centaur Erigdupus at the nuptials of Pirithous.—5. Of Nericus, one of the companions of Ulysses.]

Macăria (Μακαρία), daughter of Hercules and Deïanira.

Macăria (Μακαρία). A poetical name of several islands, such as Lesbos, Rhodes, and Cyprus.—2. An island in the southern part of the Sinus Arabicus (now Red Sea), off the coast of the Troglodytæ.

Macarius (Μακάριος), a Spartan, was one of the three commanders of the Peloponnesian force sent to aid the Ætolians in the reduction of Naupactus, B.C. 426, which, however, was saved by Demosthenes; he was afterward slain at the battle of Olpæ.

Maccabæi (Μακκαβαῖοι), the descendants of the family of the heroic Judas Maccabi or Maccabæus, a surname which he obtained from his glorious victories. (From the Hebrew makkab, a hammer.") They were also called Asamonæi (Ἀσαμωναῖοι), from Asamonæus, or Chasmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias, the father of Judas Maccabæus, or, in a shorter form, Asmonæi or Hasmoniæ. This family first obtained distinction from the attempts which were made by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, king of Syria, to root out the worship of Jehovah, and introduce the Greek religion among the inhabitants of Judæa. Antiochus published an edict, which enjoined uniformity of worship throughout his dominions. At Modin, a town not far from Lydda, lived Mattathias, a man of the priestly line and of deep religious feeling, who had five sons in the vigor of their days, John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. When the officer of the Syrian king visited Modin to enforce obedience to the royal edict, Mattathias not only refused to desert the religion of his forefathers, but with his own hand struck dead the first renegade who attempted to offer sacrifice on the heathen altar. He then put to death the king's officer, and retired to the mountains with his five sons (B.C. 167). Their numbers daily increased; and as opportunities occurred they issued from their mountain fastnesses, cut off detachments of the Syrian army, destroyed heathen altars, and restored in many places the synagogues and the open worship of the Jewish religion. Within a few months the insurrection at Modin had grown into a war for national independence. But the toils of such a war were too much for the aged frame of Mattathias, who died in the first year of the revolt, leaving the conduct of it to Judas, his third son. 1. Judas, who assumed the surname of Maccabæus, as has been mentioned above, carried on the war with the same prudence and energy with which it had been commenced. After meeting with great success, he at length fell in battle against the forces of Demetrius I. Soter, 160. He was succeeded in the command by his brother,—2. Jonathan, who maintained the cause of Jewish independence with equal vigor and success, and became recognized as high-priest of the Jews. He was put to death by Tryphon, the minister of Antiochus VI., who treacherously got him into his power, 144. Jonathan was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his brother,—3. Simon, who was the most fortunate of the sons of Mattathias, and under whose government the country became virtually independent of Syria. He was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy, the governor of Jericho, together with two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, 135. His other son, Joannes Hyrcanus, escaped, and succeeded his father.—4. Joannes Hyrcanus I. was high-priest 135–106. He did not assume the title of king, but was to all intents and purposes an independent monarch. Vid. Hyrcanus. He was succeeded by his son Aristobulus I.—5. Aristobulus I., was the first of the Maccabees who assumed the kingly title, which was henceforth borne by his successors. His reign lasted only a year, 106–105. Vid. Aristobulus. He was succeeded by his brother,—6. Alexander Jannæus, who reigned 105–78. Vid. Alexander, p. 42, b. He was succeeded by his widow,—7. Alexandra, who appointed her son Hyrcanus II. to the priesthood, and held the supreme power 78–69. On her death in the latter year, her son,—8. MACĔDŎNĬA (Μακεδονία: Μακεδόνες), a country in Europe, north of Greece, which is said to have derived its name from an ancient King Macedon, a son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Thyia, a daughter of Deucalion. The name first occurs in Herodotus, but its more ancient form appears to have been Macĕtia (Μακετία); and, accordingly, the Macedonians are sometimes called Macetæ. The country is said to have been originally named Emathia. The boundaries of Macedonia differed at different periods. In the time of Herodotus the name Macedonia designated only the country to the south and west of the River Lydias. The boundaries of the ancient Macedonian monarchy, before the time of Philip, the father of Alexander, were on the south Olympus and the Cambunian Mountains, which separated it from Thessaly and Epirus, on the east the River Strymon, which separated it from Thrace, and on the north and west Illyria and Pæonia, from which it was divided by no well-defined limits. Macedonia was greatly enlarged by the conquests of Philip. He added to his kingdom Pæonia on the north, so that the mountains Scordus and Orbelus now separated it from Mœsia; a part of Thrace on the east as far as the River Nestus, which Thracian district was usually called Macedonia adjecta; the peninsula Chalcidice on the south; and on the west a part of Illyria, as far as the Lake Lychnitis. On the conquest of the country by the Romans, B.C. 168, Macedonia was divided into four districts, which were quite independent of one another: 1. The country between the Strymon and the Nestus, with a part of Thrace east of the Nestus, as far as the Hebrus, and also including the territory of Heraclea Sintica and Bisaltice, west of the Strymon; the capital of this district was Amphipolis. 2. The country between the Strymon and the Axius, exclusive of those parts already named, but including Chalcidice; the capital Thessalonica. 3. The country between the Axius and Peneus; the capital Pella. 4. The mountainous country in the west; the capital Pelagonia. After the conquest of the Achæans in 146, Macedonia was formed into a Roman province, and Thessaly and Illyria were incorporated with it; but, at the same time, the district east of the Nestus was again assigned to Thrace. The Roman province of Macedonia accordingly extended from the Ægean to the Adriatic Seas, and was bounded on the south by the province of Achaia. It was originally governed by a proconsul; it was made by Tiberius one of the provinces of the Cæsar; but it was restored to the senate by Claudius. Macedonia may be described as a large plain, surrounded on three sides by lofty mountains. Through this plain, however, run many smaller ranges of mountains, between which are wide and fertile valleys, extending from the coast far into the interior. The chief mountains were SCORDUS or SCARDUS, on the northwestern frontier, toward Illyria and Dardania; further east, ORBELUS and SCOMIUS, which separated it from Mœsia; and RHODOPE, which extended from Scomius in a southeasterly direction, forming the boundary between Macedonia and Thrace. On the southern frontier were the CAMBUNII MONTES and OLYMPUS. The chief rivers were in the direction of east to west, the NESTUS, the STRYMON, the AXIUS, the largest of all, the LUDIAS or LYDIAS, and HALIACMON. The great bulk of the inhabitants of Macedonia consisted of Thracian and Illyrian tribes. At an early period some Greek tribes settled in the southern part of the country. They are said to have come from Argos, and to have been led by Gauanes, Aëropus, and Perdiccas, the three sons of Temenus the Heraclid. Perdiccas, the youngest of the brothers, was looked upon as the founder of the Macedonian monarchy. A later tradition, however, regarded Caranus, who was also a Heraclid from Argos, as the founder of the monarchy. The Greek settlers intermarried with the original inhabitants of the country. The dialect which they spoke was akin to the Doric, but it contained many barbarous words and forms; and the Macedonians were accordingly never regarded by the other Greeks as genuine Hellenes. Moreover, it was only in the south of Macedonia that the Greek language was spoken; in the north and northwest of the country the Illyrian tribes continued to speak their own language, and to preserve their ancient habits and customs. Very little is known of the history of Macedonia till the reign of Amyntas I., who was a contemporary of Darius Hystaspis, and from that time their history is more or less intimately connected with that of Greece, till at length Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, became the virtual master of the whole of Greece. The conquests of Alexander, extended the Macedonian supremacy over a great part of Asia; and the Macedonian kings continued to exercise their sovereignty over Greece till the conquest of Perseus by the Romans, 168, brought the Macedonian monarchy to a close. The details of the Macedonian history are given in the lives of the separate kings.

MACER, ÆMILĬUS. 1. A Roman poet, a native of Verona, died in Asia B.C. 16. He wrote a poem or poems upon birds, snakes, and medicinal plants, in imitation, it would appear, of the Theriaca of Nicander. (Ov., Trist., iv., 10, 43.) The work now extant, entitled "Æmilius Macer de Herbarum Virtutibus," belongs to the Middle Ages.—2. We must carefully distinguish from Æmilius Macer of Verona, a poet Macer, who wrote on the Trojan war, and who must have been alive in A.D. 12, since he is addressed by Ovid in that year (ex Pont., ii., 10, 2).—3. A Roman jurist, who lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. He wrote several works, extracts from which are given in the Digest.

MACER, CLŌDĬUS, was governor of Africa at Nero's death, A.D. 68, when he laid claim to the throne. He was murdered at the instigation of Galba by the procurator Trebonius Garucianus.

MACER, LICINĬUS. Vid. LICINIUS.

MACESTUS (Μάκεστος: now Simaul-Su, and lower Susugherli), a considerable river of Mysia, rises in the northwest of Phrygia, and flows north through Mysia into the Rhyndacus. It is probably the same river which Polybius (v., 77) calls Megistus (Μέγιστος).

[MACHÆREUS (Μαχαιρεύς), son of Dætas of Delphi, is said to have slain Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, in a quarrel about the sacrificial meat at Delphi.]

MACHÆRŪS (Μαχαιροῦς: Μαχαιρίτης), a strong border fortress in the south of Peræa, in Palestine, on the confines of the Nabathæi: a stronghold of the Sicarii in the Jewish war. A tradition made it the place where John the Baptist was beheaded.

MACHANĬDAS, tyrant of Lacedæmon, succeeded Lycurgus about B.C. 210. Like his predecessor, he had no hereditary title to the crown, but ruled by the swords of his mercenaries alone. He was defeated and slain in battle by Philopœmen, the general of the Achæan league, in 207.

MACHĀON (Μαχάων), son of Æsculapius, was married to Anticlea, the daughter of Diocles, by whom he became the father of Gorgasus, Nicomachus, Alexanor, Sphyrus, and Polemocrates. Together with his brother Podalirius, he went to Troy with thirty ships, commanding the men who came from Tricca, Ithome, and Œchalia. In this war he acted as the surgeon of the Greeks, and also distinguished himself in battle. He was himself wounded by Paris, but was carried from the field by Nestor. Later writers mention him as one of the Greek heroes who were concealed in the wooden horse, and he is said to have cured Philoctetes. He was killed by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus, and he received divine honors at Gerenia, in Messenia.

[MACHARES (Μαχάρης), son of Mithradates the Great, was appointed by his father king of Bosporus. After the repeated defeats of Mithradates by the Romans, Machares proved a traitor, and sent supplies to Lucullus: his father, though hard pressed by the Roman troops, marched against Machares, and the latter put himself to death to avoid falling into his enraged father's hands.]

MACHLȲES (Μάχλυες), a people of Libya, near the Lotophagi, on the western side of the Lake Triton, in what was afterward called Africa Propria.

MACHON (Μάχων), of Corinth or Sicyon, a comic poet, flourished at Alexandrea, where he gave instructions respecting comedy to the grammarian Aristophanes of Byzantium. [Two or three fragments remain, which are given by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 1133–4, edit. minor.]

MACISTUS or MACISTUM (Μάκιστος, Μάκιστον: Μακίστιος), an ancient town of Elis in Triphylia, northeast of Lepreum, originally called Platanistus (Πλατανιστοῦς), and founded by the Caucones.

MACORĂBA (Μακοράβα: now Mecca), a city in the west of Arabia Felix; probably the sacred city of the Arabs, even before the time of Mohammed, and the seat of the worship of Alitat or Alitta under the emblem of a meteoric stone.

MACRA (now Magra), a small river rising in the Apennines and flowing into the Ligurian Sea near Luna, which, from the time of Augustus, formed the boundary between Liguria and Etruria.

MACRIĀNUS one of the thirty tyrants, a distinguished general, who accompanied Valerian in his expedition against the Persians, A.D. 260. On the capture of that monarch, Macrianus was proclaimed emperor, together with his two sons Macrianus and Quietus. He assigned the management of affairs in the East to Quietus, and set out with the younger Macrianus for Italy. They were encountered by Aureolus on the confines of Thrace and Illyria, defeated and slain, 262. Quietus was shortly afterward slain in the East by Odenathus.

MACRĪNUS, M. OPILĬUS SEVĒRUS, Roman emperor, April, A.D. 217–June, 218. He was born at Cæsarea in Mauretania, of humble parents, A.D. 164, and rose at length to be præfect of the prætorians under Caracalla. He accompanied Caracalla in his expedition against the Parthians, and was proclaimed emperor after the death of Caracalla, whom he had caused to be assassinated. He conferred the title of Cæsar upon his son Diadumenianus, and at the same time gained great popularity by repealing some obnoxious taxes. But in the course of the same year he was defeated with great loss by the Parthians, and was obliged to retire into Syria. While here, his soldiers, with whom he had become unpopular by enforcing among them order and discipline, were easily seduced from their allegiance, and proclaimed Elagabalus as emperor. With the troops which remained faithful to him, Macrinus marched against the usurper, but was defeated, and fled in disguise. He was shortly afterward seized in Chalcedon, and put to death, after a reign of fourteen months.

[MACRIS (Μακρίς), another name for the island Helena. Vid. HELENA.]

MACRO, NÆVĬUS SERTORĬUS, a favorite of the Emperor Tiberius, was employed to arrest the powerful Sejanus in A.D. 31. On the death of the latter he was made præfect of the prætorians, an office which he continued to hold for the remainder of Tiberius's reign and during the earlier part of Caligula's. Macro was as cruel as Sejanus. He laid informations; he presided at the rack; and he lent himself to the most savage caprices of Tiberius during the last and worst period of his government. During the lifetime of Tiberius he paid court to the young Caligula; and he promoted an intrigue between his wife Ennia and the young prince. It was rumored that Macro shortened the last moments of Tiberius by stifling him with the bedding as he recovered unexpectedly from a swoon. But Caligula soon became jealous of Macro, and compelled him to kill himself with his wife and children, 38.

MACRŎBĬI (Μακρόβιοι, i. e., Long-lived), an Æthiopian people in Africa, placed by Herodotus (iii., 17) on the shores of the Southern Ocean. It is in vain to attempt their accurate identification with any known people.

MACROBĬUS, the grammarian, whose full name was Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius Macrobius. All we know about him is that he lived in the age of Honorius and Theodosius, that he was probably a Greek, and that he had a son named Eustathius. He states in the preface to his Saturnalia that Latin was to him a foreign tongue, and hence we may fairly conclude that he was a Greek by birth, more especially as we find numerous Greek idioms in his style. He was probably a pagan. His extant works are, 1. Saturnaliorum Conviviorum Libri VII., consisting of a series of dissertations on history, mythology, criticism, and various points of antiquarian research, supposed to have been delivered during the holidays of the Saturnalia at the house of Vettius Prætextatus, who was invested with the highest offices of state under Valentinian and Valens. The form of the work is avowedly copied from the dialogues of Plato, especially the Banquet: in substance it bears a strong resemblance to the Noctes Atticæ of A. Gellius. The first book treats of the festivals of Saturnus and Janus, of the Roman calendar, &c. The second book commences with a collection of bon mots, ascribed to the most celebrated wits of antiquity; to these are appended a series of essays on matters connected with the pleasures of the table. The four following books are devoted to criticisms on Virgil. The seventh book is of a more miscellaneous character than the preceding. 2. Commentarius ex Cicerone in Somnium Scipionis, a tract much studied during the Middle Ages. The Dream of Scipio, contained in the sixth book of Cicero's De Republica, is taken as a text, which suggests a succession of discourses on the physical constitution of the universe, according to the views of the New Platonists, together with notices of some of their peculiar tenets on mind as well as matter. 3. De Differentiis et Societatibus Græci Latinique Verbi, a treatise purely grammatical, of which only an abridgment is extant, compiled by a certain Joannes. The best editions of the works of Macrobius are by Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1670, and by Zeunius, Lips., 1774: [the first volume of a new and more copious critical edition was published at Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1848, edited by Lud. Janus.]

MACRŌNES (Μάκρωνες), a powerful and warlike Caucasian people on the northeastern shore of the Pontus Euxinus.

MACTŌRĬUM (Μακτώριον : Μακτωρῖνος), a town in the south of Sicily, near Gela.

MACȲNĬA (Μακυνία : Μακυνεύς), a town in the south of Ætolia, near the mountain Taphiassus, east of Calydon and the Evenus.

[MADAURA or MADURUS (Μάδουρος), a town in northern Numidia, near Tagaste, not to be confounded with MEDAURA.]

MADIANĪTÆ (Μαδιανῖται, Μαδιηναῖοι, Μαδιηνοί: in the Old Testament, Midianim), a powerful nomad people in the south of Arabia Petræa, about the head of the Red Sea. They carried on a caravan trade between Arabia and Egypt, and were troublesome enemies of the Israelites until they were conquered by Gideon. They do not appear in history after the Babylonish captivity.

[MADYAS (Μαδύας, Ion. Μαδύης), a king of the Scythians, under whom they overran Asia and advanced as far as Egypt: he is called by Strabo IDANTHYRSUS.]

MADȲTUS (Μάδυτος : Μαδύτιος : now Maito), a sea-port town on the Thracian Chersonesus.

Al[...] though it is unknown where Mæcenas received [...] his education, it must doubtless have been a [...] careful one. We learn from Horace that he [...] was versed both in Greek and Roman literature; and his taste for literary pursuits was shown not only by his patronage of the most eminent poets of his time, but also by several performances of his own, both in verse and prose. It has been conjectured that he became acquainted with Augustus at Apollonia before the death of Julius Cæsar; but he is mentioned for the first time in B.C. 40, and from this year his name constantly occurs as one of the chief friends and ministers of Augustus. Thus we find him employed in B.C. 37 in negotiating with Antony; and it was probably on this occasion that Horace accompanied him to Brundisium, a journey which he has described in the fifth satire of the first book. During the war with Antony, which was brought to a close by the battle of Actium, Mæcenas remained at Rome, being intrusted with the administration of the civil affairs of Italy. During this time he suppressed the conspiracy of the younger Lepidus. Mæcenas was not present at the battle of Actium, as some critics have supposed; and the first epode of Horace probably does not relate at all to Actium, but to the Sicilian expedition against Sextus Pompeius. On the return of Augustus from Actium, Mæcenas enjoyed a greater share of his favor than ever, and, in conjunction with Agrippa, had the management of all public affairs. It is related that Augustus at this time took counsel with Agrippa and Mæcenas respecting the expediency of restoring the republic; that Agrippa advised him to pursue that course, but that Mæcenas strongly urged him to establish the empire. For many years Mæcenas continued to preserve the uninterrupted favor of Augustus; but, between B.C. 21 and 16, a coolness, to say the least, had sprung up between the emperor and his faithful minister, and after the latter year he retired entirely from public life. The cause of this estrangement is enveloped in doubt. Dion Cassius positively attributes it to an intrigue carried on by Augustus with Terentia, Mæcenas's wife. Mæcenas died B.C. 8, and was buried on the Esquiline. He left no children, and he bequeathed his property to Augustus. Mæcenas had amassed an enormous fortune. He had purchased a tract of ground on the Esquiline Hill, which had formerly served as a burial-place for the lower orders. (Hor., Sat., i., 8, 7.) Here he had planted a garden, and built a house, remarkable for its loftiness, on account of a tower by which it was surmounted, and from the top of which Nero is said to have afterward contemplated the burning of Rome. In this residence he seems to have passed the greater part of his time, and to have visited the country but seldom. His house was the rendezvous of all the wits of Rome; and whoever could contribute to the amusement of the company was always welcome to a seat at his table. But his really intimate friends consisted of the greatest geniuses and most learned men of Rome; and if it was from his universal inclination toward men of talent that he obtained the reputation of a literary patron, it was by his friendship for such poets as Virgil and Horace that he deserved it. Virgil was indebted to him for the recovery of his farm, which had been appropriated by the soldiery in the division of lands in B.C. 41; and it was at the request of Mæcenas that he undertook the Georgics, the most finished of all his poems. To Horace he was a still greater benefactor. He presented him with the means of a comfortable subsistence, a farm in the Sabine country. If the estate was but a moderate one, we learn from Horace himself that the bounty of Mæcenas was regulated by his own contented views, and not by his patron's want of generosity. (Carm., iii., 16, 38.) Of Mæcenas's own literary productions only a few fragments exist. From these, however, and from the notices which we find of his writings in ancient authors, we are led to think that we have not suffered any great loss by their destruction; for, although a good judge of literary merit in others, he does not appear to have been an author of much taste himself. In his way of life Mæcenas was addicted to every species of luxury. We find several allusions in the ancient authors to the effeminacy of his dress. He was fond of theatrical entertainments, especially pantomimes, as may be inferred from his patronage of Bathyllus, the celebrated dancer, who was a freedman of his. That moderation of character which led him to be content with his equestrian rank, probably arose from his love of ease and luxury, or it might have been the result of more prudent and politic views. As a politician, the principal trait in his character was fidelity to his master, and the main end of all his cares was the consolidation of the empire; but, at the same time, he recommended Augustus to put no check on the free expression of public opinion, and, above all, to avoid that cruelty which for so many years had stained the Roman annals with blood.

MÆDĬCA (Μαιδική), the country of the Mædi, a powerful people in the west of Thrace, on the western bank of the Strymon, and the southern slope of Mount Scomius. They frequently made inroads into the country of the Macedonians, till at length they were conquered by the latter people, and their land incorporated with Macedonia, of which it formed the northeastern district.

MÆLIUS, SP., the richest of the plebeian knights, employed his fortune in buying up corn in Etruria in the great famine at Rome in B.C. 440. This corn he sold to the poor at a small price, or distributed it gratuitously. Such liberality gained him the favor of the plebeians, but, at the same time, exposed him to the hatred of the ruling class. Accordingly, in the following year he was accused of having formed a conspiracy for the purpose of seizing the kingly power. Thereupon Cincinnatus was appointed dictator, and C. Servilius Ahala the master of the horse. Mælius was summoned to appear before the tribunal of the dictator; but as he refused to go, Ahala, with an armed band of patrician youths, rushed into the crowd and slew him. His property was confiscated, and his house pulled down; its vacant site, which was called the Æquimælium, continued to subsequent ages a memorial of his fate. Later ages fully believed the story of Mælius's conspiracy, and Cicero repeatedly praises the glorious deed of Ahala. But his guilt is very doubtful. None of the alleged accomplices of Mælius were punished and Ahala was brought to trial. and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile.

Mænăca (Μαινάκη), a town in the south of Hispania Bætica, on the coast, the most westerly colony of the Phocæans.

Mænădes (Μαινάδες), a name of the Bacchantes, from μαίνομαι, "to be mad," because they were phrensied in the worship of Dionysus or Bacchus.

Mænălus (τὸ Μαίναλον or Μαινάλιον ὄρος: now Roinon), a mountain in Arcadia, which extended from Megalopolis to Tegea, was celebrated as the favorite haunt of the god Pan. From this mountain the surrounding country was called Mænălia (Μαιναλία); and on the mountain was a town Mænalus. The mountain was so celebrated that the Roman poets frequently use the adjectives Mænalius and Mænalis as equivalent to Arcadian.

Mænĭus. 1. C., consul B.C. 338, with L. Furius Camillus. The two consuls completed the subjugation of Latium; they were both rewarded with a triumph; and equestrian statues were erected to their honor in the forum. The statue of Mænius was placed upon a column, which is spoken of by later writers under the name of Columna Mænia, and which appears to have stood near the end of the forum, on the Capitoline. Mænius was dictator in 320, and censor in 318. In his censorship he allowed balconies to be added to the various buildings surrounding the forum, in order that the spectators might obtain more room for beholding the games which were exhibited in the forum; and these balconies were called after him Mæniana (sc. ædificia).—2. The proposer of the law, about 286, which required the patres to give their sanction to the election of the magistrates before they had been elected, or, in other words, to confer, or agree to confer, the imperium on the person whom the comitia should elect.—3. A contemporary of Lucilius, was a great spendthrift, who squandered all his property, and afterward supported himself by playing the buffoon. He possessed a house in the forum, which Cato in his censorship (184) purchased of him, for the purpose of building the basilica Porcia. Some of the scholiasts on Horace ridiculously relate, that when Mænius sold his house, he reserved for himself one column, the Columna Mænia, from which he built a balcony, that he might thence witness the games. The true origin of the Columna Mænia, and of the balconies called Mæniana, has been explained above. (Hor., Sat., i., 1, 101; i., 3, 21; Epist., i., 15, 26.)

Mæon (Μαίων). 1. Son of Hæmon of Thebes. He and Lycophontes were the leaders of the band that lay in ambush against Tydeus, in the war of the Seven against Thebes. Mæon was the only one whose life was spared by Tydeus. Mæon, in return, buried Tydeus when the latter was slain.—2. Husband of Dindyme, the mother of Cybele.—[3. Mæŏnĭdes (Μαιονίδης), i. e., Homer, because he was a son of Mæon, or because he was a native of Mæonia, the ancient name of Lydia. Hence he is also called Mæonius and his poems the Mæoniæ chartæ, or Mæonium carmen. Mæŏnis also occurs as a surname of Omphale, and of Arachne, because both were Lydians.

Mæōtæ. Vid. Mæotis Palus.

Mæōtis Pălus (ἡ Μαιῶτις λίμνη: now Sea of Azov), an inland sea on the borders of Europe and Asia, north of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), with which it communicates by the Bosporus Cimmerius. Its form may be described roughly as a triangle, with its vertex at its northeastern extremity, where it receives the waters of the great river Tanaïs (now Don); it discharges its superfluous water by a constant current into the Euxine. The ancients had very vague notions of its true form and size: the earlier geographers thought that both it and the Caspian Sea were gulfs of the great Northern Ocean. The Scythian tribes on its banks were called by the collective name of Mæotæ or Mæotici (Μαιῶται, Μαιωτικοί). The sea had also the names of Cimmerium or Bosporicum Mare. Æschylus (Prom., 731) applies the name Mæotic Strait to the Cimmerian Bosporus (αὐλῶν' Μαιωτικόν).

Mæra (Μαῖρα). 1. The dog of Icarius, the father of Erigone. Vid. Icarius, No. 1.—2. Daughter of Prœtus and Antea, a companion of Diana (Artemis), by whom she was killed, after she had become by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of Locrus. Others state that she died a virgin. —3. Daughter of Atlas, was married to Tegeates, the son of Lycaon. Her tomb was shown both at Tegea and Mantinea in Arcadia.

Mæsa, Julia, sister-in-law of Septimius Severus, aunt of Caracalla, and grandmother of Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. She was a native of Emesa in Syria, and seems, after the elevation of Septimius Severus, the husband of her sister Julia Domna, to have lived at the imperial court until the death of Caracalla, and to have accumulated great wealth. She contrived and executed the plot which transferred the supreme power from Macrinus to her grandson Elagabalus. When she foresaw the downfall of the latter, she prevailed on him to adopt his cousin Alexander Severus. By Severus she was always treated with the greatest respect; she enjoyed the title of Augusta during her life, and received divine honors after her death.

Magăba, a mountain in Galatia, ten Roman miles east of Ancyra.

Magas (Μάγας), king of Cyrene, was a stepson of Ptolemy Soter, being the offspring of Berenice by a former marriage. He was a Macedonian by birth; and he seems to have accompanied his mother to Egypt, where he soon rose to a high place in the favor of Ptolemy. In B.C. 308 he was appointed by the monarch to the command of the expedition destined for the recovery of Cyrene after the death of Ophellas. The enterprise was completely successful, and Magas obtained from his stepfather the government of the province. At first he ruled over the province only as a dependency of Egypt, but after the death of Ptolemy Soter he not only assumed the character of an independent monarch, but even made war on the King of Egypt. He married Apama, daughter of Antiochus Soter, by whom he had a daughter, Berenice, afterward the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes. He died 258.

[MAGDĂLA (Μάγδαλα: Μαγδαληνός, probably the Old Testament Migdal-El: now El-Meydel), a village of Palestine, on the Sea of Galilee, probably on the western shore, where the modern El-Meydel stands.]

MAGDŎLUM (Μάγδολον, Μάγδωλον: in the Old Testament, Migdol), a city of Lower Egypt, near the northeastern frontier, about twelve miles southwest of Pelusium: where Pharaoh Necho defeated the Syrians, according to Herodotus (ii., 159).

MAGETOBRIA (now Moigte de Broie, on the Saone), a town on the western frontiers of the Sequani, near which the Gauls were defeated by the Germans shortly before Cæsar's arrival in Gaul.

MAGI (Μάγοι), the name of the order of priests and religious teachers among the Medes and Persians, is said to be derived from the Persian word mag, mog, or mugh, i. e., a priest. There is strong evidence that a class similar to the Magi, and in some cases bearing the same name, existed among other Eastern nations, especially the Chaldæans of Babylon; nor is it at all probable that either the Magi, or their religion, were of strictly Median or Persian origin; but, in classical literature, they are presented to us almost exclusively in connection with Medo-Persian history. Herodotus represents them as one of the six tribes into which the Median people were divided. Under the Median empire, before the supremacy passed to the Persians, they were so closely connected with the throne, and had so great an influence in the state, that they evidently retained their position after the revolution; and they had power enough to be almost successful in the attempt they made to overthrow the Persian dynasty after the death of Cambyses, by putting forward one of their own number as a pretender to the throne, alleging that he was Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, who had been put to death by his brother Cambyses. It is clear that this was a plot to restore the Median supremacy; but whether it arose from mere ambition, or from any diminution of the power of the Magi under the vigorous government of Cyrus, can not be said with certainty. The defeat of this Magian conspiracy by Darius the son of Hystaspes and the other Persian nobles was followed by a general massacre of the Magi, which was celebrated by an annual festival (τὰ Μαγοφόνια), during which no Magian was permitted to appear in public. Still their position as the only ministers of religion remained unaltered. The breaking up of the Persian empire must have greatly altered their condition; but they still continue to appear in history down to the time of the later Roman empire. The "wise men" who came from the East to Jerusalem at the time of our Saviour's birth were Magi (μάγοι is their name in the original, Matt., ii., 1). Simon, who had deceived the people of Samaria before Philip preached to them (Acts viii.), and Elymas, who tried to hinder the conversion of Sergius Paulus at Cyprus (Acts, xiii.), are both called Magians; but in these cases the words μάγος and μαγεύων are used in a secondary sense, for a person who pretends to the wisdom, or practices the arts of the Magi. This use of the name occurs very early among the Greeks, and from it we get our word magic (ἡ μαγική, i. e., the art or science of the Magi). The constitution of the Magi as an order is ascribed by tradition to Zoroastres, or Zoroaster as the Greeks and Romans called him, the Zarathustra of the Zendavesta (the sacred books of the ancient Persians), and the Zerdusht of the modern Persians; but whether he was their founder, their reformer, or the mythical representative of their unknown origin, can not be decided. He is said to have restored the true knowledge of the supreme good principle (Ormuzd), and to have taught his worship to the Magi, whom he divided into three classes, learners, masters, and perfect scholars. They alone could teach the truths and perform the ceremonies of religion, foretell the future, interpret dreams and omens, and ascertain the will of Ormuzd by the arts of divination. They had three chief methods of divination, by calling up the dead, by cups or dishes, and by waters. The forms of worship and divination were strictly defined, and were handed down among the Magi by tradition. Like all early priesthoods, they seem to have been the sole possessors of all the science of their age. To be instructed in their learning was esteemed the highest of privileges, and was permitted, with rare exceptions, to none but the princes of the royal family. Their learning became celebrated at an early period in Greece, by the name of μάγεια, and was made the subject of speculation by the philosophers, whose knowledge of it seems, however, to have been very limited; while their high pretensions, and the tricks by which their knowledge of science enabled them to impose upon the ignorant, soon attached to their name among the Greeks and Romans that bad meaning which is still commonly connected with the words derived from it. Besides being priests and men of learning, the Magi appear to have discharged judicial functions.

MAGNENTĬUS, Roman emperor in the West, A.D. 350–353, whose full name was FLAVIUS POPILIUS MAGNENTIUS. He was a German by birth, and after serving as a common soldier was eventually intrusted by Constans, the son of Constantine the Great, with the command of the Jovian and Herculian battalions who had replaced the ancient prætorian guards when the empire was remodelled by Diocletian. He availed himself of his position to organize a conspiracy against the weak and profligate Constans, who was put to death by his emissaries. Magnentius thereupon was acknowledged as emperor in all the Western provinces except Illyria, where Vetranio had assumed the purple. Constantius hurried from the frontier of Persia to crush the usurpers. Vetranio submitted to Constantius at Sardica in December, 350. Magnentius was first defeated by Constantius at the sanguinary battle of Mursa on the Drave, in the autumn of 351, and was obliged to fly into Gaul. He was defeated a second time in the passes of the Cottian Alps, and put an end to his own life about the middle of August, 353. Magnentius was a man of commanding stature and great bodily strength; but not one spark of virtue relieved the blackness of his career as a sovereign. The power which he obtained by treachery and murder he maintained by extortion and cruelty.

Magnes (Μάγνης), one of the most important of the earlier Athenian comic poets of the old comedy, was a native of the demus of Icaria or Icarius in Attica. He flourished B.C. 460 and onward, and died at an advanced age, shortly before the representation of the Knights of Aristophanes, that is, in 423. (Aristoph., Equit., 524.) His plays contained a great deal of coarse buffoonery. [A few fragments of his plays are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc., vol. i., p. 5-6.]

Magnēsĭa (Μαγνησία: Μάγνης, pl. Μάγνητες). 1. The most easterly district of Thessaly, was a long, narrow slip of country, extending from the Peneus on the north to the Pagasæan Gulf on the south, and bounded on the west by the great Thessalian plain. It was a mountainous country, as it comprehended the Mounts Ossa and Pelion. Its inhabitants, the Magnetes, are said to have founded the two cities in Asia mentioned below.—2. M. ad Sipÿlum (M. πρὸς Σιπύλῳ or ὑπὸ Σιπύλῳ: ruins at Manissa), a city in the northwest of Lydia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of the northwest declivity of Mount Sipylus, and on the south bank of the Hermus, is famous in history as the scene of the victory gained by the two Scipios over Antiochus the Great, which secured to the Romans the empire of the East, B.C. 190. After the Mithradatic war, the Romans made it a libera civitas. It suffered, with other cities of Asia Minor, from the great earthquake in the reign of Tiberius; but it was still a place of importance in the fifth century.—3. M. ad Mæandrum (M. ἡ πρὸς Μαιάνδρῳ, M. ἐπὶ Μαιάνδρῳ: ruins at Inek-bazar), a city in the southwest of Lydia, in Asia Minor, was situated on the River Lethæus, a northern tributary of the Mæander. It was destroyed by the Cimmerians (probably about B.C. 700) and rebuilt by colonists from Miletus, so that it became an Ionian city by race as well as position. It was one of the cities given to Themistocles by Artaxerxes. It was celebrated for its temple of Artemis Leucophryne, one of the most beautiful in Asia Minor, the ruins of which still exist.

Magnŏpŏlis (Μαγνόπολις), or Eupatoria Magnopolis, a city of Pontus, in Asia Minor, near the confluence of the rivers Lycus and Iris, begun by Mithradates Eupator and finished by Pompey, but probably destroyed before very long.

Mago (Μάγων). 1. A Carthaginian, s[aid to] have been the founder of the military pow[er of] that city, by introducing a regular disc[ipline] and organization into her armies. He [flour]ished from B.C. 550 to 500, and was pr[obably] the father of Hasdrubal, who was slain i[n the] battle against Gelo at Himera. Vid. H[AMIL]CAR, No. 1.—2. Commander of the Carthag[inian] fleet under Himilco in the war against Di[onys]ius, 396. When Himilco returned to A[frica] after the disastrous termination of the ex[pedi]tion, Mago appears to have been invested [with] the chief command in Sicily. He carried o[n the] war with Dionysius, but in 392 was comp[elled] to conclude a treaty of peace, by which he a[ban]doned his allies the Sicilians to the power of [Dio]nysius. In 383 he again invaded Sicily, but [was] defeated by Dionysius and slain in battle.[—3.] Commander of the Carthaginian army in Sic[ily,] 344. He assisted Hicetas in the war again[st Ti]moleon; but, becoming apprehensive of tre[ach]ery, he sailed away to Carthage. Here he [put] an end to his own life, to avoid a worse fa[te at] the hands of his countrymen, who neverthe[less] crucified his lifeless body.—4. Son of Hami[lcar] Barca, and youngest brother of the famous H[an]nibal. He accompanied Hannibal to Italy, a[nd] after the battle of Cannæ (216) carried the ne[ws] of this great victory to Carthage; but, inst[ead] of returning to Italy, he was sent into Sp[ain] with a considerable force to the support of [his] other brother Hasdrubal, who was hard press[ed] by the two Scipios (215). He continued in t[hat] country for many years; and after his broth[er] Hasdrubal quitted Spain in 208, in order [to] march to the assistance of Hannibal in Italy, the command in Spain devolved upon him a[nd] upon Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. After th[e] decisive defeat by Scipio at Silpia in 206, Mago retired to Gades, and subsequently passed the winter in the lesser of the Balearic Islands, where the memory of his sojourn is still preserved in the name of the celebrated harbor, Portus Magonis, or Port Mahon. Early in the ensuing summer (205) Mago landed in Liguria, where he surprised the town of Genoa. Here he maintained himself for two years, but in 203 he was defeated with great loss in Cisalpine Gaul by Quintilius Varus, and was himself severely wounded. Shortly afterward he embarked his troops in order to return to Africa, but he died of his wound before reaching Africa. Cornelius Nepos, in opposition to all other authorities, represents Mago as surviving the battle of Zama, and says that he perished in a shipwreck, or was assassinated by his slaves.—5. Majoriānus, Jūlius Valērius, Roman emperor in the West, A.D. 457–461, was raised to the empire by Ricimer. His reign was chiefly occupied in making preparations to invade the Vandals in Africa; but the immense fleet which he had collected for this purpose in the harbor of New Carthage in Spain was destroyed by the Vandals in 460. Thereupon he concluded a peace with Genseric. His activity and popularity excited the jealousy of Ricimer, who compelled him to abdicate, and then put an end to his life.

Malĕlas or Malălas, Joannes (Ἰωάννης ὁ Μαλέλα or Μαλάλα), a native of Antioch, and a Byzantine historian, lived shortly after Justinian the Great. The word Malalas signifies in Syriac an orator. He wrote a chronicle of universal history from the creation of the world to the reign of Justinian inclusive. Edited by Dindorf, Bonn, 1831.

Mamæa, Julĭa, a native of Emesa in Syria, was daughter of Julia Mæsa, and mother of Alexander Severus. She was a woman of integrity and virtue, and brought up her son with the utmost care. She was put to death by the soldiers along with her son, A.D. 235.

Mamercus. 1. Son of King Numa according to one tradition, and son of Mars and Silvia according to another.—2. Tyrant of Catana, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, B.C. 344

After his defeat by Timoleon he fled to Messana, and took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. But when Timoleon laid siege to Messana, Hippon took to flight, and Mamercus surrendered, stipulating only for a regular trial before the Syracusans. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly of the people there, he was condemned by acclamation, and executed like a common malefactor.

MAMERCUS or MAMERCĪNUS, ÆMĬLĬUS, a distinguished patrician family which professed to derive its name from Mamercus in the reign of Numa. 1. L., thrice consul, namely, B.C. 484, 478, 473.—2. TIB., twice consul, 470 and 467. —3. MAM., thrice dictator, 437, 433, and 426. In his first dictatorship he carried on war against the Veientines and Fidenæ. Lar Tolumnius, the king of Veii, is said to have been killed in single combat in this year by Cornelius Cossus. In his second dictatorship Æmilius carried a law limiting to eighteen months the duration of the censorship, which had formerly lasted for five years. This measure was received with great approbation by the people; but the censors then in office were so enraged at it that they removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an ærarian.—4. L., a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, was twice consul, 341 and 329, and once dictator, 335. In his second consulship he took Privernum, and hence received the surname of Privernas.

MAMĬLĬA GENS, plebeian, was originally a distinguished family in Tusculum. They traced their name and origin to Mamilia, the daughter of Telegonus, the founder of Tusculum, and the son of Ulysses and the goddess Circe. It was to a member of this family, Octavius Mamilius, that Tarquinius betrothed his daughter; and on his expulsion from Rome he took refuge with his son-in-law, who, according to the beautiful lay preserved by Livy, roused the Latin people against the infant republic, and perished in the great battle at the Lake Regillus. In B.C. 458, the Roman citizenship was given to L. Mamilius, the dictator of Tusculum, because he had two years before marched to the assistance of the city when it was attacked by Herdonius. The gens was divided into three families, Limetanus, Turrinus, and Vitulus, but none of them became of much importance.

MANES, the general name by which the Romans designated the souls of the departed; but as it is a natural tendency to consider the souls of departed friends as blessed spirits, the Manes

Manetho (Μανεθώς or Μανεθών), an Egyptian est of the town of Sebennytus, who lived in reign of the first Ptolemy. He was the first yptian who gave in the Greek language an ount of the religion and history of his coun-
. He based his information upon the ancient ds of the Egyptians themselves, and more cially upon their sacred books. The work which he gave an account of the theology of Egyptians, and of the origin of the gods and world, bore the title of Τῶν Φυσικῶν Ἐπι-. His historical work was entitled a Hisy of Egypt. It was divided into three parts books. The first contained the history of country previous to the thirty dynasties, or at may be termed the mythology of Egypt, l also of the first dynasties. The second ned with the eleventh, twelfth, and conclul with the nineteenth dynasty. The third ve the history of the remaining eleven dynas-s, and concluded with an account of Necta-bus, the last of the native Egyptian kings.
e work of Manetho is lost; but a list of the nasties is preserved in Julius Africanus and sebius (most correct in the Armenian ver-on), who, however, has introduced various in-rpolations. According to the calculation of anetho, the thirty dynasties, beginning with enes, filled a period of three thousand five ndred and fifty-five years. The lists of the gyptian kings and the duration of their seval reigns were undoubtedly derived by him
m genuine documents, and their correctness, far as they are not interpolated, is said to be nfirmed by the hieroglyphic inscriptions on e monuments. There exists an astrological em, entitled Ἀποτελεσματικά, in six books, hich bears the name of Manetho; but this em is spurious, and can not have been written fore the fifth century of our era. Edited by his bill was warmly opposed by Q. Catulus, al party, but was supported by Cicero in an ation which has come down to us. At the end of his year Manilius was brought to trial by the aristocratical party, and was condemned, but we do not know of what offence he was accused.—3. Also called Manlius or Mallius, a Roman poet of uncertain age, but is conjectur ed to have lived in the time of Augustus. He is the author of an astrological poem in five books, entitled Astronomica. The style of this poem is extremely faulty, being harsh and obscure, and abounding in repetitions and in forced metaphors. But the author seems to have consulted the best authorities, and to have adopted their most sagacious views. The best edition is by Bentley, Lond., 1739.

Manlĭus, M., consul B.C. 392, took refuge in the Capitol when Rome was taken by the Gauls in 390. One night, when the Gauls endeavored to ascend the Capitol, Manlius was roused from his sleep by the cackling of his geese; collecting hastily a body of men, he succeeded in driving back the enemy, who had just reached the summit of the hill. From this heroic deed he is said to have received the surname of Capi tolinus. In 395 he defended the cause of the plebeians, who were suffering severely from their debts, and from the harsh and cruel treatment of their patrician creditors. The patricians accused him of aspiring to royal power, and he was thrown into prison by the dictator Cornelius Cossus. The plebeians put on mourn ing for their champion, and were ready to take up arms in his behalf. The patricians, in alarm, liberated Manlius; but this act of concession only made him bolder, and he now did not scruple to instigate the plebeians to open violence. In the following year the patricians charged him with high treason, and brought him before the people assembled in the Campus Mar-tius; but as the Capitol which had once been saved by him could be seen from this place, the court was removed to the Pœtelinian grove, outside the Porta Nomentana. Here Manlius was condemned, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian Rock. The members of the Manlia gens accordingly resolved that none of them should ever bear in future the prænomen of Marcus.

Mannus, a son of Tuisco, was regarded by the ancient Germans, along with his father, as the founders of their race. They further ascribed to Mannus three sons, from whom the three tribes of the Ingævones, Hermiones, and Istævones derived their names.

Mantinēa (Μαντίνεια: Μαντινεύς: now Pa-leopoli), one of the most ancient and important towns in Arcadia, situated on the small river Ophis, near the centre of the eastern frontier of the country. It is celebrated in history for the great battle fought under its walls between the Spartans and Thebans, in which Epaminondas fell B.C. 362. According to tradition, Manti sea was founded by Mantineus, the son of Lycaon, but it was formed in reality out of the union of four or five hamlets. Till the foundation of Megalopolis, it was the largest city in Arcadia, and it long exercised a kind of supremacy over the other Arcadian towns; but in the Peloponnesian war the Spartans attacked the city, and destroyed it by turning the waters of the Ophis against its walls, which were built of bricks. After the battle of Leuctra the city recovered its independence. At a later period it joined the Achæan league, but, notwithstanding, formed a close connection with its old enemy Sparta, in consequence of which it was severely punished by Aratus, who put to death its leading citizens and sold the rest of its inhabitants as slaves. It never recovered the effects of this blow. Its name was now changed into Antigonia, in honor of Antigonus Doson, who had assisted Aratus in his campaign against the town. The Emperor Hadrian restored to the place its ancient appellation, and rebuilt part of it in honor of his favorite Antinous, the Bithynian, who derived his family from Mantinea.

[MANTĬTHEUS (Μαντίθεος), an Athenian, the companion of Alcibiades in his escape from Sardis B.C. 411: in B.C. 408 he was one of the ambassadors sent from Athens to Darius; but he and his colleagues were given up to Cyrus, and kept in custody three years.]

MANTĬUS (Μαντίος), son of Melampus, and brother of Antiphates. Vid. MELAMPUS.

MANTO (Μαντώ, -οῦς). 1. Daughter of the Theban soothsayer Tiresias, was herself prophetess of the Ismenian Apollo at Thebes. After the capture of Thebes by the Epigoni, she was sent to Delphi with other captives, as an offering to Apollo, and there became the prophetess of this god. Apollo afterward sent her and her companions to Asia, where they founded the sanctuary of Apollo near the place where the town of Colophon was afterward built. Rhacius, a Cretan, who had settled there, married Manto, and became by her the father of Mopsus. According to Euripides, she had previously become the mother of Amphilochus and Tisiphone, by Alcmæon, the leader of the Epigoni. Being a prophetess of Apollo, she is also called Daphne, i. e., the laurel virgin.—2. Daughter of Hercules, was likewise a prophetess, and the person from whom the town of Mantua received its name. (Virg., Æn., x., 199.)

MANTŬA (Mantuānus: now Mantua). 1. A town in Gallia Transpadana, on an island in the River Mincius, was not a place of importance, but is celebrated because Virgil, who was born at the neighboring village of Andes, regarded Mantua as his birth-place. It was originally an Etruscan city, and is said to have derived its name from Manto, the daughter of Tiresias.—[2. Now probably Mondejar), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, by some erroneously regarded as Madrid.]

MARACANDA (τὰ Μαράκανδα: now Samarkand), the capital of the Persian province of Sogdiana, in the northern part of the country, was seventy stadia (seven geographical miles) in circuit. It was here that Alexander the Great killed [illegible] friend CLITUS.

MARAPHĬI (Μαράφιοι), one of the three no[illegible] tribes of the Persians, standing, with the [illegible] pii, next in honor to the Pasargadæ.

[MARATHA (Μάραθα: now Atzikolo), a [illegible] town of Arcadia, at the sources of the Bu[illegible] gus, and in the neighborhood of Gortys.]

MARATHĒSĬUM (Μαραθήσιον), a town on [illegible] coast of Ionia, between Ephesus and Neap[illegible] it belonged to the Samians, who exchange[d it] with the Ephesians for Neapolis, which [illegible] nearer to their island. The modern Scala [illegible] marks the site of one of these towns, but [illegible] doubtful which.

MARĂTHON (Μαραθών: Μαραθώνιος), a de[illegible] in Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis [illegible] situated near a bay on the eastern coast of [illegible] tica, twenty-two miles from Athens by [illegible] road, and twenty-six miles by another. It o[illegible] inally belonged to the Attic tetrapolis, an[d] said to have derived its name from the hero [illegible] athon. This hero, according to one acco[illegible] was the son of Epopeus, king of Sicyon, [illegible] having been expelled from Peloponnesus by [illegible] violence of his father, settled in Attica; w[illegible] according to another account, he was an A[illegible] dian, who took part in the expedition of [illegible] Tyndaridæ against Attica, and devoted h[illegible] self to death before the battle. The site of [illegible] ancient town of Marathon was probably no[illegible] the modern village of Marathon, but at a pl[illegible] called Vrana, a little to the south of Marat[illegible] Marathon was situated in a plain, which [illegible] tends along the sea-shore, about six miles [illegible] length, and from three miles to one mile and [illegible] half in breadth. It is surrounded on the oth[illegible] three sides by rocky hills and rugged mou[illegible] ains. Two marshes bound the extremity [illegible] the plain; the northern is more than a squ[illegible] mile in extent, but the southern is much sm[illegible] er, and is almost dry at the conclusion of the great heats. Through the centre of the pl[illegible] runs a small brook. In this plain was fou[illegible] the celebrated battle between the Persians a[illegible] Athenians, B.C. 490. The Persians were draw[illegible] up on the plain, and the Athenians on so[illegible] portion of the high ground above the plain; b[illegible] the exact ground occupied by the two arm[illegible] can not be identified, notwithstanding the in[illegible] vestigations of modern travellers. The tum[illegible] lus raised over the Athenians who fell in the battle is still to be seen.

MARĂTHUS (Μάραθος), an important city on the coast of Phœnicia, opposite to Aradus and near Antaradus: it was destroyed by the people of Aradus in the time of the Syrian king, Alexander Balas, a little before B.C. 150.

[MARATHŪSA (Μαράθουσα). 1. A small island of the Ægean Sea, on the coast of Ionia, near Clazomenæ.—2. A city in the western part of Crete; according to Hoeck, probably on the Promontorium Drepanum.]

MARCELLA. 1. Daughter of C. Marcellus and Octavia, the sister of Augustus. She was thrice married: first to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, who separated from her in B.C. 21, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus; secondly, to Julus Antonius, the son of the triumvir, by whom she had a son Lucius; thirdly, to Sextus Appuleius, consul A D 14, by whom she had a daughter Appuleia Varilia.—2. Wife of the poet Martial, to whom he has addressed two epigrams (xii., 21, 31). She was a native of Spain, and brought him as her dowry an estate. As Martial was married previously to Cleopatra, he espoused Marcella probably after his return o Spain about A.D. 96.

Marcellīnus, the author of the life of Thucydides. Vid. Thucydides.

Marcellus, Claudius, an illustrious plebeian family. 1 M., celebrated as five times consul, and the conqueror of Syracuse. In his first consulship, B.C. 222, Marcellus and his colleague conquered the Insubrians in Cisalpine Gaul, and took their capital Mediolanum. Marcellus distinguished himself by slaying in battle with his own hand Britomartus or Viridomarus, the king of the enemy, whose spoils he afterward dedicated as spolia opima in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. This was the third and last instance in Roman history in which such an offering was made. In 216 Marcellus was appointed prætor, and rendered important service to the Roman cause in the south of Italy after the disastrous battle of Cannæ. In 215 he remained in the south of Italy, with the title of proconsul. In the course of the same year he was elected consul in the place of Postumius Albinus, who had been killed in Cisalpine Gaul; but as the senate declared that the omens were unfavorable, Marcellus resigned the consulship. In 214 Marcellus was consul a third time, and still continued in the south of Italy, where he carried on the war with ability, but without obtaining any decisive results. In the summer of this year he was sent into Sicily, since the party favorable to the Carthaginians had obtained the upper hand in many of the cities in the island. After taking Leontini, he proceeded to lay siege to Syracuse, both by sea and land. His attacks were vigorous and unremitting; but, though he brought many powerful military engines against the walls, these were rendered wholly unavailing by the superior skill and science of Archimedes, who directed those of the besieged. Marcellus was at last compelled to give up all hopes of carrying the city by open force, and to turn the siege into a blockade. It was not till 212 that he obtained possession of the place. It was given up to plunder, and Archimedes was one of the inhabitants slain by the Roman soldiers. The booty found in the captured city was immense; and Marcellus also carried off many of the works of art with which the city had been adorned, to grace the temples at Rome. This was the first instance of a practice which afterward became so general. In 210 he was consul a fourth time, and again had the conduct of the war against Hannibal. He fought a battle with the Carthaginian general near Numistro in Lucania, but without any decisive result. In 209 he retained the command of his army with the rank of proconsul. In 208 he was consul for the fifth time. He and his colleague were defeated by Hannibal near Venusia, and Marcellus himself was slain in the battle. He was buried with all due honors by order of Hannibal. Marcellus appears to have been a rude, stern soldier, brave and daring to excess, but harsh, unyielding, and cruel. The great praises bestowed upon Marcellus by the Roman historians are certainly undeserved, and probably found their way into history from his funeral oration by his son, which was used as an authority by some of the earlier annalists.—2. M., son of the preceding, accompanied his father as military tribune in 208, and was present with him at the time of his death. In 204 he was tribune of the people; in 200, curule ædile; in 198, prætor; and in 196, consul. In his consulship he carried on the war against the Insubrians and Boii in Cisalpine Gaul. He was censor in 189.—3. M., consul 183, carried on the war against the Ligurians.—4. M., son of No. 2, was thrice consul, first in 166, when he gained a victory over the Alpine tribes of the Gauls; secondly in 155, when he defeated the Ligurians; and thirdly in 152, when he carried on the war against the Celtiberians in Spain. In 148 he was sent ambassador to Masinissa, king of Numidia, but was shipwrecked on the voyage, and perished. —5. M., an intimate friend of Cicero, is first mentioned as curule ædile with P. Clodius in 56. He was consul in 51, and showed himself a bitter enemy to Cæsar. Among other ways in which he displayed his enmity, he caused a citizen of Comum to be scourged, in order to show his contempt for the privileges lately bestowed by Cæsar upon that colony. But the animosity of Marcellus did not blind him to the imprudence of forcing on a war for which his party was unprepared; and at the beginning of 49 he in vain suggested the necessity of making levies of troops, before any open steps were taken against Cæsar. His advice was overruled, and he was among the first to fly from Rome and Italy. After the battle of Pharsalia (48) he abandoned all thoughts of prolonging the contest, and withdrew to Mytilene, where he gave himself up to the pursuits of rhetoric and philosophy. Marcellus himself was unwilling to sue to the conqueror for forgiveness, but his friends at Rome were not backward in their exertions for that purpose. At length, in 46, in a full assembly of the senate, C. Marcellus, the cousin of the exile, threw himself at Cæsar's feet to implore the pardon of his kinsman, and his example was followed by the whole body of the assembly. Cæsar yielded to this demonstration of opinion, and Marcellus was declared to be forgiven. Cicero thereupon returned thanks to Cæsar, in the oration Pro Marcello, which has come down to us. Marcellus set out on his return; but he was murdered at the Piræus by one of his own attendants, P. Magius Chilo.—6. C., brother of the preceding, was consul 49. He is constantly confounded with his cousin, C. Marcellus (No. 8), who was consul in 50. He accompanied his colleague, Lentulus, in his flight from Rome, and eventually crossed over to Greece. In the following year (48) he commanded part of Pompey's fleet; but this is the last we hear of him. —7. C., uncle of the two preceding, was prætor in 80, and afterward succeeded M. Lepidus in the government of Sicily. His administration of the province is frequently praised by Cicero in his speeches against Verres, as affording the most striking contrast to that of the accused. Marcellus himself was present on that occasion, as one of the judges of Verres.

—8. C., son of the preceding, and first cousin of M. Marcellus (No. 5), whom he succeeded in the consulship, 50. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero from an early age, and attached himself to the party of Pompey, notwithstanding his connection with Cæsar by his marriage with Octavia. In his consulship he was the advocate of all the most violent measures against Cæsar; but when the war actually broke out, he displayed the utmost timidity and helplessness. He could not make up his mind to join the Pompeian party in Greece; and after much hesitation, he at length determined to remain in Italy. He readily obtained the forgiveness of Cæsar, and thus was able to intercede with the dictator in favor of his cousin, M. Marcellus (No. 5). He must have lived till near the close of 41, as his widow, Octavia, was pregnant by him when betrothed to Antony in the following year.—9. M., son of the preceding and of Octavia, the daughter of C. Octavius and sister of Augustus, was born in 43. As early as 39 he was betrothed in marriage to the daughter of Sextus Pompey; but the marriage never took place, as Pompey's death in 35 removed the occasion for it. Augustus, who had probably destined the young Marcellus as his successor, adopted him as his son in 25, and, at the same time, gave him his daughter Julia in marriage. In 23 he was curule ædile, but in the autumn of the same year he was attacked by the disease of which he died shortly after at Baiæ, notwithstanding all the skill and care of the celebrated physician Antonius Musa. He was in the twentieth year of his age, and was thought to have given so much promise of future excellence that his death was mourned as a public calamity; and the grief of Augustus, as well as that of his mother Octavia, was for a time unbounded. Augustus himself pronounced the funeral oration over his remains, which were deposited in the mausoleum lately erected for the Julian family. At a subsequent period (14) Augustus dedicated in his name the magnificent theatre near the Forum Olitorium, of which the remains are still visible. But the most durable monument to the memory of Marcellus is to be found in the well-known passage of Virgil (Æn., vi., 860-886), which must have been recited to Augustus and Octavia before the end of 22.—10. M., called by Cicero, for distinction's sake, the father of Æserninus (Brut., 36), served under Marius in Gaul in 102, and as one of the lieutenants of L. Julius Cæsar in the Marsic war, 90.—11. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS ÆSERNINUS, son or grandson of No. 10, quæstor in Spain in 48, under Q. Cassius Longinus, took part in the mutiny of the soldiers against Cassius. — 12. P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, son of No. 10, must have been adopted by one of the Cornelii Lentuli. He was one of Pompey's lieutenants in the war against the pirates, B.C. 67.—13. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, son of the preceding, was prætor 59, after which he governed the province of Syria for nearly two years, and was consul 56, when he showed himself a friend of the aristocratical party, and opposed all the measures of the triumvirate.

MARCELLUS, EPRĬUS, born of an obscure family at Capua, rose by his oratorical talents to distinction at Rome in the reigns of Cl[audius], Nero, and Vespasian. He was one of the p[rin]cipal delators under Nero, and accused m[any] of the most distinguished men of his time. [He] was brought to trial in the reign of Vespa[sian], but was acquitted, and enjoyed the patro[nage] and favor of this emperor as well. In A.D. [79], however, he was convicted of having taken p[art] in the conspiracy of Alienus Cæcina, and the[re]fore put an end to his own life.

MARCELLUS, NONĬUS, a Latin grammarian, [the] author of an important treatise, entitled [De] Compendiosa Doctrina per Litteras ad Fi[lium], sometimes, but erroneously, called De Prop[rie]tate Sermonis. He must have lived betw[een] the second and sixth centuries of the Christ[ian] era. His work is divided into eighteen cha[p]ters, but of these the first twelve are in real[ity] separate treatises on different grammatical s[ub]jects. The last six are in the style of the O[no]masticon of Julius Pollux, each containing [a] series of technical terms in some one dep[art]ment. The whole work contains numer[ous] quotations from the earlier Latin writers. T[he] best edition is by Gerlach and Roth, Basil., 18[42].

MARCELLUS SIDĒTES, a native of Side in Pa[m]phylia, lived in the reigns of Hadrian and An[to]ninus Pius, A.D. 117–161. He wrote a l[ong] medical poem in Greek hexameter verse, co[n]sisting of forty-two books, of which two fra[g]ments remain, [and are found in the Corp[us] Poetarum of Maittaire.]

MARCELLUS, ULPĬUS, a jurist, lived under An[]toninus Pius and M. Aurelius. He is oft[en] cited in the Digest.

MARCĬA. 1. Wife of M. Regulus, who was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians.—2. Wife of M. Cato Uticensis, daughter of L. Marcius Philippus, consul B.C. 56. It was about 56 that Cato is related to have ceded her to his friend Q. Hortensius, with the approbation of her father. She continued to live with Hortensius till the death of the latter in 50, after which she returned to Cato.—3. Wife of Fabius Maximus, the friend of Augustus, learned from her husband the secret visit of the emperor to his grandson Agrippa, and informed Livia of it, in consequence of which she became the cause of her husband's death, A.D. 13 or 14. She is mentioned on two or three occasions by Ovid. —4. Daughter of Cremutius Cordus. Vid. CORDUS.—5. The favorite concubine of Commodus, organized the plot by which the emperor perished. Vid. COMMODUS. She subsequently became the wife of Eclectus, his chamberlain, also a conspirator, and was eventually put to death by Julianus, along with Lætus, who also had been actively engaged in the plot.

[MARCIA AQUA, a Roman aqueduct commenced by the prætor Marcius Rex 145 B.C., and finished by him in the following year, his term of office having been renewed for that purpose. It passed near Tibur, and through the country of the Peligni and Marsi, and supplied Rome with its best water: vid. ROMA p. 753 b.]

MARCĬA GENS, claimed to be descended from Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome. Vid. ANCUS MARCIUS. Hence one of its families subsequently assumed the name of Rex, and the heads of Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius were placed upon the coins of the Marcii. But notwithstanding these claims to such high antiquity, no patricians of this name, with the exception of Coriolanus, are mentioned in the early history of the republic (vid. CORIOLANUS); and it was not till after the enactment of the Licinian laws that any member of the gens obtained the consulship. The names of the most distinguished families are CENSORINUS, PHILIPPUS, REX, and RUTILUS.

MARCIĀNA, the sister of Trajan, and mother of Matidia, who was the mother of Sabina, the wife of the Emperor Hadrian.

MARCIĀNOPŎLIS (Μαρκιανούπολις), an important city in the interior of Mœsia Inferior, west of Odessus, founded by Trajan, and named after his sister Marciana. It was situated on the high road from Constantinople to the Danube. It subsequently became the capital of the Bulgarians, who called it Pristhlava (Πρισθλάβα), whence its modern name Presthlaw, but the Greeks still call it Marcenopoli.

MARCIĀNUS. 1. Emperor of the East A.D. 450–457, was a native of Thrace or Illyricum, and served for many years as a common soldier in the imperial army. Of his early history we have only a few particulars; but he had attained such distinction at the death of Theodosius II. in 450, that the widow of the latter, the celebrated Pulcheria, offered her hand and the imperial title to Marcian, who thus became Emperor of the East. Marcian was a man of resolution and bravery; and when Attila sent to demand the tribute which the younger Theodosius had engaged to pay annually, the emperor sternly replied, "I have iron for Attila, but no gold." Attila swore vengeance; but he first invaded the Western Empire, and his death, two years afterward, saved the East. In 451 Marcian assembled the council of Chalcedon, in which the doctrines of the Eutychians were condemned. He died in 457, and was succeeded by Leo.—2. Of Heraclea in Pontus, a Greek geographer, of uncertain date, but who perhaps lived in the fifth century of the Christian era. He wrote a work in prose, entitled "A Periplus of the External Sea, both eastern and western, and of the largest Islands in it." The External Sea he used in opposition to the Mediterranean. This work was in two books; of which the former, on the East and South Seas, has come down to us entire; but of the latter, which treated of the West and North Seas, we possess only the three last chapters on Africa, and a mutilated one on the distance from Rome to the principal cities in the world. In this work he chiefly follows Ptolemy. He also made an epitome of the Periplus of Artemidorus of Ephesus (vid. ARTEMIDORUS, No. 4), of which we possess the introduction, and the periplus of Pontus, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia. Marcianus likewise published an edition of Menippus with additions and corrections. Vid. MENIPPUS. The works of Marcianus are edited by Hudson, in the Geographi Græci Minores, and separately by Hoffmann, Marciani Periplus, &c., Lips., 1841.

MARCIĀNUS, ÆLIUS, a Roman jurist, who lived under Caracalla and Alexander Severus. His works are frequently cited in the Digest.

MARCIĀNUS CAPELLA. Vid. CAPELLA.

MARCIUS, an Italian seer, whose prophetic verses (Carmina Marciana) were first discovered by M. Atilius, the prætor, in B.C. 213. They were written in Latin, and two extracts from them are given by Livy, one containing a prophecy of the defeat of the Romans at Cannæ, and the second, commanding the institution of the Ludi Apollinares. The Marcian prophecies were subsequently preserved in the Capitol with the Sibylline books. Some writers mention only one person of this name, but others speak of two brothers, the Marcii.

[MARCODURUM (now Düren), a city of the Ubii in Germania Inferior.]

MARCOMANNI, that is, men of the mark or border, a powerful German people of the Suevic race, originally dwelt in the southwest of Germany, between the Rhine and the Danube, on the banks of the Main; but under the guidance of their chieftain Maroboduus, who had been brought up at the court of Augustus, they migrated into the land of the Boii, a Celtic race, who inhabited Bohemia and part of Bavaria. Here they settled after subduing the Boii, and founded a powerful kingdom, which extended south as far as the Danube. Vid. MAROBODUUS. At a later time, the Marcomanni, in conjunction with the Quadi and other German tribes, carried on a long and bloody war with the Emperor M. Aurelius, which lasted during the greater part of his reign, and was only brought to a conclusion by his son Commodus purchasing peace of the barbarians as soon as he ascended the throne, A.D. 180.

MARDĒNE or MARDYĒNE (Μαρδηνή, Μαρδυηνή), a district of Persis, extending north from Taocene to the western frontier and to the seacoast. It seems to have taken its name from some branch of the great people called Mardi or Amardi, who are found in various parts of western and central Asia; for example, in Armenia, Media, Margiana, and, under the same form of name as those in Persis, in Sogdiana.

MARDI. Vid. AMARDI, MARDENE.

MARDŎNIUS (Μαρδόνιος), a distinguished Persian, was the son of Gobryas, and the son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis. In B.C. 492 he was sent by Darius with a large armament to punish Eretria and Athens for the aid they had given to the Ionians. But his expedition was an entire failure. His fleet was destroyed by a storm off Mount Athos, and the greater part of his land forces was destroyed on his passage through Macedonia by the Brygians, a Thracian tribe. In consequence of his failure, he was superseded in the command by Datis and Artaphernes, 490. On the accession of Xerxes, Mardonius was one of the chief instigators of the expedition against Greece, with the government of which he hoped to be invested after its conquest; and he was appointed one of the generals of the land army. After the battle of Salamis (480) he became alarmed for the consequences of the advice he had given, and persuaded Xerxes to return home with the rest of the army, leaving three hundred thousand men under his command for the subjugation of Greece. He was defeated in the following year (470 B.C.), near Platææ, by the combined Greek forces under the command of Pausanias, and was slain in the battle.

Mărēa, -ĕa, -īa (Μαρέη, Μαρεία, Μαρία: Μαρεώτης, Mareōta: ruins at Mariouth), a town of Lower Egypt, in the district of Mareotis, on the southern side of the Lake Mareotis, at the mouth of a canal.

Mărĕōtis (Μαρεῶτις). 1. Also called Μαρεώτης Νομός, a district of Lower Egypt, on the extreme northwest, on the borders of the Libyæ Nomos: it produced good wine.—2. A town in the interior of the Libyæ Nomos, between the Oasis of Ammon and the Oasis Minor.

Marĕōtis or Marēa or (-ia) Lacus (ἡ Μαρεῶτις, Μαρεία, Μαρία λίμνη: now Birket-Mariouth, or El-Kreit), a considerable lake in the northwest of Lower Egypt, separated from the Mediterranean by the neck of land on which Alexandrea stood, and supplied with water by the Canopic branch of the Nile, and by canals. It was less than three hundred stadia (thirty geographical miles) long, and more than one hundred and fifty wide. It was surrounded with vines, palms, and papyrus. It served as the port of Alexandrea for vessels navigating the Nile.

Măres (Μᾶρες), a people of Asia, on the northern coast of the Euxine, who served in the army of Xerxes, being equipped with helmets of wicker-work, leathern shields, and javelins.

Marēsa, Marescha (Μαρησά, Μαρισά, Μαρισσά, Μαρεσχά: probably ruins southeast of Beit Jibrin), an ancient fortress of Palestine, in the south of Judæa, of some importance in the history of the early kings of Judah and of the Maccabees. The Parthians had destroyed it before the time of Eusebius; and it is probable that its ruins contributed to the erection of the city of Eleutheropolis (now Beit Jibrin), which was afterward built on the site of the ancient Bætogabra, two Roman miles northwest of Maresa.

Marescha. Vid. Maresa.

Margiāna (ἡ Μαργιανή: the southern part of Khiva, southwest part of Bokhara, and northeast part of Khorassan), a province of the ancient Persian empire, and afterward of the Greco-Syrian, Parthian, and Persian kingdoms in Central Asia, north of the mountains called Sariphi (now Ghoor), a part of the chain of the Indian Caucasus, which divided it from Aria; and bounded on the east by Bactriana, on the northeast and north by the River Oxus, which divided it from Sogdiana and Scythia, and on the west by Hyrcania. It received its name from the River Margus (now Moorghab), which flows through it, from southeast to northwest, and is lost in the sands of the Desert of Khiva. On this river, near its termination, stood the capital of the district, Antiochia Margiana (now Meru). With the exception of the districts round this and the minor rivers, which produced excellent wine, the country was for the most part a sandy desert. Its chief inhabitants were the Derbices, Parni, Tapuri, and branches of the great tribes of the Massagetæ, Dahæ, and Mardi. The country became known to the Greeks by the expeditions of Alexander and Antiochus I., the first of whom founded, and the second rebuilt, Antiochia; and the Romans of the age of Augustus obtained further information about it from the returned captives who had been taken by the Parthians and had resided at Antiochia.

Mariandȳni (Μαριανδυνοί), an ancient people of Asia Minor, on the northern coast, east of the River Sangarius, in the northeast part of Bithynia. With respect to their ethnical affinities, it seems doubtful whether they were connected with the Thracian tribes (the Thyni and Bithyni) on the west, or the Paphlagonians on the east; but the latter appears the more probable.

Marīnus (Μαρῖνος). 1. Of Tyre, a Greek geographer, who lived in the middle of the second century of the Christian era, and was the immediate predecessor of Ptolemy. Marinus was undoubtedly the founder of mathematical geography in antiquity; and Ptolemy based his whole work upon that of Marinus. Vid. Ptolemæus. The chief merit of Marinus was, that he put an end to the uncertainty that had hitherto prevailed respecting the positions of places, by assigning to each its latitude and longitude.—2. Marĭus. 1. C., the celebrated Roman, who was seven times consul, was born in B.C. 157, near Arpinum, of an obscure and humble family

His father's name was C. Marius, and his mother's Fulcinia; and his parents, as well as Marius himself, were clients of the noble plebeian house of the Herennii. So indigent, indeed, is the family represented to have been, that young Marius is said to have worked as a common peasant for wages, before he entered the ranks of the Roman army. (Comp. Juv., viii., 246.) The meanness of his origin has probably been somewhat exaggerated; but, at all events, he distinguished himself so much by his valor at the siege of Numantia in Spain (134) as to attract the notice of Scipio Africanus, who is said to have foretold his future greatness. His name does not occur again for fifteen years; but in 119 he was elected tribune of the plebs, when he was thirty-eight years of age. In this office he came forward as a popular leader, and proposed a law to give greater freedom to the people at the elections; and when the senate attempted to overawe him, he commanded one of his officers to carry the consul Metellus to prison. He now became a marked man, and the aristocracy opposed him with all their might. He lost his election to the ædileship, and with difficulty obtained the prætorship; but he acquired influence and importance by his marriage with Julia, the sister of C. Julius Cæsar, who was the father of the future ruler of Rome. In 109 Marius crossed over into Africa as legate of the consul Q. Metellus. Here, in the war against Jugurtha, the military genius of Marius had ample opportunity of displaying itself, and he was soon regarded as the most distinguished officer in the army. He also ingratiated himself with the soldiers, who praised him in the highest terms in their letters to their friends at Rome. His popularity became so great that he resolved to return to Rome, and become at once a candidate for the consulship; but it was with great difficulty that he obtained from Metellus permission to leave Africa. On his arrival at Rome he was elected consul with an enthusiasm which bore down all opposition before it; and he received from the people the province of Numidia, and the conduct of the war against Jugurtha (107). On his return to Numidia he carried on the war with great vigor; and in the following year (106) Jugurtha was surrendered to him by the treachery of Bocchus, king of Mauretania. Vid. JUGURTHA. Marius sent his quæstor Sulla to receive the Numidian king from Bocchus. This circumstance sowed the seeds of the personal hatred which afterward existed between Marius and Sulla, since the enemies of Marius claimed for Sulla the merit of bringing the war to a close by obtaining possession of the person of Jugurtha. Meantime Italy was threatened by a vast horde of barbarians, who had migrated from the north of Germany. The two leading nations of which they consisted were called Cimbri and Teutoni, the former of whom are supposed to have been Celts, and the latter Gauls. To these two great races were added the Ambrones, and some of the Swiss tribes, such as the Tigurini. The whole host is said to have contained three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a much larger number of women and children. They had defeated one Roman army after another, and it appeared that nothing could check their progress. The utmost alarm prevailed throughout Italy; all party quarrels were hushed. Every one felt that Marius was the only man capable of saving the state, and he was accordingly elected consul a second time during his absence in Africa. Marius entered Rome in triumph on the first of January, 104, the first day of his second consulship. Meanwhile, the threatened danger was for a while averted. Instead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri marched into Spain, which they ravaged for the next two or three years. But as the return of the barbarians was constantly expected, Marius was elected consul a third time in 103, and a fourth time in 102. In the latter of these years the Cimbri returned into Gaul. The barbarians now divided their forces. The Cimbri marched round the northern foot of the Alps, in order to enter Italy by the northeast, crossing the Tyrolese Alps by the defiles of Tridentum (now Trent). The Teutoni and Ambrones, on the other hand, marched against Marius, who had taken up a position in a fortified camp on the Rhone. The decisive battle was fought near Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix). The carnage was dreadful. The whole nation was annihilated, for those who did not fall in the battle put an end to their own lives. The Cimbri, meantime, had forced their way into Italy. Marius was elected consul a fifth time (101), and joined the proconsul Catulus in the north of Italy. The two generals gained a great victory over the enemy on a plain called the Campi Raudii, near Vercellæ (now Vercelli). The Cimbri met with the same fate as the Teutoni; the whole nation was destroyed. Marius was received at Rome with unprecedented honors. He was hailed as the saviour of the state; his name was coupled with the gods in the libations and at banquets, and he received the title of third founder of Rome. Hitherto the career of Marius had been a glorious one; but the remainder of his life is full of horrors, and brings out the worst features of his character. In order to secure the consulship the sixth time, he entered into close connection with two of the worst demagogues that ever appeared at Rome, Saturninus and Glaucia. He gained his object, and was consul a sixth time in 100. In this year he drove into exile his old enemy Metellus; and shortly afterward, when Saturninus and Glaucia took up arms against the state, Marius crushed the insurrection by command of the senate. Vid. SATURNINUS. His conduct in this affair was greatly blamed by the people, who looked upon him as a traitor to his former friends. For the next few years Marius took little part in public affairs He possessed none of the qualifications which were necessary to maintain influence in the state during a time of peace, being an unlettered soldier, rude in manners, and arrogant in conduct. The Social war again called him into active service (90). He served as legate of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus; and after the latter had fallen in battle, he defeated the Marsi in two successive engagements. Marius was now sixty-seven, and his body had grown stout and unwieldy; but he was still as greedy of honor and distinction as he had ever been. He had set his heart upon obtaining the command of the war against Mithradates, which the senate had bestowed upon the consul Sulla at the end of the Social war (88). In order to gain his object, Marius allied himself to the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, who brought forward a law for distributing the Italian allies, who had just obtained the Roman franchise, among all the Roman tribes. As those new citizens greatly exceeded the old citizens in number, they would, of course, be able to carry whatever they pleased in the comitia. The law was carried, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the consuls; and the tribes, in which the new citizens now had the majority, appointed Marius to the command of the war against Mithradates. Sulla fled to his army, which was stationed at Nola; and when Marius sent thither two military tribunes to take the command of the troops, Sulla not only refused to surrender the command, but marched upon Rome at the head of his army. Marius was now obliged to take to flight. After wandering along the coast of Latium, and encountering terrible sufferings and privations, which he bore with unflinching fortitude, he was at length taken prisoner in the marshes formed by the River Liris, near Minturnæ. The magistrates of this place resolved to put him to death, in accordance with a command which Sulla had sent to all the towns in Italy. A Gallic or Cimbrian soldier undertook to carry their sentence into effect, and with a drawn sword entered the apartment where Marius was confined. The part of the room in which Marius lay was in the shade; and to the frightened barbarian the eyes of Marius seemed to dart out fire, and from the darkness a terrible voice exclaimed, "Man, durst thou murder C. Marius?" The barbarian immediately threw down his sword, and rushed out of the house. Straightway there was a revulsion of feeling among the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They got ready a ship, and placed Marius on board. He reached Africa in safety, and landed at Carthage; but he had scarcely put his foot on shore before the Roman governor sent an officer to bid him leave the country. This last blow almost unmanned Marius; his only reply was, "Tell the prætor that you have seen C. Marius a fugitive sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Soon afterward Marius was joined by his son, and they took refuge in the island of Cercina. During this time a revolution had taken place at Rome, in consequence of which Marius was enabled to return to Italy. The consul Cinna (87), who belonged to the Marian party, had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, and had subsequently been deprived by the senate of the consulate. Cinna collected an army, and resolved to recover his honors by force of arms. As soon as Marius heard of these changes, he left Africa, and joined Cinna in Italy. Marius and Cinna now laid siege to Rome. The failure of provisions compelled the senate to yield, and Marius and Cinna entered Rome as conquerors. The most frightful scenes followed. The guards of Marius stabbed every one whom he did not salute, and the streets ran with the blood of the noblest of the Roman aristocracy. Among the victims of his vengeance were the great orator M. Antonius and his former colleague Q. Catulus. Without going through the form of an election, Marius and Cinna named themselves consuls for the following year (86). But he [did] not long enjoy the honor: he was now in [his] seventy-first year; his body was worn out [by] the fatigues and sufferings he had recently [un]dergone; and on the eighteenth day of his [con]sulship he died of an attack of pleurisy, af[ter] seven days' illness.—2. Mercator seems undoubtedly to have been a layman, but we are ignorant of every circumstance connected with his origin and personal history. The works of Mercator refer exclusively to the Pelagian and Nestorian heresies, and consist, for the most part, of passages extracted and translated from the chief Greek authorities. Mars, an ancient Roman god, who was at an early period identified by the Romans with the Greek Ares, or the god delighting in bloody war. Vid. Ares. The name of the god in the Sabine and Oscan was Mamers; and Mars itself is a contraction of Mavers or Mavors. Next to Jupiter, Mars enjoyed the highest honors at Rome. He is frequently designated as Father Mars, whence the forms Marspiter and Maspiter, analogous to Jupiter. Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus were the three tutelary divinities of Rome, to each of whom King Numa appointed a flamen. He was worshipped at Rome as the god of war, and war itself was frequently designated by the name of Mars. His priests, the Salii, danced in full armor, and the place dedicated to warlike exercises was called after his name (Campus Martius). But, being the father of the Romans, Mars was also the protector of the most honorable pursuit, i. e., agriculture; and under the name of Silvanus, he was worshipped as the guardian of cattle. Mars was also identified with Quirinus, who was the deity watching over the Roman citizens in their civil capacity as Quirites. Thus Mars appears under three aspects. As the warlike god, he was called Gradivus; as the rustic god, he was called Silvanus; while, in his relation to the state, he bore the name of Quirinus. His wife was called Neria or Neriene, the feminine of Nero which in the Sabine language signified "strong. The wolf and the woodpecker (picus) were sacred to Mars. Numerous temples were dedicated to him at Rome, the most important of which was that outside the Porta Capena, on the Appian road, and that of Mars Ultor, which was built by Augustus in the forum.

[Marsacii, a people in Gallia Belgica, on one of the islands formed by the Rhine, which first became known to the Romans through the war with Civilis.]

Marsi. 1. A brave and warlike people of the Sabellian race, dwelt in the centre of Italy, in the high land surrounded by the mountains of the Apennines, in which the Lake Fucinus is situated. Along with their neighbors the Peligni, Marrucini, &c., they concluded a peace with Rome, B.C. 304. Their bravery was proverbial; and they were the prime movers of the celebrated war waged against Rome by the Socii or Italian allies in order to obtain the Roman franchise, and which is known by the name of the Marsic or Social war. Their chief town was Marruvium. The Marsi appear to have been acquainted with the medicinal properties of several of the plants growing upon their mountains, and to have employed them as remedies against the bites of serpents, and in other cases. Hence they were regarded as magicians, and were said to be descended from a son of Circe. Others, again, derived their origin from the Phrygian Marsyas simply on account of the resemblance of the name.—2. A people in Germany, appear to have dwelt originally on both banks of the Ems, and to have been only a tribe of the Cherusci, although Tacitus makes them one of the most ancient tribes in Germany. They joined the Cherusci in the war against the Romans, which terminated in the defeat of Varus, but they were subsequently driven into the interior of the country by Germanicus.

Marsigni, a people in the southeast of Germany, of Suevic extraction.

Marsus, Domitius, a Roman poet of the Augustan age. He wrote poems of various kinds, but his epigrams were the most celebrated of his productions. Hence he is frequently mentioned by Martial, who speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration. He wrote a beautiful epitaph on Tibullus, which has come down to us.

Marsyas (Μαρσύας). 1. A mythological personage, connected with the earliest period of Greek music. He is variously called the son of Hyagnis, or of Œagrus, or of Olympus. Some make him a satyr, others a peasant. All agree in placing him in Phrygia. The following is the outline of his story: Minerva (Athena) having, while playing the flute, seen the reflection of herself in water, and observed the distortion of her features, threw away the instrument in disgust. It was picked up by Marsyas, who no sooner began to blow through it, than the flute, having once been inspired by the breath of a goddess, emitted of its own accord the most beautiful strains. Elated by his success, Marsyas was rash enough to challenge Apollo to a musical contest, the conditions of which were that the victor should do what he pleased with the vanquished. The Muses, or, according to others, the Nysæans, were the umpires. Apollo played upon the cithara, and Marsyas upon the flute; and it was not till the former added his voice to the music of his lyre that the contest was decided in his favor. As a just punishment for the presumption of Marsyas, Apollo bound him to a tree, and flayed him alive. His blood was the source of the River Marsyas, and Apollo hung up his skin in the cave out of which that river flows. His flutes (for, according to some, the instrument on which he played was the double flute) were carried by the River Marsyas into the Mæander, and again emerging in the Asopus, were thrown on land by it in the Sicyonian territory, and were dedicated to Apollo in his temple at Sicyon. The fable evidently refers to the struggle between the citharœdic and aulœdic styles of music, of which the former was connected with the worship of Apollo among the Dorians, and the latter with the orgiastic rites of Cybele in Phrygia. In the fora of ancient cities there was frequently placed a statue of Marsyas, which was probably intended to hold forth an example of the severe punishment of arrogant presumption. The statue of Marsyas in the forum of Rome is well known by the allusions of Horace (Sat., i., 6, 120), Juvenal (ix., 1, 2), and Martial (ii., 64, 7).—2. A Greek historian, was the son of Periander, a native of Pella in Macedonia, a contemporary of Alexander, with whom he is said to have been educated. His principal work was a history of Macedonia, in ten books, from the earliest times to the wars of Alexander. He also wrote other works, the titles of which are given by Suidas.—3. ... Philippi, commonly called the younger, to distinguish him from the preceding, was a Greek historian. The period at which he flourished is uncertain: the earliest writers by whom he is cited are Pliny and Athenæus Marsyas (Μαρσύας). 1. A small and ... river of Phrygia, a tributary of the Mæander, took its rise, according to Xenophon, in the ... ace of the Persian kings at Celænæ, beneath the Acropolis, and fell into the Mæander outside the city. Pliny, however, states that its source was in the valley called Aulocrene, about ... miles from Apamea Cibotus (which city was ... or near the site of Celænæ), and that after a subterraneous course it first came out to ... at Apamea. Colonel Leake reconciles the statements by the natural explanation that the place where the river first broke forth from its subterraneous course was regarded as its origin. Tradition ascribed its name to the fable of Marsyas.—2. (Now Chinar-Chai), a considerable river of Caria, having its source in the district called Idrias, flowing northwest and north through the middle of Caria, past Stratonicea and Alabanda, and falling into the southern side of the Mæander nearly opposite Tralles.—3. In Syria, a small tributary of the Orontes, into which it falls on the eastern side near Apamea.—4. A name given to the extensive plain in Syria through which the ... course of the Orontes flows, lying between the ranges of Casius and Lebanon, and reaching from Apamea on the north to Laodicea ad Libanum on the south.

Martialis. 1. M. Valerius, the epigrammatic poet, was born at Bilbilis in Spain in the third year of Claudius, A.D. 43. He came to Rome in the thirteenth year of Nero, 66; and after residing in the metropolis thirty-five years, he returned to the place of his birth in the third year of Trajan, 100. He lived there for upward of three years at least, on the property of his wife, a lady named Marcella, whom he seems to have married after his return to Bilbilis. His death can not have taken place before 104. His fame was extended, and his books were eagerly sought for, not only in the city, but also in Gaul, Germany, and Britain; he secured the patronage of the emperors Titus and Domitian, obtained by his influence the freedom of the state for several of his friends, and received for himself, although apparently without family, the privileges accorded to those who were the fathers of three children (jus trium liberorum), together with the rank of tribunus and the rights of the equestrian order. His circumstances appear to have been easy during his residence at Rome, for he had a mansion in the city whose situation he describes, and a suburban villa near Nomentum, to which he frequently alludes with pride. The extant works of Martial consist of a collection of short poems, all included under the general appellation Epigrammata, upward of fifteen hundred in number, divided into fourteen books. Those which form the two last books, usually distinguished respectively as Xenia and Apophoreta, amounting to three hundred and fifty, consist of distichs, descriptive of a vast variety of small objects, chiefly articles of food or clothing, such as were usually ser-as presents among friends during the Saturnalia, and on other festive occasions. In addition to the above, nearly all the printed copies include thirty-three epigrams, forming a book apart from the rest, which has been commonly known as Liber de Spectaculis, because the contents relate to the shows exhibited by Titus and Domitian, but there is no ancient authority for the title. The different books were collected and published by the author, sometimes singly and sometimes several at one time. The Liber de Spectaculis and the first nine books of the regular series involve a great number of historical allusions, extending from the games of Titus (80) down to the return of Domitian from the Sarmatian expedition in January, 94. All these books were composed at Rome except the third, which was written during a tour in Gallia Togata. The tenth book was published twice: the first edition was given hastily to the world; the second, that which we now read (x., 2), celebrates the arrival of Trajan at Rome, after his accession to the throne (99). The eleventh book seems to have been published at Rome early in 100, and at the close of the year he returned to Bilbilis. After keeping silence for three years (xii., prooem.), the twelfth book was dispatched from Bilbilis to Rome (xii., 3, 18), and must therefore be assigned to 104. Books xiii. and xiv., Xenia and Apophoreta, were written chiefly under Domitian, although the composition may have been spread over the holidays of many years. It is well known that the word Epigram, which originally denoted simply an inscription, was, in process of time, applied to any brief metrical effusion, whatever the subject might be, or whatever the form under which it was presented. Martial, however, first placed the epigram upon the narrow basis which it now occupies, and from his time the term has been in a great measure restricted to denote a short poem, in which all the thoughts and expressions converge to one sharp point, which forms the termination of the piece. Martial's epigrams are distinguished by singular fertility of imagination, prodigious flow of wit, and delicate felicity of language; and from no source do we derive more copious information on the national customs and social habits of the Romans during the first century of the empire. But, however much we may admire the genius of the author, we feel no respect for the character of the man. The servility of adulation with which he loads Domitian, proves that he was a courtier of the lowest class; and his works are defiled by the most cold-blooded filth, too clearly denoting habitual impurity of thought, combined with habitual impurity of expression. The best edition is by Schneidewinn, Grem., 1842.—2. Gargilĭus, a Roman historian, and a contemporary of Alexander Severus, who is cited by Vopiscus. There is extant a short fragment on veterinary surgery bearing the name of Gargilius Martialis; and Angelo Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the royal library at Naples part of a work De Hortis, also ascribed to Gargilius Martialis; but whether Gargilius Martialis the horticulturist, and Gargilius Martialis the veterinarian, are all, or any two of them, the same, or all different personages, can not be determined.

Martyrŏpŏlis (Μαρτυρόπολις: now Meia Farekin), a city of Sophene, in Armenia Major, on the River Nymphus, a tributary of the Tigris; under Justinian, a strong fortress, and the residence of the first Dux Armeniæ.

Marullus, C. Epidĭus, tribune of the plebs B.C. 44, removed, in conjunction with his colleague L. Cæsetius Flavus, the diadem which had been placed upon the statue of C. Julius Cæsar, and attempted to bring to trial the persons who had saluted the dictator as king. Cæsar, in consequence, deprived him of the tribunate, and expelled him from the senate.

[Marus (now Marosch), mentioned by Tacitus as a tributary of the Danube on the north, probably the same as the Marisus.]

Marŭvĭum. Vid. Marruvium.

[Masada (Μάσαδα), a fortress on the shore of the Dead Sea, built by Jonathan Maccabæus, and afterward greatly strengthened by Herod, as a place of refuge for himself. It fell into the hands of the Romans after the capture of Jerusalem, the garrison having devoted themselves to self-destruction.]

Mascas (Μάσκας, Μασκᾶς: now Wady-el-Seba), an eastern tributary of the Euphrates in Mesopotamia, mentioned only by Xenophon (Anab., i., 5), who describes it as surrounding the city of Corsote, and as being thirty-five parasangs from the Chaboras. It appears to be the same river as the Saocoras of Ptolemy.

Mases (Μάσης: Μασήτιος), a town on the southern coast of Argolis, the harbor of Hermione.

Masinissa (Μασσανάσσης), king of the Numidians, was the son of Gala, king of the Massylians, the easternmost of the two great tribes into which the Numidians were at that time divided; but he was brought up at Carthage, where he appears to have received an education superior to that usual among his countrymen. In B.C. 213 the Carthaginians persuaded Gala to declare war against Syphax, king of the neighboring tribe of the Massæsylians, who had lately entered into an alliance with Rome. Masinissa was appointed by his father to command the invading force, with which he attacked and totally defeated Syphax. In the next year (212) Masinissa crossed over into Spain and supported the Carthaginian generals there with a large body of Numidian horse. He fought on the side of the Carthaginians for some years; but after their great defeat by Scipio in 206, he secretly promised the latter to support the Romans as soon as they should send an army into Africa. In his desertion of the Carthaginians he is said to have been also actuated by resentment against Hasdrubal, who had previously betrothed to him his beautiful daughter Sophonisba, but violated his engagement in order to bestow her hand upon Syphax. During the absence of Masinissa in Spain his father Gala had died, and the throne had been seized by a usurper; but Masinissa, on his return, soon expelled the usurper and obtained possession of the kingdom. He was now attacked by Syphax and the Carthaginians, who were anxious to crush him before he could receive assistance from Rome. He was repeatedly defeated by Syphax and his generals, and with difficulty escaped falling into the hands of his enemies. But the arrival of Scipio in Africa (204) soon changed the posture of affairs. He instantly joined the Roman general, and rendered the most important services to him during the remainder of the war. He took a prominent part in the defeat of the combined forces of Syphax and Hasdrubal, and, in conjunction with Lælius, he reduced Cirta, the capital of Syphax. Among the captives that fell into their hands on this occasion was Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax, and the same who had been formerly promised in marriage to Masinissa himself. The story of his hasty marriage with her, and its tragical termination, is related elsewhere. Vid. SOPHONISBA. In the decisive battle of Zama (202), Masinissa commanded the cavalry of the right wing, and contributed in no small degree to the successful result of the day. On the conclusion of the final peace between Rome and Carthage, he was rewarded with the greater part of the territories which had belonged to Syphax, in addition to his hereditary dominions. For the next fifty years Masinissa reigned in peace, though constantly making aggressions upon the Carthaginian territory. At length, in 150, he declared open war against Carthage, and these hostilities led to the outbreak of the third Punic war. Masinissa died in the second year of the war, 148. On his death-bed he had sent for Scipio Africanus the younger, at that time serving in Africa as a military tribune, but he expired before his arrival, leaving it to the young officer to settle the affairs of his kingdom. He died at the advanced age of ninety, having retained in an extraordinary degree his bodily strength and activity to the last, so that in the war against the Carthaginians, only two years before, he not only commanded his army in person, but was able to go through all his military exercises with the agility and vigor of a young man. His character has been extolled by the Roman writers far beyond his true merits. He possessed, indeed, unconquerable energy and fortitude; but he was faithless to the Carthaginians as soon as fortune began to turn against them; and though he afterward continued steady to the cause of the Romans, it was because he found it uniformly his interest to do so. He was the father of a very numerous family; but it appears that three only of his legitimate sons survived him, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa. Between these three the kingdom was portioned out by Scipio, according to the dying directions of the old king.

[MASISTES (Μασίστης), son of Darius and Atossa, accompanied his brother Xerxes in his expedition against Greece.]

[MASISTIUS (Μασίστιος), commander of the cavalry in the army of Xerxes in the invasion of Greece, distinguished for his bravery and commanding appearance; he was slain in a skirmish before the battle of Platææ: the Greeks, says Herodotus (ix, 20), called him Macistius (Μακίστιος).]

[MASPII (Μάσπιοι), mentioned by Herodotus as one of the most distinguished races of the Persian nation.]

MASSA, BÆBĬUS or BEBĬUS, was accused by Pliny the younger and Herennius Senecio of plundering the province of Bætica, of which he had been governor, A.D. 93. He was condemned, but escaped punishment by the favor of Domitian; and from this time he became one of the informers and favorites of the tyrant.

MASSÆSȲLI or -II. Vid. MAURETANIA, NUMIDIA.

MASSĂGA (τὰ Μάσσαγα), the capital city of the Indian people ASSACENI.

MASSĂGĔTÆ (Μασσαγέται), a wild and warlike people of Central Asia, in Scythia intra Imaum, north of the Jaxartes (the Araxes of Herodotus) and the Sea of Aral, and on the peninsula between this lake and the Caspian. Their country corresponds to that of the Kirghiz Tartars in the north of Independent Tartary. Some of the ancient geographers give them a greater extent toward the southeast, and Herodotus appears to include under the name all the nomad tribes of Asia east of the Caspian. They appear to have been of the Turkoman race, their manners and customs resembled those of the Scythians in general; but they had some peculiarities, such as the killing and eating of their aged people. Their chief appearance in ancient history is in connection with the expedition undertaken against them by Cyrus the Great, in which Cyrus was defeated and slain. Vid. CYRUS.

MASSĬCUS MONS, a mountain in the northwest of Campania, near the frontiers of Latium, celebrated for its excellent wine, the produce of the vineyards on the southern slope of the mountain. The celebrated Falernian wine came from the eastern side of this mountain.

MASSĬCȲTUS or MASSICȲTES (Μασσικύτης), one of the principal mountain chains of LYCIA.

MASSĬLĬA (Μασσαλία: Μασσαλιώτης, Massiliensis: now Marseilles), a Greek city in Gallia Narbonensis, on the coast of the Mediterranean, in the country of the Salyes. It was situated on a promontory, which was connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus, and was washed on three sides by the sea. Its excellent harbor, called Lacydon, was formed by a small inlet of the sea, about half a mile long and a quarter of a mile broad. This harbor had only a narrow opening, and before it lay an island where ships had good anchorage. Massilia was founded by the Phocæans of Asia Minor about B.C. 600, and soon became a very flourishing city. It extended its dominion over the barbarous tribes in its neighborhood, and planted several colonies on the coast of Gaul and Spain, such as ANTIPOLIS, NICÆA, and EMPORIUM. Its naval power and commercial greatness soon excited the jealousy of the Carthaginians, who made war upon the city, but the Massilians not only maintained their independence, but defeated the Carthaginians in a sea-fight. At an early period they cultivated the friendship of the Romans, to whom they always continued faithful allies. Accordingly, when the southeast corner of Gaul was made a Roman province, the Romans allowed Massilia to retain its independence and its own constitution. This constitution was aristocratic. The city was governed by a senate of six hundred persons called Timuchi. From these were selected fifteen presidents, who formed a sort of committee for carrying on the ordinary business of the government, and three of these were intrusted with the executive power. The inhabitants retained the religious rites of their mother country, and they cultivated with especial reverence the worship of the Ephesian Artemis or Diana. Massilia was for many centuries one of the most important commercial cities in the ancient world. In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey (B.C. 49) it espoused the cause of the latter, but after a protracted siege, in which it lost its fleet, it was obliged to submit to Cæsar. From the effects of this blow it never fully recovered. Its inhabitants had long paid attention to literature and philosophy; and under the early emperors it became one of the chief seats of learning, to which the sons of many illustrious Romans resorted to complete their studies. The modern Marseilles occupies the site of the ancient town, but contains no remains of ancient buildings.

MASSĪVA. 1. A Numidian, grandson of Gala, king of the Massylians, and nephew of Masinissa, whom he accompanied into Spain.—2. Son of Gulussa, and grandson of Masinissa, was assassinated at Rome by order of Jugurtha because he had put in his claim to the kingdom of Numidia.

MASTANĂBAL or MANASTĂBAL, the youngest of the three legitimate sons of Masinissa, between whom the kingdom of Numidia was divided by Scipio after the death of the aged king (B.C. 148). He died before his brother Micipsa, and left two sons Jugurtha and Gauda.

MASTAURA (τὰ Μάσταυρα: now ruins of Mastaura-Kalesi), a city of Lydia, on the borders of Caria, near Nysa.

[MASTOR (Μάστωρ). 1. Father of Lycophron of Cythera.—2. Father of the diviner Halitherses, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

MASTRAMĒLA, a town on the southern coast of Gallia Narbonensis, east of the Rhone, and a lake of the same name, called by Mela Avaticorum stagnum.

MASTŪSĬA. 1. The southwest point of the Thracian Chersonesus, opposite Sigeum.—2. A mountain of Lydia, on the southern slope of which Smyrna lay.

MATERNUS, CURIATĬUS, a Roman rhetorician and tragic poet, one of the speakers in the Dialogus de Oratoribus ascribed to Tacitus.

MATERNUS FIRMICUS. Vid. FIRMICUS.

MATHO. 1. One of the leaders of the Carthaginian mercenaries in their war against Carthage, after the conclusion of the first Punic war, B.C. 241. He was eventually taken prisoner and put to death.—2. A pompous, blustering advocate, ridiculed by Juvenal and Martial.

MATHO, POMPŌNĬUS. 1. M'., consul B.C. 233, carried on war against the Sardinians, whom he defeated. In 217 he was magister equitum, in 216 prætor, and in 215 proprætor in Cisalpine Gaul.—2. M., brother of the preceding, consul 231, also carried on war against the Sardinians. He was likewise prætor in 217. He died in 204.—3. M., probably son of No. 2, ædile 206, and prætor 204, with Sicily as his province.

MATIĀNA (Ματιανή, Ματιανοί, -ηνή, -ηνοί, Herod.), the southwesternmost district of Media Atropatene, along the mountains separating Media from Assyria, which were also called Matiani. The great salt lake of Spaura (Ματιανὴ λίμνη: now Lake of Urmi) was in this district. Herodotus also mentions a people on the Halys in Asia Minor by the name of Matieni.

MATĪNUS, a mountain in Apulia running out into the sea, was one of the offshoots of Mount Garganus, and is frequently mentioned by Horace in consequence of his being a native of Apulia.

MATISCO (now Maçon), a town of the Ædui in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Arar, and on the road from Lugdunum to Augustodunum.

MATĬUS CALVĒNA, C., a Roman eques, and a friend of Cæsar and Cicero. After Cæsar's death he espoused the side of Octavianus, with whom he became very intimate. [This is probably the same C. Matius who translated the Iliad into Latin verse, and was the author of several other works. Matius also wrote "Mimiambi," which were as celebrated as his translation of the Iliad, and paid great attention to economics and agriculture. He also wrote a work on the whole art and science of cookery, in three books, entitled respectively Cocus, Cetarius, Salmagarius. The fragments are given by Bothe, Poet. Scen. Lat. Vet., vol. vi., p. 265–268; and by Zell, Stuttgard, 1829.]

MATRON (Μάτρων), of Pitana, a celebrated writer of parodies upon Homer, probably lived a little before the time of Philip of Macedon.

MATRŎNA (now Marne), a river in Gaul, which formed the boundary between Gallia Lugdunensis and Belgica, and which falls into the Sequana a little south of Paris.

Mattĭăci, a people in Germany, who dwelt on the eastern bank of the Rhine, between the Main and the Lahn, and were a branch of the Chatti. They were subdued by the Romans, who, in the reign of Claudius, had fortresses and silver mines in their country. After the death of Nero they revolted against the Romans, and took part with the Chatti and other German tribes in the siege of Moguntiacum. From this time they disappear from history; and their country was subsequently inhabited by the Alemanni. Their chief towns were Aquæ Mattiacæ (now Wiesbaden), and Mattiacum (now Marburg), which must not be confounded with Mattium, the capital of the Chatti.

Mattĭum (now Maden), the chief town of the Chatti, situated on the Adrana (now Eder), was destroyed by Germanicus.

Matūta, commonly called Mater Matūta, is usually considered as the goddess of the dawn of morning, and her name is considered to be connected with maturus or matutinus. It seems, however, to be well attested that Matuta was only a surname of Juno; and it is probable that the name is connected with mater, so that Mater Matuta is an analogous expression with Hostus Hostilius, Faunus Fatuus, Aius Locutius, and others. Her festival, the Matralia, was celebrated on the 11th of June (vid. Dict. of Ant., art. Matralia). The Romans identified Matuta with the Greek Leucothea. A temple was dedicated to Matuta at Rome by King Servius, and was restored by the dictator Camillus, after the taking of Veii. There was also a temple of Matuta at Satricum.

Maurĕtānĭa or Maurĭtānĭa (ἡ Μαυρουσία: Μαυρούσιοι, Μαῦροι, Mauri), the westernmost of the principal divisions of Northern Africa, lay between the Atlantic on the west, the Mediterranean on the north, Numidia on the east, and Gætulia on the south; but the districts embraced under the names of Mauretania and Numidia respectively were of very different extent at different periods. The earliest known inhabitants of all Northern Africa west of the Syrtes were the Gætulians, who were displaced and driven inland by tribes of Asiatic origin, who are found in the earliest historical accounts, settled along the northern coast under various names; their chief tribes being the Mauri or Maurusii, west of the River Malva or Malucha (now Muluia or Mohalou); thence the Massæsylii to (or nearly to) the River Ampsaga (now Wady-el-Kebir), and the Massylii between the Ampsaga and the Tusca (now Wady-Zain), the western boundary of the Carthaginian territory. Of these people, the Mauri, who possessed a greater breadth of fertile country between the Atlas and the coasts, seem to have applied themselves more to the settled pursuits of agriculture than their kindred neighbors on the east, whose unsettled warlike habits were moreover confirmed by their greater exposure to the intrusions of the Phœnician settlers. Hence arose a difference, which the Greeks marked by applying the general name of Νομάδες to the tribes between the Malva and the Tusca; whence came the Roman names of Numidia for the district, and Numidæ for its people. Vid. Numidia. Thus Mauretania was at first only the country west of the Malva, and corresponded to the later district of Mauretania Tingitana, and to the modern empire of Marocco, except that the latter extends farther south; the ancient boundary on the south is the Atlas. The Romans first became acquainted with the country during the war with Jugurtha, B.C. 106; of their relations with it till it became a Roman province, about 33, an account is given under Bocchus. During this period the kingdom of Mauretania had been increased by the addition of the western part of Numidia as far as Saldæ, which Julius Cæsar bestowed on Bogud, as a reward for his services in the African war. A new arrangement was made about 25, when Augustus gave Mauretania to Juba II., in exchange for his paternal kingdom of Numidia. Upon the murder of Juba's son Ptolemæus, by Caligula (A.D. 40), Mauretania became finally a Roman province, and was formally constituted as such by Claudius, who added to it nearly half of what was still left of Numidia, namely, as far as the Ampsaga, and divided it into two parts, of which the western was called Tingitana, from its capital Tingis (now Tangier), and the eastern Cæsariensis from its capital Julia Cæsarea (now Zershell); the boundary between them being the River Malva, the old limit of the kingdom of Bocchus I. The latter corresponded to the western and central part of the modern regency (and now French colony) of Algiers. These "Mauretaniæ duæ" were governed by an equestrian procurator. In the later division of the empire under Diocletian and Constantine, the eastern part of M. Cæsariensis, from Saldæ to the Ampsaga, was erected into a new province, and called M. Sitifensis, from the inland town of Sitifi (now Setif); at the same time, the western province, M. Tingitana, seems to have been placed under the same government as Spain, so that we still find mention of the "Mauretaniæ duæ," meaning now, however, Cæsariensis and Sitifensis. From A.D. 429 to 534 Mauretania was in the hands of the Vandals, and in 650 and the following years it was conquered by the Arabs. Its ancient inhabitants still exist as powerful tribes in Marocco and Algier, under the names of Berbers, Schilluhs, Kabyles, and Tuariks. Its chief physical features are described under Africa and Atlas. Under the later Roman emperors it was remarkable for the great number of its episcopal sees.

Mausōlus (Μαύσωλος or Μαύσσωλος), king of Caria, was the eldest son of Hecatomnus, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty B.C. 377. In 362 he took part in the general revolt of the satraps against Artaxerxes Mnemon, and availed himself of that opportunity to extend his dominions. In 358 he joined with the Rhodians and others in the war waged by them against the Athenians, known by the name of Social war. He died in 353, leaving no children, and was succeeded by his wife and sister Artemisia. The extravagant grief of the widow for his death, and the honors she paid to his memory—especially by the erection of the splendid monument, which was called from him the Mausoleum—are related elsewhere. Vid. Artemisia.

Maxentius, Roman emperor A.D. 306–312, whose full name was M. Aurelius Valerius Maxentius. He was the son of Maximianus and Eutropia, and received in marriage the daughter of Galerius; but he was passed over in the division of the empire which followed the abdication of his father and Diocletian in A.D. 305. Maxentius, however, did not tamely acquiesce in this arrangement, and, being supported by the prætorian troops, who had been recently deprived of their exclusive privileges, he was proclaimed emperor at Rome in 306. He summoned his father, Maximianus, from his retirement in Lucania, who again assumed the purple. The military abilities of Maximianus were of great service to his son, who was of indolent and dissolute habits. Maximianus compelled the Cæsar Severus, who had marched upon Rome, to retreat in haste to Ravenna, and soon afterward put the latter to death when he had treacherously got him into his power (307). The Emperor Galerius now marched in person against Rome, but Maximianus compelled him likewise to retreat. Maxentius, relieved from these imminent dangers, proceeded to disentangle himself from the control which his father sought to exercise, and succeeded in driving him from his court. Soon afterward Maxentius crossed over to Africa, which he ravaged with fire and sword, because it had submitted to the independent authority of a certain Alexander. Upon his return to Rome Maxentius openly aspired to dominion over all the Western provinces; and soon afterward declared war against Constantine, alleging, as a pretext, that the latter had put to death his father Maximianus. He began to make preparations to pass into Gaul; but Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy. The struggle was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at Saxa Rubra, near Rome, October 27th, 312. Maxentius tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. Maxentius is represented by all historians as a monster of rapacity, cruelty, and lust. The only favored class was the military, upon whom he depended for safety; and in order to secure their devotion and to gratify his own passions, all his other subjects were made the victims of the most revolting licentiousness, and ruined by the most grinding exactions.

Maximiānŏpŏlis (Μαξιμιανούπολις: in the Old Testament, Hadad Rimmon), a city in Palestine, in the valley of Megiddo, a little to the southwest of Megiddo.

Maximiānus. I. Roman emperor A.D. 286–305, whose full name was M. Aurelius Valerius Maximianus. He was born of humble parents in Pannonia, and had acquired such fame by his services in the army, that Diocletian selected this rough soldier for his colleague, as one whose abilities were likely to prove valuable in the disturbed state of public affairs, and accordingly created him first Cæsar (285), and then Augustus (286), conferring at the same time the honorary appellation of Herculius, while he himself assumed that of Jovius. The subsequent history of Maximian has been fully detailed in former articles. Vid. Diocletianus, Constantinus I., Maxentius. It is sufficient to relate here, that after having been reluctantly compelled to abdicate, at Milan (305), he was again invested with the imperial title by his son Maxentius, in the following year (306), to whom he rendered the most important services in the war with Severus and Galerius. Having been expelled from Rome shortly afterward by his son, he took refuge in Gaul with Constantine, to whom he had previously given his daughter Fausta in marriage. Here he again attempted to resume the imperial crown, but was easily deposed by Constantine (308). Two years afterward, he endeavored to induce his daughter Fausta to destroy her husband, and was, in consequence, compelled by Constantine to put an end to his own life.—II., Roman emperor A.D. 305–311, usually called Galerius. His full name was Galerius Valerius Maximianus. He was born near Sardica in Dacia, and was the son of a shepherd. He rose from the ranks to the highest commands in the army, and was appointed Cæsar by Diocletian, along with Constantius Chlorus, in 292. At the same time he was adopted by Diocletian, whose daughter Valeria he received in marriage, and was intrusted with the command of Illyria and Thrace. In 297 he undertook an expedition against the Persian monarch Narses, in which he was unsuccessful, but in the following year (298) he defeated Narses with great slaughter, and compelled him to conclude a peace. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian (305), Galerius became Augustus or emperor. In 307 he made an unsuccessful attempt to recover Italy, which had owned the authority of the usurper Maxentius. Vid. Maxentius. He died in 311, of the disgusting disease known in modern times by the name of morbus pediculosus. He was a cruel persecutor of the Christians; and it was at his instigation that Diocletian issued the fatal ordinance (303), which for so many years deluged the world with innocent blood.

Maximīnus. I., Roman emperor A.D. 235–238, whose full name was C. Julius Verus Maximinus. He was born in a village on the confines of Thrace, of barbarian parentage, his father being a Goth, and his mother a German from the tribe of the Alani. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimius Severus by his gigantic stature and marvellous feats of strength, and was permitted to enter the army. He eventually rose to the highest rank in the service; and on the murder of Alexander Severus by the mutinous troops in Gaul (235), he was proclaimed emperor. He immediately bestowed the title of Cæsar on his son Maximus During the three years of his reign he carried on war against the Germans with success; but his government was characterized by a degree of oppression and sanguinary excess hitherto unexampled. The Roman world became at length tired of this monster. The senate and the provinces gladly acknowledged the two Gordiani, who had been proclaimed emperors in Africa; and after their death the senate itself proclaimed Maximus and Balbinus emperors (238). As soon as Maximinus heard of the elevation of the Gordians, he hastened from his winter-quarters at Sirmium. Having crossed the Alps, he laid siege to Aquileia, and was there slain by his own soldiers, along with his son Maximus, in April. The most extraordinary tales are related of the physical powers of Maximinus, which seem to have been almost incredible. His height exceeded eight feet. The circumference of his thumb was equal to that of a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. It is said that he was able single-handed to drag a loaded wagon, could with his fist knock out the grinders, and with a kick break the leg of a horse; while his appetite was such, that in one day he could eat forty pounds of meat, and drink an amphora of wine.—II., Roman emperor 305-314, originally called Daza, and subsequently Galerius Valerius Maximinus. He was the nephew of Galerius by a sister, and in early life followed the occupation of a shepherd in his native Illyria. Having entered the army, he rose to the highest rank in the service; and upon the abdication of Diocletian in 305, he was adopted by Galerius, and received the title of Cæsar. In 308 Galerius gave him the title of Augustus; and on the death of the latter in 311, Maximinus and Licinius divided the East between them. In 313 Maximinus attacked the dominions of Licinius, who had gone to Milan for the purpose of receiving in marriage the sister of Constantine. He was, however, defeated by Licinius near Heraclea, and fled to Tarsus, where he soon after died. Maximinus possessed no military talents. He owed his elevation to his family connection. He surpassed all his contemporaries in the profligacy of his private life, in the general cruelty of his administration, and in the furious hatred with which he persecuted the Christians.

Maxĭmus. 1. Of Ephesus or Smyrna, one of the teachers of the Emperor Julian, to whom he was introduced by Ædesius. Maximus was a philosopher of the New Platonic school, and, like many others of that school, both believed in and practiced magic. It is said that Julian, through his persuasion, was induced to abjure Christianity. On the accession of Julian, Maximus was held in high honor at the court, and accompanied the emperor on his fatal expedition against the Persians, which he had prophesied would be successful. In 364 he was accused of having caused by sorcery the illness of the Emperors Valens and Valentinian, and was thrown into prison, where he was exposed to cruel tortures. In 297 he was consul for the fifth time, and in 296 for the sixth time. In the latter year he commanded at the great battle of Sentinum, when the combined armies of the Samnites, Gauls, Etruscans, and Umbrians were defeated by the Romans.—2. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges, or the Glutton, from the dissoluteness of his youth, son of the last. His mature manhood atoned for his early irregularities. He was consul 292, and was completely defeated by the Pentrian Samnites. He escaped degradation from the consulate only through his father's offer to serve as his lieutenant for the remainder of the war. In a second battle the consul retrieved his reputation, and was rewarded with a triumph, of which the most remarkable feature was old Fabius riding beside his son's chariot. He was consul the second time 276. Shortly afterward he went as legatus from the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt. He was consul a third time 265.—3. Q. Fabius Maximus, with the agnomens Verrucosus, from a wart on his upper lip, Ovicula, or the Lamb, from the mildness or apathy of his temper, and Cunctator, from his caution in war, was grandson of Fabius Gurges. He was consul for the first time 233, when Liguria was his province; censor 230; consul a second time 228; opposed the agrarian law of C. Flaminius 227; was dictator for holding the comitia in 221; and in 218 was legatus from the senate to Carthage, to demand reparation for the attack on Saguntum In 217, immedi[…] ately after the defeat at Thrasymenus, Fabius was appointed dictator. From this period, so long as the war with Hannibal was merely defensive, Fabius became the leading man at Rome. On taking the field he laid down a simple and immutable plan of action. He avoided all direct encounter with the enemy; moved his camp from highland to highland, where the Numidian horse and Spanish infantry could not follow him; watched Hannibal's movements with unrelaxing vigilance, and cut off his stragglers and foragers. His inclosure of Hannibal in one of the upland valleys between Cales and the Vulturnus, and the Carthaginian's adroit escape by driving oxen with blazing fagots fixed to their horns up the hill-sides, are well-known facts. But at Rome and in his own camp the caution of Fabius was misinterpreted; and the people, in consequence, divided the command between him and M. Minucius Rufus, his master of the horse. Minucius was speedily entrapped, and would have been destroyed by Hannibal had not Fabius generously hastened to his rescue. Fabius was consul for the third time in 215, and for the fourth time in 214. In 213 he served as legatus to his own son, Q. Fabius, consul in that year, and an anecdote is preserved which exemplifies the strictness of the Roman discipline. On entering the camp at Suessula, Fabius advanced on horseback to greet his son. He was passing the lictors when the consul sternly bade him dismount. "My son," exclaimed the elder Fabius, alighting, "I wished to see whether you would remember that you were consul." Fabius was consul for the fifth time in 209, in which year he retook Tarentum. In the closing years of the second Punic war Fabius appears to less advantage. The war had become aggressive under a new race of generals. Fabius disapproved of the new tactics; he dreaded the political supremacy of Scipio, and was his uncompromising opponent in his scheme of invading Africa. He died in 203.—4. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS, elder son of the preceding, was prætor 214, and consul 213. He was legatus to the consul M. Livius Salinator 207. He died soon after this period, and his funeral oration was pronounced by his father.—5. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS ÆMILIANUS, was by birth the eldest son of L. Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, and was adopted by No. 3. Fabius served under his father (Æmilius) in the Macedonian war, 168, and was despatched by him to Rome with the news of his victory at Pydna. He was prætor in Sicily 149 -148, and consul in 145. Spain was his province, where he encountered, and at length defeated Viriathus. Fabius was the pupil and patron of the historian Polybius.—6. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS ALLOBROGICUS, son of the last. He was consul 121; and he derived his surname from the victory which he gained in this year over the Allobroges and their ally, Bituitus, king of the Arverni in Gaul. He was censor in 108. He was an orator and a man of letters. —7. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS SERVILIANUS, was adopted from the gens Servilia by No. 5. He was uterine brother of Cn. Servilius Cæpio, consul in 141. He himself was consul in 142, when he carried on war with Viriathus.

MAXĬMUS, MAGNUS CLEMENS, Roman emperor A.D. 383-388, in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, was a native of Spain. He was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Britain in 383, and forthwith crossed over to Gaul to oppose Gratian, who was defeated by Maximus, and was shortly afterward put to death. Theodosius found it expedient to recognize Maximus as emperor of Gaul, Britain, and Spain, in order to secure Valentinian in the possession of Italy. Maximus, however, aspired to the undivided empire of the West, and accordingly, in 387, he invaded Italy at the head of a formidable army. Valentinian was unable to resist him, and fled to Theodosius in the East. Theodosius forthwith prepared to avenge his colleague. In 388 he forced his way through the Noric Alps, which had been guarded by the troops of Maximus, and shortly afterward took the city of Aquileia by storm, and there put Maximus to death. Victor, the son of Maximus, was defeated and slain in Gaul by Arbogates, the general of Theodosius.

MAXĬMUS, PETRONĬUS, Roman emperor A.D. 455, belonged to a noble Roman family, and enjoyed some of the highest offices of state under Honorius and Valentinian III. In consequence of the violence offered to his wife by Valentinian, Maximus formed a conspiracy against this emperor, who was assassinated, and Maximus himself proclaimed emperor in his stead. His reign, however, lasted only two or three months. Having forced Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, to marry him, she resolved to avenge the death of her former husband, and accordingly Genseric was invited to invade Italy. When Genseric landed at the mouth of the Tiber, Maximus prepared to fly from Rome, but was slain by a band of Burgundian mercenaries, commanded by some old officers of Valentinian.

MAXĬMUS TYRĬUS, a native of Tyre, a Greek rhetorician and Platonic philosopher, lived during the reigns of the Antonines and of Commodus. Some writers suppose that he was one of the tutors of M. Aurelius; but it is more probable that he was a different person from Claudius Maximus, the Stoic, who was the tutor of this emperor. Maximus Tyrius appears to have spent the greater part of his life in Greece, but he visited Rome once or twice. There are extant forty-one Dissertations (Διαλέξεις or Λόγοι) of Maximus Tyrius on theological, ethical, and other philosophical subjects, written in an easy and pleasing style, but not characterized by much depth of thought. The best edition is by Reiske, Lips., 1774-5, 2 vols. 8vo.

[MAZÆUS (Μαζαῖος). 1. Satrap of Cilicia, who, with Belesys, satrap of Syria, made head against the revolted Phœnicians in the reign of Ochus, while the latter was preparing to march against them. 2. A Persian officer under Darius, sent to guard the passage of the Euphrates on the approach of Alexander the Great; he behaved subsequently with great bravery at the battle of Gaugamela, in which he commanded the Persian cavalry. After the flight of Darius he retired to Babylon, but surrendered himself to Alexander, who appointed him satrap of Babylon B.C. 331.]

Mazara (Μαζάρα: Μαζαραῖος: now Mazzara), a town on the western coast of Sicily, situated on a river of the same name, between Lilybæum and Selinus, and founded by the latter city, was taken by the Romans in the first Punic war.

Mazĭces (Μάζικες), a people of Northern Africa, in Mauretania Cæsariensis, on the southern slope of Mount Zalacus. They, as well as the Maxyes, are thought to be the ancestors of the Amazirghs.

[Mecisteus (Μηκιστεύς). 1. A son of Talaus and Lysimache, brother of Adrastus, and father of Euryalus of Thebes.—2. A son of Echius, and one of the companions of Teucer at Troy, was slain by Polydamas.]

Mecyberna (Μηκύβερνα: Μηκυβερναῖος: now Molivo), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic Gulf, east of Olynthus, of which it was the sea-port. From this town part of the Toronaic Gulf was subsequently called Sinus Mecybernæus.

Mēdăba (Μήδαβα), a city of Peræa in Palestine.

Mĕdĭma, Medma, or Mesma, a Greek town on the western coast of Bruttium, founded by the Locrians, with a celebrated fountain and a harbor called Emporium.

Mĕdaura, Ad Medēra, or Amedēra (ruins at Ayedrah), a flourishing city of Northern Africa, on the borders of Numidia and Byzacena, between Lares and Theveste; a Roman colony, and the birth-place of Appuleius.

Medēa (Μήδεια), daughter of Æētes, king of Colchis, by the Oceanid Idyia, or, according to others, by Hecate, the daughter of Perses. She was celebrated for her skill in magic. The principal parts of her story are given under Absyrtus, Argonautæ, and Jason. It is sufficient to state here that, when Jason came to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece, she fell in love with the hero, assisted him in accomplishing the object for which he had visited Colchis, and afterward fled with him as his wife to Greece; that, having been deserted by Jason for the youthful daughter of Creon, king of Corinth, she took fearful vengeance upon her faithless spouse by murdering the two children which she had had by him, and by destroying his young wife by a poisoned garment; and that she then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. So far her story has been related elsewhere. At Athens she is said to have married King Ægeus, or to have been beloved by Sisyphus. Jupiter (Zeus) himself is said to have sued for her, but in vain, because Medea dreaded the anger of Juno (Hera); and the latter rewarded her by promising immortality to her chi[ldren]. Her children are, according to some acc[ounts], Mermerus, Pheres, or Thessalus, Alc[imenes] and Tisander; according to others, she [had] seven sons and seven daughters, while ot[hers] mention only two children, Medus (some [call] him Polyxenus) and Eriopis, or one son A[...]. Respecting her flight from Corinth there [are] different traditions. Some say, as we rem[ark]ed above, that she fled to Athens, and mar[ried] Ægeus, but when it was discovered that [she] had laid snares for Theseus, she escaped [and] went to Asia, the inhabitants of which [were] called after her Medes. Others relate that [she] first fled from Corinth to Hercules at The[bes], who had promised her his assistance while [still] in Colchis, in case of Jason being unfaithf[ul to] her. She cured Hercules, who was seized [with] madness; and, as he could not afford her [the] assistance he had promised, she went to Ath[ens]. She is said to have given birth to her son [Me]dus after her arrival in Asia, where she [had] married a king; whereas others state that [her] son Medus accompanied her from Athens [to] Colchis, where her son slew Perses, and [re]stored her father Æētes to his kingdom. [The] restoration of Æētes, however, is attributed [by] some to Jason, who accompanied Medea [to] Colchis. At length Medea is said to have [be]come immortal, to have been honored with [di]vine worship, and to have married Achilles [in] Elysium.

Mēdĭa (ἡ Μηδία: Μῆδος, Mēdus), an impor[t]ant country of Western Asia, occupying the ex[]treme west of the great table-land of Iran, an[d] lying between Armenia on the north and north[]west, Assyria and Susiana on the west an[d] southwest, Persis on the south, the great des[]ert of Aria on the east, and Parthia, Hyrcan[ia], and the Caspian on the northeast. Its bounda[]ries were, on the north the Araxes, on the wes[t] and southwest the range of mountains call[ed] Zagros and Parachoatras (now Mountains of Kurdistan and Louristan), which divided it from the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the eas[t] the desert, and on the northeast the Casp[ii] Montes (now Elburz Mountains), the country be[]tween which and the Caspian, though reckon[ed] as a part of Media, was possessed by the Ge[læ], Mardi, and other independent tribes. Media thus corresponded nearly to the modern province of Irak-Ajemi. It was for the most part a fert[ile] country, producing wine, figs, oranges, and ci[t]rons, and honey, and supporting an excellent breed of horses. It was well peopled, and wa[s] altogether one of the most important provinces of the ancient Persian empire. After the Mac[]edonian conquest it was divided into two parts, Great Media (ἡ μεγάλη Μηδία) and Atropatene. Vid. Atropatene. The earliest history of Me[]dia is involved in much obscurity. Herodotus Ctesias (in Diodorus) give different chro- gies for its early kings. Ctesias makes Ar- s the founder of the monarchy, about B.C. and reckons eight kings from him to the throw of the kingdom by Cyrus. Herodo- reckons only four kings of Media, namely, ɪoces, B.C. 710–657; 2. Phraortes, 657– 3. Cyaxares, 635–595; 5. Astyages, 595– The last king was dethroned by a revolu- which transferred the supremacy to the ians, who had formerly been the subordinate le in the united Medo-Persian empire. Vid. r. (Now Milan), the capital of the ibres in Gallia Transpadana, was situated n extensive plain between the rivers Tici- and Addua. It was taken by the Romans . 222, and afterward became both a muni- um and a colony. On the new division of empire made by Diocletian, it became the dence of his colleague Maximianus, and con- ued to be the usual residence of the emper- of the West till the irruption of Attila, who k and plundered the town, induced them to nsfer the seat of government to the more ongly-fortified town of Ravenna. Mediola- n was at this time one of the first cities of empire; it possessed an imperial mint, and was the seat of an archbishopric. It is cele brated in ecclesiastical history as the see of St. Ambrose. On the fall of the Western empire, it became the residence of Theodoric the Great and the capital of the Ostrogothic kingdom, and surpassed even Rome itself in populousness and prosperity. It received a fearful blow in A.D. 539, when, in consequence of having sided with Belisarius, it was taken by the Goths under Vitiges, a great part of it destroyed, and its inhabitants put to the sword. It, however, gradually recovered from the effects of this blow, and was a place of importance under the Lombards, whose capital, however, was Pavia. The modern Milan contains no remains of antiquity, with the exception of sixteen handsome fluted pillars near the Church of S. Lorenzo.—2. Megalŏpŏlis (ἡ Μεγάλη πόλις, Μεγαλόπολις: Μεγαλοπολίτης). 1. (Now Sinano or Sinanu), the most recent but the most important of the cities of Arcadia, was founded on the adv[ice of] Epaminondas, after the battle of Leuctra, [B.C.] 371, and was formed out of the inhabitan[ts of] thirty-eight villages. It was situated in [the] district Mænalia, near the frontiers of Me[sse]nia, on the River Helisson, which flowed th[rough] the city, dividing it into nearly two equal p[arts]. It stood on the site of the ancient town O[res]tion or Orestia, was fifty stadia (six mile[s) in] circumference, and contained, when it wa[s be]sieged by Polysperchon, about fifteen thou[sand] men capable of bearing arms, which would [give] us a population of about seventy thousan[d in]habitants. Megalopolis was for a time su[bject] to the Macedonians, but soon after the d[eath] of Alexander the Great it was governed [by a] series of native tyrants, the last of whom, [Lyd]iades, voluntarily resigned the government, [and] united the city to the Achæan league, B.C. [234]. It became, in consequence, opposed to Sp[arta], and was taken and plundered by Cleome[nes], who either killed or drove into banishmen[t] its inhabitants, and destroyed a great part of [the] city, 222. After the battle of Sellasia in [the] following year it was restored by Philopœ[men], who again collected its inhabitants, but it n[ever] recovered its former prosperity, and grad[ually] sunk into insignificance. Mĕgăra (τὰ Μέγαρα, in Lat. Megara, -æ, and pl. Megara, -orum: Μεγαρεύς, Megarensis). (Now Megara), the capital of Megaris, was situated eight stadia (one mile) from the sea opposite the island Salamis, about twenty-six miles from Athens and thirty-one miles from Corinth. It consisted of three parts: 1. The ancient Pelasgian citadel, called Caria, said to have been built by Car, the son of Phoroneus, which was situated on a hill northwest of the later city. This citadel contained the ancient and celebrated Megaron (μέγαρον) or temple of Ceres (Demeter), from which the town is supposed to have derived its name. 2. The modern citadel, situated on a lower hill to the southwest of the preceding, and called Alcathous, from its reputed founder Alcathous, son of Pelops. 3. The town properly so called, situated at the foot of the two citadels, said to have been founded by the Pelopidæ under Alcathous, and subsequently enlarged by a Doric colony under Alethes and Athemenes at the time of Codrus. It appears to have been originally called Polichne (Πολίχνη). The town contained many public buildings, which are described at length by Pausanias. Its sea-port was Nisæa (Νίσαια), which was connected with Megara by two walls, eight stadia in length, built by the Athenians when they had possession of Megara, B.C. 461–445. Nisæa is said to have been built by Nisus, the son of Pandion; and the inhabitants of Megara are sometimes called Nisæan Megarians (οἱ Νισαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) to distinguish them from the Hyblæan Megarians (οἱ Ὑβλαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) in Sicily. In front of Nisæa lay the small island Minoa (Μίνωα), which added greatly to the security of the harbor. In the most ancient times Megara and the surrounding country was inhabited by Leleges. It subsequently became annexed to Attica; and Megaris formed one of the four ancient divisions of Attica. It was next conquered by the Dorians, and was for a time subject to Corinth; but it finally asserted its independence, and rapidly became a wealthy and powerful city. To none of these events can any date be assigned with certainty. Its power at an early period is attested by the flourishing colonies which it founded, of which Selymbria, Chalcedon, and Byzantium, and the Hyblæan Megara in Sicily, were the most important. Its navy was a match for that of Athens, with which it contested the island of Salamis; and it was not till after a long struggle that the Athenians succeeded in obtaining possession of this island. The government was originally an aristocracy, as in most of the Doric cities; but Theagenes, who put himself at the head of the popular party, obtained the supreme power about B.C. 620. Theagenes was afterward expelled, and a democratical form of government established. After the Persian wars, Megara was for some time at war with Corinth, and was thus led to form an alliance with Athens, and to receive an Athenian garrison into the city, 461; but the oligarchical party having got the upper hand, the Athenians were expelled, 441. Megara is not often mentioned after this period. It was taken and its walls destroyed by Demetrius Poliorcetes; it was taken again by the Romans under Q. Metellus; and in the time of Augustus it had ceased to be a place of importance. Megara is celebrated in the history of philosophy as the seat of a philosophical school, usually called the Megarian, which was founded by Euclid, a native of the city, and a disciple of Socrates. Vid. Euclides, No. 2. There are no remains of any importance of the ancient city of Megara.—2. A town in Sicily, on the eastern coast, north of Syracuse, founded by Dorians from Megara in Greece, B.C. 728, on the site of a small town Hybla, and hence called Megara Hyblæa, and its inhabitants Megarenses Hyblæi (Μεγαρεῖς Ὑβλαῖοι). From the time of Gelon it belonged to Syracuse. It was taken and plundered by the Romans in the second Punic war, and from that time sunk into insignificance, but it is still mentioned by Cicero under the name of Megaris.

Megăreus (Μεγαρεύς), son of Onchestus, also called a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Œnope, of Hippomenes, of Apollo, or of Ægeus. He was a brother of Abrote, the wife of Nisus, king of Megara, and the father of Evippus, Timalcus, Hippomenes, and Evæchme. Megara is said to have derived its name from him.

Mĕgăris (ἡ Μεγαρίς or ἡ Μεγαρική, sc. γῆ), a small district in Greece, between the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, originally reckoned part of Hellas proper, but subsequently included in the Peloponnesus. It was bounded on the north by Bœotia, on the east and northeast by Attica, and on the south by the territory of Corinth. It contained about seven hundred and twenty square miles. The country was very mountainous; and its only plain was the one in which the city of Megara was situated. It was separated from Bœotia by Mount Cithæron, and from Attica by the mountains called the Horns (τὰ κέρατα), on account of their two projecting summits. The Œnean Mountains extended through the greater part of the country, and formed its southern boundary toward Corinth. There are two roads through these mountains from Corinth, one called the Scironian pass, which ran along the Saronic Gulf, passed by Crommyon and Megara, and was the direct road from Corinth to Athens; the other ran along the Corinthian Gulf, passed by Geranēa and Pegæ, and was the road from Corinth into Bœotia. The only town of importance in Megaris was its capital Megara. Vid. Megara.

Megasthĕnes (Μεγασθένης), a Greek writer, who was sent by Seleucus Nicator as ambassador to Sandracottus, king of the Prasii, where he resided some time. He wrote a work on India, in four books, entitled Indica (τὰ Ἰνδικά), to which later Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of the country. [The fragments of Megasthenes have been collected by Schwanbeck, Megasth. Fragm., &c., Bonn, 1846; and by Müller, Hist. Græc. Fragm., vol ii., p. 397–439.]

Meges (Μέγης), son of Phyleus, and grandson of Augeas, was one of the suitors of Helen, and led his bands from Dulichium and the Echinades against Troy.

Megiddo (Μαγεδδώ, Μαγεδώ: now Lejjun?), a considerable city of Palestine, on the River Kishon, in a valley of the same name, which formed a part of the great plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon, on the confines of Galilee and Samaria. It was a residence of the Canaanitish kings before the conquest of Palestine by the Jews. It was fortified by Solomon. It was probably the same place which was called Legio under the Romans.

[Megista (Μεγίστη), an island on the coast of Lycia, between Rhodes and the Chelidonian islands, with a city of the same name, which, according to Strabo, was also called Cisthene. Vid. Cisthene, No. 2.]

Megistāni, a people of Armenia, in the district of Sophene, near the Euphrates.]

[Megistias (Μεγιστίας) of Acarnania, of the race of Melampus, a celebrated seer, fought and fell at the battle of Thermopylæ.]

MELA, river. Vid. MELLA.

MELA, FABIUS, a Roman jurist, who is often cited in the Digest, probably lived in the time of Antoninus Pius.

MELA or MELLA, M. ANNÆUS, the youngest son of M. Annæus Seneca the rhetorician, and brother of L. Seneca the philosopher, and Gallio. By his wife Acilia he had at least one son, the celebrated Lucan. After Lucan's death, A.D. 65, Mela laid claim to his property; and as he was rich, he was accused of being privy to Piso's conspiracy, and anticipated a certain sentence by suicide.

MELA, POMPONIUS, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise upon Geography, was a native of Spain, and probably flourished under the Emperor Claudius. His work is entitled De Situ Orbis Libri III. It contains a brief description of the whole world as known to the Romans. The text is often corrupt, but the style is simple, and the Latinity is pure; and although every thing is compressed within the narrowest limits, we find the monotony of the catalogue occasionally diversified by animated and pleasing pictures. The best edition is by Tzschucke, seven parts, 8vo, Lips., 1807.

MELÆNA ACRA (ἡ Μέλαινα ἄκρα). 1. (Now Kara Burnu, which means the same as the Greek name, i. e., the Black Cape), the northwestern promontory of the great peninsula of Ionia: formed by Mount Mimas; celebrated for the millstones hewn from it.—2. (Now Cape San Nicolo), the northwestern promontory of the island of Chios.—3. (Now Kara Burnu), a promontory of Bithynia, a little east of the Bosporus, between the rivers Rhebas and Artanes; also called Καλίνακρον and Βιθυνίας ἄκρον.

MELÆNÆ (Μελαιναί: Μελαινεύς). 1. Or MELÆNEÆ (Μελαινεαί), a town in the west of Arcadia, on the Alpheus, northwest of Buphagium, and southeast of Heræa.—2. A demus in Attica, on the frontiers of Bœotia, belonging to the tribe Antiochis.

MELAMBIUM (Μελάμβιον), a town of Thessaly in Pelasgiotis, belonging to the territory of Scotussa.

MELAMPUS (Μελάμπους). 1. Son of Amythaon by Idomene, or, according to others, by Aglaia or Rhodope, and a brother of Bias. He was looked upon by the ancients as the first mortal who had been endowed with prophetic powers, as the person who first practiced the medical art, and who established the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) in Greece. He is said to have been married to Iphianassa (others call her Iphianira or Cyrianassa), by whom he became the father of Mantius and Antiphates. Abas, Bias, Manto, and Pronoe are also named by some writers as his children. Before his house there stood an oak tree containing a serpent's nest. The old serpents were killed by his servants, but Melampus took care of the young ones and fed them carefully. One day, when he was asleep, they cleaned his ears with their tongues. On his waking, he perceived, to his astonishment, that he now understood the language of birds, and that with their assistance he could foretell the future. In addition to this, he acquired the power of prophesying from the victims that were offered to the gods; and, [illegible] having an interview with Apollo on the [illegible] of the Alpheus, he became a most [illegible] soothsayer. During his residence at Py[illegible] brother Bias was one of the suitors for the [illegible] of Pero, the daughter of Neleus. The [illegible] promised his daughter to the man who [illegible] bring him the oxen of Iphiclus, which [illegible] guarded by a dog whom neither man nor [illegible] could approach. Melampus undertook the [illegible] of procuring the oxen for his brother, al[illegible] he knew that the thief would be caught [illegible] kept in imprisonment for a year, after which [illegible] was to come into possession of the [illegible] Things turned out as he had said; Melam[illegible] was thrown into prison, and in his captivity [illegible] learned from the wood-worms that the buil[illegible] in which he was imprisoned would soon [illegible] down. He accordingly demanded to be let [illegible] and as Phylacus and Iphiclus thus became [illegible] quainted with his prophetic powers, they as[illegible] him in what manner Iphiclus, who had no [illegible] dren, was to become father. Melampus, on [illegible] suggestion of a vulture, advised Iphiclus to [illegible] the rust from the knife with which Phyla[illegible] had once cut his son, and drink it in water [illegible] ing ten days. This was done, and Iphiclus [illegible] came the father of Podarces. Melampus [illegible] received the oxen as a reward for his [illegible] services, drove them to Pylos, and thus ga[illegible] Pero for his brother. Afterward Melampus [illegible] tained possession of a third of the kingdom [illegible] Argos in the following manner: In the [illegible] of Anaxagoras, king of Argos, the women [illegible] the kingdom were seized with madness, and roamed about the country in a frantic state. Melampus cured them of their phrensy, on condition that he and his brother Bias should receive an equal share with Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos. Melampus and Bias married the two daughters of Prœtus, and ruled over two thirds of Argos.—2. The author of two little Greek works still extant, entitled Divinatio ex palpitatione and De Nævis Oleaceis in Corpore. He lived probably in the third century B.C. at Alexandrea. Both the works are full of superstitions and absurdities. Edited by Franz in his Scriptores Physiognomiæ Veteres, Altenburg, 1780.

MELANCHLÆNI (Μελάγχλαινοι), a people in the north of Sarmatia Asiatica, about the upper course of the River Tanaïs (now Don), resembling the Scythians in manners, though of a different race. Their Greek name was derived from their dark clothing.

[MELANDEPTÆ (Μελανδέπται) or MELANDITÆ (Μελανδῖται), a people of Thrace, in the mountains northwest of Byzantium, along the coast of the Pontus Euxinus.]

[MELANEUS (Μελανεύς). 1. Son of Apollo, king of the Dryopes, was a famous archer; he obtained from Perieres, king of Messenia, a town which he named after his wife Œchalia.—2. Father of Amphimedon in Ithaca.]

MELANIPPE (Μελανίππη). 1. Daughter of Chiron, also called Evippe. Being with child by Æolus, she fled to Mount Pelion; and in order that her condition might not become known, she prayed to be metamorphosed into a mare. Diana (Artemis) granted her prayer, and in the form of a horse she was placed among the stars

Another account describes her metamorphosis as a punishment for having despised Diana (Artemis), or for having divulged the counsels of the gods.—[2. A queen of the Amazons, taken captive by Hercules; she obtained her freedom by surrendering her girdle to the hero.

Melanippĭdes (Μελανιππίδης), of Melos, a celebrated lyric poet in the department of the dithyramb. He flourished about B.C. 440, and lived for some time at the court of Perdiccas, of Macedonia, and there died. His high reputation as a poet is intimated by Xenophon, who makes Aristodemus give him the first place among dithyrambic poets, by the side of Homer, Sophocles, Polycletus, and Zeuxis, as the chief masters in their respective arts; and by Plutarch, who mentions him, with Simonides and Euripides, as among the most distinguished masters of music. Several verses of his poetry are still preserved. Vid. Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Græc., p. 847–850. Some writers, following the authority of Suidas, make two poets of this name.

Melanippus (Μελάνιππος). 1. Son of Astacus of Thebes, who, in the attack of the Seven on his native city, slew Tydeus and Mecisteus. His tomb was shown in the neighborhood of Thebes, on the road to Chalcis.—[2. A Trojan, slain by Teucer.—3. Another Trojan warrior, son of Hicetaon, slain by Antilochus.—4. Another Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus.—5. A son of Theseus and Perigune, gained the prize in running at the games celebrated by the Epigoni after the capture of Thebes.]

Melanogætŭli. Vid. Gætulia.

Melanthĭus (Μελάνθιος). 1. Also called Melantheus, son of Dolius, was a goat-herd of Ulysses, who sided with the suitors of Penelope, and was killed by Ulysses.—2. An Athenian tragic poet, of whom little is known beyond the attacks made on him by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. The most important passage respecting him is in the Peace of Aristophanes (796, &c.). He was celebrated for his wit, of which several specimens are preserved by Plutarch.—3. Or Melanthus, an eminent Greek painter of the Sicyonian school, was contemporary with Apelles (B.C. 332), with whom he studied under Pamphilus. He was one of the best colorists of all the Greek painters.—[4. Leader of the twenty ships sent by the Athenians to the aid of Aristagoras of Miletus in his revolt against the Persian government.]

Melanthĭus (Μελάνθιος, now probably Melet-Irma), a river of Pontus, in Asia Minor, east of the Promontorium Jasonium; the boundary between Pontus Polemoniacus and Pontus Cappadocius.

[Melantho (Μελανθώ), daughter of Dolius, sister of the goat-herd Melanthius (vid. Melanthius), female attendant upon Penelope, was put to death by Ulysses because she had aided the suitors.]

Melanthus or Melanthĭus (Μέλανθος). 1. One of the Nelidæ, and king of Messenia, whence he was driven out by the Heraclidæ, on their conquest of the Peloponnesus; and, following the instructions of the Delphic oracle, took refuge in Attica. In a war between the Athenians and Bœotians, Xanthus, the Bœotian king, challenged Thymœtes, king of Athens and the last of the Theseidæ, to single combat. Thymœtes declined the challenge on the ground of age and infirmity. So ran the story, which strove afterward to disguise the violent change of dynasty; and Melanthus undertook it on condition of being rewarded with the throne in the event of success. He slew Xanthus, and became king, to the exclusion of the Theseidæ According to Pausanias, the conqueror of Xanthus was Andropompus, the father of Melanthus; according to Aristotle, it was Codrus, his son.—[2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who wished to carry off Bacchus (Dionysus), but were changed into dolphins.]

[Melas (Μέλας). 1. A son of Phrixus and Chalciope, married Eurycléa, by whom he became father of Hyperes.—2. A son of Porthaon and Euryte, and brother of Œneus.]

Melas (Μέλας), the name of several rivers, whose waters were of a dark color. 1. (Now Mauro Nero or Mauro Potamo), a small river in Bœotia, which rises seven stadia north of Orchomenus, becomes navigable almost from its source, flows between Orchomenus and Aspledon, and loses the greater part of its waters in the marshes connected with Lake Copais. A small portion of its waters fell in ancient times into the River Cephisus.—2. A river of Thessaly, in the district Malis, flows near Heraclea and Trachis, and falls into the Maliac Gulf.—3. A river of Thessaly in Phthiotis, falls into the Apidanus.—4. A river of Thrace, flows first southwest, then northwest, and falls north of Cardia into the Melas Sinus.—5. A river in the northeast of Sicily, which flows into the sea between Mylæ and Naulochus, through excellent meadows, in which the oxen of the sun are said to have fed.—6. (Now Manaugat-Su), a navigable river, fifty stadia (five geographical miles) east of Side, was the boundary between Pamphylia and Cilicia.—7. (Now Kara-Su, i. e., the Black River), in Cappadocia, rises in Mount Argæus, flows past Mazaca, and, after forming a succession of morasses, falls into the Halys, and not (as Strabo says) into the Euphrates.

Melas Sinus (Μέλας κόλπος: now Gulf of Saros), a gulf of the Ægæan Sea, between the coast of Thrace on the northwest and the Thracian Chersonesus on the southeast, into which the River Melas flows.

Meldi or Meldæ, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the borders of Belgica, and upon the River Sequana (now Seine), in whose territory Cæsar built forty ships for his expedition against Britain.

Meleăger (Μελέαγρος). 1. Son of Œneus and Althæa, the daughter of Thestius, husband of Cleopatra, and father of Polydora. Others call him a son of Mars (Ares) and Althæa. He was one of the most famous Ætolian heroes of Calydon, and distinguished himself by his skill in throwing the javelin. He took part in the Argonautic expedition. On his return home, the fields of Calydon were laid waste by a monstrous boar, which Diana (Artemis) had sent against the country as a punishment, because Œneus, the king of the place, once neglected to offer up a sacrifice to the goddess. No one dared encounter the terrible animal, till at length Meleager, with a band of other heroes, went out to hunt the boar. He slew the animal; but the Calydonians and Curetes quarrelled about the nead and hid., and at length waged open war against each other. The Calydonians were always victorious, so long as Meleager went out with them. But when his mother Althæa pronounced a curse upon him, enraged at the death of her brother who had fallen in the fight, Meleager stayed at home with his wife Cleopatra. The Curetes now began to press Calydon very hard. It was in vain that the old men of the town made him the most brilliant promises if he would again join in the fight, and that his father, his sisters, and his mother supplicated him. At length, however, he yielded to the prayers of his wife Cleopatra: he put the Curetes to flight, but he never returned home, for the Erinnys, who had heard the curse of his mother, overtook him. Such is the more ancient form of the legend, as we find it in Homer. (Il., ix., 527, seq.) In the later traditions Meleager collects the heroes from all parts of Greece to join him in the hunt. Among others was the fair maiden Atalanta; but the heroes refused to hunt with her, until Meleager, who was in love with her, overcame their opposition. Atalanta gave the animal the first wound, which was at length slain by Meleager. He presented the hide to Atalanta, but the sons of Thestius took it from her, whereupon Meleager in a rage slew them. This, however, was the cause of his own death, which came to pass in the following way. When he was seven days old the Mœræ appeared, declaring that the boy would die as soon as the piece of wood which was burning on the hearth should be consumed. Althæa, upon hearing this, extinguished the firebrand, and concealed it in a chest. Meleager himself became invulnerable; but after he had killed the brothers of his mother, she lighted the piece of wood, and Meleager died. Althæa, too late repenting of what she had done, put an end to her life; and Cleopatra died of grief. The sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Diana (Artemis) changed them into Guinea-hens (μελεαγρίδες), which were transferred to the island of Leros. Even in this condition they mourned during a certain part of the year for their brother. Two of them, Gorge and Deïanira, through the mediation of Bacchus (Dionysus), were not metamorphosed.—2. Son of Neoptolemus, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great. After the death of Alexander the Great (B.C. 323) Meleager resisted the claims of Perdiccas to the regency, and was eventually associated with the latter in this office. Shortly afterward, however, he was put to death by order of Perdiccas.—[3. Commander of a squadron of cavalry in the army of Alexander the Great at the battle of Arbela. He was afterward slain in an insurrection against the officers left by Antigonus in the government of Media.]—4. Son of Eucrates, the celebrated writer and collector of epigrams, was a native of Gadara in Palestine, and lived about B.C. 60. There are one hundred and thirty-one of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology, written in a good Greek style, though somewhat affected, and distinguished by sophistic acumen and amatory fancy. An account of his collection of epigrams is given under PLANUDES.

[MELES (Μέλης), a small stream of Ionia flowing by Smyrna, on the banks of which Ho[mer] is said to have been born; (according to an[oth]er account, he composed his poems in a g[rot]to at its source) and hence was called M[ele]sigenes (Μελησιγένης): from this also was [de]rived the phrase Meletææ chartæ in Tib[ull.] Another account makes Meles, the god o[f the] stream, to have been the father of Homer.]

[MELESANDER (Μελήσανδρος), an Athe[nian] general, who was sent out with six ships in [the] year 430 B.C. against Caria and Lycia, [ki]lled [in] battle in Lycia.]

[MELESIPPUS (Μελήσιππος), a Lacedæmonia[n,] one of the ambassadors sent to Athens B[.C.] 432, and again the next year to demand t[he] restoration of the independence of the Gr[eek] states, but without success.]

MĔLĒTUS or MELITUS (Μέλητος: Μέλιτος), [an] obscure tragic poet, but notorious as one of t[he] accusers of Socrates, was an Athenian, of t[he] Pitthean demus. He is represented by Pl[ato] and Aristophanes and their scholiasts as a fr[igid] and licentious poet, and a worthless and prof[li]gate man. In the accusation of Socrates it w[as] Meletus who laid the indictment before t[he] archon Basileus; but, in reality, he was th[e] most insignificant of the accusers; and, accord[]ing to one account, he was bribed by Anyt[us] and Lycon to take part in the affair. Soon afte[r] the death of Socrates, the Athenians repent[ed] of their injustice, and Meletus was stoned to death as one of the authors of their folly.

MĔLĬA (Μελία), a nymph, daughter of Oceanus, became by Inachus the mother of Phoroneus and Ægialeus or Pegeus; and by Silenus the mother of the centaur Pholus; and by Neptune (Poseidon) of Amycus. She was carried off by Apollo, and became by him the mother of Ismenius and of the seer Tenerus. She was worshipped in the Ismenium, the sanctuary of Apollo, near Thebes. In the plural form, the Meliæ or Meliades (Μελίαι, Μελιάδες) are the nymphs who, along with the Gigantes and Erinnyes, sprang from the drops of blood that fell from Cœlus (Uranus) and were received by Terra (Gæa). The nymphs that nursed Jupiter (Zeus) are likewise called Meliæ.

MELIBŒA (Μελίβοια: Μελιβοεύς). 1. A town on the coast of Thessaly, in Magnesia, between Mount Ossa and Mount Pelion, is said to have been built by Magnes, and to have been named Melibœa in honor of his wife. It is mentioned by Homer as belonging to the dominions of Philoctetes, who is hence called by Virgil (Æn., iii., 401) dux Melibœus. It was celebrated for its purple dye. (Lucret., ii., 499; Virg., Æn., v., 251.)—2. A small island at the mouth of the River Orontes, in Syria.

MELICERTES. Vid. PALÆMON.

[MELINOPHAGI (Μελινοφάγοι, "Millet-eaters"), a Thracian people on the coast of Salmydessus, whom the Greeks named after their chief article of food, not knowing their real name.]

MELISSA (Μέλισσα). 1. A nymph said to have discovered the use of honey, and from whom bees were believed to have received their name (μέλισσαι). There can be no doubt, however, that the name really came from μέλι, honey, and was hence given to nymphs. According to some traditions, bees were nymphs metamorphosed. Hence the nymphs who fed the infant Jupiter (Zeus) with honey are called Melissæ.—2. The name of priestesses in general, but more especially of the priestesses of Ceres (Demeter), Proserpina (Persephone), Apollo, and Diana (Artemis).—3. Wife of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, and daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, was slain by her husband. Vid. PERIANDER.

[MELISSA (Μέλισσα), a village in the eastern part of Phrygia Magna, between Synnada and Metropolis, with the tomb of Alcibiades, where, at Hadrian's order, a statue was erected to him of Parian marble and sacrifices annually offered.]

MELISSUS (Μέλισσος). 1. Of Samos, a Greek philosopher, the son of Ithagenes, was, according to the common account, the commander of the fleet opposed to Pericles, B.C. 440. But he is not mentioned by Thucydides, and ought probably to be placed much earlier, as he is said to have been connected with Heraclitus, and to have been a disciple of Parmenides. It appears from the fragments of his work, which was written in prose, and in the Ionic dialect, that he adopted the doctrines of the Eleatics. —2. A Latin grammarian and a comic poet, was a freedman of Mæcenas, and was intrusted by Augustus with the arrangement of the library in the portico of Octavia.

MĔLĬTA or MĔLĬTE (Μελίτη: Μελιταῖος, Melitensis). 1. (Now Malta), an island in the Mediterranean Sea, situated fifty-eight miles from the nearest point of Sicily, and one hundred and seventy-nine miles from the nearest point of Africa. Its greatest length is seventeen miles and a quarter, and its greatest breadth nine miles and a quarter. The island was first colonized by the Phœnicians, who used it as a place of refuge for their ships, on account of its excellent harbors. It afterward passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, but was taken possession of by the Romans in the second Punic war, and annexed to the province of Sicily. The Romans, however, appear to have neglected the island, and it is mentioned by Cicero as a frequent resort of pirates. It contained a town of the same name, founded by the Carthaginians, and two celebrated temples, one of Juno on a promontory near the town, and another of Hercules in the southeast of the island. It is celebrated in sacred history as the island on which the Apostle Paul was shipwrecked; though some writers erroneously suppose that the apostle was shipwrecked on the island of the same name off the Illyrian coast. The inhabitants manufactured fine cloth, which was in much request at Rome. They also exported a considerable quantity of honey; and from this island, according to some authorities, came the catuli Melitæi, the favorite lap-dogs of the Roman ladies, though other writers make them come from the island off the Illyrian coast.—2. (Now Meleda), a small island in the Adriatic Sea, off the coast of Illyria (Dalmatia), northwest of Epidaurus.—3. A demus in Attica, which also formed part of the city of Athens, was situated south of the inner Ceramicus, and probably included the hill of the Museum. It was said to have derived its name from a nymph Melite, with whom Hercules was in love, and it therefore contained a temple of this god. One of the gates of Athens was called the Melitian gate, because it led to this demus. Vid p. 122, b.—4. A lake in Ætolia, near the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to the territory of the town Œniadæ.

MELITÆA, MELITĒA, or MELITĪA (Μελιταία, Μελίτεια, Μελιτία: Μελιτιεύς), a town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, on the northern slope of Mount Othrys, and near the River Enipeus. It is said to have been called Pyrrha [in] more ancient times, and the sepulchre of Hellen was shown in its market-place.

MĔLĬTE (Μελίτη). 1. A nymph, one of the Nereides, a daughter of Nereus and Doris.—[2. A Naiad, daughter of the river-god Ægæus, became by Hercules mother of Hyllus in the land of the Phæacians.]

MELITĒNE (Μελιτηνή), a district of Armenia Minor, between the Anti-Taurus and the Euphrates, celebrated for its fertility, and especially for its fruit-trees, oil, and wine. It possessed no great town until the first century of our era, when a city, also called Melitene (now Malatiyah) was built on a tributary of the Euphrates, and near that river itself, probably on the site of a very ancient fort. This became a place of considerable importance; the centre of several roads; the station, under Titus, of the twelfth legion; and, in the later division of the provinces, the capital of Armenia Secunda. In A.D. 577 it was the scene of a victory gained by the Romans over the Persians under Chosroes I.

MĔLĬTO (Μελίτων), a Christian writer of considerable eminence, was bishop of Sardes in the reign of M. Aurelius, to whom he presented an Apology for the Christians. Of his numerous works only fragments are extant.

MELLA or MELA (now Mella), a river in Gallia Transpadana, which flows by Brixia and falls into the Ollius (now Oglio).

MELLARĬA. 1. A town of the Bastuli in Hispania Bætica, between Belon and Calpe, on the road from Gades to Malaca.—2. A town in the same province, considerably north of the former, on the road from Corduba to Emerita MELODŪNUM (now Melun), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island of the Sequana (now Seine), and on the road from Agendicum to Lutetia Parisiorum.

MĒLOS (Μῆλος: Μήλιος: now Milo), an island in the Ægean Sea, and the most westerly of the group of the Cyclades, whence it was called Zephyria by Aristotle. It is about seventy miles north of the coast of Crete, and sixty-five east of the coast of Peloponnesus. Its length is about fourteen miles from east to west, and its breadth about eight miles. It contains on the north a deep bay, which forms an excellent harbor, and on which was situated a town, bearing the same name as the island. The island is of volcanic origin; it contains hot springs, and mines of sulphur and alum. Its soil is very fertile, and it produced in antiquity as it does at present, abundance of corn, oil, wine, &c. It was first colonized by the Phœnicians, who are said to have called it Byblus or Byblis, after the Phœnician town Byblus. It was afterward colonized by Lacedæmonians, or at least by Dorians; and consequently in the Peloponnesian war it embraced the side of Sparta. In B.C. 426 the Athenians made an unsuccessful attack upon the island; but in 416 they obtained possession of the town after a siege of several months, whereupon they killed all the adult males, sold the women and children as slaves, and peopled the island by an Athenian colony. Melos was the birth-place of Diagoras, the atheist, whence Aristophanes calls Socrates also the Melian.

Melpŏmĕne (Μελπομένη), i. e., the singing goddess, one of the nine Muses, who presided over Tragedy. Vid. Musæ.

[Melpum (now Melza), a city of Gallia Transpadana, in the territory of the Insubres.]

[Melsus (now Narcea), a small stream in the territory of the Astures, in Hispania Tarraconensis, flowing into the Oceanus Cantabricus, west of Flavionovia.]

Memĭni, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, on the western bank of the Druentia, whose chief town was Carpentoracte (now Carpentras).

Memmĭa Gens, a plebeian house at Rome, whose members do not occur in history before B.C. 173, but who pretended to be descended from the Trojan Mnestheus. (Virg., Æn., v. 117.)

Memmĭus. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 111, was an ardent opponent of the oligarchical party at Rome during the Jugurthine war. Among the nobles impeached by Memmius were L. Calpurnius Bestia and M. Æmilius Scaurus. Memmius was slain by the mob of Saturninus and Glaucia, while a candidate for the consulship in 100.—2. C. Memmius Gemellus, tribune of the plebs 66, curule ædile 60, and prætor 58. He belonged at that time to the Senatorian party, since he impeached P. Vatinius, opposed P. Clodius, and was vehement in his invectives against Julius Cæsar. But before he competed for the consulship, 54, he had been reconciled to Cæsar, who supported him with all his interest. Memmius, however, again offended Cæsar by revealing a certain coalition with his opponents at the comitia. He was impeached for ambitus, and, receiving no aid from Cæsar, withdrew from Rome to Mytilene, where he was living in the year of Cicero's proconsulate. Memmius married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced after having by her at least one son, C. Memmius. Vid. No. 3. He was eminent both in literature and in eloquence. Lucretius dedicated his poem, De Rerum Natura, to him. He was a man of profligate character, and wrote indecent poems.—3. C. Memmius, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs 54, when he prosecuted A. Gabinius for malversation in his province of Syria, and Domitius Calvinus for ambitus at his consular comitia. Memmius was step-son of T. Annius Milo, who married his mother Fausta after her divorce. He was consul suffectus 34.—4. P. Memmius Regulus, consul suffectus A.D. 31, afterward præfect of Macedonia and Achaia. He was the husband of Lollia Paulina, and was compelled by Caligula to divorce her.

Memnon (Μέμνων). 1. The beautiful son of Tithonus and Eos (Aurora), and brother of Emathion. He is rarely mentioned by Homer, and must be regarded essentially as a post-Homeric hero. According to these later traditions, he was a prince of the Æthiopians, who ca[me to] the assistance of his uncle Priam, for Tit[honus] and Priam were half-brothers, being both [sons] of Laomedon by different mothers. Resp[ecting] his expedition to Troy there are differ[ent le]gends. According to some, Memnon the Æ[thi]opian first went to Egypt, thence to Susa, [and] thence to Troy. At Susa, which had been f[ound]ed by Tithonus, Memnon built the acro[polis,] which was called after him the Memno[nium.] According to others, Tithonus was the gov[ern]or of a Persian province and the favori[te of] Teutamus; and Memnon obtained the c[om]mand of a large host of Æthiopians and S[usians] to succor Priam. Memnon came to the [war] in armor made for him by Vulcan (Hephæs[tus]). He slew Antilochus, the son of Nestor, but [was] himself slain by Achilles after a long and f[ierce] combat. While the two heroes were fig[hting,] Jupiter (Zeus) weighed their fates, and the s[cale] containing Memnon's sank. His mother [was] inconsolable at his death. She wept for [him] every morning; and the dew-drops of the m[orn]ing are the tears of Aurora (Eos). To s[oothe] the grief of his mother, Jupiter (Zeus) ca[used] a number of birds to issue out of the fu[neral] pile, on which the body of Memnon was b[urn]ing, which, after flying thrice around the b[urn]ing pile, divided into two separate bodies, [and] fought so fiercely that half of them fell d[own] upon the ashes of the hero, and thus form[ed a] funeral sacrifice for him. These birds [were] called Memnonides, and, according to a st[ory] current on the Hellespont, they visited e[very] year the tomb of the hero. At the entrea[ty] of Aurora (Eos), Jupiter (Zeus) conferred i[m]mortality upon Memnon. At a comparativ[ely] late period, the Greeks gave the name of Mem[non] to the colossal statue in the neighborhood of Thebes, which was said to give forth a sou[nd] like the snapping asunder of a chord when [it] was struck by the first rays of the rising su[n]. Although the Greeks gave this name to th[e] statue, they were well aware that the Egyptia[ns] did not call the statue Memnon, but Amenophi[s.] This figure was made of black stone, in a sit[]ting posture, with its feet close together, and th[e] hands leaning on the seat. Several very in[]genious conjectures have been propounded re[]specting the alleged meaning of the so-calle[d] statue of Memnon. Some have asserted tha[t] it served for astronomical purposes, and other[s] that it had reference to the mystic worship o[f] the sun and light, but there can be little dou[bt] that the statue represented nothing else tha[n] the Egyptian king Amenophis.—2. A native o[f] Rhodes, joined Artabazus, satrap of Lowe[r] Phrygia, who had married his sister, in his re[]volt against Darius Ochus. When fortune de[]serted the insurgents, they fled to the court o[f] Philip. Mentor, the brother of Memnon, bei[ng] high in favor with Darius, interceded on behal[f] of Artabazus and Memnon, who were pardone[d] and again received into favor. On the death of Mentor, Memnon, who possessed great mili[]tary skill and experience, succeeded him in his authority, which extended over all the wester[n] coast of Asia Minor (about B.C. 336). Whe[n] Alexander invaded Asia, Memnon defended Halicarnassus against Alexander until it was no longer possible to hold out, he then collect[ed]

n army and a fleet, with the design of carry- the war into Greece, but died at Mytilene in , before he could carry his plan into execu- . His death was an irreparable loss to the sian cause, for several Greek states were ared to join him had he carried the war into ece —3. A native of Heraclea Pontica, wrote ge work on the history of that city. Of how y books it consisted, we do not know. Pho- had read from the ninth to the sixteenth usive, of which portion he has made a tol- ly copious abstract. The first eight books ad not read, and he speaks of other books r the sixteenth. The ninth book began with ccount of the tyrant Clearchus, the disciple Plato and Isocrates, and the sixteenth book e down to the time of Julius Cæsar, after latter had obtained the supreme power. work was probably written in the time of astus, and certainly not later than the time Iadrian or the Antonines. The Excerpta Photius are published separately by Orelli, , 1816

MEMNONIUM and -IA (Μεμνόνειον, Μεμνόνεια), e names applied by the Greeks to certain ancient buildings and monuments in Egypt Asia, which they supposed to have been ted by or in honor of MEMNON. 1. The t celebrated of these was a great temple at bes, described by Strabo, and commonly tified by modern travellers with the mag- ent ruins of the temple of Remeses the at. at Western Thebes, or, as it is usually ed, the tomb of Osymandyas, from its agree- nt with the description of that monument giv- by Diodorus. There are, however, strong unds for supposing that the true Memnoni- , described by Strabo, stood behind the two ssal sitting statues on the plain of Thebes, of which is clearly the vocal statue of Mem- , and that it has entirely disappeared.—2 ABYDOS, No. 2.—3. The citadel of Susa was alled, and its erection was ascribed to the nnon who appears in the legends of the Tro- war; but there is no reason to suppose that connection of Memnon with the Persian cap- existed before the Persian conquest of Egypt.

MEMPHIS (Μέμφις, Μενφ: in the Old Testament, ph: Μεμφίτης, Memphites: now ruins at Menf Metrahenny), a great city of Egypt, second mportance only to Thebes, after the fall of ch it became the capital of the whole country, sition which it had previously shared with bes. It was of unknown antiquity, its found- n being ascribed to Menes. It stood on the (western) bank of the Nile, about ten miles e the Pyramids of Jizeh, near the northern t of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, a e of which (Μεμφίτης) was named after the . It was connected by canals with the lakes Moeris and Mareotis, and was the great centre he commerce of Egypt until the Persian con- st (B.C. 524), when Cambyses partially de- yed the city. After the foundation of Alex- rea it sank into insignificance, and was final- destroyed at the Arab conquest in the sev- h century. In the time of its splendor it is l to have been one hundred and fifty stadia circumference, and half a day's journey in ry direction. Of the splendid buildings with ich it was adorned, the chief were the palace of the Pharaohs; the temple-palace of the god bull Apis; the temple of Serapis, with its ave nue of sphinxes, now covered by the sand of the desert; and the temple of Vulcan (Hephæstus), the Egyptian Phtha, of whose worship Memphis was the chief seat. The ruins of this temple, and of other buildings, still cover a large por- tion of the plain between the Nile and the west- ern range of hills which skirt its valley.

MENÆNUM or MENÆ (Menenius, Cic., Menani nus, Plin., but on coins Menænus: now Mineo) a town on the eastern coast of Sicily, south of Hybla, the birth-place and residence of the Si- celian chief Ducetius, who was long a formida- ble enemy of the Greek cities in Sicily. Vid DUCETIUS. On his fall the town lost all its im portance.

MENALIPPUS. Vid. MELANIPPUS.

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), of Athens, the most distinguished poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Diopithes and Hegesistrate, and flour ished in the time of the successors of Alexan- der. He was born B.C. 342. His father, Dio- pithes, commanded the Athenian forces on the Hellespont in the year of his son's birth. Alex is, the comic poet, was the uncle of Menander on the father's side; and we may naturally sup- pose that the young Menander derived from his uncle his taste for the comic drama, and was instructed by him in its rules of composition. His character must have been greatly influenced by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicu- rus, of whom the former was his teacher and the latter his intimate friend. His taste and sympathies were altogether with the philosophy of Epicurus; and in an epigram he declared that "as Themistocles rescued Greece from slavery, so Epicurus from unreason." From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Characteres of the philosopher, and which form- ed the great charm of the comedies of Menan- der. His master's attention to external ele- gance and comfort he not only imitated, but, as was natural in a man of an elegant person, a joyous spirit, and a serene and easy temper, he carried it to the extreme of luxury and effem- inacy. The moral character of Menander is de- fended by modern writers against the asper- sions of Suidas and others. Thus much is cer- tain, that his comedies contain nothing offens- ive, at least to the taste of his own and the fol- lowing ages, none of the purest, it must be ad- mitted, as they were frequently acted at private banquets. Of the actual events of his life we know but little. He enjoyed the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus, whose attention was first drawn to him by admiration of his works. Ptol- emy, the son of Lagus, was also one of his ad- mirers; and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandrea, but Menander seems to have de- clined the proffered honor. He died at Athens B.C. 291, at the age of 52, and is said to have been drowned while swimming in the harbor of Piræus. Notwithstanding Menander's fame as a poet, his public dramatic career was not emi- nently successful; for, though he composed up- ward of one hundred comedies, he gained the prize only eight times. His preference for ele- gant exhibitions of character above coarse jesting may have been the reason why he was not so great a favorite with the common people as his principal rival, Philemon, who is said, moreover, to have used unfair means of gaining popularity. Menander appears to have borne the popular neglect very lightly, in the consciousness of his superiority; and once when he happened to meet Philemon, he is said to have asked him, "Pray, Philemon, do not you blush when you gain a victory over me?" The neglect of Menander's contemporaries has been amply compensated by his posthumous fame. His comedies retained their place on the stage down to the time of Plutarch, and the unanimous consent of antiquity placed him at the head of the New Comedy, and on an equality with the great masters of the various kinds of poetry. His comedies were imitated by the Roman dramatists, particularly by Terence, who was little more than a translator of Menander. But we can not form, from any one play of Terence, a fair notion of the corresponding play of Menander, as the Roman poet frequently compressed two of Menander's plays into one. It was this mixing up of different plays that Cæsar pointed to by the phrase O dimidiate Menander, in the epigram which he wrote upon Terence. Of Menander's comedies only fragments are extant. The best edition of them is by Meineke, in his Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, Berol., 1841.

[MENANDER (Μένανδρος). 1. An Athenian officer in the Sicilian expedition, associated in the supreme command with Nicias, toward the end of the year B.C. 414: he afterward served with Alcibiades against Pharnabazus, and was one of the commanders at the disastrous battle of Ægos-potami.—2. King of Bactria, was one of the most powerful of all the Greek rulers of that country, and one of those who made the most extensive conquests in India, reaching beyond the Hypanis or Sutledj.—3. Surnamed Protector, a Greek writer of Byzantium in the latter half of the sixth century. He wrote a history of the Eastern empire from A.D. 559 to 582 in eight books, of which considerable extracts have been preserved in the "Eclogæ Legationum" attributed to Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. Edited by Bekker and Niebuhr, Bonn, 1830.]

MENAPĬA (Μεναπία), a city of Bactriana, on the River Zariaspis.

MENAPĬI, a powerful people in the north of Gallia Belgica, originally dwelt on both banks of the Rhine, but were afterward driven out of their possessions on the right bank by the Usipetes and Tenchteri, and inhabited only the left bank near its mouth, and west of the Mosa. Their country was covered with forests and swamps. They had a fortress on the Mosa called Castellum Menapiorum (now Kessel).

MENAS (Μηνᾶς), also called MENŎDŌRUS (Μηνόδωρος) by Appian, a freedman of Pompey the Great, was one of the principal commanders of the fleet of Sextus Pompey in his war against Octavianus and Antony, B.C. 40. In 39 he tried in vain to dissuade his master from concluding a peace with Octavianus and Antony; and, at an entertainment given to them by Sextus on board his ship at Misenum, Menas suggested to him to cut the cables of the vessel, and, running it out to sea, dispatch both his rivals. The treacherous proposal, however, was rejected by Pompey. On the breaking out of the war again in 38, Menas deserted Pompey and went over to Octavianus. In 36 he returned to his old master's service; but in the course of the same year he again played the deserter and joined Octavianus. In 35 he accompanied Octavianus in the Pannonian campaign, and was slain at the siege of Siscia. According to the old scholiasts, this Menas is the person vehemently attacked by Horace in his fourth epode. This statement has been called in question by many modern commentators; but their arguments are far from satisfactory.

MENDE or MENDÆ (Μένδη, Μενδαῖος), a town on the western coast of the Macedonian peninsula Pellene and on the Thermaic Gulf, was a colony of the Eretrians, and was celebrated for its wine. It was for some time a place of considerable importance, but was ruined by the foundation of Cassandrea.

MENDES (Μένδης: Μενδήσιος: ruins near Ashmun-tarieh), a considerable city of the Delta of Egypt, on the southern side of the Lake of Tanis (now Menzaleh), and on the bank of one of the smaller arms of the Nile, named after it Μενδήσιον στόμα, the chief seat of the worship of MENDES.

MENECLES (Μενεκλῆς). 1. Of Barce in Cyrene, an historian of uncertain date.—2. Of Alabanda, a celebrated rhetorician. He and his brother Hierocles taught rhetoric at Rhodes, where the orator M. Antonius heard them, about B.C. 94.

MENECRĂTES (Μενεκράτης). 1. A Syracusan physician at the court of Philip, king of Macedon, B.C. 359–336. He made himself ridiculous by calling himself "Jupiter," and assuming divine honors. There is a tale that he was invited one day by Philip to a magnificent entertainment, where the other guests were sumptuously fed, while he himself had nothing but incense and libations, as not being subject to the human infirmity of hunger. He was at first pleased with his reception, but afterward perceiving the joke, and finding that no more substantial food was offered him, he left the party in disgust.—2. TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS MENECRATES, a physician mentioned by Galen, composed more than one hundred and fifty medical works, of which only a few fragments remain.

MENEDĒMUS (Μενέδημος), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Eretria, and, though of noble birth, was poor, and worked for a livelihood either as a builder or as a tent-maker. According to one story, he seized the opportunity afforded by his being sent on some military service to MEGARA to hear Plato, and abandoned the army to addict himself to philosophy; but it may be questioned whether he was old enough to have heard Plato before the death of the latter. According to another story, he and his friend Asclepiades got their livelihood as millers, working during the night, that they might have leisure for philosophy in the day. The two friends afterward became disciples of Stilpo at Megara. From Megara they went to Elis, and placed themselves under the instruction of some disciples of Phædo. On his return to Eretria Menedemus established a school of philosophy, which was called the Eretrian. He did not, however, confine himself to philosophcal pursuits, but took an active part in the political affairs of his native city, and came to be the leading man in the state. He went on various embassies to Lysimachus, Demetrius, and others; but, being suspected of the treacherous intention of betraying Eretria into the power of Antigonus, he quitted his native city secretly, and took refuge with Antigonus in Asia. Here he starved himself to death in the seventy-fourth year of his age, probably about B.C. 277. Of the philosophy of Menedemus little is known, except that it closely resembled that of the Megarian school. Vid. EUCLIDES, No. 2.

MENELĀI or -US, PORTUS (Μενελάϊος λίμην, Μενέλαος: now Marsa-Toubrouk, or Ras-el-Milhr ?), an ancient city on the coast of Marmarica, in Northern Africa, founded, according to tradition, by Menelaus. It is remarkable in history as the place where Agesilaus died.

MENELAÏUM (Μενελάϊον), a mountain in Laconia, southeast of Sparta, near Therapne, on which the heroum of Menelaus was situated, the foundations of which temple were discovered in the year 1834.

MENELĀUS (Μενέλαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλας). 1. Son of Plisthenes or Atreus, and younger brother of Agamemnon. His early life is related under AGAMEMNON. He was king of Lacedæmon, and married to the beautiful Helen, by whom he became the father of Hermione. When Helen had been carried off by Paris, Menelaus and Ulysses sailed to Troy in order to demand her restitution. Menelaus was hospitably treated by Antenor, but the journey was of no avail; and the Trojan Antimachus even advised his fellow-citizens to kill Menelaus and Ulysses. Thereupon Menelaus and his brother Agamemnon resolved to march against Troy with all the forces that Greece could muster. Agamemnon was chosen the commander-in-chief. In the Trojan war Menelaus was under the special protection of Juno (Hera) and Minerva (Athena), and distinguished himself by his bravery in battle. He killed many illustrious Trojans, and would have slain Paris also in single combat, had not the latter been carried off by Venus (Aphrodite) in a cloud. Menelaus was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse; and as soon as Troy was taken, he and Ulysses hastened to the house of Deiphobus, who had married Helen after the death of Paris, and put him to death in a barbarous manner. Menelaus is said to have been secretly introduced into the chamber of Deiphobus by Helen, who thus became reconciled to her former husband. He was among the first that sailed away from Troy, accompanied by his wife Helen and Nestor; but he was eight years wandering about the shores of the Mediterranean before he reached home. He arrived at Sparta on the very day on which Orestes was engaged in burying Clytæmnestra and Ægisthus. Henceforward he lived with Helen at Sparta in peace and wealth, and his palace shone in its splendor like the sun or the moon. When Telemachus visited Sparta to inquire after his father, Menelaus was solemnizing the marriage of his daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus, and of his son Megapenthes with a daughter of Alector. In the Homeric poems Menelaus is described as a man of an athletic figure; he spoke little, but what he said was always impressive; he was brave and courageous, but milder than Agamemnon, intelligent and hospitable. According to the prophecy of Proteus in the Odyssey, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium. According to a later tradition, he and Helen went to the Taurians, where they were sacrificed by Iphigenia to Diana (Artemis). Menelaus was worshipped as a hero at Therapne, where his tomb and that of Helen were shown. Respecting the tale that Helen never went to Troy, but was detained in Egypt, vid. HELENA.—2. Son of Lagus, and brother of Ptolemy Soter, held possession of Cyprus for his brother, but was defeated and driven out of the island by Demetrius Poliorcetes, B.C. 306.—3. A Greek mathematician, a native of Alexandrea, the author of an extant treatise in three books, on the Sphere. He made some astronomical observations at Rome in the first year of the Emperor Trajan, A.D. 98.

MENELĀUS (Μενέλαος), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Canopic branch of the Nile, named after the brother of Ptolemy the son of Lagus. It was made the capital of the district between the lakes of Mœris and Mareotis (νομὸς Μενελαΐτης).

MENENIUS LANĀTUS. 1. AGRIPPA, consul B.C. 503, conquered the Sabines. It was owing to his mediation that the first great rupture between the patricians and plebeians, when the latter seceded to the Sacred Mount, was brought to a happy and peaceful termination in 493, and it was upon this occasion he is said to have related to the plebeians his well-known fable of the belly and its members.—2. T., consul 477, was defeated by the Etruscans. He had previously allowed the Fabii to be destroyed by the Etruscans, although he might have assisted them with his army. For this act of treachery he was brought to trial by the tribunes and condemned to pay a fine. He took his punishment so much to heart, that he shut himself up in his house and died of grief.

MENES (Μήνης), first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of the Egyptians themselves. Herodotus records of him that he built Memphis on a piece of ground which he had rescued from the river by turning it from its former course, and erected therein a magnificent temple to Hephæstus (Phthah). Diodorus tells us that he introduced into Egypt the worship of the gods and the practice of sacrifices, as well as a more elegant and luxurious style of living. That he was a conqueror, like other founders of kingdoms, we learn from an extract from Manetho preserved by Eusebius. By Marsham and others he has been identified with the Mizraim of Scripture. According to some accounts he was killed by a hippopotamus.

MENESTHĒI PORTUS (now Puerto de S. Maria), a harbor in Hispania Bætica, not far from Gades, with an oracle of Menestheus, who is said in some legends to have settled in Spain.

[MENESTHES (Μενέσθης), a Greek warrior at the siege of Troy, slain by Hector.]

MENESTHEUS (Μενεσθεύς). 1. Son of Peteus, an Athenian king, who led the Athenians against Troy, and surpassed all other mortals in arranging the war-steeds and men for battle. With the assistance of the Tyndarids, he is said to have driven Theseus from his kingdom.—2. Son of Iphicrates, the famous Athenian general, by the daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace. He married the daughter of Timotheus; and in 356 was chosen commander in the Social war, his father and his father-in-law being appointed to aid him with their counsel and experience. They were all three impeached by their colleague, Chares, for alleged misconduct and treachery in the campaign; but Iphicrates and Menestheus were acquitted.

[Menesthius (Μενέσθιος). 1. Son of Areïthous, king of Arne in Bœotia, was slain by Paris.—2. Son of Sperchīus or of Borus and Polydora, nephew of Achilles, a leader of the Myrmidons before Troy.]

[Menestratus (Μενέστρατος), a sculptor, whose Hercules and Hecate were greatly admired. The latter stood in the opisthodomus of the temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, and was made of marble of such brilliancy that it was necessary to warn beholders to shade their eyes, says Pliny.]

Mēninx or Lotophagītis, afterward Girba (Μῆνιγξ, Λωτοφαγῖτις, Λωτοφάγων νῆσος: now Jerbah), a considerable island, close to the coast of Africa Propria, at the southeastern extremity of the Lesser Syrtis, with two cities, Meninx (now Menaz) on the northeast, and Girba, or Gerra, on the southwest. It was the birth-place of the emperors Vibius Gallus and Volusianus.

Menippe (Μενίππη), daughter of Orion and sister of Metioche. These two sisters put themselves to death of their own accord in order to propitiate the two Erinnyes, who had visited Aonia with a plague. They were metamorphosed by Proserpina (Persephone) and Pluto (Hades) into comets, and the Aonians erected to them a sanctuary near Orchomenos.

Menippus (Μένιππος). 1. A cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Cœle-Syria. He seems to have been a hearer of Diogenes, and flourished about B.C. 60. He amassed great wealth as a usurer (ἡμεροδανειστής), but was cheated out of it all, and committed suicide. We are told that he wrote nothing serious, but that his books were full of jests; whence it would appear that he was one of those cynic philosophers who threw all their teaching into a satirical form. In this character he is several times introduced by Lucian. His works are now entirely lost; but we have considerable fragments of Varro's Saturæ Menippeæ, written in imitation of Menippus.—[2. Of Stratonice, a Carian by birth, was the most accomplished orator of his time in all Asia. Cicero, who heard him, puts him almost on a level with the Attic orators.—3. Of Pergamus, a geographer, lived in the time of Augustus, and wrote a Περίπλους τῆς ἐντὸς θαλάττης, of which an abridgment was made by Marcianus, and of which some fragments are preserved. Vid. Marcianus.]

Mennis, a city of Adiabene, in Assyria, only mentioned by Curtius (v., 1).

[Menodorus (Μηνόδωρος). Vid. Menas.]

Menŏdŏtus (Μηνόδοτος), a physician of Nicomedia in Bithynia, who was a pupil of Antiochus of Laodicea, and tutor to Herodotus of Tarsus; he belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and lived probably about the beginning of the second century after Christ.

Menœceus (Μενοικεύς). 1. A Theban, grandson of Pentheus, and father of Hipponome, Jocasta, and Creon.—2. Grandson of the former, and son of Creon. He put an end to his life because Tiresias had declared that his death would bring victory to his country, when the seven Argive heroes marched against Thebes. His tomb was shown at Thebes near the Neïtian gate.

[Menœtes. 1. Pilot of the ship of Gyas, who threw him overboard for having delayed his vessel in the race at the celebration of the games in honor of Anchises.—2. An Arcadian who fought on the side of Æneas in Italy, and was slain by Turnus.]

Menœtius (Μενοίτιος). 1. Son of Iapetus and Clymene or Asia, and brother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. He was killed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning in the battle with the Titans, and was hurled into Tartarus.—2. Son of Actor and Ægina, husband of Polymele or Sthenele, and father of Patroclus, who is hence called Menœtiades. After Patroclus had slain the son of Amphidamas, Menœtius fled with him to Peleus in Phthia, and had him educated there.

[Menon (Μένων). 1. A Trojan warrior slain by Leonteus.—2. A citizen of Pharsalus in Thessaly, who aided the Athenians at Eion with twelve talents and two hundred horsemen, raised by himself from his own penestæ, and was rewarded for these services with the freedom of the city.]—3. A Thessalian adventurer, was one of the generals of the Greek mercenaries in the army of Cyrus the Younger when the latter marched into Upper Asia against his brother Artaxerxes, B.C. 401. After the death of Cyrus he was apprehended along with the other Greek generals by Tissaphernes, and was put to death by lingering tortures, which lasted for a whole year. His character is drawn in the blackest colors by Xenophon. He is the same as the Menon introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name.

Mens, a personification of mind, worshipped by the Romans. She had a sanctuary on the Capitol; and the object of her worship was that the citizens might always be guided by a right spirit.

Mentēsa (Mentesānus). 1. Surnamed Bastia, a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Castulo to Carthago Nova.—2. A small town of the Bastuli in the south of Hispania Bætica.

Mentor (Μέντωρ). 1. Son of Alcimus, and a faithful friend of Ulysses, [to whom the latter confided the supervision of his household when setting out for Troy. Minerva assumed his form to give instructions to the young Telemachus, and accompanied him as Mentor to the court of Nestor.—2. Father of Imbrius of Caria, who fought on the side of the Trojans, is called by Homer "rich in horses."]—3. A Greek of Rhodes, who, with his brother Memnon, rendered active assistance to Artabazus. When the latter found himself compelled to take refuge at the court of Philip, Mentor entered the service of Nectanabis, king of Egypt. He was sent to the assistance of Tennes, king of Sidon, in his revolt against Darius Ochus; and when Tennes went over to the Persians, Mentor was taken into the service of Darius. He rose rapidly in the favor of Darius, and eventually received a satrapy, including all the western coast of Asia Minor. His influence with Darius enabled him to procure the pardon of his brother Memnon. He died in possession of his satrapy, and was succeeded by his brother Memnon. Vid. Memnon.—4. The most celebrated silver-chaser among the Greeks, who must have flourished before B.C. 356. His works were vases and cups, which were most highly prized by the Romans.

[Mentŏres (Μέντορες), a people on the coast of Liburnia, in the district Mentorice (Μεντορική); they also possessed the islands situated on this coast in the Adriatic called "Insulæ Mentorides" (Μεντορίδες), now probably Veglia, Arbe, Cherso, &c.]

[Menyllus (Μένυλλος). 1. A Macedonian, appointed to command the Macedonian garrison in Munychia after the Lamiac war, B.C. 322. He was a just man, and on friendly terms with Phocion. He was replaced by Nicanor, B.C. 319, on the death of Antipater.—2. Of Alabanda, ambassador to Rome in B.C. 162, from Ptolemy VI. Philometor, to plead his cause against his younger brother Physcon: his mission, however, was unsuccessful. While at Rome, he, with Polybius, aided in effecting the escape of the Syrian prince Demetrius.]

Mercurĭi Promontorĭum. Vid. Hermæum.

Mercŭrĭus, a Roman divinity of commerce and gain. The character of the god is clear from his name, which is connected with merx and mercari. A temple was built to him as early as B.C. 495, near the Circus Maximus; an altar of the god existed near the Porta Capena, by the side of a well; and in later times a temple seems to have been built on the same spot. Under the name of the ill-willed (malevolus), he had a statue in what was called the vicus sobrius, or the sober street, in which no shops were allowed to be kept, and milk was offered to him there instead of wine. This statue had a purse in its hand, to indicate his functions. His festival was celebrated on the twenty-fifth of May, and chiefly by merchants, who also visited the well near the Porta Capena, to which magic powers were ascribed; and with water from that well they used to sprinkle themselves and their merchandise, that they might be purified, and yield a large profit. The Romans of later times identified Mercurius, the patron of merchants and tradespeople, with the Greek Hermes, and transferred all the attributes and myths of the latter to the former. The Fetiales, however, never recognized the identity, and, instead of the caduceus, used a sacred branch as the emblem of peace. The resemblance between Mercurius and Hermes is indeed very slight, and their identification is a proof of the thoughtless manner in which the Romans acted in this respect. Vid. Hermes.

Mercurĭus Trismegistus. Vid. Hermes Trismegistus.

Mērĭŏnes (Μηριόνης), a Cretan hero, son of Molus, who, conjointly with Idomeneus, led the Cretans in eighty ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and usually acted together with his friend Idomeneus. Later traditions relate that on his way homeward he was thrown on the coast of Sicily, where he was received by the Cretans who had settled there; whereas, according to others, he returned safely to Crete, and was buried and worshipped as a hero, together with Idomeneus, at Cnosus.

Mermĕrus (Μέρμερος). 1. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Macareus or Mormorus, was murdered, together with his brother Pheres, by his mother at Corinth.—2. Son of Pheres, and grandson of Jason and Medea.—[3. A Trojan, slain by Antilochus.—4. A Centaur, slain at the nuptials of Pirithous.]

Mermessus or Myrmessus (Μερμησσός, Μυρμησσός), also written Marmessus and Marpessus, a town of Mysia, in the territory of Lampsacus, not far from Polichna, the native place of a sibyl.

[Mermnadæ (Μερμνάδαι), a Lydian family, which, on the murder of Candaules by Gyges, succeeded the Heraclidæ on the throne of Lydia, and held it for five generations, about 716–546 B.C. The sovereigns of this family were Gyges, Ardys, Sadyattes, Alyattes, and Crœsus.]

Merobaudes, Flavĭus, a general and a poet, whose merits are recorded in an inscription on the base of a statue dug up in the Ulpian forum at Rome in the year 1812 or 1813. We learn from the inscription that the statue was erected in A.D. 435. Some fragments of the poems of Merobaudes were discovered by Niebuhr upon a palimpsest belonging to the monastery of St. Gall, and were published by him at Bonn, 1823, [and again in 1824; they are also printed in a volume of the Corpus Script. Byzant., with Corippus, edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1836.]

Mĕrŏē (Μερόη: now ports of Nubia and Sennar), the island, so called, and almost an island in reality, formed by the rivers Astapus (now Blue Nile) and Astaboras (now Atbarah), and the portion of the Nile between their mouths, was a district of Æthiopia. Its capital, also called Meroë, stood near the northern point of the island, on the eastern bank of the Nile, below the modern Shendy, where the plain, near the village of Assour, is covered with ruins of temples, pyramids, and other works in a style closely resembling the Egyptian. Standing in a fertile district, rich in timber and minerals, at the foot of the highlands of Abyssinia, and at the junction of two great rivers, Meroë became, at a very early period, a chief emporium for the trade between Egypt, Northern Africa, Æthiopia, Arabia, and India, and the capital of a powerful state. The government was a hierarchical monarchy, entirely in the hands of a ruling caste of priests, who chose a king from among themselves, bound him to govern according to their laws, and put him to death when they chose; until King Ergamenes (about B.C. 300) threw off the yoke of the priests, whom he massacred, and converted his kingdom into an absolute monarchy. The priests of Meroë were closely connected in origin and customs with those of Egypt; and, according to some traditions, the latter sprang from the former, and they from India; but the settlement of this point involves an important ethnical question, which lies beyond the limits of this book. For further details respecting the kingdom of Meroë, vid. ÆTHIOPIA. Meroë had a celebrated oracle of Ammon.

MEROM LACUS. Vid. SEMECHONITIS.

MĔRŎPĒ (Μερόπη). 1. One of the Heliades or sisters of Phaëthon.—2. Daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and wife of Sisyphus of Corinth, by whom she became the mother of Glaucus. In the constellation of the Pleiades she is the seventh and the least visible star, because she is ashamed of having had intercourse with a mortal man.—3. Daughter of Cypselus, wife of Cresphontes, and mother of Æpytus. For details, vid. ÆPYTUS.

MEROPS (Μέροψ). 1. King of the island of Cos, husband of the nymph Ethemea, and father of Eumelus. His wife was killed by Diana (Artemis) because she had neglected to worship that goddess. Merops, in order to rejoin his wife, wished to make away with himself, but Juno (Hera) changed him into an eagle, whom she placed among the stars.—2. King of the Æthiopians, by whose wife, Clymene, Helios became the father of Phaëthon.—3. King of Rhyndacus, on the Hellespont, also called Macar or Macareus, was a celebrated soothsayer, and father of Clite, Arisbe, Amphius, and Adrastus.—[4. A Trojan, companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

MERŬLA, L. CORNĒLIUS, was flamen dialis, and, on the deposition of L. Cinna in B.C. 87, was elected consul in his place. On the capture of Rome by Marius and Cinna at the close of the same year, Merula put an end to his own life in order to escape the hands of the executioner.

MESAMBRĬA (Μεσαμβρίη: now Bushehr), a peninsula on the coast of Persis, near the River Padargus.

MESCHĔLA (Μεσχέλα: probably near Bonah), a large city on the coast of Northern Africa, said to have been founded by Greeks returning from the Trojan war. It was taken by Eumachus, the lieutenant of Agathocles.

MESEMBRĬA (Μεσημβρία, Herod. Μεσαμβρίη: Μεσημβριανός). 1. (Now Missivria or Messuri), a celebrated town of Thrace on the Pontus Euxinus, and at the foot of Mount Hæmus, founded by the inhabitants of Chalcedon and Byzantium in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and hence called a colony of Megara, since those two towns were founded by the Megarians.—2. A town in Thrace, but of much less importance, on the coast of the Ægean Sea, and in the territory of the Cicones, near the mouth of the Lissus, and the most westerly of the Samothracian settlements on the main land.

MĔSĒNĒ (Μεσηνή, i. e., Midland), a name given to that part of Babylonia which consisted [of the] great island formed by the Euphrates, the [Ti]gris, and the Royal Canal, and contained, [there]fore, the greater part of Babylonia.

MESŎMĒDES (Μεσομήδης), a lyric and [epigram]matic poet under Hadrian and the Anto[nines] was a native of Crete, and a freedman [of Ha]drian, whose favorite Antinous he celebra[ted in] a poem. A salary, which he had received [from] Hadrian, was diminished by Antoninus [Pius]. Three poems of his are preserved in the G[reek] Anthology.

MĔSŎPŎTĂMĬA (Μεσοποταμία, Μέση τῶν [ποτα]μῶν: in the Old Testament, Aram Naha[raim], i. e., Syria between the Rivers: LXX., Μεσο[ποτα]μία Συρίας: now Al-Jesira, i. e., The Isla[nd]), [a] district of Western Asia, named from its [situa]tion between the Euphrates and the Tigri[s, by] which rivers the former divided it from [Syria] and Arabia on the west, the latter from As[syria] on the east: on the north it was separated [from] Armenia by a branch of the Taurus, called [Ma]sius, and on the south from Babylonia by [the] Median Wall. The name was first used by [the] Greeks in the time of the Seleucidæ. In e[arly] times the country was reckoned a part, so[me]times of Syria, and sometimes of Assyria. [Even] in the division of the Persian empire w[as not] recognized as a distinct country, but it belo[nged] to the satrapy of Babylonia. Excepting [the] mountainous region on the north and [north]east, formed by the chain of MASIUS, and [its] prolongation parallel to the Tigris, the coun[try] formed a vast plain, broken by few hills, w[ell] watered by rivers and canals, and very ferti[le] except in the southern part, which was m[ore] like the Arabian Desert on the opposite side of the Euphrates. Besides corn, and fruits, and spices (e. g., the amomum), it produced fine timber and supported large herds of cattle; in the southern, or desert part, there were numerous wild animals, such as wild asses, gazelles, ostriches, and lions. Its chief mineral products were naphtha and jet. The northern part of Mesopotamia was divided into the districts of MYGDONIA and OSROENE. It belonged successively to the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Macedonian, Syro-Grecian, Parthian, and later Persian empires. In a wider sense, the name is sometimes applied to the whole country between the Euphrates and the Tigris.

MESPĬLA (ἡ Μέσπιλα: ruins at Kouyounjik, opposite to Mosul, Layard: others give different sites for it), a city of Assyria, on the eastern side of the Tigris, which Xenophon (Anab. iii., 4) mentions as having been formerly a great city, inhabited by Medes, but in his time fallen to decay. It had a wall six parasangs in circuit, composed of two parts, namely, a base fifty feet thick and fifty high, of polished stone, full of shells (the limestone of the country), upon which was built a brick wall fifty feet thick and one hundred high. It had served, according to tradition, as the refuge for the Median queen when the Persians overthrew the empire of the Medes, and it resisted all the efforts of the Persian king to take it, until a thunder storm frightened the inhabitants into a surrender.

Messa (Μέσσα, Μέσση: now Mezapo), a town and harbor in Laconia, near Tænarum Promontorium.

Messabatēne or -īcē (Μεσσαβατηνή, Μεσσαβατική: Μεσσαβάται), a small district on the southeastern margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the borders of Media, Persis, and Susiana, reckoned sometimes to Persis and sometimes to Susiana. The name seems to be derived from the mountain passes in the district.

Messāla or Messalla, the name of a distinguished family of the Valeria gens at Rome. They appear for the first time on the consular Fasti in B.C. 263, and for the last in A.D. 506. 1. M'. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messala, was consul B.C. 263, and, in conjunction with his colleague M. Otacilius, carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians in Sicily. The two consuls concluded a peace with Hieron. In consequence of his relieving Messana, he obtained the cognomen of Messala. His triumph was distinguished by two remarkable monuments of his victory—by a pictorial representation of a battle with the Sicilian and Punic armies, which he placed in the Curia Hostilia, and by a sun-dial (horologium), from the booty of Catana, which was set up on a column behind the rostra in the forum. Messala was censor in 252.—2. M. Valerius Messala, consul 226.—3. M. Valerius Messala, prætor peregrinus 194, and consul 188, when he had the province of Liguria.—4. M. Valerius Messala, consul 161, and censor 154.—5. M. Valerius Messala Niger, prætor 63, consul 61, and censor 55. He belonged to the aristocratical party. He married a sister of the orator Q. Hortensius, by whom he had at least one son. —6. M. Valerius Messala, son of the preceding; consul 53; belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party; but in consequence, probably, of his enmity to Pompey, he joined Cæsar in the civil war, and served under him in Africa. He was in high repute for his skill in augury, on which science he wrote.—7. M. Valerius Messala Corvinus, son of the preceding, was partly educated at Athens, where probably began his intimacy with Horace and L. Bibulus. After Cæsar's death (44) he joined the republican party, and attached himself especially to Cassius, whom, long after, when he had become the friend of Augustus, he was accustomed to call "my general." Messala was proscribed; but since his kinsmen proved his absence from Rome at the time of Cæsar's assassination, the triumvirs erased his name from the list, and offered him security for his person and property. Messala, however, rejected their offers, followed Cassius into Asia, and at Philippi, in the first day's battle, turned Augustus's flank, stormed his camp, and narrowly missed taking him prisoner. After the death of Brutus and Cassius, Messala, with a numerous body of fugitives, took refuge in the island of Thasos. His followers, though defeated, were not disorganized, and offered him the command. But he induced them to accept honorable terms from Antony, to whom he attached himself until Cleopatra's influence made his ruin certain and easy to be foreseen. Messala then again changed his party, and served Augustus effectively in Sicily, 36; against the Salassians, a mountain tribe lying between the Graian and the Pennine Alps, 34; and at Actium, 31. A decree of the senate had abrogated Antony's consulship for 31, and Messala was appointed to the vacant place. He was proconsul of Aquitania in 28–27, and obtained a triumph for his reduction of that province. Shortly before or immediately after his administration of Aquitania, Messala held a prefecture in Asia Minor. He was deputed by the senate, probably in 30, to greet Augustus with the title of "Pater Patriæ;" and the opening of his address on that occasion is preserved by Suetonius. During the disturbances at the comitia in 27, Augustus nominated Messala to the revived office of warden of the city; but he resigned it in a few days. Messala soon afterward withdrew from all public employments except his augurship, to which Augustus had specially appointed him, although, at the time of his admission, there was no vacancy in the augural college. About two years before his death, which happened about the middle of Augustus's reign, B.C. 3 to A.D. 3, Messala's memory failed him, and he often could not recall his own name. His tomb was of remarkable splendor. Messala was as much distinguished in the literary as in the political world of Rome. He was a patron of learning and the arts, and was himself an historian, a poet, a grammarian, and an orator. He wrote commentaries on the civil wars after Cæsar's death, and a genealogical work, De Romanis Familiis. The treatise, however, De Progenie Augusti, which sometimes accompanies Eutropius and the minor Roman historians, is the forgery of a much later age. Messala's poems were of a satirical or even licentious character. His writings as a grammarian were numerous and minute, comprising treatises on collocation and lexicography, and on the powers and uses of single letters. His eloquence reflected the character of his age. More smooth and correct than vigorous or original, he persuaded rather than convinced, and conciliated rather than persuaded. His health was feeble, and the procemia of his speeches generally pleaded indisposition and solicited indulgence. He mostly took the defendant's side, and was frequently associated in causes with C. Asinius Pollio. He recommended and practiced translation from the Greek orators; and his version of the Phryne of Hyperides was thought to exhibit remarkable skill in either language. His political eminence, the wealth he inherited or acquired in the civil wars, and the favor of Antony and Augustus, rendered Messala one of the principal persons of his age, and an effective patron of its literature. His friendship for Horace and his intimacy with Tibullus are well known. In the elegies of the latter poet, the name of Messala is continually introduced. The dedication of the Ciris, a doubtful work, is not sufficient proof of his friendship with Virgil; but the companion of "Plotius and Varius, of Mæcenas and Octavius" (Hor., Sat., i., 10, 81), can not well have been unknown to the author of the Eclogues and Georgics. He directed Ovid's early studies (ex Pont., iv., 16), and Tiberius sought his acquaintance in early manhood, and took him for his model in elo quence.—8. M. Valerius Messala Barbatus Appianus, was consul B.C. 12, and died in his year of office. He was the father (or grandfather) of the Empress Messalina.—9. L. Valerius Messala Volesus, consul A.D. 5, and afterward proconsul of Asia, where his cruelties drew on him the anger of Augustus and a condemnatory decree from the senate.—10. L. Vipstanus Messala, legionary tribune in Vespasian's army, A.D. 70, was brother of Aquilius Regulus, the notorious delator in Domitian's reign. He is one of Tacitus's authorities for the history of the civil war after Galba's death, and a principal interlocutor in the dialogue De Oratoribus ascribed to Tacitus.

Messalīna. 1. Statilĭa, grand-daughter of T. Statilius Taurus, consul A.D. 11, was the third wife of the Emperor Nero, who married her in A.D. 66. She had previously espoused Atticus Vestinus, whom Nero put to death without accusation or trial, merely that he might marry Messalina.—2. Valĕrĭa, daughter of M. Valerius Messala Barbatus and of Domitia Lepida, was the third wife of the Emperor Claudius. She married Claudius, to whom she was previously related, before his accession to the empire. Her profligacy and licentiousness were notorious; and the absence of virtue was not concealed by a lingering sense of shame or even by a specious veil of decorum. She was as cruel as she was profligate; and many members of the most illustrious families of Rome were sacrificed to her fears or her hatred. She long exercised an unbounded empire over her weak husband, who alone was ignorant of her infidelities. For some time she was supported in her career of crime by the freedmen of Claudius; but when Narcissus, the most powerful of the emperor's freedmen, perceived that he should probably fall a victim to Messalina's intrigues, he determined to get rid of her. The insane folly of Messalina furnished the means of her own destruction. Having conceived a violent passion for a handsome Roman youth, C. Silius, she publicly married him, with all the rites of a legal connubium, during the absence of Claudius at Ostia, A.D. 48. Narcissus persuaded the emperor that Silius and Messalina would not have dared such an outrage had they not determined also to deprive him of empire and life. Claudius wavered long, and at length Narcissus himself issued Messalina's death-warrant. She was put to death by a tribune of the guards in the gardens of Lucullus.

Messāna (Μεσσάνα Dor., Μεσσήνη: Μεσσάνιος: now Messina), a celebrated town on the north-eastern coast of Sicily, on the straits separating Italy from this island, which are here about four miles broad. The Romans called the town Messana, according to its Doric pronunciation, but Messene was its more usual name among the Greeks. It was originally a town of the Siceli, and was called Zancle (Ζάγκλη), or a sickle, on account of the shape of its harbor, which is formed by a singular curve of sand and shells. The first Greek colonists were, according to Thucydides, pirates from the Chalcidian town of Cumæ in Italy, who were joined by Chalcidians from Eubœa, and, according to Strabo, by Naxians; but these two accounts are not contradictory, for since Naxos in Sicily was also a colony from Chalcis, we may easily suppose that the Naxians joined the other Chalcidians in the foundation of the town. Zancle soon became so powerful that it founded the town of Himera, about B.C. 648. After the capture of Miletus by the Persians, the inhabitants of Zancle invited the Ionians, who had been expelled from their native country, to settle on their "beautiful coast" (καλὴ ἀκτή, Herod., vi., 22), and a number of Samians and other Ionic Greeks accepted their offer. On landing in the south of Italy, they were persuaded by Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, to take possession of Zancle during the absence of Scythes, the tyrant of the city, who was engaged in the siege of some other Sicilian town. But their treachery was soon punished; for Anaxilas himself shortly afterward drove the Samians out of Zancle, and made himself master of the town, the name of which he changed into Messana or Messene, both because he was himself a Messenian, and because he transferred to the place a body of Messenians from Rhegium. Anaxilas died 476; and, about ten years afterward (466), his sons were driven out of Messana and Rhegium, and republican governments established in these cities. Messana now enjoyed great prosperity for several years, and, in consequence of its excellent harbor and advantageous position, it became a place of great commercial importance. But in 396 it was taken by the Carthaginians, who destroyed the town because they saw that they should be unable to maintain so distant a possession against the power of Dionysius of Syracuse. Dionysius began to rebuild it in the same year, and, besides collecting the remains of the former population, he added a number of Locrians, Messenians, and others, so that its inhabitants were of a very mixed kind. After the banishment of the younger Dionysius, Messana was for a short time free, but it fell into the power of Agathocles about 312. Among the mercenaries of this tyrant were a number of Mamertini, an Oscan people from Campania, who had been sent from home under the protection of the god Mamers or Mars to seek their fortunes in other lands. These Mamertini were quartered in Messana; and, after the death of Agathocles (282), they made themselves masters of the town, killed the male inhabitants, and took possession of their wives, their children, and their property. The town was now called Mamertīna, and the inhabitants Mamertīni; but its ancient name of Messana continued to be in more general use. The new inhabitants could not lay aside their old predatory habits, and, in consequence, became involved in a war with Hieron of Syracuse, who defeated them in several battles, and would probably have conquered the town had not the Carthaginians come in to the aid of the Mamertini, and, under the pretext of assisting them, taken possession of their citadel. The Mamertini had, at the same time, applied to the Romans for help, who gladly availed themselves of the opportunity to obtain a footing in Sicily. Thus Messana was the immediate cause of the first Punic war, 264. The Mamertini expelled the Carthaginian garrison, and received the Romans, in whose power Messana remained till the latest times. There are scarcely any remains of the ancient city at Messina.

MESSĀPĬA (Μεσσαπία). 1. The Greek name of CALABRIA.—2. (Now Messagna), a town in Calabria, between Uria and Brundisium.

MESSĀPĬUM (τὸ Μεσσάπιον ὄρος), a mountain in Bœotia, on the eastern coast, near the town Anthedon, from which Messapus is said to have sailed to the south of Italy.

MESSĀPUS (Μέσσαπος), a Bœotian, from whom Messapia, in the south of Italy, was believed to have derived its name.

[MESSĒIS (Μεσσηΐς). 1. A celebrated fountain in Pheræ in Thessaly.—2. A fountain near Therapne in Laconia.]

MESSĒNE (Μεσσήνη), daughter of Triopas, and wife of Polycaon, whom she induced to take possession of the country which was called after her, Messenia. She is also said to have introduced there the worship of Jupiter (Zeus) and the mysteries of the great goddess of Eleusis.

MESSĒNE (Μεσσήνη : Μεσσήνιος). 1. (Now Mavromati), the later capital of Messenia, was founded by Epaminondas B.C. 369, and completed and fortified within the space of eighty-five days. It was situated at the foot of the steep hill of Ithome, which was so celebrated as a fortress in the history of the Messenian wars, and which now formed the acropolis of the new city. Messene was one of the most strongly fortified cities of Greece. It was surrounded by massive walls built entirely of stone, and flanked with numerous towers. There are still considerable remains of some of these towers, as well as the foundations of the walls, and of several public buildings. They are described by a modern traveller as "built of the most regular kind of masonry, and formed of large stones fitted together with great accuracy." The northern gate of the city is also extant, and opens into a circular court, sixty-two feet in diameter. The city was supplied with water from a fountain called Clepsydra, which is still a fine spring, from which the modern village of Mavromati derives its name, meaning Black Spring, or, literally, Black Eye.—2. Vid. MESSANA.

MESSĒNĬA (Μεσσηνία : Μεσσήνιος), a country in Peloponnesus, bounded on the east by Laconia, on the north by Elis and Arcadia, and on the south and west by the sea. It was separated from Laconia by Mount Taygetus; but part of the western slope of Taygetus belonged to Laconia; and it is difficult to determine the exact boundaries between the two countries, as they were different at different periods. In the most ancient times the River Nedon formed the boundary between Messenia and Laconia toward the sea; but Pausanias places the frontier line further east, at a woody hollow called Chœrius, twenty stadia south of Abia. The River Neda formed the northern boundary between Messenia and Elis. The area of Messenia is about one thousand one hundred and sixty-two square miles. It was for the most part a mountainous country, and contained only two plains of any extent, in the north the plain of Stenyclerus, and in the south a still larger plain, through which the Pamisus flowed, and which was called Macaria or the Blessed, on account of its great fertility. There were, however, many smaller valleys among the mountains; and the country was much less rugged and far more productive than the neighboring Laconia. Hence Messenia is described by Pausanias as the most fertile country in Peloponnesus; and it is praised by Euripides on account of its climate, which was neither too cold in winter nor too hot in summer. The most ancient inhabitants of Messenia were Leleges, intermingled with Argives. According to tradition, Polycaon, the younger son of Lelex, married the Argive Messene, a daughter of Triopas, and named the country Messene in honor of his wife. This is the name by which it is called in Homer, who does not use the form Messenia. Five generations afterward Æolians settled in the country, under the guidance of Perieres, a son of Æolus. His son Aphareus gave a home to Neleus, who had been driven out of Thessaly, and who founded the town of Pylos, which became the capital of an independent sovereignty. For a long time there was properly no Messenian kingdom. The western part of the land belonged to the dominions of the Neleid princes of Pylos, of whom Nestor was the most celebrated, and the eastern to the Lacedæmonian monarchy. Thus it appears to have remained till the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, when Messenia fell to the share of Cresphontes, who destroyed the kingdom of Pylos, and united the whole country under his sway. The ruling class were now Dorians, and they continued to speak the purest Doric down to the latest times. The Spartans soon coveted the more fertile territory of their brother Dorians; and after many disputes between the two nations, and various inroads into each other's territories, open war at length broke out. This war, called the first Messenian war, lasted twenty years, B.C. 743–723; and notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the Messenian king, Aristodemus, the Messenians were obliged to submit to the Spartans after the capture of their fortress Ithome, and to become their subjects. Vid. ARISTODEMUS. After bearing the yoke thirty-eight years, the Messenians again took up arms under their heroic leader Aristomenes. Vid. ARISTOMENES The second Messenian war lasted seventeen years, B.C. 685–668, and terminated with the conquest of Ira and the complete subjugation of the country. Most of the Messenians emigrated to foreign countries, and those who remained behind were reduced to the condition of Helots or serfs. In this state they remained till 464, when the Messenians and other Helots took advantage of the devastation occasioned by the great earthquake at Sparta, to rise against their oppressors. This third Messenian war lasted ten years, 464–455, and ended by the Messenians surrendering Ithome to the Spartans on condition of their being allowed a free departure from Peloponnesus. They settled at Naupactus on the Corinthian Gulf opposite Peloponnesus, which town the Athenians had lately taken from the Locri Ozolæ, and gladly granted to such deadly enemies of Sparta. At the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war (404), the unfortunate Messenians were obliged to leave Naupactus and take refuge in Italy, Sicily, and other countries; but when the supremacy of Sparta was overthrown by the battle of Leuctra, Epaminondas resolved to restore the independence of Messenia. He accordingly gathered together the Messenian exiles from the various lands in which they were scattered; and in the summer of 369 he founded the town of Messene at the foot of Mount Ithome. Vid. MESSENE. Messenia was never again subdued by the Spartans, and it maintained its independence till the conquest of the Achæans and the rest of Greece by the Romans, 146.

[MESSENIĂCUS SINUS (Μεσσηνιακὸς κόλπος, now Gulf of Coron), a large gulf or bay, washing the southern shore of Messenia, and extending from the promontory Acritas on the west to the promontory Thyrides on the east, or, according to others, to Cape Tænarus; the northern part was also called Coronæus from the city CORONE, and its southern Asinæus from the city ASINE, though Strabo makes this another appellation for the whole gulf.]

[MESSIUS, C., was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 56, when he brought in a bill for Cicero's recall from exile. In the same year the Messian law, by the same tribune, assigned extraordinary powers to Cn. Pompey. Cicero defended Messius when he was recalled from a legatio, and attacked by the Cæsarian party. Messius afterward appears as an adherent of Cæsar's, whose troops he introduced into Acilla, a town in Africa.]

METAPHRASTES, SYMĔON (Συμεὼν ὁ Μεταφράστης), a celebrated Byzantine writer, lived in the ninth and tenth centuries, and held many hi[...] offices at the Byzantine court. His surname Metaphrastes was given to him on account of his having composed a celebrated paraphrase of the lives of the saints. Besides his other works, he wrote a Byzantine history, entitled Annales, beginning with the Emperor Leo Armenus, A.D. 813, and finishing with Romanus, the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, 963. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1838.

METAPONTĬUM, called METAPONTUM by the Romans (Μεταπόντιον: Μεταπόντιος, Metapontinus: now Torre di Mare), a celebrated Greek city in the south of Italy, on the Tarentine Gulf, and on the eastern coast of Lucania, is said to have been originally called Metabum (Μέταβον). There were various traditions respecting its foundation, all of which point to its high antiquity, but from which we can not gather any certain information on the subject. It is said to have been afterward destroyed by the Samnites, and to have been repeopled by a colony of Achæans, who had been invited for that purpose by the inhabitants of Sybaris. Hence it is called by Livy an Achæan town, and is regarded by some writers as a colony from Sybaris. It fell into the hands of the Romans with the other Greek cities in the south of Italy in the war against Pyrrhus, but it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ. From the time of the second Punic war it disappears from history, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias.

METELLA. Vid. CÆCILIA.

METELLUS, a distinguished plebeian family of the Cæcilia gens at Rome. 1. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS, consul B.C. 251, carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians. In the following year he gained a great victory over Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general. The elephants which he took in this battle were exhibited in his triumph at Rome. Metellus was consul a second time in 249, and was elected pontifex maximus in 243, and held this dignity for twenty-two years. He must, therefore, have died shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war. In 241 he rescued the Palladium when the temple of Vesta was on fire, but lost his sight in consequence. He was dictator in 224, for the purpose of holding the comitia.—2. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS, son of the preceding, was plebeian ædile 209, curule ædile 208, served in the army of the consul Claudius Nero 207, and was one of the legates sent to Rome to convey the joyful news of the defeat and death of Hasdrubal; and was consul with L. Veturius Philo, 206. In his consulship he and his colleague carried on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium, where he remained as proconsul during the following year. In 205 he was dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia. Metellus survived the second Punic war many years, and was employed in several public commissions.—3. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS MACEDONICUS, son of the last, was prætor 148, and carried on war in Macedonia against the usurper Andriscus, whom he defeated and took prisoner. He next turned his arms against the Achæans, whom he defeated at the beginning of 146. On his return to Rome in 146, he triumphed, and received the surname of Macedonicus. Metellus was consul in 143, and received the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on the war with success for two years against the Celtiberi. He was succeeded by Q. Pompeius in 141. Metellus was censor 131. He died 115, full of years and honors. He is frequently quoted by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of human felicity. He had filled all the highest offices of the state with reputation and glory, and was carried to the funeral pile by four sons, three of whom had obtained the consulship in his lifetime, while the fourth was a candidate for the office at the time of his death.—4. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS CALVUS, brother of the last, consul 142.—5. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS BALEARICUS, eldest son of No. 3, was consul 123, when he subdued the inhabitants of the Balearic islands, and received, in consequence, the surname of Balearicus. He was censor 120.—6. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS DIADEMATUS, second son of No. 3, has been frequently confounded with Metellus Dalmaticus, consul 119 (No. 9). Metellus Diadematus received the latter surname from his wearing for a long time a bandage round his forehead, in consequence of an ulcer. He was consul 117.—7. M. CÆCILIUS METELLUS, third son of No. 3, was consul 115, the year in which his father died. In 114 he was sent into Sardinia as proconsul, and suppressed an insurrection in the island, in consequence of which he obtained a triumph in 113 on the same day as his brother Caprarius.—8. C. CÆCILIUS METELLUS CAPRARIUS, fourth son of No. 3. The origin of his surname is quite uncertain. He was consul 113, and carried on war in Macedonia against the Thracians, whom he subdued. He obtained a triumph, in consequence, in the same year and on the same day with his brother Marcus. He was censor 102 with his cousin Metellus Numidicus.—9. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS DALMATICUS, elder son of No. 4, and frequently confounded, as has been already remarked, with Diadematus (No. 6), was consul 119, when he subdued the Dalmatians, and obtained, in consequence, the surname Dalmaticus. He was censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus in 115, and he was also pontifex maximus. He was alive in 100, when he is mentioned as one of the senators of high rank who took up arms against Saturninus.—10. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS NUMIDICUS, younger son of No. 4, was one of the most distinguished members of his family. The character of Metellus stood very high among his contemporaries; in an age of growing corruption his personal integrity remained unsullied; and he was distinguished for his abilities in war and peace. He was one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party at Rome. He was consul 109, and carried on the war against Jugurtha in Numidia with great success. Vid. JUGURTHA. He remained in Numidia during the following year as proconsul; but, as he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion, his legate C. Marius industriously circulated reports in the camp and the city that Metellus designedly protracted the war for the purpose of continuing in the command. These rumors had the desired effect. Marius was raised to the consulship, Numidia was assigned to him as his province, and Metellus saw the honor of finishing the war snatched from his grasp. Vid. MARIUS. On his return to Rome in 107 he was received with the greatest honor. He celebrated a splendid triumph, and received the surname of Numidicus. In 102 he was censor with his cousin Metellus Caprarius. In 100 the tribune Saturninus and Marius resolved to ruin Metellus. Saturninus proposed an agrarian law, to which he added the clause that the senate should swear obedience to it within five days after its enactment, and that whosoever should refuse to do so should be expelled the senate, and pay a heavy fine. Metellus refused to take the oath, and was therefore expelled the senate; but Saturninus, not content with this, brought forward a bill to punish him with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms in his defence; but Metellus quitted the city, and retired to Rhodes, where he bore his misfortune with great calmness. He was, however, recalled to Rome in the following year (99) on the proposition of the tribune Q. Calidius. The orations of Metellus are spoken of with praise by Cicero, and they continued to be read with admiration in the time of Fronto.—11. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS NEPOS, son of Balearicus (No. 5), and grandson of Macedonicus lus (No 3), appears to have received the surname of Nepos because he was the eldest grandson of the latter. Metellus Nepos exerted himself in obtaining the recall of his kinsman Metellus Numidicus from banishment in 99, and was consul in 98 with T. Didius. In this year the two consuls carried the lex Cæcilia Didia.—12. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius, son of Numidicus (No. 10), received the surname of Pius on account of the love which he displayed for his father when he besought the people to recall him from banishment in 99. He was prætor 89, and was one of the commanders in the Marsic or Social war. He was still in arms in 87, prosecuting the war against the Samnites, when Marius landed in Italy and joined the consul Cinna. The senate, in alarm, summoned Metellus to Rome; but, as he was unable to defend the city against Marius and Cinna, he crossed over to Africa. After remaining in Africa three years, he returned to Italy and joined Sulla, who also returned to Italy in 83. In the war which followed against the Marian party, Metellus was one of the most successful of Sulla's generals, and gained several important victories both in Umbria and in Cisalpine Gaul. In 80, Metellus was consul with Sulla himself; and in the following year (79) he went as proconsul into Spain, in order to prosecute the war against Sertorius, who adhered to the Marian party. Here he remained for the next eight years, and found it so difficult to obtain any advantages over Sertorius, that the senate sent Pompey to his assistance with proconsular power and another army. Sertorius, however, was a match for them both, and would probably have continued to defy all the efforts of Metellus and Pompey, if he had not been murdered by Perperna and his friends in 72. Vid. Sertorius. Metellus was pontifex maximus, and, as he was succeeded in this dignity by Julius Cæsar in 63, he must have died either in this year or at the end of the preceding.—13. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer, elder son of Nepos (No. 11). In 66 he served as legate in the army of Pompey in Asia, and was prætor in 63, the year in which Cicero was consul. During his year of office he afforded warm and efficient support to the aristocratical party. He prevented the condemnation of C. Rabirius by removing the military flag from the Janiculum. He co-operated with Cicero in opposing the schemes of Catiline; and, when the latter left the city to make war upon the republic, Metellus had the charge of the Picentine and Senonian districts. By blocking up the passes he prevented Catiline from crossing the Apennines and penetrating into Gaul, and thus compelled him to turn round and face Antonius, who was marching against him from Etruria. In the following year, 62, Metellus went with the title of proconsul into the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which Cicero had relinquished because he was unwilling to leave the city. In 60 Metellus was consul with L. Afranius, and opposed all the efforts of his colleague to obtain the ratification of Pompey's acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands for his soldiers. He died in 59, and it was suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Clodia, with whom he lived on the most unhappy terms, and who was a woman of the most profligacy.—14. Q. Cæcilius Metel[lus] Nepos, younger son of the elder Nepos (No [11]). He served as legate of Pompey in the war ag[ainst] the pirates and in Asia from 67 to 64. He [re]turned to Rome in 63 in order to become a [can]didate for the tribunate, that he might the[re] favor the views of Pompey. His election [was] opposed by the aristocracy, but without succ[ess]. His year of office was a stormy one. On[e of] his first acts in entering upon his office on [the] tenth of December, 63, was a violent at[tack] upon Cicero. He maintained that the man [who] had condemned Roman citizens without a h[ear]ing ought not to be heard himself, and acc[ord]ingly prevented Cicero from addressing the p[eo]ple on the last day of his consulship, and [only] allowed him to take the usual oath, whereu[pon] Cicero swore that he had saved the state. [In] the following year (62) Metellus brought [for]ward a bill to summon Pompey, with his ar[my], to Rome, in order to restore peace, but, on [the] day on which the bill was to be read, the [two] parties came to open blows, and Metellus [was] obliged to take to flight. He repaired to Pom[]pey, with whom he returned to Rome in 61. [He] was prætor in 60, and consul in 57 with Lentulus Spinther. Notwithstanding his p[re]vious enmity with Cicero, he did not oppose [his] recall from exile. In 56 Metellus administe[red] the province of Nearer Spain, where he carr[ied] on war against the Vaccæi. He died in [55]. Metellus did not adhere strictly to the politi[cal] principles of his family. He did not supp[ort] the aristocracy like his brother; nor, on the other hand, can he be said to have been a lead[]er of the democracy. He was, in fact, little more than a servant of Pompey, and, according to his bidding, at one time opposed and at another supported Cicero.—15. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius Scipio, the adopted son of Metellus Pius (No. 12). He was the son of P. Scipio Nasica, prætor 94. Hence his name is given in various forms. Sometimes he is called P. Scipio Nasica, sometimes Q. Metellus Scipio and sometimes simply Scipio or Metellus. He was tribune of the plebs in 59, and was a candidate for the consulship along with Plautius Hypsæus and Milo in 53. He was supported by the Clodian mob, since he was opposed to Milo, but, in consequence of the disturbances in the city, the comitia could not be held for the election of consuls. After the murder of Clodius at the beginning of 52, Pompey was elected sole consul. In the course of the same year Pompey married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, and on the first of August he made his father-in-law his colleague in the consulship. Scipio showed his gratitude by using every effort to destroy the power of Cæsar and strengthen that of Pompey. He took an active part in all the proceedings which led to the breaking out of the civil war in 49, and, in the division of the provinces, made among the Pompeian party, he obtained Syria, to which he hastened without delay. After plundering the province in the most unmerciful manner, he crossed over into Greece in 48 to join Pompey. He commanded the centre of the Pompeian army at the battle of Pharsalia. After the loss of the battle he fled, first to Corcyra and then to Africa, where he received the chief command of the Pompeian troops. He was defeated by Cæsar at the decisive battle of Thapsus in 46. He attempted to escape by sea, but his squadron having been overpowered by P. Sittius, he put an end to his own life. Metellus Scipio never exhibited any proofs of striking abilities either in war or in peace. In public he showed himself cruel, vindictive, and oppressive; in private he was mean, avaricious, and licentious, even beyond most of his contemporaries.—16. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Creticus, was consul 69, and carried on war against Crete, which he subdued in the course of three years. He returned to Rome in 66, but was unable to obtain a triumph in consequence of the opposition of Pompey, to whom he had refused to surrender his command in Crete, which Pompey had claimed in virtue of the Gabinian law, which had given him the supreme command in the whole of the Mediterranean. Metellus, however, would not relinquish his claim to a triumph, and accordingly resolved to wait in the neighborhood of the city till more favorable circumstances. He was still before the city in 63, when the conspiracy of Catiline broke out. He was sent into Apulia to prevent an apprehended rising of the slaves; and in the following year, 62, after the death of Catiline, he was at length permitted to make his triumphal entrance into Rome, and received the surname of Creticus. Metellus, as was to be expected, joined the aristocracy in their opposition to Pompey, and succeeded in preventing the latter from obtaining the ratification of his acts in Asia.—17. L. Cæcilius Metellus, brother of the last, was prætor 71, and as proprætor succeeded Verres in the government of Sicily in 70. He defeated the pirates, and compelled them to leave the island. His administration is praised by Cicero; but he nevertheless attempted, in conjunction with his brothers, to shield Verres from justice. He was consul 68 with Q. Marcius Rex, but died at the beginning of the year.—18. M. Cæcilius Metellus, brother of the two last, was prætor 69, in the same year that his eldest brother was consul. The lot gave him the presidency in the court de pecuniis repetundis, and Verres was very anxious that his trial should come on before Metellus.—19. L. Cæcilius Metellus Creticus, was tribune of the plebs 49, and a warm supporter of the aristocracy. He did not fly from Rome with Pompey and the rest of his party; and he attempted to prevent Cæsar from taking possession of the sacred treasury, and only gave way upon being threatened with death.

[Methodius (Μεθόδιος), surnamed Patarensis, and sometimes Eubulus or Eubulius, successively bishop of Olympus and Patara in Lycia, and Tyre in Phœnicia, lived in the third, and died at the beginning of the fourth century. He was a man of great learning and exemplary piety; and wrote several works, most of which are extant, and were published collectively by Combéfis, Paris, 1644, folio.]

[Methon (Μέθων), a kinsman of Orpheus, from whom the Thracian town of Methone was believed to have derived its name.]

Methōne (Μεθώνη: Μεθωναῖος). 1. Or Mothōne (Μοθώνη: now Modon), a town at the southwest corner of Messenia, with an excellent harbor, protected from the sea by a reef of rocks, of which the largest was called Mothon. The ancients regarded Methone as the Pedasus of Homer. After the conquest of Messenia it became one of the Lacedæmonian harbors, and is mentioned as such in the Peloponnesian war. The Emperor Trajan conferred several privileges upon the city.—2. (Eleutherokhori), a Greek town in Macedonia, on the Thermaic Gulf, forty stadia northeast of Pydna, was founded by the Eretrians, and is celebrated from Philip having lost an eye at the siege of the place. After its capture by Philip it was destroyed, but was subsequently rebuilt, and is mentioned by Strabo as one of the towns of Macedonia.—3. A town in Thessaly mentioned by Homer, but does not occur in historical times. The ancients placed it in Magnesia.—4. Or Methāna (Μέθανα: now Methana or Mitone), an ancient town in Argolis, situated on a peninsula of the same name, opposite the island of Ægina. The peninsula runs a considerable way into the sea, and is connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus, lying between the towns of Trœzen and Epidaurus. The town of Methana lay at the foot of a mountain of volcanic origin.

Mĕthŏra (Μέθορα, Μόδουρα ἡ τῶν Θεῶν: now Matra, the sacred city of Krishna), a city of India intra Gangem, on the River Jomanes (now Jumna), in the territory of the Surasenæ, a tribe subject to the Prasii. It was a great seat of the worship of the Indian god whom the Greeks identified with Hercules.

[Methydrium (Μεθύδριον), a small town of Arcadia, on the road from Olympia to Orchomenus, deriving its name from the circumstance of its being built on a steep cliff between the waters of Malœtas and Mylaon.]

Methymna (ἡ Μήθυμνα, Μέθυμνα, the former generally in the best writers; also on coins the Æolic form Μάθυμνα: Μηθυμναῖος, Μεθυμναῖος: now Molivo), the second city of Lesbos, stood at the northern extremity of the island, and had a good harbor. It was the birthplace of the musician and dithyrambic poet Arion, and of the historian Hellanicus. The celebrated Lesbian wine grew in its neighborhood. In the Peloponnesian war it remained faithful to Athens, even during the great Lesbian revolt (vid. Mytilene): afterward it was sacked by the Spartans (B.C. 406), and never quite recovered its prosperity.

[Metiŏchus (Μητίοχος). 1. Son of Miltiades, captured by the Phœnicians, and taken to the Persian court. Darius did him no injury, but conferred many favors on him, and gave him a Persian lady in marriage, by whom he had children, who were held in estimation among the Persians.—2. An Athenian orator, a contemporary and friend of Pericles, for whom he often spoke in the assembly at Athens.]

Mētĭon (Μητίων), son of Erechtheus and Praxithea, and husband of Alcippe. His sons, the Metionidæ, expelled their cousin Pandion from his kingdom of Athens, but were themselves afterward expelled by the sons of Pandion.

Mētis (Μῆτις), the personification of prudence, is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and the first wife of Jupiter (Zeus). Afraid lest she should give birth to a child wiser and more powerful than himself, Jupiter (Zeus) devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Afterward he gave birth to Minerva (Athena), who sprang from his head. Vid. p. 120, b.

[Metiscus, charioteer of Turnus, ejected from his place by Juturna, who guided the chariot herself, when Turnus was about to engage in single combat with Æneas.]

Metīus. Vid. Mettius.

Meton (Μέτων), an astronomer of Athens, who, in conjunction with Euctemon, introduced the cycle of nineteen years, by which he adjusted the course of the sun and moon, since he had observed that two hundred and thirty-five lunar months correspond very nearly to nineteen solar years. The commencement of this cycle has been placed B.C. 432. We have no details of Meton's life, with the exception that his father's name was Pausanias, and that he feigned insanity to avoid sailing for Sicily in the ill-fated expedition of which he is stated to have had an evil presentiment.

[Metōpe (Μετώπη). 1. A daughter of the Arcadian river-god Ladon, was married to Asopus, and became the mother of Thebe.—2. Wife of the river-god Sangarius, and mother of Hecuba, the wife of Priam.]

[Metōpus (Μέτωπος), a Pythagorean of Metapontum; author of a work on virtue, some extracts from which have been preserved by Stobæus, and are given among the Pythagorean fragments in Gale's Opuscula Mythologica.]

[Metrobius (Μετρόβιος), an actor who performed in women's parts, a great favorite of the dictator Sulla.]

Metrōdōrus (Μητρόδωρος). 1. Of Cos, son of Epicharmus, and grandson of Thyrsus. Like several of that family, he addicted himself partly to the study of the Pythagorean philosophy, partly to the science of medicine. He wrote a treatise upon the works of Epicharmus. He flourished about B.C. 460.—2. Of Lampsacus, a contemporary and friend of Anaxagoras. He wrote on Homer, the leading feature of his system of interpretation being that the deities and stories in Homer were to be understood as allegorical modes of representing physical powers and phenomena. He died 464.—3. Of Chios, a disciple of Democritus, or, according to other accounts, of Nessus of Chios, flourished about 330. He was a philosopher of considerable reputation, and professed the doctrines of the skeptics in their fullest sense. He also studied, if he did not practice, medicine, on which he wrote a good deal. He was the instructor of Hippocrates and Anaxarchus.—4. A native of Lampsacus or Athens, was the most distinguished of the disciples of Epicurus, with whom he lived on terms of the closest friendship. He died 277, in the fifty-third year of his age, seven years before Epicurus, who would have appointed him his successor had he survived him. The philosophy of Metrodorus appears to have been of a more grossly sensual kind than that of Epicurus. Perfect happiness, according to Cicero's account, he made to consist in having a well-constituted body. He found fault with his brother Timocrates for not admitting that the belly was the test and measure of every thing that pertained to a happy life. He w the author of several works quoted by the an- cient writers.—5. Of Scepsis, a philosopher, w was raised to a position of great influence a trust by Mithradates Eupator, being appoint supreme judge without appeal even to the ki Subsequently he was led to desert his alle ance, when sent by Mithradates on an emba to Tigranes, king of Armenia. Tigranes s him back to Mithradates, but he died on t road. According to some accounts, he was d patched by order of the king; according others, he died of disease. He is frequen mentioned by Cicero; he seems to have be particularly celebrated for his powers of me ory. In consequence of his hostility to the R mans, he was surnamed the Roman-hater.— Of Stratonice in Caria, was at first a discip of the school of Epicurus, but afterward a tached himself to Carneades. He flourish about 110.

[Metrophanes (Μητροφάνης), a general o Mithradates the Great, who sent him with a army into Greece to support Archelaus, B.C. 87. He reduced Eubœa and some other place but was defeated by the Roman general *Bru*tius Sura.]

Mētrŏpŏlis (Μητρόπολις). 1. The most an cient capital of Phrygia, but in historical time an inconsiderable place. Its position is doubt ful. Some identify it with Afioum-Kara-Hissa near the centre of Great Phrygia, which agree well enough with the position of the Campus Metropolitanus of Livy (xxxviii., 15), while others find it in the ruins at Pismesh-Kalesi in the north of Phrygia, and suppose a second Metropolis in the south as that to which the Campus Metropolitanus belonged.—2. In Lydia (ruins at Turbali), a city in the plain of the Caÿster, between Ephesus and Smyrna, one hundred and twenty stadia from the former, and two hundred from the latter. There were other cities of Asia so called, but they are either unimportant, or better known by other names, such as Ancyra, Bostra, Cæsarea in Palestine, Edessa, and others.—3. (Now Kastri), a town of Thessaly in Histiæotis, near the Peneus, and between Gomphi and Pharsalus, formed by the union of several small towns, to which Ithome also belonged.—4. A town of Acarnania in the district Amphilochia, between the Ambracian Gulf and the River Achelous.

Mētrōŭm, afterward Aulia (Μητρῷον, on coins Μῆτρος, Αὐλία, Αὔλαια), a city of Bithynia.

Mettīus or Metīus. 1. Curtīus. Vid. Curtius.—2. Fuffetīus, dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome. After the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii had determined the supremacy of the Romans, Mettius was summoned to aid them in a war with Fidenæ and the Veientines. On the field of battle Mettius drew off his Albans to the hills, and awaited the issue of the battle. On the following day the Albans were all deprived of their arms, and Mettius himself, as the punishment of his treachery, was torn asunder by chariots driven in opposite directions.

Metŭlum, the chief town of the Iapydes in Illyricum, was near the frontiers of Liburnia, and was situated on two peaks of a steep mountain. Augustus nearly lost his life in reduc ing this place, the inhabitants of which fought against him with the most desperate courage.

Mevānia (Mevānas, ātis: now Bevagna), an ancient city in the interior of Umbria, on the River Tinea, was situated on the road from Rome to Ancona, in a very fertile country, and was celebrated for its breed of beautiful white oxen. It was a strongly-fortified place, though its walls were built only of brick. According to some accounts, Propertius was a native of this place.

Mezentīus (Μεσέντιος), king of the Tyrrhenians or Etruscans, at Cære or Agylla, was expelled by his subjects on account of his cruelty, and took refuge with Turnus, king of the Rutulians, whom he assisted in the war against Æneas and the Trojans. Mezentius and his son Lausus were slain in battle by Æneas. This is the account of Virgil. Livy and Dionysius, however, say nothing about the expulsion of Mezentius from Cære, but represent him as an ally of Turnus, and relate that Æneas disappeared during the battle against the Rutulians and Etruscans at Lanuvium. Dionysius adds that Ascanius was besieged by Mezentius and Lausus; that the besieged in a sally by night slew Lausus, and then concluded a peace with Mezentius, who from henceforth continued to be their ally.

[Miccion (Μικκίων), a painter, mentioned by Lucian as a disciple of Zeuxis.]

Micipsa (Μικίψας), king of Numidia, the eldest of the sons of Masinissa. After the death of the latter (B.C. 148), the sovereign power was divided by Scipio between Micipsa and his two brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal, in such a manner that the possession of Cirta, the capital of Numidia, together with the financial administration of the kingdom, fell to the share of Micipsa. It was not long, however, before the death of both his brothers left him in possession of the undivided sovereignty of Numidia, which he held from that time without interruption till his death. He died in 118, leaving the kingdom to his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal, and their adopted brother Jugurtha.

Micon (Μίκων), of Athens, son of Phanochus, was a very distinguished painter and statuary, contemporary with Polygnotus, about B.C. 460.

[Micythus (Μίκυθος), son of Chœrus, was at first a slave in the service of Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, but gradually rose to so high a place in the confidence of his master, that the latter, at his death (B.C. 476), left him guardian of his infant sons, and regent until they attained their majority. He discharged his duty, and at the proper time resigned the sovereignty into the hands of the young princes, set out for Greece, and settled at Tegea, where he resided for the rest of his life.]

Midaēum (Μιδάειον), a city of Phrygia Epictetus between Dorylæum and Pessinus; the place where Sextus Pompeius was captured by the troops of Antony, B.C. 35.

Midas (Μίδας), son of Gordius and Cybele, is said to have been a wealthy but effeminate king of Phrygia, a pupil of Orpheus, and a great patron of the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus). His wealth is alluded to in a story connected with his childhood, for it is said that while a child, ants carried grains of wheat into his mouth, to indicate that one day he should be the richest of all mortals. Midas was introduced into the Satyric drama of the Greeks, and was represented with the ears of a satyr, which were afterward lengthened into the ears of an ass. He is said to have built the town of Ancyra, and as king of Phrygia he is called Berecynthius heros (Ov., Met., xi., 106). There are several stories connected with Midas, of which the following are the most celebrated. 1. Silenus, the companion and teacher of Bacchus (Dionysus), had gone astray in a state of intoxication, and was caught by country people in the rose gardens of Midas. He was bound with wreaths of flowers and led before the king. These gardens were in Macedonia, near Mount Bermion or Bromion, where Midas was king of the Briges, with whom he afterward emigrated to Asia, where their name was changed into Phryges. Midas received Silenus kindly; and, after treating him with hospitality, he led him back to Bacchus (Dionysus), who allowed Midas to ask a favor of him. Midas, in his folly, desired that all things which he touched should be changed into gold. The request was granted; but as even the food which he touched became gold, he implored the god to take his favor back. Bacchus (Dionysus) accordingly ordered him to bathe in the source of Pactolus, near Mount Tmolus. This bath saved Midas, but the river from that time had an abundance of gold in its sand.—2. Midas, who was himself related to the race of Satyrs, once had a visit from a Satyr, who indulged in all kinds of jokes at the king's expense. Thereupon Midas mixed wine in a well; and when the Satyr had drank of it, he fell asleep and was caught. This well of Midas was at different times assigned to different localities. Xenophon (Anab., i., 2, § 13) places it in the neighborhood of Thymbrium and Tyræum, and Pausanias at Ancyra.—3. Once, when Pan and Apollo were engaged in a musical contest on the flute and lyre, Midas was chosen to decide between them. The king decided in favor of Pan, whereupon Apollo changed his ears into those of an ass. Midas contrived to conceal them under his Phrygian cap, but the servant who used to cut his hair discovered them. The secret so much harassed this man, that, as he could not betray it to a human being, he dug a hole in the earth, and whispered into it, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled the hole up again, and his heart was relieved. But on the same spot a reed grew up, which in its whispers betrayed the secret. Midas is said to have killed himself by drinking the blood of an ox.

Midēa or Midēa (Μίδεια, Μιδέα: Μιδεάτης), a town in Argolis, of uncertain site, is said to have been originally called Persepolis, because it had been fortified by Perseus. It was destroyed by the Argives.

Midĭas (Μειδίας), an Athenian of wealth and influence, was a violent enemy of Demosthenes the orator. In B.C. 354 Midias assaulted Demosthenes when he was discharging the duties of Choregus, during the celebration of the great Dionysia. Demosthenes brought an accusation against Midias; but the speech which he wrote for the occasion, and which is extant, was never delivered, since Demosthenes dropped the accusation in consequence of his receiving the sum of thirty minæ.

MILĒTŎPŎLIS (Μιλητόπολις: now Muhalich or Hamamli? ruins), a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, at the confluence of the River Rhyndacus and Macestus, and somewhat east of the lake which was named after it, LACUS MILETOPOLITIS (Μιλητοπολῖτις λίμνη: now Lake of Maniyas). This lake, which was also called Artynia, lies some miles west of the larger lake of Apollonia (now Abullionte).

MĪLĒTUS (Μίλητος), son of Apollo and Arīa of Crete. Being beloved by Minos and Sarpedon, he attached himself to the latter, and fled from Minos to Asia, where he built the city of Miletus. Ovid (Met., ix., 442) calls him a son of Apollo and Deīone, and hence Deīonides.

MĪLĒTUS (Μίλητος, Dor. Μίλατος: Μιλήσιος, and on inscriptions, Μειλήσιος: Milēsius). 1. One of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, belonged territorially to Caria and politically to Ionia, being the southernmost of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy. It is mentioned by Homer as a Carian city; and one of its early names, Lelegeïs, is a sign that the Leleges also formed a part of its population. Its first Greek colonists were said to have been Cretans who were expelled by Minos; the next were led to it by Neleus at the time of the so-called Ionic migration. Its name was derived from the mythical leader of the Cretan colonists, Miletus: it was also called PITYUSA (Πιτυοῦσα) and ANACTORIA (Ἀνακτορία). The city stood upon the southern headland of the Sinus Latmicus, opposite to the mouth of the Mæander, and possessed four distinct harbors, protected by a group of islets, called Lade, Dromiscus, and Perne. The city wall inclosed two distinct towns, called the outer and the inner; the latter, which was also called Old Miletus, stood upon an eminence overhanging the sea, and was of great strength. Its territory extended on both sides of the Mæander, as far apparently as the promontories of Mycale on the north and Posidium on the south. It was rich in flocks; and the city was celebrated for its woollen fabrics, the Milesia vellera. At a very early period it became a great maritime state, extending its commerce throughout the Mediterranean, and even beyond the Pillars of Hercules, but more especially in the direction of the Euxine, along the shore of which the Milesians planted several important colonies, such as Cyzicus, Sinope, Abydos, Istropolis, Tomi, Olbia or Borysthenes, Apollonia, Odessus, and Panticapæum. Naucratis in Egypt was also a colony of Miletus. It also occupies a high place in the early history of Greek literature, as the birth-place of the philosophers Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, and of the historians Cadm[us and] Hecatæus. After the rise of the Lydian [mon]archy, Miletus, by its naval strength, re[sisted] the attacks of Alyattes and Sadyattes for [...] years, but fell before Crœsus, whose s[uccess] may perhaps be ascribed to the intestine [dissen]tions which for a long time weakened the [city]. With the rest of Ionia, it was conquered [by] Harpagus, the general of Cyrus, in B.C. [...], and under the dominion of the Persians it retained its prosperity till the great Ionian [re]volt, of which Miletus was the centre [...] ARISTAGORAS, HISTIÆUS), and after the sup[pres]sion of which it was destroyed by the Per[sians] (B.C. 494). It recovered sufficient impor[tance] to oppose a vain resistance to Alexander [the] Great, which brought upon it a second [...]. Under the Roman empire it still appears [a] place of some consequence, until its final [de]struction by the Turks. Its ruins are di[fficult] to discover, on account of the great ch[anges] made in the coast by the River Mæander. [Vid.] MÆANDER. They are usually supposed to [be] those at the wretched village of Palatia, on [the] southern bank of the Menderch, a little a[bove] its present mouth; but Forbiger has sta[ted] that these are more probably the ruins of My[us], and that those of Miletus are buried in a l[ake] formed by the Menderch at the foot of Mo[unt] Latmus.—[2. MILO or MILON (Μίλων). 1. Of Crotona, s[on] of Diotimus, an athlete, famous for his extraor[dinary] bodily strength. He was six times vic[tor] in wrestling at the Olympic games, and a[s] often at the Pythian; but, having entered the lists at Olympia a seventh time, he was worsted by the superior agility of his adversary. [By] these successes he obtained great distinction among his countrymen, so that he was even ap[pointed] to command the army which defeated the Sybarites, B.C. 511. Many stories are re[lated] by ancient writers of Milo's extraordinary feats of strength; such as his carrying a heifer of four years old on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, and afterward eating the whole of it in a single day. The mode of his death is thus related: as he was passing through a forest when enfeebled by age, he saw the trunk of a tree which had been partially split open by woodcutters, and attempted to rend it further, but the wood closed upon his hands, and thus held him fast, in which state he was attack[ed] and devoured by wolves.—2. All ...mpey's influence was directed against him; ...t Milo was not without hope, since the higher ...ristocracy, from jealousy of Pompey, supported ...him, and Cicero undertook his defence. His trial opened on the fourth of April, 52. He was impeached on three counts—de Vi, de Ambitu, or bribery, and de Sodalitiis, or illegal interference with the freedom of elections. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a consular, was appointed quæsitor by a special law of Pompey's, and all Rome and thousands of spectators from Italy thronged the forum and its avenues. But Milo's chances of acquittal were wholly marred by the virulence of his adversaries, who insulted and obstructed the witnesses, the process, and the conductors of the defence. Pompey availed himself of these disorders to line the forum and its encompassing hills with soldiers. Cicero was intimidated, and Milo was condemned. Had he even been acquitted on the first count, de Vi, the two other charges of bribery and conspiracy awaited him. He therefore went into exile. Cicero, who could not deliver, re-wrote and expanded the defence of Milo—the extant oration—and sent it to him at Marseilles. Milo remarked, "I am glad this was not spoken, since I must have been acquitted, and then had never known the delicate flavor of these Marseilles mullets." Cæsar refused to recall Milo from exile in 49, when he permitted many of the other exiles to return. In the following year (48), M. Cælius, the prætor, had, during Cæsar's absence, promulgated a bill for the adjustment of debts. Needing desperate allies, Cælius accordingly invited Milo to Italy, as the fittest tool for his purposes. At the head of a band of criminals and run-away slaves, Milo appeared in the south of Italy, but was opposed by the prætor Q. Pedius, and slain under the walls of an obscure fort in the district of Thurii. Milo, in 57, married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla. She proved a faithless wife, and Sallust, the historian, was soundly scourged by Milo for an intrigue with her.

[Miltas (Μίλτας), a Thessalian, a contemporary of Plato, spoken of by Plutarch as a seer, and a follower of the Platonic philosophy: he served in the army of Dion against Dionysius the younger, and encouraged the troops when alarmed by an eclipse.]

Miltiădes (Μιλτιάδης). 1. Son of Cypselus, was a man of considerable distinction in Athens in the time of Pisistratus. The Doloncians, a Thracian tribe dwelling in the Chersonesus, being hard pressed in war by the Absinthians, applied to the Delphic oracle for advice, and were directed to admit a colony led by the man who should be the first to entertain them after they left the temple. This was Militiades, who, eager to escape from the rule of Pisistratus, gladly took the lead of a colony under the sanction of the oracle, and became tyrant of the Chersonesus, which he fortified by a wall built across its isthmus. In a war with the people of Lampsacus he was taken prisoner, but was set at liberty on the demand of Crœsus. He died without leaving any children, and his sovereignty passed into the hands of Stesagoras, the son of his half-brother Cimon. Sacrifices and games were instituted in his honor, in which no Lampsacene was suffered to take part.—2. Son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, became tyrant of the Chersonesus on the death of the latter, being sent out by Pisistratus from Athens to take possession of the vacant inheritance. By a stratagem he got the chief men of the Chersonesus into his power and threw them into prison, and took a force of mercenaries into his pay. In order to strengthen his position still more, he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of a Thracian prince named Olorus. He joined Darius Hystaspis on his expedition against the Scythians, and was left with the other Greeks in charge of the bridge over the Danube. When the appointed time had expired, and Darius had not returned, Miltiades recommended the Greeks to destroy the bridge and leave Darius to his fate. Some time after the expedition of Darius, an inroad of the Scythians drove Miltiades from his possessions; but after the enemy had retired, the Doloncians brought him back. It appears to have been between this period and his withdrawal to Athens that Miltiades conquered and expelled the Pelasgian inhabitants of Lemnos and Imbros, and subjected the islands to the dominion of Attica. Lemnos and Imbros belonged to the Persian dominions; and it is probable that this encroachment on the Persian possessions was the cause which drew upon Miltiades the hostility of Darius, and led him to fly from the Chersonesus when the Phœnician fleet approached after the subjugation of Ionia

Miltiades reached Athens in safety, but his eldest son Metiochus fell into the hands of the Persians. At Athens Miltiades was arraigned, as being amenable to the penalties enacted against tyranny, but was acquitted. When Attica was threatened with invasion by the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals. Miltiades, by his arguments, induced the polemarch Callimachus to give the casting vote in favor of risking a battle with the enemy, the opinions of the ten generals being equally divided. Miltiades waited till his turn came, and then drew his army up in battle array on the ever-memorable field of Marathon. Vid. Marathon. After the defeat of the Persians Miltiades endeavored to urge the Athenians to measures of retaliation, and induced them to intrust to him an armament of seventy ships, without knowing the purpose for which they were designed. He proceeded to attack the island of Paros, for the purpose of gratifying a private enmity. His attacks, however, were unsuccessful; and after receiving a dangerous hurt in the leg while penetrating into a sacred inclosure on some superstitious errand, he was compelled to raise the siege and return to Athens, where he was impeached by Xanthippus for having deceived the people. His wound had turned into a gangrene, and being unable to plead his cause in person, he was brought into court on a couch, his brother Tisagoras conducting his defence for him. He was condemned; but on the ground of his services to the state, the penalty was commuted to a fine of fifty talents, the cost of the equipment of the armament. Being unable to pay this, he was thrown into prison, where he not long after died of his wound. The fine was subsequently paid by his son Cimon.

Milўas (ἡ Μιλυάς: Μιλύαι, Milyæ), was originally the name of all Lycia; but it was afterward applied to the high table-land in the north of Lycia, between the Cadmus and the Taurus, and extending considerably into Pisidia. Its people seem to have been the descendants of the original inhabitants of Lycia. It contained a city of the same name. After the defeat of Antiochus the Great, the Romans gave it to Eumenes, king of Pergamus, but its real government seems to have been in the hands of Pisidian princes.

Mimnermus (Μίμνερμος), a celebrated elegiac poet, was generally called a Colophonian, but was properly a native of Smyrna, and was descended from those Colophonians who reconquered Smyrna from the Æolians. He flourished from about B.C. 634 to 600. He was a contemporary of Solon, who, in an extant fragment of one of his poems, addresses him as still living. Only a few fragments of the compositions of Mimnermus have come down to us. They belong chiefly to a poem entitled Nanno, and are addressed to the flute-player of that name. The compositions of Mimnermus form an epoch in the history of elegiac poetry. Before his time the elegy had been devoted chiefly either to warlike or national, or to convivial and joyous subjects. Archilochus had, indeed, occasionally employed the elegy for strains of lamentation, but Mimnermus was the first who systematically made it the vehicle for plaintive, mournful, and erotic strains. The instability of human happiness, the helplessness of man, the cares and miseries to which life is exposed, the brief season that man has to enjoy himself in, the wretchedness of old age, are plaintively dwelt upon by him, while love is held up as the only consolation that men possess, life not being worth having when it can no longer be enjoyed. The latter topic was most frequently dwelt upon, and as an erotic poet he was held in high estimation in antiquity. (Hor., Epist., ii. 2, 100.) The fragments are published separately by Bach, Lips., 1826.

Minerva, called Athena by the Greeks. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. Athena. Minerva was one of the great Roman divinities. Her name seems to be of the same root as mens; and she is accordingly the thinking, calculating, and inventive power personified. Jupiter was the first, Juno the second, and Minerva the third in the num ber of the Capitoline divinities. Tarquin, the son of Demaratus, was believed to have united the three divinities in one common temple, and hence, when repasts were prepared for the gods, these three always went together. She was the daughter of Jupiter, and is said to have sometimes wielded the thunderbolts of her father. As Minerva was a virgin divinity, and her father the supreme god, the Romans easily identified her with the Greek Athena, and accordingly all the attributes of Athena were gradually transferred to the Roman Minerva. But we confine ourselves at present to those which were peculiar to the Roman goddess. Being a maiden goddess, her sacrifices consisted of calves which had not borne the yoke. She is said to have invented numbers; and it is added that the law respecting the driving in of the annual nail was for this reason attached to the temple of Minerva. She was worshipped as the patroness of all the arts and trades, and at her festival she was particularly invoked by all who desired to distinguish themselves in any art or craft, such as painting, poetry, the art of teaching, medicine, dyeing, spinning, weaving, and the like. This character of the goddess may be perceived also from the proverbs "to do a thing pingui Minerva," i. e., to do a thing in an awkward or clumsy manner; and sus Minervam, of a stupid person who presumed to set right an intelligent one. Minerva, however, was the patroness, not only of females, on whom she conferred skill in sewing, spinning, weaving, &c., but she also guided men in the dangers of war, where victory is gained by cunning, prudence, courage, and perseverance. Hence she was represented with a helmet, shield, and a coat of mail; and the booty made in war was frequently dedicated to her. Minerva was further believed to be the inventor of musical instruments, especially wind instruments, the use of which was very important in religious worship, and which were accordingly subjected to a sort of purification every year on the last day of the festival of Minerva. This festival lasted five days, from the nineteenth to the twenty-third of March, and was called Quinquatrus, because it began on the fifth day after the ides of the month This number of days was not accidental, for we are told that the number five was sacred to Minerva. The most ancient temple of Minerva at Rome was probably that on the Capitol; another existed on the Aventine, and she had a chapel at the foot of the Cælian Hill, where she bore the surname of Capta.

Minervæ Arx or Minervĭum (now Castro), a hill on the coast of Calabria, where Æneas is said to have landed.

Minervæ Promontōrĭum (now Punta della Campanella or della Minerva), a rocky promontory in Campania, running out a long way into the sea, six miles southeast of Surrentum, on whose summit was a temple of Minerva, which was said to have been built by Ulysses, and which was still standing in the time of Seneca. Here the Sirens are reported to have dwelt. The Greeks regarded it as the northwestern boundary of Œnotria.

Minĭo (now Mignone), a small river in Etruria, which rises near Satrium, and falls into the Tyrrhene Sea between Graviscæ and Centum Cellæ.

Minĭus (now Minho), a river in the north west of Spain, rises in the Cantabrian Mountains in the north of Gallæcia, and falls into the ocean. It was also called Bænis, and derived its name of Minius from the minium or vermilion carried down by its waters.

Minōa (Μινώα.). 1. A small island in the Saronic Gulf, off the coast of Megaris, and opposite a promontory of the same name, was united to the main land by a bridge, and formed, with the promontory, the harbor of Nisæa. Vid. p. 493.—2. A town on the eastern coast of Laconia, and on a promontory of the same name, northeast of Epidaurus Limera.—3. A town on the western part of the northern coast of Crete, between the promontories Drepanum and Psacum.—4. A town on the eastern part of the northern coast of Crete, belonging to the territory of Lyctus, and situated on the narrowes part of the island.—5. A town in Sicily. Vid. Heraclea Minoa.

Minos (Μίνως). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Europa, brother of Rhadamanthys, was the king and legislator of Crete. After his death he became one of the judges of the shades in Hades. He was the father of Deucalion and Ariadne; and, according to Apollodorus, the brother of Sarpedon. Some traditions relate that Minos married Itone, daughter of Lyctius, by whom he had a son, Lycastus, and that the latter became, by Ida, the daughter of Corybas, the father of another Minos. But it should be observed that Homer and Hesiod know only of one Minos, the ruler of Cnosus, and the son and friend of Jupiter (Zeus), and that they relate nearly the same things about him which later traditions assign to a second Minos, the grandson of the former. In this case, as in many other mythical traditions, a rationalistic criticism attempted to solve contradictions and difficulties in the stories about a person by assuming that the contradictory accounts must refer to two different personages.—2. Grand son of the former, and a son of Lycastus and Ida, was likewise a king and lawgiver of Crete. He is described as the husband of Pasiphaë, a daughter of Helios; and as the father of Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Androgeos, Acalle, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phædra. After the death of Asterius, Minos aimed at the supremacy of Crete, and declared that it was destined to him by the gods; in proof of which, he asserted that the gods always answered his prayers. Accordingly, as he was offering up a sacrifice to Neptune (Poseidon), he prayed that a bull might come forth from the sea, and promised to sacrifice the animal. The bull appeared, and Minos became king of Crete. (Others say that Minos disputed the government with his brother Sarpedon, and conquered.) But Minos, who admired the beauty of the bull, did not sacrifice him, and substituted another in his place. Neptune (Poseidon) therefore rendered the bull furious, and made Pasiphaë conceive a passion for the animal. Dædalus enabled Pasiphaë to gratify her passion, and she became by the bull the mother of the Minotaurus, a monster with a human body and a bull's head, or, according to others, with a bull's body and a human head. The monster was kept in the labyrinth at Cnosus, constructed by Dædalus. Dædalus fled from Crete to escape the wrath of Minos, and took refuge in Sicily. Minos followed him to Sicily, and was there slain by Cocalus and his daughters. Minos is further said to have divided Crete into three parts, and to have ruled nine years. The Cretans traced their legal and political institutions to Minos. He is said to have been instructed in the art of law-giving by Jupiter (Zeus) himself; and the Spartan Lycurgus was believed to have taken the legislation of Minos as his model. In his time Crete was a powerful maritime state; and Minos not only checked the piratical pursuits of his contemporaries, but made himself master of the Greek islands of the Ægean. The most ancient legends describe Minos as a just and wise law-giver, whereas the later accounts represent him as an unjust and cruel tyrant. In order to avenge the wrong done to his son (vid. Androgeos) at Athens, he made war against the Athenians and Megarians. He subdued Megara, and compelled the Athenians either every year or every nine years to send him as a tribute seven youths and seven maidens, who were devoured in the labyrinth by the Minotaurus. The monster was slain by Theseus.

Mintha (Μίνθη), a daughter of Cocytus, beloved by Hades, was metamorphosed by Ceres (Demeter) or Proserpina (Persephone) into a plant called after her mintha, or mint. In the neighborhood of Pylos there was a hill called after her; and at its foot there was a temple of Pluto (Hades), and a grove of Ceres (Demeter).

Minthe (Μίνθη: now Vunuka), a mountain of Elis in Triphylia, near Pylos.

Minturnæ (Minturnensis: now Trajetta), an important town in Latium, on the frontiers of Campania, was situated on the Appia Via, and on both banks of the Liris, and near the mouth of this river. It was an ancient town of the Ausones or Aurunci, but surrendered to the Romans of its own accord, and received a Roman colony B.C. 296. It was subsequently recolonized by Julius Cæsar. In its neighborhood was a grove sacred to the nymph Marica, and also extensive marshes (Paludes Minturnenses), formed by the overflowing of the River Liris, in which Marius was taken prisoner. Vid. p. 480, a. The neighborhood of Minturnæ produced good wine. There are the ruins of an amphitheatre and of an aqueduct at the modern Trajetta.

[Minucia, one of the vestal priestesses in B.C. 337. Her passion for gay attire made her conduct suspected. On inquiry, suspicion was justified, and Minucia was buried alive.]

Minucianus (Μινουκιανός). 1. A Greek rhetorician, was a contemporary of the celebrated rhetorician Hermogenes of Tarsus (flourished A.D. 170), with whom he was at variance.—2. An Athenian, the son of Nicagoras, was also a Greek rhetorician, and lived in the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 260–268). He was the author of several rhetorical works, and a portion of his Τέχνη ῥητορική is extant, and is published in the ninth volume of Walz's Rhetores Græci.

Minucius Rufus. 1. M., consul B.C. 221, when he carried on war against the Istri. In 217 he was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus. The cautious policy of Fabius displeased Minucius; and accordingly, when Fabius was called away to Rome, Minucius disobeyed the positive commands of the dictator, and risked a battle with a portion of Hannibal's troops. He was fortunate enough to gain a victory; in consequence of which, he became so popular at Rome that a bill was passed giving him equal military power with the dictator. The Roman army was now divided, and each portion encamped separately under its own general. Anxious for distinction, Minucius eagerly accepted a battle which was offered him by Hannibal, but was defeated, and his troops were only saved from total destruction by the timely arrival of Fabius with all his forces. Thereupon Minucius generously acknowledged his error, gave up his separate command, and placed himself again under the authority of the dictator. He fell at the battle of Cannæ in the following year.—2. Q., plebeian ædile 201, prætor 200, and consul 197, when he carried on war against the Boii with success. In 189 he was one of the ten commissioners sent into Asia after the conquest of Antiochus the Great; and in 183 he was one of the three ambassadors sent into Gaul.—3. M., prætor 197.—4. M., tribune of the plebs 121, brought forward a bill to repeal the laws of C. Gracchus. This Marcus Minucius and his brother Quintus are mentioned as arbiters between the inhabitants of Genua and the Viturii, in a very interesting inscription which was discovered in the year 1506, about ten miles from the modern city of Genoa.—5. Q., consul 110, obtained Macedonia as his province, carried on war with success against the barbarians in Thrace, and triumphed on his return to Rome. He perpetuated the memory of his triumph by building the Porticus Minucia, near the Circus Flaminius.

Minucius Felix. Vid. Felix.

Minyæ (Μινύαι), an ancient Greek race, who originally dwelt in Thessaly. Iolcos, in Thessaly, was one of their most ancient seats. Their ancestal hero, Minyas, is said to have migrated from Thessaly into the north of Bœotia, and there to have established the empire of the Minyæ, with the capital of Orchomenos. Vid. Orchomenos. As the greater part of the Argonauts were descended from the Minyæ, they are themselves called Minyæ. The descendants of the Argonauts founded a colony in Lemnos called Minyæ. Thence they proceeded to Elis Triphylia, and to the island of Thera.

Minyas (Μινύας), son of Chryses, and the ancestral hero of the race of the Minyæ. The accounts of his genealogy vary very much in the different traditions, for some call him a son of Orchomenus or Eteocles, others of Neptune (Poseidon), Aleus, Mars (Ares), Sisyphus, or Halmus. He is further called the husband of Tritogenia, Clytodora, or Phanosyra. Orchomenus, Presbon, Athamas, Diochthondas, Eteoclymene, Periclymene, Leucippe, Arsinoë, and Al-

Clathoë or Alcithoë, are mentioned as his children. His tomb was shown at Orchomenos in Bœotia. A daughter of Minyas was called Minyeïas (-ădis) or Minēïs (-ĭdis). Vid. Ov., Met, iv., 1, 32.

MIROBRĪGA. 1. A town of the Celtici in Lusitania, on the coast of the ocean.—2. A Roman municipium in the territory of the Turduli, in Hispania Bætica, on the road from Emerita to Cæsaraugusta.

MISĒNUM (now Punta di Miseno), a promontory in Campania, south of Cumæ, said to have derived its name from Misenus, the companion and trumpeter of Æneas, who was drowned and buried here. The bay formed by this promontory was converted by Augustus into an excellent harbor, and was made the principal station of the Roman fleet on the Tyrrhene Sea. A town sprung up around the harbor, and here the admiral of the fleet usually resided. The inhabitants were called Misenates and Misenenses. The Roman nobles had previously built villas on the coast. Here was the villa of C. Marius, which was purchased by Lucullus, and which afterward passed into the hands of the Emperor Tiberius, who died at this place.

[MISĒNUS (Μισηνός). 1. A companion of Ulysses.—2. Pilot of the fleet of Æneas; according to Virgil, at first a companion and trumpeter of Hector, afterward followed Æneas to Italy. Vid. MISENUM.]

MISITHEUS, the father-in-law of the Emperor Gordian III., who married his daughter Sabinia Tranquillina in A.D. 241. Misitheus was a man of learning, virtue, and ability. He was appointed by his son-in-law præfect of the prætorians, and effected many important reforms in the royal household. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition against the Persians, whom he defeated; but in the course of this war he was cut off either by disease or by the treachery of his successor Philippus, 243.

MITHRADĀTES or MITHRIDĀTES (Μιθραδάτης or Μιθριδάτης), a common name among the Medes and Persians, derived from Mitra or Mithra, the Persian name for the sun, and the root da, signifying "to give." Mithradates would therefore mean, "given by the sun." [The form Mithradates, which is found on coins, is more correct than Mithridates, though the latter is the usual one in Greek writers.] 1. I. King, or, more properly, satrap of Pontus, was son of Ariobarzanes I., and was succeeded by Ariobarzanes II., about B.C. 363. The kings of Pontus claimed to be lineally descended from one of the seven Persians who had conspired against the Magi, and who was subsequently established by Darius Hystaspis in the government of the countries bordering on the Euxine Sea. Very little is known of their history until after the fall of the Persian empire.—2. II. King of Pontus (337–302), succeeded his father Ariobarzanes II., and was the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus. After the death of Alexander the Great, he was for a time subject to Antigonus; but during the war between the successors of Alexander, he succeeded in establishing his independence. He died at the age of 84.—3. III. King of Pontus (302–266), son and successor of the preceding. He enlarged his paternal dominions by the acquisition of great part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. He was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes III.—4. IV. King of Pontus (about 240–190), son and successor of Ariobarzanes III. He gave his daughter Laodice in marriage to Antiochus III. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces I.—5. V. King of Pontus (about 156–120), surnamed EUERGETES, son and successor of Pharnaces I. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made an alliance with the Romans, whom he assisted in the third Punic war and in the war against Aristonicus (131–129) He was assassinated at Sinope by a conspiracy among his own immediate attendants.—6. VI. King of Pontus (120–63), surnamed EUPATOR, also DIONYSUS, but more commonly THE GREAT, was the son and successor of the preceding, and was only eleven years old at the period of his accession. We have very imperfect information concerning the earlier years of his reign, and much of what has been transmitted to us wears a very suspicious aspect. We are told that immediately on ascending the throne he found himself assailed by the designs of his guardians, but that he succeeded in eluding all their machinations, partly by displaying a courage and address in warlike exercises beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. In order to evade the designs against his life, he also devoted much of his time to hunting, and took refuge in the remotest and most unfrequented regions, under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase Whatever truth there may be in these accounts, it is certain that when he attained to manhood he was not only endowed with consummate skill in all martial exercises, and possessed of a bodily frame inured to all hardships, as well as a spirit to brave every danger, but his naturally vigorous intellect had been improved by careful culture. As a boy, he had been brought up at Sinope, where he had probably received the elements of a Greek education; and so powerful was his memory, that he is said to have learned not less than twenty-five languages, and to have been able, in the days of his greatest power, to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own peculiar dialect. The first steps of his career were marked by blood. He is said to have murdered his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithradates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother. In the early part of his reign he subdued the barbarian tribes between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia, and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus. He assisted Parisades, king of the Bosporus, against the Sarmatians and Roxolani, and rendered the whole of the Tauric Chersonese tributary to his kingdom. After the death of Parisades, the kingdom of Bosporus itself was incorporated with his dominions. He was now in possession of such great power that he began to deem himself equal to a contest with Rome itself Many causes of dissension had already arisen between them, but Mithradates had hitherto submitted to the mandates of Rome. Even after expelling Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia, and Nicomedes from Bithynia in 90, he offered no resistance to the Romans when they restored these monarchs to their kingdom. But when Nicomedes, urged by the Roman legates, invaded the territories of Mithradates, the latter made preparations for immediate hostilities. His success was rapid and striking. In 88 he drove Ariobarzanes out of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes out of Bithynia, defeated the Roman generals who had supported the latter, made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, and at last of the Roman province of Asia. During the winter he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to put to death, on the same day, all the Roman and Italian citizens who were to be found within their walls. So hateful had the Romans rendered themselves, that these commands were obeyed with alacrity by almost all the cities of Asia, and eighty thousand Romans and Italians are said to have perished in this fearful massacre. Meantime Sulla had received the command of the war against Mithradates, and crossed over into Greece in 87. Mithradates, however, had resolvèd not to await the Romans in Asia, but had already sent his general Archelaus into Greece at the head of a powerful army. The war proved unfavorable to the king. Archelaus was twice defeated by Sulla with immense loss near Chæronea, and Orchomenos in Bœotia (86). About the same time Mithradates was himself defeated in Asia by Fimbria. Vid. FIMBRIA. These disasters led him to sue for peace, which Sulla was willing to grant, because he was anxious to return to Italy, which was entirely in the hands of his enemies. Mithradates consented to abandon all his conquests in Asia, to pay a sum of two thousand talents, and to surrender to the Romans a fleet of seventy ships. Thus terminated the first Mithradatic war (84). Shortly afterward Murena, who had been left in command of Asia by Sulla, invaded the dominions of Mithradates (83), under the flimsy pretext that the king had not yet evacuated the whole of Cappadocia. In the following year (82) Murena renewed his hostile incursions, but was defeated by Mithradates on the banks of the River Halys. But shortly afterward Murena received peremptory orders from Sulla to desist from hostilities; in consequence of which, peace was again restored. This is usually called the second Mithradatic war. Mithradates, however, was well aware that the peace between him and Rome was in fact a mere suspension of hostilities, and that the republic would never suffer the massacre of her citizens in Asia to remain ultimately unpunished. No formal treaty was ever concluded between Mithradates and the Roman senate; and the king had in vain endeavored to obtain the ratification of the terms agreed on between him and Sulla. The death of Nicomedes III., king of Bithynia, at the beginning of 74, brought matters to a crisis. That monarch left his dominions by will to the Roman people; and Bithynia was accordingly declared a Roman province; but Mithradates asserted that the late king had left a legitimate son by his wife Nysa, whose pretensions he immediately prepared to support by his arms. He had employed the last few years in forming a powerful army, armed and disciplined in the man manner; and he now took the field one hundred and twenty thousand foot sixteen thousand horse, and a vast number barbarian auxiliaries. This was the commencement of the third Mithradatic war. The Roman consuls, Lucullus and Cotta, were able to oppose his first irruption. He traversed Bithynia without encountering any resistance and when at length Cotta ventured to give battle under the walls of Chalcedon, the was totally defeated both by sea and land. Mithradates then proceeded to lay siege to Cyzicus both by sea and land. Lucullus marched to relief of the city, cut off the king's supplies, eventually compelled him to raise the siege early in 73. On his retreat Mithradates fered great loss, and eventually took refuge Pontus. Hither Lucullus followed him in next year. The new army which the king collected was entirely defeated by the Roman general, and Mithradates, despairing of ing the further progress of Lucullus, took uge in the dominions of his son-in-law Tigranes the king of Armenia. Tigranes at first no disposition to attempt the restoration of father-in-law; but being offended at the ty conduct of Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent to demand the surrender of Mithradates, the Armenian king not only refused request, but determined to prepare for war the Romans. Accordingly, in 69, Lucullus marched into Armenia, defeated Tigranes Mithradates near Tigranocerta, and in the year (68) again defeated the allied monarchs near Artaxata. The Roman general then turned aside into Mesopotamia, and laid siege to Nisibis. Here the Roman soldiers broke out open mutiny, and demanded to be led home; and Lucullus was obliged to raise the siege, and return to Asia Minor. Meanwhile Mithradates had taken advantage of the absence of Lucullus to invade Pontus at the head of a large army. He defeated Fabius and Triarius, to whom the defence of Pontus had been committed; and when Lucullus returned to Pontus, he was unable to resume the offensive in consequence of the mutinous spirit of his own soldiers. Mithradates was thus able, before the close of 67, to regain possession of the greater part of his hereditary dominions. In the following year (66) the conduct of the war was intrusted to Pompey. Hostilities were resumed with greater vigor than ever. Mithradates was obliged to retire before the Romans, but was surprised and defeated by Pompey; and as Tigranes now refused to admit him into his own dominions, he resolved to plunge with his small army into the heart of Colchis, and thence make his way to the Palus Mæotis and the Cimmerian Bosporus. Arduous as this enterprise appeared, it was successfully accomplished; and he at length established himself without opposition at Panticapæum, the capital of Bosporus. He had now nothing to fear from the pursuit of Pompey, who turned his arms first against Tigranes, and afterward against Syria. Unable to obtain peace from Pompey, except he would come in person to make his submission, Mithradates conceived the daring project of marching round the northern and western coasts Euxine, through the wild tribes of the Sarmatians and Getæ, and having gathered round his standard all these barbarous nations, to penetrate into Italy itself. But meanwhile disaffection had made rapid progress among his followers. His son Pharnaces at length openly rebelled against him. He was joined both by the whole army and the citizens of Panticapæum, who unanimously proclaimed him king; and Mithradates who had taken refuge in a strong tower, saw that no choice remained to him but death or captivity. Hereupon he took poison, which he constantly carried with him; but his constitution had been so long inured to antidotes that it did not produce the desired effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of his Gaulish mercenaries to dispatch him with his sword. He died in 63. His body was sent by Pharnaces to Pompey at Amisus, as a token of his submission; but the conqueror caused it to be interred with regal honors in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Sinope. He was sixty-eight or sixty-nine years old at the time of his death, and had reigned fifty-seven years, of which twenty-five had been occupied, with only some brief intervals, in one continued struggle against the Roman power. The estimation in which he was held by his adversaries is the strongest testimony to his great abilities: Cicero calls him the greatest of all kings after Alexander, and in another passage says that he was a more formidable opponent than any other monarch whom the Roman arms had yet encountered. — 7. Kings of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, 9, 13.—8. Of Pergamus, son of Menodotus, but his mother having had an amour with Mithradates the Great, he was generally looked upon as in reality the son of that monarch. The king himself bestowed great care on his education; and he appears as early as 64 to have exercised the chief control over the affairs of his native city. At a subsequent period he served under Julius Cæsar in the Alexandrean war (48); and after the defeat of Pharnaces in the following year (47), Cæsar bestowed upon Mithradates the kingdom of the Bosporus, and also the tetrarchy of the Galatians. But the kingdom of the Bosporus still remained to be won, for Asander, who had revolted against Pharnaces, was, in fact, master of the whole country, and Mithradates having attempted to expel Asander, was defeated and slain.

MITHRADĀTIS RĒGIO (Μιθριδάτου χώρα), a district of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the western side of the River Rha (now Wolga), so called because it was the place of refuge of the last Mithradates, in the reign of Claudius.

MITHRAS (Μίθρας), the god of the sun among the Persians. About the time of the Roman emperors his worship was introduced at Rome, and thence spread over all parts of the empire. The god is commonly represented as a handsome youth, wearing the Phrygian cap and attire, and kneeling on a bull which is thrown on the ground, and whose throat he is cutting. The bull is at the same time attacked by a dog, a serpent, and a scorpion. This group appears frequently among ancient works of art, and a fine specimen is preserved in the British Museum.

MNĒMĒ (Μνήμη), i. e., memory, one of the three Muses who were in early times worshipped at Ascra in Bœotia. There seems to have been also a tradition that Mneme was the mother of the Muses, for Ovid (Met., v., 268) calls them Mnemonides; unless this be only an abridged form for the daughters of Mnemosyne. Vid. MUSÆ.

MNEMŎSȲNĒ (Μνημοσύνη), i. e., memory, daughter of Uranus, and one of the Titanides, became by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of the Muses.

MNESARCHUS (Μνήσαρχος). 1. Son of Euphron or Euthyphron, and father of Pythagoras. He was generally believed not to have been of purely Greek origin. According to some accounts, he belonged to the Tyrrhenians of Lemnos and Imbros, and is said to have been an engraver of rings. According to other accounts, the name of the father of Pythagoras was Marmacus, whose father Hippasus came from Phlius —2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of Pythagoras and Theano. According to some accounts he succeeded Aristæus as president of the Pythagorean school.—3. A Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panætius, flourished about B.C. 110, and taught at Athens. Among his pupils was Antiochus of Ascalon.

MNESĬCLES (Μνησικλῆς), one of the great Athenian artists of the age of Pericles, was the architect of the Propylæa of the Acropolis, the building of which occupied five years, B.C. 437–433. It is said that, during the progress of the work, he fell from the summit of the building, and was supposed to be mortally injured, but was cured by a herb which Minerva (Athena) showed to Pericles in a dream.

[MNESILŎCHUS (Μνησίλοχος). 1. One of the thirty tyrants at Athens.—2. Son of Euripides by Chœrile, whose father was also called Mnesilochus, is said to have been an actor; he is said also to have aided Euripides in the composition of his tragedies.]

[Mnesimachus (Μνησίμαχος), a comic poet of the middle comedy, some fragments of whose plays are still extant, and are given by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 787–793, edit. minor.]

[Mnesithīdes (Μνησιθείδης), one of the thirty tyrants at Athens.]

Mnesithēus (Μνησίθεος), a physician, was a native of Athens, and lived probably in the fourth century B.C., as he is quoted by the comic poet Alexis. He enjoyed a great reputation, and is frequently mentioned by Galen and others.

Mnester (Μνήστηρ), a celebrated pantomime actor in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, was also one of the lovers of the Empress Messalina, and was put to death upon the ruin of the latter.

Mōābītis (Μωαβῖτις, Μόβα: Μωαβῖται, Moabītæ: in the Old Testament, Moab, for both country and people), a district of Arabia Petræa, east of the Dead Sea, from the River Arnon (now Wady-el-Mojib, the boundary between Palestine and Arabia) on the north, to Zoar, near the south end of the Dead Sea, on the south, between the Amorites on the north, the Midianites on the east, and the Edomites on the south, that is, before the Israelitish conquest of Canaan. At an earlier period, the country of Moab had extended northward, beyond the northern end of the Dead Sea, and along the eastern bank of the Jordan, as far as the River Jabbok, but it had been wrested from them by the Amorites. The plains east of the Jordan were, however, still called the plains of Moab. The Moabites were left undisturbed by the Israelites on their march to Canaan; but Balak, king of Moab, through fear of the Israelites, did what he could to harm them, first by his vain attempt to induce the prophet Balaam to curse the people whom a divine impulse forced him to bless, and then by seducing them to worship Baal-Peor. Hence the hereditary enmity between the Israelites and Moabites, and the threatenings denounced against Moab by the Hebrew prophets. In the time of the Judges they subdued the southern part of the Jewish territory, with the assistance of the Ammonites and Amalekites, and held it for eighteen years (Judges, iii., 12, foll.). They were conquered by David, after the partition of whose kingdom they belonged to the kingdom of Israel. They revolted after the death of Ahab (B.C. 896), and appear to have become virtually independent; and after the ten tribes had been carried into captivity, the Moabites seem to have recovered the northern part of their original territory. They were subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, with other nations bordering on Palestine, very soon after the Babylonian conquest of Judæa, after which they scarcely appear as a distinct nation, but, after a few references to them, they disappear in the general name of the Arabians. The name Moabitis, however, was still applied to a district of Arabia, between the Arnon (the southern frontier of Peræa, or Palestine east of Jordan), and the Nabathæi, in the mountains of Seir. The Moabites were a kindred race to the Hebrews, being descended from Moab, son of Lot. They worshipped Baal-Peor and Chemosh with most licentious rites, and sometimes offered human sacrifices. The government was monarchical. They were originally a pastoral people; but the excessive fertility of their country, which is a mountain tract intersected with rich valleys and numerous streams, led them to diligence and success in agriculture. The frequent ruins of towns and traces of paved roads, which still cover the face of the country, show how populous and prosperous it was. The chief city, Ar or Rabbath-Moab, afterward Areopolis (now ruins of Rabba), was about twenty-five miles south of the Arnon.

[Moagetes, tyrant of the Cibyrates, in Phrygia, made himself conspicuous by his enmity to Rome during the war with Antiochus the Great, for which he was condemned by the consul Manlius Vulso to pay a heavy fine.]

[Moca (Μόκα, now Mocha), a city of Arabia Petræa, which, under the Roman supremacy, was regarded as a holy city, and had its own laws; coins of this city of the time of the Antonines and Septimius Severus are still extant.]

Modestīnus, Herennīus, a Roman jurist and a pupil of Ulpian, flourished in the reigns of Alexander Severus, Maximinus, and the Gordians, A.D. 222–244. He taught law to the younger Maximinus. Though Modestinus is the latest of the great Roman jurists, he ranks among the most distinguished. There are three hundred and forty-five excerpts in the Digest from his writings, the titles of which show the extent and variety of his labors.

Modestus, a military writer, the author of a Libellus de Vocabulis Rei Militaris, addressed to the Emperor Tacitus, A.D. 275. It is very brief, and presents no features of interest. Printed in all the chief collections of Scriptores de Re Militari.

Modicĭa (now Monza), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on the River Lambrus, north of Mediolanum (now Milan), where Theodoric built a palace, and Theodolinda, queen of the Langobards, a splendid church, which still contains many of the precious gifts of this queen.

Mōdin (Μωδεείν, -εείν, or ιείν), a little village on a mountain north of Lydda or Diospolis, on the extreme northwest of Judæa, celebrated as the native place of the Maccabæan family. Its exact site is uncertain.

Mœnus, Mœnis, Mænus, or Menus (now Main), a river in Germany, which rises in the Sudeti Montes, flows through the territory of the Hermunduri and the Agri decumates of the Romans, and falls into the Rhine opposite Moguntiacum.

Mœræ (Μοῖραι), called Parcæ by the Romans, the Fates. Mœra properly signifies "a share," and as a personification "the deity who assigns to every man his fate or his share." Homer usually speaks of one Mœra, and only once mentions the Mœræ in the plural (Il., xxiv., 29). In his poems Mœra is fate personified at the birth of man, spins out the thread future life, follows his steps, and directs nsequences of his actions according to unsel of the gods. But the personifica- f his Mœra is not complete; for he men- o particular appearance of the goddess, ributes, and no parentage. His Mœra is ore quite synonymous with Æsa (Αἶσα). siod the personification of the Mœræ is ete. He calls them daughters of Jupiter) and Themis, and makes them three in er, viz., Clotho, or the spinning fate; sis, or the one who assigns to man his and Atropos, or the fate that can not be ed. Later writers differ in their genealogy Mœræ from that of Hesiod; thus they lled children of Erebus and Night, of Sat- Cronos) and Night, of Terra (Ge) and Oce- or lastly of Ananke or Necessity. The cter and nature of the Mœræ are different- cribed at different times and by different rs. Sometimes they appear as divinities in the strict sense of the term, and some- only as allegorical divinities of the dura- of human life. In the former character take care that the fate assigned to every by eternal laws may take its course with- struction; and Jupiter (Zeus), as well as ther gods and men, must submit to them. y assign to the Erinnyes, who inflict the shment for evil deeds, their proper func- s; and with them they direct fate accord- o the laws of necessity, whence they are etimes called the sisters of the Erinnyes. e grave and mighty goddesses were repre- ed by the earliest artists with staffs or scep- , the symbol of dominion. The Mœrae, as divinities of the duration of human life, ich is determined by the two points of birth of death, are conceived either as goddesses birth or as goddesses of death, and hence ir number was two, as at Delphi, and was sequently increased to three. The distribu- on of the functions among the three was not strictly observed, for we sometimes find all three described as spinning, although this should be the function of Clotho alone, who is, more- over, often mentioned alone as the representa- tive of all. As goddesses of birth, who spin the thread of the beginning of life, and even prophesy the fate of the newly born, they are mentioned along with Ilithyia, who is called their companion. The symbol with which they, or rather Clotho alone, are represented to in- dicate this function, is a spindle, and the idea implied in it was carried out so far, that some- times we read of their breaking or cutting off the thread when life is to end. Being goddess- es of fate, they must necessarily know the fu- ture, which at times they reveal, and thus be- come prophetic divinities. As goddesses of death, they appear together with the Keres and the infernal Erinnyes, with whom they are even confounded. For the same reason they, along with the Charites, lead Persephone out of the lower world into the regions of light. The va- rious epithets which poets apply to the Mœræ generally refer to the severity, inflexibility, and sternness of fate. They had sanctuaries in many parts of Greece. The poets sometimes describe them as aged and hideous women, and even as lame, to indicate the slow march of fate; but in works of art they are represented as grave maidens, with different attributes, viz., Clotho with a spindle or a roll (the book of fate); Lachesis pointing with a staff to the globe; and Atropos with a pair of scales, or a sun-dial, or a cutting instrument.

Mœris or Myris (Μοῖρις, Μύρις), a king of Egypt, who, Herodotus tells us, reigned some nine hundred years before his own visit to that country, which seems to have been about B.C 450. We hear of Mœris that he formed the lake known by his name, and joined it by a canal to the Nile, in order to receive the waters of the river when they were superabundant, and to supply the defect when they did not rise sufficiently. In the lake he built two pyramids, on each of which was a stone statue, seated on a throne, and intended to represent himself and his wife.

Mœris (Μοῖρις), commonly called Mœris Atticista, a distinguished grammarian, the author of a work still extant, entitled Λέξεις Ἀττικαί, though the title varies somewhat in different manuscripts. Of the personal history of the author nothing is known. He is conjectured to have lived about the end of the second century after Christ. His treatise is a sort of comparison of the Attic with other Greek dialects, consisting of a list of Attic words and expressions, which are illustrated by those of other dialects, especially the common Greek. Edited by Pierson, Lugd. Bat., 1759; [reprinted with some additions by Koch, Lips., 1831: and by Bekker with Harpocration, Berlin, 1833.]

Mœris Lacus (Μοίριος or Μοίριδος λίμνη: now Birket-el-Keroun), a great lake on the western side of the Nile, in Middle Egypt, used for the reception and subsequent distribution of a part of the overflow of the Nile. It was believed by the ancients to have been dug by King Mœris; but it is really a natural, and not an artificial lake.

Mœro (Μοιρώ) or Myro (Μυρώ), a poetess of Byzantium, wife of Andromachus, surnamed Philologus, and mother of the grammarian and tragic poet Homerus, lived about B.C. 300. She wrote epic, elegiac, and lyric poems.

Mœrocles (Μοιροκλῆς), an Athenian orator, a native of Salamis, was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and, like him, an opponent of Philip and Alexander.

Mœsia, called by the Greeks Mysia (Μυσία, also M. ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ, to distinguish it from Mysia in Asia), a country of Europe, was bounded on the south by Mount Hæmus, which separated it from Thrace, and by Mount Orbolus and Scordus, which separated it from Macedonia, on the west by Mount Scordus and the rivers Drinus and Savus, which separated it from Illyricum and Pannonia, on the north by the Danube, which separated it from Dacia, and on the east by the Pontus Euxinus, thus corresponding to the present Servia and Bulgaria. This country was subdued in the reign of Augustus, but does not appear to have been formally constituted a Roman province till the commencement of the reign of Tiberius. It was originally only one province, but was afterward formed into two provinces (probably after the conquest of Dacia by Trajan), called Mœsia Superior and Mœsia inferior, the former being the western, and the latter the eastern half of the country, and separated from each other by the River Cebrus or Ciabrus, a tributary of the Danube. When Aurelian surrendered Dacia to the barbarians, and removed the inhabitants of that province to the south of the Danube, the middle part of Mœsia was called Dacia Aureliani; and this new province was divided into Dacia Ripensis, the district along the Danube, and Dacia Interior, the district south of the latter as far as the frontiers of Macedonia. In the reign of Valens, some of the Goths crossed the Danube and settled in Mœsia. These Goths are sometimes called Mœso-Goths, and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the Scriptures into Gothic about the middle of the fourth century. The original inhabitants of the country, called Mœsi by the Romans, and Mysi (Μυσοί) by the Greeks, were a Thracian race, and were divided into several tribes, such as the Trĭballi, Peucini, &c.

Mogontiăcum, Moguntiăcum, or Magontiăcum (now Mainz or Mayence), a town on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite the mouth of the River Mœnus (now Main), was situated in the territory of the Vangiones, and was subsequently the capital of the province of Germania Prima. It was a Roman municipium, and was founded, or at least enlarged and fortified, by Drusus. It was always occupied by a strong Roman garrison, and continued to the downfall of the empire to be one of the chief Roman fortresses on the Rhine.

Moliŏne. Vid. Moliones.

Moliŏnes or Moliŏnĭdæ (Μολίονες, Μολίονε, Μολιονίδαι), that is, Eurytus and Cteatus, so called after their mother Molione. They are also called Actoridæ or Actoriōne (Ἀκτορίωνε), after their reputed father Actor, the husband of Molione, though they were generally regarded as the sons of Neptune (Poseidon). According to a late tradition, they were born out of an egg; and it is further stated that their bodies grew together, so that they had only one body, but two heads, four arms, and four legs. Homer mentions none of these extraordinary circumstances; and, according to him, the Moliones, when yet boys, took part in an expedition of the Epeans against Neleus and the Pylians. They are represented as nephews of Augeas, king of the Epeans. When Hercules marched against Augeas, the latter intrusted the conduct of the war to the Moliones; but, as Hercules was taken ill, he concluded peace with Augeas, whereupon his army was attacked and defeated by the Molionidæ. In order to take vengeance, he afterward slew them near Cleonæ, on the frontiers of Argolis, when they had been sent from Elis to sacrifice at the Isthmian games on behalf of the town. The Moliones are mentioned as conquerors of Nestor in the chariot race, and as having taken part in the Calydonian hunt. Cteatus was the father of Amphimachus by Theronice, and Eurytus of Thalpius by Theraphone. Their sons, Amphimachus and Thalpius, led the Epeans to Troy.

[Molorchus (Μόλορχος), the mythical founder of Molorchia, near Nemea, entertained Hercules when he went against the Nemean lion.]

Molossi (Μολοσσοί), a people in Epirus, inhabited a narrow slip of country, called after them Molossia (Μολοσσία) or Molossis, which extended from the Aous, along the western bank of the Arachthus, as far as the Ambracian Gulf. The Molossi were a Greek people, who claimed descent from Molossus, the son of Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus) and Andromache, and are said to have emigrated from Thessaly into Epirus, under the guidance of Pyrrhus himself. In their new abodes they intermingled with the original inhabitants of the land and with the neighboring Illyrian tribes, in consequence of which they were regarded by the other Greeks as half barbarians. They were, however, by far the most powerful people in Epirus, and their kings gradually extended their dominion over the whole of the country. The first of their kings, who took the title of King of Epirus, was Alexander, who perished in Italy B.C. 326. Vid. Epirus. The ancient capital of the Molossi was Passaron, but Ambracia afterward became their chief town, and the residence of their kings. The Molossian hounds were celebrated in antiquity, and were much prized for hunting.

[Molpadia (Μολπαδία), an Amazon, slew Antiope, another Amazon, who had married Theseus, and was herself slain by Theseus.]

[Molus (Μόλος), son of Deucalion, and father of Meriones (Hom.): according to a Cretan legend, son of Minos, and brother of Deucalion.]

Molycrīum (Μολύκρειον, also Μολύκρεια, Μολυκρία: Μολύκριος, Μολυκριεύς, Μολυκραῖος), a town in the most southerly part of Ætolia, at the entrance of the Corinthian Gulf, gave the name of Rhium Molycrium (Ῥίον Μολύκριον) to the neighboring promontory of Antirrhium. It was founded by the Corinthians, but was afterward taken possession of by the Ætolians.

Mōmemphis (Μώμεμφις: now Panouf-Khet, or Manouf-el-Seffli, i. e., Lower Memphis), the capital of the Nomos Momemphites in Lower Egypt, stood on the eastern side of the Lake Mareotis.

Momus (Μῶμος), the god of mockery and censure, is not mentioned by Homer, but is called in Hesiod the son of Night. Thus he is said to have censured in the man formed by Vulcan (Hephæstus), that a little door had not been left in his breast, so as to enable one to look into his secret thoughts.

Mona (now Anglesey), an island off the coast of the Ordovices in Britain, was one of the chief seats of the Druids. It was invaded by Suetonius Paulinus A.D. 61, and was conquered by Agricola, 78. Cæsar (B. G., v., 13) erroneously describes this island as half way between Britannia and Hibernia. Hence it has been supposed by some critics that the Mona of Cæsar is the Isle of Man; but it is more probable that he received a false report respecting the real position of Mona, especially since er ancient writers give the name of Mona Isle of Anglesey, and the name of the island is likely to have been mentioned r on account of its celebrity in connec-th the Druids.

[Mon]eses. 1. A Parthian general, mentioned [Ho]race (Carm., iii., 6, 9), is probably the as Surenas, the general of Orodes, who ed Crassus.—2. A Parthian noble, who to Antony and urged him to invade , but soon afterward returned to the n king Phraates.—3. A general of the n king, Vologeses I., in the reign of [Mon]apia or Monarina (now Isle of Man), an between Britannia and Hibernia.

[Mon]da or Munda (now Mondego), a river on estern coast of Spain, which flows into ean between the Tagus and Durius.

[Mon]eta, a surname of Juno among the Ro- by which she was characterized as the tress of money. Under this name she temple on the Capitoline, in which there the same time the mint, just as the pub- sury was in the temple of Saturn. The had been vowed by the dictator L. Furius ttle against the Aurunci, and was erect- the spot where the house of M. Manlius linus had stood. Moneta signifies the but some writers found such a meaning in. Thus Livius Andronicus used Moneta anslation of Mnemosyne (Μνημοσύνη), and made her the mother of the Muses or Ca-. Cicero relates that, during an earth-, a voice was heard issuing from the tem- f Juno on the Capitol, and admonishing ns) that a pregnant sow should be sacri-. A somewhat more probable reason for me is given by Suidas, though he assigns too late a time. In the war with Pyrrhus the Tarentines, he says, the Romans, being nt of money, prayed to Juno, and were by the goddess that money would not be ting to them so long as they would fight the arms of justice. As the Romans by perience found the truth of the words of Juno, ey called her Juno Moneta. Her festival was lebrated on the first of June.

Monima (Μονίμη), a Greek woman, either of Stratonicea, in Ionia, or of Miletus, was the wife of Mithradates, but was put to death by order of this monarch when he fled into Arme-nia, B.C. 72.

Monœci Portus, also Herculis Monœci Portus (now Monaco), a port-town on the coast of Liguria, between Nicæa and Albium Inteme-lium, founded by the Massilians, was situated on a promontory (hence the arx Monœci of Virg., Æn., vi., 801), and possessed a temple of Her-cules Monœcus, from whom the place derived its name. The harbor, though small and ex-posed to the southeastern wind, was of import-ance, as it was the only one on this part of the coast of Liguria.

Montānus, Curtĭus, was exiled by Nero A.D. 67, but was soon afterward recalled at his fa-ther's petition. On the accession of Vespasian, he vehemently attacked in the senate the noto-rious delator Aquilius Regulus. If the same person with the Curtius Montanus satirized by Juvenal (iv., 107, 131; xi., 34), Montanus in later life sullied the fair reputation he enjoyed in youth; for Juvenal describes him as a corpu-lent epicure, a parasite of Domitian, and a hack-neyed declaimer.

[Montānus, Julius, a versifier of some re-pute in the reign of Tiberius, and one of the emperor's private friends.]

Montānus, Voltiēnus, an orator and declaim-er in the reign of Tiberius. From his propen-sity to refine upon thought and diction, he was named the "Ovid" of the rhetorical schools. He was convicted on a charge of majestas, and died an exile in the Balearic islands, A.D. 25.

Mopsia or Mopsopia, an ancient name of Pam-phylia, derived from Mopsus, the mythical lead-er of certain Greeks who were supposed to have settled in Pamphylia, as also in Cilicia and Syria, after the Trojan war, and whose name appears more than once in the geographical names in Cilicia. (Vid. e. g. Mopsucrene, Mopsuestia.)

Mopsium (Μόψιον: Μόψιος), a town of Thes-saly in Pelasgiotis, situated on a hill of the same name, between Tempe and Larissa.

Mopsucrēne (Μόψου κρήνη or κρῆναι, i. e., the Spring of Mopsus), a city of Cilicia Campestris, on the southern slope of the Taurus, and twelve Roman miles from Tarsus, was the place where the Emperor Constantius died, A.D. 364.

Mopsuestĭa (Μόψου ἑστία, Μοψουεστία, i. e., the Hearth of Mopsus, also Μόψου πόλις and Μόψος: Μοψεάτης: Mamistra, in the Middle Ages: now Messis), an important city of Cilicia Campestris, on both banks of the River Pyr-amus, twelve Roman miles from its mouth, on the road from Tarsus to Issus, in the beautiful plain called τὸ Ἀλήϊον πεδίον, was a civitas li-bera under the Romans. The two parts of the city were connected by a handsome bridge built by Constantius over the Pyramus. In ecclesi-astical history, it is notable as the birth-place of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

Mopsus (Μόψος). 1. Son of Ampyx or Am-pycus by the nymph Chloris. Being a seer, he was also called a son of Apollo by Himantis. He was one of the Lapithæ of Œchalia or Ti-tæron (Thessaly), and took part in the combat at the wedding of Pirithous. He was one of the Calydonian hunters, and also one of the Argonauts, and was a famous prophet among the Argonauts. He died in Libya of the bite of a snake, and was buried there by the Argo-nauts. He was afterward worshipped as an oracular hero.—2. Son of Apollo and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, and also a celebrated seer. He contended in prophecy with Calchas at Col-ophon, and showed himself superior to the lat-ter in prophetic power. Vid. Calchas. He was believed to have founded Mallos in Cilicia, in conjunction with the seer Amphilochus. A dispute arose between the two seers respecting the possession of the town, and both fell in combat by each other's hand. Mopsus had an oracle at Mallos, which existed as late as the time of Strabo.

Morgantium, Morgantīna, Murgantĭa, Mor-gentĭa (Μοργάντιον, Μοργαντίνη· Μοργαντῖνος: Murgentinus), a town in Sicily founded by the Morgetes, after they had been driven out of Italy by the Œnotrians. According to Livy (xxiv., 27) this city was situated on the east ern coast, probably at the mouth of the Symæthus; but, according to other writers, it was situated in the interior of the island, southeast of Agyrium, and near the Symæthus. The neighboring country produced good wine.

Morgētes (Μόργητες), an ancient people in the south of Italy. According to Strabo they dwelt in the neighborhood of Rhegium, but, being driven out of Italy by the Œnotrians, crossed over to Sicily, and there founded the town of Morgantium. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Morges was the successor of the Œnotrian king Italus, and hospitably received Siculus, who had been driven out of Latium by the Aborigines, in consequence of which the earlier Œnotrians were called Italietes, Morgetes, and Siculi. According to this account, the Morgetes ought to be regarded as a branch of the Œnotrians.

Moria or Morija (Μώριον ὄρος), a mountain of Judæa, within the city of Jerusalem, on the summit of which the temple was built. Vid. Jerusalem.

[Moricambe Æstuarium (Μορικάμβη εἴσχυσις), now Morecambe Bay), an estuary or bay on the western coast of Britannia.]

Morimēne (Μοριμενή), the northwestern district of Cappadocia, on the banks of the Halys, assigned under the Romans to Galatia. Its meadows were entirely devoted to the feeding of cattle.

Mŏrĭni, a people in Gallia Belgica, west of the Nervii and Menapii, and the most northerly people in all Gaul, whence Virgil calls them extremi hominum (Æn., viii., 727). They dwelt on the coast, opposite Britain, and at the narrowest part of the channel between Gaul and Britain, which is hence sometimes called Fretum Morinorum or Morinum. They were a brave and warlike people. Their country was covered with woods and marshes. Their principal town was Gesoriacum.

Morĭus (Μώριος), a small river in Bœotia, a southern tributary of the Cephisus, at the foot of Mount Thurion, near Chæronēa.

Mormo (Μορμώ, also Μορμολύκη, Μορμολυκεῖον), a female spectre, with which the Greeks used to frighten children.

Morpheus (Μορφεύς), the son of Sleep, and the god of dreams. The name signifies the fashioner or moulder, because he shaped or formed the dreams which appeared to the sleeper.

Mors, called Thanătos (Θάνατος) by the Greeks, the god of death. In the Homeric poems Death does not appear as a distinct divinity, though he is described as the brother of Sleep, together with whom he carries the body of Sarpedon from the field of battle to the country of the Lycians. In Hesiod he is a son of Night and a brother of Ker and Sleep, and Death and Sleep reside in the lower world. In the Alcestis of Euripides, where Death comes upon the stage, he appears as an austere priest of Hades in a dark robe and with the sacrificial sword, with which he cuts off a lock of a dying person, and devotes it to the lower world. On the whole, later poets describe Death as a sad or terrific being (Horat., Carm., i., 4, 13; Sat., ii., 1, 57); but the best artists of the [illegible] avoiding any thing that might be disp[illegible] abandoned the idea suggested to them [illegible] poets, and represented Death under a [illegible] pleasing aspect. On the chest of Cyp[illegible] Night was represented with two boys, on[illegible] and the other white; and at Sparta there [illegible] statues of both Death and Sleep. Both [illegible] usually represented as slumbering youths [illegible] genii with torches turned upside down [illegible] are traces of sacrifices having been [illegible] to Death, but no temples are mentioned [illegible] where.

[Morsimus (Μόρσιμος), son of Philocle[illegible] brother of Melanthius, a tragic poet, w[illegible] well as his brother, was made the object [illegible] bitterest attacks of Aristophanes, on a[illegible] of both his dull and lifeless poetry and [illegible] based character.]

Morȳchus (Μόρυχος), a tragic poet, a [illegible] temporary of Aristophanes, noted especia[illegible] his gluttony and effeminacy.

[Morys (Μόρυς), son of Hippotion, a Ph[illegible] an, slain by Meriones at the siege of Troy.]

Mosa (now Maas or Meuse), a river in [illegible] Belgica, rises in Mount Vogesus, in the [illegible] tory of the Lingones, flows first northeast [illegible] then northwest, and falls into the Vah[illegible] western branch of the Rhine.

Moscha (Μόσχα: now Muscat), an impo[illegible] sea-port on the northeastern coast of A[illegible] Felix, northwest of Syagrus, the easter[illegible] promontory of the peninsula (now Ras el[illegible] a chief emporium for the trade between [illegible] and Arabia.

Moschi (Μόσχοι), a people of Asia, whose [illegible] ritory (ἡ Μοσχική, Moschorum Tractus) fo[illegible] originally the southern part of Colchis, bu[illegible] the time of Augustus, was divided between C[illegible] chis, Iberia, and Armenia.

Moschĭci Montes or -icus Mons (τὰ Μοσχικὰ ὄρη: now Mesjidi), a range of mountains [illegible] tending south and southwest from the [illegible] chain of the Caucasus to that of the Anti-Ta[illegible] rus, and forming the boundary between Colchis and Iberia: named after the Moschi, who dw[illegible] among them. Though lofty, they were w[illegible] wooded to the summit, and their lower slopes were planted with vines.

Moschion (Μοσχίων), a Greek physician, the author of a short Greek treatise "On Female Diseases," is supposed to have lived in the beginning of the second century after Christ. The work is edited by Dewez, Vienn., 1793.

Moschus (Μόσχος), of Syracuse, a grammarian and bucolic poet, lived about B.C. 250. Suidas says that he was acquainted with Aristarchus. According to this statement, his date ought to be placed later; but he calls himself a pupil of Bion in the idyl in which he bewails the death of the latter. Vid. Bion. There are four of his idyls extant. He writes with elegance and liveliness; but he is inferior to Bion, and comes still further behind Theocritus. His style labors under an excess of polish and ornament. For editions, vid. Bion, [and add. by Hermann, Leipzig, 1849.]

Mosella (now Mosel or Moselle), a river in Gallia Belgica, rises in Mount Vogesus, flows northeast through the territories of the Treviri, and falls into the Rhine at Confluentes (now Coblenz) This river forms the subject of a descriptive poem by Ausonius.

Mostēni (Μοστηνοί, Μόστινα, Μουστήνη, Μοστήνη), a city of Lydia, in the Hyrcanian plain, southeast of Thyatira, was one of the cities of Asia Minor destroyed by the great earthquake of A.D. 17. Its coins are numerous.

Mosychlus. Vid. Lemnos.

Mosynœci (Μοσύνοικοι, Μοσσύνοικοι), or Mosyni or Mossyni (Μοσυνοί, Μοσσυνοί), a people on the northern coast of Asia Minor, in Pontus, east of the Chalybes and the city of Cerasus, celebrated for their warlike spirit and savage customs, which are described by Xenophon (Anab., iv., 4; v., 4). Their name was derived from the conical wooden houses in which they dwelt. Their government was very curious: a king chosen by them was strictly guarded in a house higher than the rest, and maintained at the public cost; but as soon as he displeased the commons, they literally stopped the supplies, and starved him to death.

Mothōne. Vid. Methone.

Motūca (Μότουκα: Mutycensis: now Modica), a town in the south of Sicily, west of the promontory Pachynus and near the sources of the River Motychanus (now Fiume di Ragusa). Since both Cicero and Pliny call the inhabitants Mutycenses, it is probable that Mutyca is the more correct form of the name. This town must not be confounded with the more celebrated Motya.

Motўa (Μοτύη: Μοτυαῖος), an ancient town in the northwest of Sicily, situated on a small island (now Isola di Mezzo) only six stadia from the coast, with which it was connected by a mole. It was founded by the Phœnicians in the territory of the Elymi. It possessed a good harbor, and was in early times one of the most flourishing cities of Sicily. It afterward passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, was taken from them by Dionysius of Syracuse, and was finally captured by the Carthaginian general Himilco, who transplanted all its inhabitants to the town of Lilybæum, which he had founded in its neighborhood B.C., 497. From this time it disappears from history.

Motychānus. Vid. Motuca.

Mūcia, daughter of Q. Mucius Scævola, the augur, consul B.C. 95, was married to Cn. Pompey, by whom she had two sons, Cneius and Sextus, and a daughter, Pompeia. She was divorced by Pompey in 62. She next married M. Æmilius Scaurus, a step-son of the dictator Sulla. In 39 Mucia went to Sicily to mediate between her son Sextus Pompey and Augustus. She was living at the time of the battle of Actium, 31. Augustus treated her with great respect.

Muciānus. 1. P. Licinius Crassus Dives Mucianus, was the son of P. Mucius Scævola, and was adopted by P. Licinius Crassus Dives. He was consul B.C. 131, and carried on the war against Aristonicus in Asia, but was defeated by the latter. He succeeded Scipio Nasica as pontifex maximus. He was distinguished both as an orator and a lawyer.—2. Licinius Muciānus, three times consul, in A.D. 52, 70, and 75. On Nero's death in 68, Mucianus had the command of the province of Syria, and he rendered efficient aid to Vespasian when the latter resolved to seize the imperial throne. As soon as Vespasian was proclaimed emperor, Mucianus set out for Europe to oppose Vitellius; but the Vitellians were entirely defeated by Antonius Primus (vid. Primus), before Mucianus entered Italy. Antonius, however, had to surrender all power into the hands of Mucianus, upon the arrival of the latter at Rome. Mucianus was an orator and a historian. His powers of oratory are greatly praised by Tacitus. He made a collection of the speeches of the republican period, which he published in eleven books of Acta and three of Epistolæ. The subject of his history is not mentioned, but it appears to have treated chiefly of the East.

Mucĭus Scævŏla. Vid. Scævola.

Mugilla (Mugillanus), a town in Latium, near Corioli, from which a family of the Papirii probably derived their name Mugillanus.

Mulcĭber, a surname of Vulcan, which seems to have been given to him as an euphemism, that he might not consume the habitations and property of men, but might kindly aid them in their pursuits. It occurs frequently in the Latin poets.

[Mulius (Μούλιος). 1. Son-in-law of Augeas, and husband of Agamede, slain by Nestor.—2. Name of two noble Trojans, of whom one was slain by Patroclus, the other by Achilles.—3. Herald and attendant of the suitor Amphinomus of Dulichium.]

Mulŭcha, Malva, or Molŏchath (Μόλοχαθ now Wad el Mulwia, or Mohalou, or Sourb-eu Herb), the largest river of Mauretania, rising in the Atlas, and flowing north by east into the Gulf of Melillah, has been successively the boundary between the Mauri and the Massæsylii, Mauretania and Numidia, Mauretania Tingitana and Mauretania Cæsariensis, Marocco and Algier. Compare Mauretania.

Mummĭus. 1. L., tribune of the plebs B.C. 187, and prætor 177.—2. L., surnamed Achaicus, son of the last, was prætor 154, when he carried on the war successfully in further Spain against the Lusitanians. He was consul in 146, when he won for himself the surname of Achaicus by the conquest of Greece and the establishment of the Roman province of Achaia. After defeating the army of the Achæan league at the Isthmus of Corinth, he entered Corinth without opposition. The city was burned, razed and abandoned to pillage; the native Corinthians were sold for slaves, and the rarest specimens of Grecian art were given up to the rapacity of an ignorant conqueror. Polybius the historian saw Roman soldiers playing at draughts upon the far-famed picture of Bacchus (Dionysus) by Aristides; and Mummius himself was so unconscious of the real value of his prize, that he sold the rarer works of painting, sculpture, and carving to the King of Pergamus, and exacted securities from the masters of vessels who conveyed the remainder to Italy to replace by equivalents any picture or statue lost or injured in the passage. He remained in Greece during the greater part of 145 with the title of proconsul. He arranged the fiscal and municipal constitution of the newly-acquired province, and won the confidence and esteem of the provincials by his integrity, justice, and equanimity. He triumphed in 145. He was censor in 142 with Scipio Africanus the younger. The political opinions of Mummius inclined to the popular side.—3. Sp., brother of the preceding, and his legatus at Corinth in 146–145, was an intimate friend of the younger Scipio Africanus. In political opinions Spurius was opposed to his brother Lucius, and was a high aristocrat. He composed ethical and satirical epistles, which were extant in Cicero's age, and were probably in the style which Horace afterward cultivated so successfully.

Munātius Plancus. Vid. Plancus.

Munda. 1. A Roman colony and an important town in Hispania Bætica, situated on a small river, and celebrated on account of two battles fought in its neighborhood, the victory of Cn. Scipio over the Carthaginians in B.C. 216, and the important victory of Julius Cæsar over the sons of Pompey in 45. The town had fallen into decay as early as the time of Pliny. The site of the ancient town is usually supposed to be the modern village of Monda, southwest of Malaga; but Munda was more probably in the neighborhood of Cordova, and there are ruins of ancient walls and towers between Martos, Alcandete, Espejo, and Bæna which are conjectured to be the remains of Munda.—2. A river. Vid. Monda.

Munychĭa (Μουνυχία), a hill in the peninsula of Piræus, which formed the citadel of the ports of Athens. It was strongly fortified, and is frequently mentioned in Athenian history. At its foot lay the harbor of Munychia, one of the three harbors in the peninsula of Piræus, fortified by Themistocles. The names of these three harbors were Piræus, Zea, and Munychia. The last was the smallest and the most easterly of the three, and is called at the present day Phanari: Zea was situated between Piræus and Munychia. Most topographers have erroneously supposed Phanari to be Phaleron, and Zea to be Munychia. The entrance the harbor of Munychia was very narrow, and could be closed by a chain. The hill of Munychia contained several public buildings. Of these the most important were, (1) A temple of Diana (Artemis) Munychia, in which persons accused of crimes against the state took refuge: (2.) The Bendideum, the sanctuary of the Thracian Artemis Bendis, in whose honor the festival of the Bendidea was celebrated: (3.) The theatre on the northwestern slope of the hill, in which the assemblies of the people were sometimes held.

Murcĭa, Murtĕa, or Murtĭa, a surname of Venus at Rome, where she had a chapel in the circus, with a statue. This surname, which is said to be the same as Myrtea (from myrtus, a myrtle), was believed to indicate the fondness of the goddess for the myrtle tree. In ancient times there is said to have been a myrtle grove in the front of her chapel at the foot of the Aventine.

Murcus, L. Statĭus, was Cæsar's legatus B.C. 48, and prætor 45. He went into Syria after his year of office expired; and after Cæsar's death became an active supporter of the republican party. Cassius appointed him prefect of the fleet. After the ruin of the republican party at Philippi in 42, Murcus went over to Sextus Pompey in Sicily. Here he was assassinated by Pompey's order at the instigation of his freedman Menas, to whom Murcus had borne himself loftily.

Murēna, Licinĭus. The name Murena, which is the proper way of writing the word, not Muræna, is said to have been given in consequence of one of the family having a great liking for the lamprey (murena), and building tanks (vivaria) for them. 1. P., a man of some literary knowledge, lost his life in the wars of Marius and Sulla, B.C. 82.—2. L., brother of the preceding, served under Sulla in Greece, in the Mithradatic war. After Sulla had made peace with Mithradates (84), Murena was left as proprætor in Asia. Anxious for distinction, Murena sought a quarrel with Mithradates; and after carrying on the war for two years, was at length compelled by the strict orders of Sulla to stop hostilities. Vid. p. 520, a. Murena returned to Rome, and had a triumph in 81. He probably died soon after.—3. L., son of the last, served under his father in the second Mithradatic war, and also under Lucullus in the third Mithradatic war. In 65 he was prætor, in 64 proprætor of Gallia Cisalpina, and in 63 was elected consul with D. Junius Silanus. Servius Sulpicius, an unsuccessful candidate, instituted a prosecution against Murena for bribery (ambitus), and he was supported in the matter by M. Porcius Cato, Cn. Postumius, and Servius Sulpicius the younger. Murena was defended by Q. Hortensius, M. Tullius Cicero, who was then consul, and M. Licinius Crassus. The speech of Cicero, which is extant, was delivered in the latter part of November. The orator handled his subject skillfully, by making merry with the formulæ and the practice of the lawyers, to which class Sulpicius belonged, and with the paradoxes of the Stoics, to which sect Cato had attached himself. Murena was acquitted, and was consul in the following year, 62.—4. A. Terentius Varro Murena, probably the son of the preceding, was adopted by A. Terentius Varro, whose name he took, according to the custom in such cases. In the civil wars he is said to have lost his property, and C. Proculeius, a Roman eques, is said to have given him a share of his own property. This Proculeius is called the brother of Varro, but, if we take the words of Horace literally (Carm., ii., 2), Proculeius had more than one brother. It is conjectured that this Proculeius was a son of the brother of No. 3, who had been adopted by one Proculeius. This would make Proculeius the cousin of Varro. It was common enough among the Romans to call cousins by the name of brothers (frater patruelis and frater). In 25 Murena subdued the Salassi in the Alps, and founded the town of Augusta (now Aosta) in their territory. He was consul suffectus in 23. In 22 he was involved in the conspiracy of Fannius Cæpio, and was condemned to death and executed, notwithstanding the intercession of Proculeius and Terentia, the sister of Murena. Horace (Carm., ii., 10) addresses Murena by the name of Licinius, and probably intended to give him some advice as to being more cautious in his speech and conduct.

Murgantĭa. 1. Vid. Morgantium.—2. A town in Samnium of uncertain site.

Murgis, a town in Hispania Bætica, on the n..nueis of Tarraconensis, and on the road from Acci to Malaga.

MURIDŪNUM or MORIDŪNUM (now Dorchester), called DUNIUM by Ptolemy, the capital of the Durotriges in the south of Britain. At Dorchester there are remains of the walls and the amphitheatre of the ancient town.

[MURRĀNUS, a companion of Turnus, slain by Æneas in Italy.]

MURSA or MURSĬA (now Esseck, capital of Slavonia), an important town in Pannonia Inferior, situated on the Dravus, not far from its junction with the Danube, was a Roman colony founded by the Emperor Hadrian, and was the residence of the governor of Lower Pannonia. Here Magnentius was defeated by Constantius II., A.D. 351.

MURSELLA, or MURSA MINOR, a town in Pannonia Inferior, only ten miles west of the great Mursa.

MUS, DĔCIUS. Vid. DECIUS.

MUSA, ANTŌNĬUS, a celebrated physician at Rome about the beginning of the Christian era. He was brother to Euphorbus, the physician to King Juba, and was himself the physician to the Emperor Augustus. He had been originally a slave. When the emperor was seriously ill, and had been made worse by a hot regimen and treatment, B.C. 23, Antonius Musa succeeded in restoring him to health by means of cold bathing and cooling drinks, for which service he received from Augustus and the senate a large sum of money and the permission to wear a gold ring, and also had a statue erected in his honor near that of Æsculapius by public subscription. He seems to have been attached to this mode of treatment, to which Horace alludes (Epist., i., 15, 3), but failed when he applied it to the case of M. Marcellus, who died under his care a few months after the recovery of Augustus, 23. He wrote several pharmaceutical works, which are frequently quoted by Galen, but of which nothing except a few fragments remain. There are, however, two short Latin medical works ascribed to Antonius Musa, but these are universally considered to be spurious.

MŪSA or MŪZA (Μοῦσα, Μοῦζα: now probably Moushid, north of Mokha), a celebrated port of Arabia Felix, on the western coast, near its southern extremity, or, in other words, on the eastern shore of the Red Sea, near the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb.

MUSÆ (Μοῦσαι), the Muses, were, according to the earliest writers, the inspiring goddesses of song, and, according to later notions, divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the arts and sciences. They were originally regarded as the nymphs of inspiring wells, near which they were worshipped, and they bore different names in different places, until the Thraco-Bœotian worship of the nine Muses spread from Bœotia over other parts of Greece, and ultimately became generally established. 1. Genealogy of the Muses. The most common notion was that they were the daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Mnemosyne, and born in Pieria, at the foot of Mount Olympus. Some call them the daughters of Cœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Gæa), and others daughters of Pierus and Antiope, or of Apollo, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Plusia, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Moneta, probably a mere translation of Mnemosyne or Mneme, whence they are called Mnemonides, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva, or, lastly, of Æther and Terra (Gæa).—2. Number of the Muses. Originally there were three Muses worshipped on Mount Helicon in Bœotia, namely Melete (meditation), Mneme (memory), and Aoide (song). Three Muses also were recognized at Sicyon and at Delphi. As daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Plusia we find mention of four Muses, viz., Thelzinoe (the heart delighting), Aoide (song), Arche (beginning), and Melete. Some accounts, in which they are called daughters of Pierus, mention seven Muses, viz., Nilo, Tritone, Asopo, Heptapora, Achelois, Tipoplo, and Rhodia; and others, lastly, mention eight, which is also said to have been the number recognized at Athens. At length, however, the number nine became established throughout all Greece. Homer sometimes mentions Musa only in the singular, and sometimes Musæ in the plural, and once only he speaks of nine Muses, though without mentioning any of their names. Hesiod is the first who states the names of all the nine, and these nine names became the usual ones. They are Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia or Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope.—3. Nature and character of the Muses. In Homer's poems, they are the goddesses of song and poetry, and live in Olympus. There they sing the festive songs at the repast of the immortals. They bring before the mind of the mortal poet the events which he has to relate, and confer upon him the gift of song. The earliest poets in their invocation of the Muse or Muses were perfectly sincere, and actually believed in their being inspired by the goddesses; but in later times the invocation of the Muses was a mere formal imitation of the early poets. Thamyris, who presumed to excel the Muses, was deprived by them of the gift they had bestowed on him, and punished with blindness. The Sirens, who likewise ventured upon a contest with them, were deprived of the feathers of their wings, and the Muses put them on their own persons as ornaments. The nine daughters of Pierus, who presumed to rival the Muses, were metamorphosed into birds. Since poets and bards derived their power from the Muses, they are frequently called either their disciples or sons. Thus Linus is called a son of Amphimarus and Urania, or of Apollo and Calliope, or Terpsichore; Hyacinthus a son of Pierus and Clio; Orpheus a son of Calliope or Clio, and Thamyris a son of Erato. These and a few others are the cases in which the Muses are described as mothers; but the more general idea was, that, like other nymphs, they were virgin divinities. Being goddesses of song, they were naturally connected with Apollo, the god of the lyre, who, like them, instructs the bards, and is mentioned along with them even by Homer. In later times Apollo is placed in very close connection with the Muses, for he is described as the leader of the choir of the Muses by the surname Musagetes (Μουσαγέτης). A further feature in the character of the Muses is their prophetic power, which belongs to them, partly because they were regarded as inspiring nymphs, and partly because of their connection with the prophetic god of Delphi. Hence they instructed, for example, Aristæus in the art of prophecy. As the Muses loved to dwell on Mount Helicon, they were naturally associated with Bacchus (Dionysus) and dramatic poetry, and hence they are described as the companions, playmates, or nurses of Bacchus (Dionysus). The worship of the Muses points originally to Thrace and Pieria about Mount Olympus, whence it was introduced into Bœotia; and the names of mountains, grottoes, and wells, connected with their worship in the north, were likewise transferred to the south. Near Mount Helicon, Ephialtes and Otus are said to have offered the first sacrifices to them. In the same place there was a sanctuary with their statues, the sacred wells Aganippe and Hippocrene, and on Mount Libethrion, which is connected with Helicon, there was a sacred grotto of the Muses. Pierus, a Macedonian, is said to have been the first who introduced the worship of the nine Muses, from Thrace to Thespiæ, at the foot of Mount Helicon. There they had a temple and statues, and the Thespians celebrated a solemn festival of the Muses on Mount Helicon, called Musea. Mount Parnassus was likewise sacred to them, with the Castalian spring, near which they had a temple. The sacrifices offered to the Muses consisted of libations of water or milk, and of honey. The various surnames by which they are designated by the poets are for the most part derived from the places which were sacred to them or in which they were worshipped, while some are descriptive of the sweetness of their songs.—4. Representations of the Muses in works of art. In the most ancient works of art we find only three Muses, and their attributes are musical instruments, such as the flute, the lyre, or the barbiton. Later artists gave to each of the nine sisters different attributes as well as different attitudes. 1. Calliŏpe, the Muse of epic poetry, appears with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper; 2. Clio, the Muse of history, appears in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books; 3. Euterpe, the Muse of lyric poetry, with a flute; 4. Melpomĕne, the Muse of tragedy, with a tragic mask, the club of Hercules, or a sword; her head is surrounded with vine leaves, and she wears the cothurnus; 5. Terpsichŏre, the Muse of choral dance and song, appears with the lyre and the plectrum; 6. Erăto, the Muse of erotic poetry and mimic imitation, sometimes also has the lyre; 7. Polymnĭa or Polyhymnĭa, the Muse of the sublime hymn, usually appears without any attribute, in a pensive or meditating attitude; 8. Uranĭa, the Muse of astronomy, with a staff pointing to a globe; 9. Thalia, the Muse of comedy and of merry or idyllic poetry, appears with a comic mask, a shepherd's staff, or a wreath of ivy. Sometimes the Muses are seen with feathers on their heads, alluding to their contest with the Sirens.

Musæus (Μουσαῖος). 1. A semi-mythological personage, to be classed with Olen, Orpheus, and Pamphus. He was regarded as the author of various poetical compositions, especially as connected with the mystic rites of Ceres (Demeter) at Eleusis, over which the legend represented him as presiding in the time of Hercules. He was reputed to belong to the family of the Eumolpidæ, being the son of Eumolpus and Selene. In other variations of the myth he was less def-initely called a Thracian. According to other legends, he was the son of Orpheus, of whom he was generally considered as the imitator and disciple. Some accounts gave him a wife Deïoce and a son Eumolpus. There was a tradition that the Museum in Piræus bore that name from having been the place where Musæus was buried. Among the numerous compositions attributed to him by the ancients, the most celebrated were his Oracles. Onomacritus, in the time of the Pisistratidæ, made it his business to collect and arrange the oracles that passed under the name of Musæus, and was banished by Hipparchus for interpolating in the collection oracles of his own making.—2. A grammarian, the author of the celebrated poem on the loves of Hero and Leander. Nothing is known of the personal history of the writer; but it is certain that the poem is a late production. Some critics suppose that the author did not live earlier than the fifth century of our era. Edited by Passow, Lips., 1810; and by Schæfer, Lips., 1825.

Musagĕtes. Vid. Musæ.

Musonĭus Rufus, C., a celebrated Stoic philosopher, was the son of a Roman eques. He was banished by Nero to the island of Gyaros in A.D. 66, under the pretext of his having been privy to the conspiracy of Piso. He returned from exile on the accession of Galba, and seems to have been held in high estimation by Vespasian, as he was allowed to remain at Rome when the other philosophers were banished from the city. Musonius wrote various philosophical works, all of which have perished.

Musti (Μούστη), a town in the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), near the River Bagradas, on the road from Carthage to Sicca Venerea. Here Regulus killed an enormous serpent.

Muthul, a river of Numidia, the boundary between the kingdoms of Jugurtha and Adherbal. It is probably the same as the [illegible]tus.

[Mutilum, a fortified place in Gallia Cispadana, between the rivers Gabellus and Scultenna, answering probably to the modern Modolo.]

Mutĭlus, C. Papĭus, one of the principal Samnite generals in the Marsic war, B.C. 90–89.

Mutĭna (Mutinensis: now Modena), an important town in Gallia Cispadana, on the [illegible] road from Mediolanum to the south of [illegible] was originally a Celtic town, and was the first place which the Romans took away from the Boii. It is mentioned at the beginning of the second Punic war (B.C. 218) under the name of Motina, as a fortified place inhabited by the Romans; but it was not till 183 that it was made a Roman colony. Mutina is celebrated in the history of the civil war after Cæsar's death. Decimus Brutus was besieged here by M. Antonius from December, 44, to April, 43, and under its walls the battles were fought in which the consuls Hirtius and Pansa perished. Hence this war was called the Bellum Mutinense. The best wool in all Italy came from the neighborhood of Mutina.

[Mutines (Μουτίνας, or Μυττόνας, Polyb.), a Lybio-Phœnician, an active and able officer of Hannibal, selected by him to take command of ily after the death of Hippocrates. He prov- a source of great annoyance to the Romans, l baffled all their efforts to capture or subdue n; but at length, having been superseded ough the jealousy of Hanno, he betrayed rigentum into the hands of the Romans, who arded him with the rights of citizenship, d bestowed other honors on him.]

Motunus or Mutinus, was among the Ro- s the same as the phallus, or Priapus, among Greeks, and was believed to be the most erful averter of demons, and of all evil that ulted from pride, boastfulness, and the like.

[Mutyca. Vid. Motuca.]

[Muziris (Μουζιρίς or Μούζουρις: now Mird- i), a port of the district Limyrica, on the st coast of India intra Gangem, five hundred dia (fifty geographical miles) east of Tyndis, ere vessels usually landed.]

Mycale (Μυκάλη: now Samsun), a mountain the south of Ionia in Asia Minor, north of mouth of the Mæander. It forms the west- extremity of Mount Messogis, and runs far t into the sea, opposite to Samos, forming a rp promontory, which was called Mycale or gilium (Τρωγίλιον, Τρωγύλιον: now Cape S. ria). This cape and the southeast promon- y of Samos (Posidonium) overlap one an- er, and the two tongues of land are separat- by a strait only seven stadia (little more than ee fourths of a mile) in width, which is re- wned in Greek history as the scene of the tory gained over the Persian fleet by Leo- hides and Xanthippus, B.C. 479. There eems to have been a city of the same name on or near the promontory. On the northern side of the promontory, near Priene, was the great temple of Neptune (Poseidon), which was the place of meeting for the Panionic festival and Amphictyony.

Mycalessus (Μυκαλησσός: Μυκαλήσσιος), an ancient and important city in Bœotia, mention- ed by Homer, was situated on the road from Aulis to Thebes. In B.C. 413 some Thracian mercenaries in the pay of Athens surprised and sacked the town, and butchered the inhabitants. From this blow it never recovered, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It possessed a celebrated temple of Ceres (Demeter), who was hence surnamed Mycalessia.

Mycenæ, sometimes Mycēne (Μυκῆναι, Μυ- κήνη: Μυκηναῖος: now Karvata), an ancient town in Argolis, about six miles northeast of Argos, is situated on a hill at the head of a nar- row valley, and is hence described by Homer as "in a recess (μυχῷ) of the Argive land:" hence the etymology of the name. Mycenæ is said to have been founded by Perseus, and was subsequently the favorite residence of the Pe- lopidæ. During the reign of Agamemnon it was regarded as the first city in all Greece, but after the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians it ceased to be a place of importance. It still, however, continued an independent town till B.C. 468, when it was attacked by the Ar- gives, whose hatred the Mycenæans are said to have incurred by the part they took in the Per- sian war in favor of the Greek cause. The massive walls of Mycenæ resisted all the at- tacks of the Argives; but the inhabitants were at length compelled by famine to abandon their town. They effected their escape without a surrender, and took refuge, some at Cleonæ, some in Achaia, and others in Macedonia. My- cenæ was now destroyed by the Argives and was never rebuilt; but there are still numerous remains of the ancient city, which, on account of their antiquity and grandeur, are some of the most interesting in all Greece. Of these the most remarkable are the subterranean vault, commonly called the "Treasury of Atreus," but which was more probably a sepulchre, and the Gate of Lions, so called from two lions sculp- tured over the gate.

Mycēne (Μυκήνη), daughter of Inachus and wife of Arestor, from whom the town of My- cenæ was believed to have derived its name: the true etymology of the name is given above.

Mycerīnus or Mecherīnus (Μυκερῖνος, Μεχε- ρῖνος), son of Cheops, king of Egypt, succeeded his uncle Chephren on the throne. His con- duct formed a strong contrast to that of his fa- ther and uncle, being as mild and just as theirs had been tyrannical. On the death of his daugh- ter, he placed her corpse within the hollow body of a wooden cow, which was covered with gold. Herodotus tells us that it was still to be seen at Saïs in his time. We further hear of My- cerinus that, being warned by an oracle that he should die at the end of six years, because he had been a gentle ruler and had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to revelry, and strove to double his allotted time by turning night into day. He began to build a pyramid, but died before it was finished. It was smaller than those of Cheops and Chephren, and, according to Herod- otus, was wrongly ascribed by some to the Greek hetæra Rhodopis.

[Mychus (Μυχός), a harbor in the east of Phocis, on the Crissæan Gulf, probably the mod- ern Zalitza.]

[Myci (Μυκοί), a people of Asia, belonging to the fourteenth satrapy of the Persian empire.]

Mycŏnus (Μύκονος: Μυκόνιος: now Mycono), a small island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, southeast of Tenos and east of Delos, never attained any importance in history, but is celebrated in mythology as one of the places where the giants were defeated by Hercules. The island was poor and unproductive, and its inhabitants were rapacious. It contained two towns, a promontory called Phorbia, and a mountain named Dimastus. The large num- ber of bald persons in this island was consid- ered worthy of record by several ancient writ- ers.

[Mydon (Μύδων). 1. Son of Atymnius, char- ioteer of Pylæmenes, a Trojan warrior, slain by Antilochus.—2. Another Trojan warrior, slain by Achilles.]

[Myecphorītes Nomos (Μυεκφορίτης νομός), a tract of Lower Egypt, opposite the city of Bubastis, on an island, and probably so called from a city Myecphoris.]

Mygdon (Μύγδων). 1. Son of Acmon, a Phryg- ian king, who fought with Otreus and Priam against the Amazons, and from whom some of the Phrygians are said to have been called Myg- donians. He had a son Corœbus, who is hence called Mygdonides.—[2. King of the Bebrycians, brother of Amycus, slain by Hercules when his expedition after the girdle of the Amazon Hippolyte.]

Mygdŏnia (Μυγδονία: Μύγδονες). 1. A district in the east of Macedonia, bordering on the Thermaic Gulf and the Chalcidic peninsula. Its people were of Thracian origin.—2. A district in the north of Asia Minor, between Mount Olympus and the coast, in the east of Mysia and the west of Bithynia, named after the Thracian people Mygdones, who formed a settlement here, but were afterward subdued by the Bithyni.—3. The northeastern district of Mesopotamia, between Mount Masius and the Chaboras, which divided it from Osroëne. From its great fertility, it was also called Anthemusia (Ἀνθεμουσία). The name of Mygdonia was first introduced after the Macedonian conquests: in the passage of Xenophon (Anab., iv., 3), sometimes cited to prove the contrary, the true reading is Μαρδόνιοι, not Μυγδόνιοι.

[Mygdŏnius (Μυγδόνιος: now probably Jakhjakhah), an eastern tributary of the Chaboras, flowing by the walls of Nisibis. Vid. Aborrhas.]

Myia (Μυῖα), daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, and wife of Milo of Crotona. A letter, addressed to a certain Phyllis, is extant under her name.

Mylæ (Μυλαί: Μυλαῖος, Μυλαίτης). 1. (Now Melazzo), a town on the eastern part of the northern coast of Sicily, situated on a promontory running out far into the sea, with a harbor and a citadel. It was founded by Zancle (Messana), and continued subject to the latter city. It was off Mylæ that Agrippa defeated the fleet of Sextus Pompeius, B.C. 36.—2. A town of Thessaly, in Magnesia, of uncertain site.

Mylăsa or Mylassa (τὰ Μύλασα, Μύλασσα: Μυλασεύς: now Melasso, ruins), a very ancient and flourishing inland city of Caria, lay eighty stadia (eight geographical miles) from the coast at the Gulf of Iassus, in a fertile plain, on and at the foot of an isolated rock of beautiful white marble, which furnished the material for the splendid temples and other public buildings of the city. The most important of these buildings was the great national temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Carius or Osagon. Vid. Caria. Mylasa was the birth-place and capital of Hecatomnus. Under the Romans it was made a free city. In the civil wars it was taken and partly destroyed by Labienus. Its remains are very extensive, and the ruins of the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) are supposed to have been found on the rock which formed the Acropolis of the ancient city.

Myndus (Μύνδος: Μύνδιος: now probably Port Gumishlu, ruins), a Dorian colony on the coast of Caria, in Asia Minor, founded by settlers from Trœzene, probably on the site of an old town of the Leleges, which continued to exist under the name of Palæmyndus. Myndus stood at the western extremity of the same peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. It was not one of the cities of the Dorian Hexapolis, but never became a place of much importance.

[Mynes (Μύνης), son of Euenus of Lyrnessus, husband of Briseis, slain by Achilles, who carried off captive his beautiful widow, the occasion of the quarrel between him and Agamemnon.]

Myōn or Myŏnia (Μύων, Μυονία: Μυονεύς), a town of the Locri Ozolæ, situated on a considerable height thirty stadia from Amphissa, and in one of the passes which led from Ætolia into Phocis.

Myonnēsus (Μυόννησος: now Cape Hypsili), a promontory of Ionia, with a town and a small island of the same name, south of Teos and west of Lebedus, and forming the northern headland of the Gulf of Ephesus. Here the Romans, under the prætor L. Æmilius, gained a great naval victory over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190.

Mўos Hormos (ὁ Μυὸς ὅρμος, i. e., Mouse-port, or, as others render it, Muscle-port, for μῦς is also the Greek for muscle, and this shell-fish is very common on the western coast of the Red Sea), afterward Veneris Portus (Ἀφροδίτης ὅρμος), an important sea-port town of Upper Egypt, built by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus on a promontory of the same name, six or seven days' journey from Coptos. Some of the best modern geographers identify the port with Kosseir (latitude 26° 10′), which is still an important port of the Red Sea, and the place of embarkation for the caravan to Mecca. Kosseir lies due east of Coptos, and is connected with it by a valley, which contains traces of an ancient road, and which still forms the route of the Mecca caravan. At the village of Abu-Shaar, near Kosseir, are extensive ruins, which are supposed to be the remains of the town of Myos Hormos. Others, however, place it a degree further north, in latitude 27° 10′, opposite the Jaffatine islands.

Myra or Myron (τὰ and ἡ Μύρα, ἡ Μύρων: Μυρεύς: now Myra, Grk., Dembre, Turk., ruins), one of the chief cities of Lycia, and, under the later Roman empire, the capital of the province, was built on a rock twenty stadia (two geographical miles) from the sea, and had a port called Andriaca (Ἀνδριακή). St. Paul touched here on his voyage as a prisoner to Rome, and the passage where this is mentioned (Acts, xxvii., 5, 6) affords incidental proof that the place was then an important sea-port. There are still magnificent ruins of the city, in great part hewn out of the rock.

[Myrcinus (Μύρκινος), a small city and fortress of Thrace, on the Strymon, founded by the Milesian Histiæus, with the consent of Darius, as the capital of a small principality in these regions: it fell, however, into the hands of the Edoni, who made it their capital and the residence of their princes.]

Myriandrus (Μυρίανδρος), a Phœnician colony in Syria, on the eastern side of the Gulf of Issus, a day's journey from the Cilician Gates. It probably stood a little south of Alexandrea, at a spot where there are ruins. Herodotus calls the Gulf of Issus ὁ Μυριανδικὸς κόλπος, a name evidently derived from this place, with a slight variation of form.

Myricūs (Μυρικοῦς), a city on the coast of Troas, opposite to Tenedos.

Myrīna (ἡ Μυρίνα, or Μύρινα, Μύριννα, Μυρίνη: Μυριναῖος). 1. (Now Sandarlik?), a very ancient and strongly fortified city on the western coast of Mysia, founded, according to mythical tradition, by Myrinus or by the Amazon Myrina, and colonized by the Æolians, of whose federacy it formed a member. It was also called Smyrna, and, under the Roman empire, Sebastopolis: it was made by the Romans a civitas libera. It was destroyed by earthquakes under Tiberius and Trajan, but each time rebuilt. It was the birth-place of the epigrammatic poet Agathias.—2. Vid. LEMNOS.

[MYRINA (Μύρινα), an Amazon, said to have given name to the city MYRINA, No. 1: she is mentioned in the Iliad (ii., 814).]

MYRLEA (Μύρλεια: Μυρλεανός: ruins at Amapoli, a little distance inland from Mudanieh), a city of Bithynia, not far from Prusa, founded by the Colophonians, and almost rebuilt by Prusias I., who called it APAMEA after his wife. The Romans colonized it under Julius Cæsar and Augustus.

MYRMECIDES (Μυρμηκίδης), a sculptor and engraver, of Miletus or Athens, is generally mentioned in connection with Callicrates, like whom he was celebrated for the minuteness of his works. Vid. CALLICRATES. His works in ivory were so small that they could scarcely be seen without placing them on black hair.

MYRMECIUM (Μυρμήκιον), a Scythian or Cimmerian town of the Chersonesus Taurica, situated on a promontory of the same name at the narrowest part of the Bosporus, opposite the Achilleum in Asia.

MYRMIDON (Μυρμιδών), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Eurymedusa, daughter of Clitos, whom Jupiter (Zeus) deceived in the disguise of an ant. Her son was for this reason called Myrmidon (from μύρμηξ, an ant), and was regarded as the ancestor of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was married to Pisidice, by whom he became the father of Antiphus and Actor.

MYRMIDONES (Μυρμιδόνες), an Achæan race in Phthiotis in Thessaly, whom Achilles ruled over, and who accompanied this hero to Troy. They are said to have inhabited originally the island of Ægina, and to have emigrated with Peleus into Thessaly; but modern critics, on the contrary, suppose that a colony of them emigrated from Thessaly into Ægina. The Myrmidones disappear from history at a later period. The ancients derived their name either from a mythical ancestor MYRMIDON, or from the ants (μύρμηκες) in Ægina, which were fabled to have been metamorphosed into men in the time of Æacus. Vid. ÆACUS.

[MYRO (Μυρώ). Vid. MOERO.]

MYRON (Μύρων). 1. Tyrant of Sicyon, the father of Aristonymus, and grandfather of Clisthenes. He gained the victory at Olympia in the chariot-race in B.C. 648.—2. One of the most celebrated of the Greek statuaries, and also a sculptor and engraver, was born at Eleutheræ, in Bœotia, about 480. He is also called an Athenian, because Eleutheræ had been admitted to the Athenian franchise. He was the disciple of Ageladas, the fellow-disciple of Polycletus, and a younger contemporary of Phidias. He flourished about 431, the time of the beginning o the Peloponnesian war. The chief characteristic of Myron seems to have been his power of expressing a great variety of forms. Not content with the human figure in its most difficult and momentary attitudes, he directed his art toward various other animals, and he seems to have been the first great artist who did so. His great works were nearly all in bronze. The most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. Of his Discobolus there are several marble copies in existence. It is true that we can not prove by testimony that any of these alleged copies were really taken from Myron's work, or from imitations of it; but the resemblance between them, the fame of the original, and the well-known frequency of the practice of making such marble copies of celebrated bronzes, all concur to put the question beyond reasonable doubt. Of these copies we possess one in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum, which was found in the grounds of Hadrian's Tiburtine Villa in 1791. The Cow of Myron appears to have been a perfect work of its kind. It was celebrated in many popular verses, and the Greek Anthology still contains no less than thirty-six epigrams upon it. The Cow was represented as lowing, and the statue was placed on a marble base, in the centre of the largest open place in Athens, where it still stood in the time of Cicero. In the time of Pausanias it was no longer there; it must have been removed to Rome, where it was still to be seen in the temple of Peace in the time of Procopius.—3. Of Priene, the author of an historical account of the first Messenian war, probably lived not earlier than the third century B.C.

MYRONIDES (Μυρωνίδης), a skillful and successful Athenian general. In B.C. 457 he defeated the Corinthians who had invaded Megaris, and in 456 he defeated the Bœotians at Œnophyta.

MYRRHA (Μύῤῥα) or SMYRNA, daughter of Cinyras and mother of Adonis. For details, vid ADONIS.

MYRRHINUS (Μυῤῥινοῦς: Μυῤῥινούσιος), a demus on the eastern coast of Attica, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, a little south of the promontory Cynosura. It is said to have been built by a hero Colænus, and it contained a temple of Diana (Artemis) Colænis.

MYRSILUS (Μύρσιλος). 1. Vid. CANDAULES.—2. A Greek historical writer of uncertain date, a native of Lesbos, from whom Dionysius of Halicarnassus borrowed a part of his account of the Pelasgians.

MYRSINUS. Vid. MYRTUNTIUM

MYRTILIS, a town of the Turdetani, on the Anas in Lusitania, possessing the Jus Latii.

MYRTILUS (Μυρτίλος), son of Mercury (Hermes) by Cleobule, Clytia, Phaethusa, or Myrto. He was the charioteer of Œnomaus, king of Elis, whom he betrayed when Pelops contended with his master in the chariot-race. He was afterward thrown into the sea by Pelops near Geræstus in Eubœa; and that part of the Ægean is said to have thenceforth been called after him the Myrtoan Sea. Vid. ŒNOMAUS, PELOPS. At the moment he expired he pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops which was henceforward tormented by the Erinnyes. His father placed him among the stars as auriga.

MYRTIS (Μύρτις), a lyric poetess, a native of Anthedon in Bœotia. She was reported to have been the instructress of Pindar, and to have contended with him for the palm of superiority. This is alluded to in an extant fragment of Co-nna There were statues in honor of her in various parts of Greece.

[Myrto (Μυρτώ). 1. Daughter of Aristides, the grandson of Aristides the Just, married, according to one account, by Socrates while Xanthippe was living. Boeckh thinks she was his first wife.—2. Vid. Myrtoum Mare.]

Myrtōum Mare (τὸ Μυρτῷον πέλαγος), the part of the Ægean Sea south of Eubœa, Attica, and Argolis, which derived its name from the small island Myrtus, though others suppose it to come from Myrtilus, whom Pelops threw into this sea, or from the maiden Myrto.

Myrtuntĭum (Μυρτούντιον: Μυρτούσιος), called Myrsĭnus (Μύρσινος) in Homer, a town of the Epeans in Elis, on the road from Elis to Dyme.

Myrtus. Vid. Myrtoum Mare.

Mys (Μῦς), an artist in the toreutic department, engraved the battle of the Lapithæ and the Centaurs and other figures on the shield of Phidias's colossal bronze statue of Minerva (Athena) Promachos in the Acropolis of Athens. He is mentioned as one of the most distinguished engravers by several ancient writers.

Myscĕlus (Μύσκελος or Μύσκελλος), a native of Achaia, and, according to Ovid (Metam., xv., 1), an Heraclid, and the son of an Argive named Alemon. He founded Croton in Italy, B.C. 710, in accordance with the Delphic oracle. The oracle had commanded him to build a city where he should find rain with fine weather. For a long time he thought it impossible to fulfill the command of the oracle, till at length he found in Italy a beautiful woman in tears; whereupon he perceived that the oracle was accomplished, and straightway founded Croton on the spot.

Mȳsi (Μυσοί), one of the Thracian tribes who seem to have crossed over from Europe into Asia Minor before recorded history begins. They appear to be the same people as the Mœsi (in Greek also Μυσοί), on the banks of the Danube. Vid. Mœsia. They stand in close connection with the Teucri. These two communities appear to have moved from the banks of the Strymon to the southeast of Thrace, forcing the Bithyni over the Thracian Bosporus into Asia, and then to have crossed over into Asia themselves, by way of the Thracian Bosporus, and to have settled on the southeastern shore of the Propontis, as far west as the River Rhyndacus (the rest of the Asiatic coast of the Propontis and the Hellespont being occupied by Phrygians), and also in the eastern and southern parts of the district afterward called Mysia, in the mountains called Olympus and Temnus, and on the southern side of Ida. The Teucrians obtained a permanent footing also on the northern side of Ida, in the Troad. Being afterward driven westward over the Rhyndacus by the Bithynians, and hemmed in on the west and north by the Æolian colonies, the Mysians may be regarded as about shut up within the ranges of Ida and Olympus on the north and northeast, and Temnus on the south. They were a simple pastoral people, low in the scale of civilization. Their language and religion bore a strong resemblance to those of their neighbors, the Phrygians and Lydians, who were of the same Thracian origin as themselves, and hence arose he error, which is found in Herodotus, of deriving them directly from the Lydians.

Mȳsĭa (ἡ Μυσία, poet. Μυσὶς αἶα: Μυσός, Mysus and Mysius: now Chan Karasi, the northwestern district of Anadoli), a district of Asia Minor, called, also, the Asiatic Mysia (Μυσία ἡ Ἀσιανή), in contradistinction to Mœsia on the banks of the Danube. Originally it meant of course the territory of the Mysi, but in the usual division of Asia Minor, as settled under Augustus, it occupied the whole of the northwestern corner of the peninsula, between the Hellespont on the northwest; the Propontis on the north; the River Rhyndacus and Mount Olympus on the east, which divided it from Bythynia and Phrygia; Mount Temnus, and an imaginary line drawn from Temnus to the southern side of the Elaïtic Gulf on the south, where it bordered upon Lydia, and the Ægean Sea on the west. It was subdivided into five parts: (1.) Mysia Minor (M. ἡ μικρά), along the northern coast. (2.) Mysia Major (M. ἡ μεγάλη), the southeastern inland region, with a small portion of the coast between the Troad and the Æolic settlements about the Elaïtic Gulf. (3.) Troas (ἡ Τρωάς), the northwestern angle, between the Ægean and Hellespont, and the southern coast along the foot of Ida. (4.) Æolis or Æolia (ἡ Αἰολίς or Αἰολία), the southern part of the western coast, around the Elaïtic Gulf, where the chief cities of the Æolian confederacy were planted, but applied in a wider sense to the western coast in general. And (5.) Teuthrania (ἡ Τευθρανία), the southwestern angle, between Temnus and the borders of Lydia, where, in very early times, Teuthras was said to have established a Mysian kingdom, which was early subdued by the kings of Lydia; this part was also called Pergamene, from the celebrated city of Pergamus, which stood in it. This account applies to the time of the early Roman empire; the extent of Mysia, and its subdivisions, varied greatly at other times. In the heroic ages we find the great Teucrian monarchy of Troy in the northwest of the country, and the Phrygians along the Hellespont; as to the Mysians, who appear as allies of the Trojans, it is not clear whether they are Europeans or Asiatics. The Mysia of the legends respecting Telephus is the Teuthranian kingdom in the south, only with a wider extent than the later Teuthrania. Under the Persian empire, the northwestern portion, which was still occupied in part by Phrygians, but chiefly by Æolian settlements, was called Phrygia Minor, and by the Greeks Hellespontus. Mysia was the region south of the chain of Ida, and both formed, with Lydia, the second satrapy. In the division of the empire of Alexander the Great, Mysia fell, with Thrace, to the share of Lysimachus, B.C. 311, after whose defeat and death, in 281, it became a part of the Greco-Syrian kingdom with the exception of the southwestern portion, where Philetærus founded the kingdom of Pergamus (280), to which kingdom the whole of Mysia was assigned, together with Lydia, Phrygia, Caria, Lycia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia, after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans in 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamus, Mysia fell to the Romans in 133 by the bequest of Attalus III., and formed part of the province of Asia. Under the later empire Mysia formed a separate proconsular province under the name of Hellespontus. The country was for the most part mountainous, its chief chains being those of Ida, Olympus, and Temnus, which are terminal branches of the northwestern part of the Taurus chain, and the union of which forms the elevated land of southeastern Mysia. Their prolongations into the sea form several important bays and capes; namely, among the former, the great Gulf of Adramyttium (now Adramytti), which cuts off Lesbos from the continent, and the Sinus Elaïticus (now Gulf of Chandeli); and, among the latter, Sigeum (now Cape Yenicheri) and Lectum (now Cape Baba), at the northwestern and southwestern extremities of the Troad, and Cane (now Cape Coloni) and Hydria (now Fokia), the northern and southern headlands of the Elaïtic Gulf. Its rivers are numerous; some of them considerable, in proportion to the size of the country, and some of first-rate importance in history and poetry: the chief of them, beginning on the east, were Rhyndacus and Macestus, Tarsius, Æsepus, Granicus, Rhodius, Simois, and Scamander, Satnois, Evenus, and Caicus. The tribes of the country, besides the general appellations mentioned above, were known by the following distinctive names: the Olympiēni or Olympēni (Ὀλυμπιηνοί, Ὀλυμπηνοί), in the district of Olympēne, at the foot of Mount Olympus; next to them, on the south and west, and occupying the greater part of Mysia Proper, the Abrettēni, who had a native divinity called by the Greeks Ζεὺς Ἀβρεττηνός; the Trimenthurītæ, the Pentademītæ, and the Mysomacedŏnes, all in the region of Mount Temnus.

Mȳsĭus (now Bergama), a tributary of the River Caïcus in Mysia, or rather the upper part of the Caïcus itself, had its source in Mount Temnus.

Myson (Μύσων), of Chenæ, a village either in Laconia or on Mount Œta, is enumerated by Plato as one of the seven sages, in place of Periander.

Mystĭa, a town in the southeast of Bruttium, a little above the Promontorium Cocintum.

Mȳtĭlēne or Mĭtȳlene (Μυτιλήνη, Μιτυλήνη: the former is the ancient form, and the one usually found on coins and inscriptions; the latter is sometimes found on inscriptions, and is the commoner form in MSS.: Μυτιληναῖος, Mitylenæus: Mytilene or Metelin), the chief city of Lesbos, stood on the eastern side of the island opposite the coast of Lesbos, upon a promontory which was once an island, and both sides of which formed excellent harbors. Its first foundation is ascribed to Carians and Pelasgians. It was early colonized by the Æolians. Vid. Lesbos. Important hints respecting its political history are furnished by the fragments of the poetry of Alcæus, whence (and from other sources) it seems that, after the rule and overthrow of a series of tyrants, the city was nearly ruined by the bitter hatred and conflicts of the factions of the nobles and the people, till Pittacus was appointed to a sort of dictatorship, and the nobles were expelled. Vid. Alcæus, Pittacus. Meanwhile, the city had grown to great importance as a naval power, and had founded colonies on the coasts of Mysia and Thrace. At the beginning of the seventh century B.C., the possession of one of these colonies, Sigeum at the mouth of the Hellespont, was disputed in war between the Mytilenæans and Athenians, and assigned to the latter by the award of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. Among the other colonies of Mytilene were Achilleum, Assos, Antandrus, &c. Mytilene submitted to the Persians after the conquest of Ionia and Æolis, and furnished contingents to the expeditions of Cambyses against Egypt and of Darius against Scythia. It was active in the Ionian revolt, after the failure of which it again became subject to Persia, and took part in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. After the Persian war it formed an alliance with Athens, and remained one of the most important members of the Athenian confederacy, retaining its independence till the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 428, when it headed a revolt of the greater part of Lesbos, the progress and suppression of which forms one of the most interesting episodes in the history of the Peloponnesian war. (Vid. the Histories of Greece.) This event destroyed the power of Mytilene. Its subsequent fortunes can not be related in detail here. It fell under the power of the Romans after the Mithradatic war. Respecting its important position in Greek literary history, vid. Lesbos.

Myttistratum. Vid. Amestratus.

Myus (Μυοῦς: Μυούσιος: ruins at Palatia), the least city of the Ionian confederacy, stood in Caria, on the southern side of the Mæander, thirty stadia from its mouth, and very near Miletus. Its original site was probably at the mouth of the river; but its site gradually became an unhealthy marsh; and by the time of Augustus it was so deserted by its inhabitants that the few who remained were reckoned as citizens of Miletus.

N.

Naarda (Ναάρδα), a town of Babylonia, chiefly inhabited by Jews, and with a Jewish academy.

Naarmalcha or Nahrmalcha (Ναρμάλχας, Ναρμάλχας, i. e., the King's Canal: ὁ βασίλειος ποταμός, ἡ βασιλικὴ διῶρυξ, flumen regium: Nahr-al-Malk or Ne Gruel Melek), the greatest of the canals connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris, was situated near the northern limit of Babylonia, a little south of the Median Wall, in latitude 33° 5′ about. Its formation was ascribed to a governor named Gobares. It was repaired upon the building of Seleucia at its junction with the Tigris by Seleucus Nicator, and again under the Roman emperors Trajan, Severus, and Julian.

Nabalĭa. Vid. Navalia.

Nabarzānes (Ναβαρζάνης), a Persian, conspired along with Bessus, against Darius, the last king of Persia. He was pardoned by Alexander.

Nābătæi, Nābăthæ (Ναβαταῖοι, Ναβάται: in the Old Testament, Nebaioth), an Arabian people, descended from the eldest son of Ishmael, had their original abodes in the northwestern part of the Arabian peninsula, east and southeast of the Moabites and Edomites, who dwelt on the east of the Dead Sea and in the mountains reaching from it to the Persian Gulf. In the changes effected among the tribes of these regions by the Babylonian conquest of Judæa, the Nabathæans extended west into the Sinaitic peninsula and the territory of the Edomites, while the latter took possession of the south of Judæa (vid. Idumæi); and hence the Nabathæans of Greek and Roman history occupied nearly the whole of Arabia Petræa, along the northeastern coast of the Red Sea, on both sides of the Ælanitic Gulf, and in the Idumæan Mountains (Mountains of Seir), where they had their celebrated rock-hewn capital, Petra. At first they were a roving pastoral people; but, as their position gave them the command of the trade between Arabia and the west, they prosecuted that trade with great energy, establishing regular caravans between Leuce Come, a port of the Red Sea, in the northwestern part of Arabia, and the port of Rhinocolura (now El-Arish) on the Mediterranean, upon the frontiers of Palestine and Egypt. Sustained by this traffic, a powerful monarchy grew up, which resisted all the attacks of the Greek kings of Syria, and which, sometimes at least, extended its power as far north as Syria. Thus, in the reign of Caligula, even after the Nabathæans had nominally submitted to Rome, we find even Damascus in possession of an ethnarch of "Aretas the king," i. e., of the Nabathæan Arabs: the usual names of these kings were Aretas and Obodas. Under Augustus the Nabathæans are found, as nominal subjects of the Roman empire, assisting Ælius Gallus in his expedition into Arabia Felix, through which, and through the journey of Athenodorus to Petra, Strabo derived important information. Under Trajan the Nabathæans were conquered by A. Cornelius Palma, and Arabia Petræa became a Roman province, A.D. 105–107. In the fourth century it was considered a part of Palestine, and formed the diocese of a metropolitan, whose see was at Petra. The Mohammedan conquest finally overthrew the power of the Nabathæans, which had been long declining: their country soon became a haunt of the wandering Arabs of the Desert, and their very name disappeared.

Nabis (Νάβις), succeeded in making himself tyrant of Lacedæmon on the death of Machanidas, B.C. 207. He carried the licence of tyranny to the furthest possible extent. All persons possessed of property were subjected to incessant exactions, and the most cruel tortures if they did not succeed in satisfying his rapacity. One of his engines of torture resembled the maiden of more recent times; it was a figure resembling his wife Apega, so constructed as to clasp the victim and pierce him to death with the nails with which the arms and bosom of the figure were studded. The money which he got by these means and by the plunder of the temples enabled him to raise a large body of mercenaries, whom he selected from among the most abandoned and reckless villains. With these forces he was able to extend his sway over a considerable part of Peloponnesus; but his further progress was checked by Flamininus, who, after a short campaign, compelled him to sue for peace (195). The tyrant, however, was allowed to retain the sovereignty of Sparta, and soon after the departure of Flamininus from Greece he resumed hostilities. He was opposed by Philopœmen, the general of the Achæan league; and though Nabis met at first with some success, he was eventually defeated by Philopœmen, and was soon afterward assassinated by some Ætolians who had been sent to his assistance (192).

Nabonassar (Ναβονάσαρος), king of Babylon, whose accession to the throne was fixed upon by the Babylonian astronomers as the era from which they began their calculations. This era is called the Era of Nabonassar. It commenced on the twenty-sixth of February, B.C. 747.

Nabrissa or Nebrissa (now Lebrija), also named Veneria, a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica, near the mouth of the Bætis.

Nacolīa (Νακόλεια or -ία, or Νακώλεια: now Sidighasi), a town of Phrygia Epictetus, on the western bank of the River Thymbrius, between Dorylæum and Cotyæum, was the place where the Emperor Valens defeated his rival Procopius, A.D. 366.

[Næbis or Nebis (Νῇβις, now Neyva), a river on the western coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Durius and the Minius.]

Nænĭa, i. e., a dirge or lamentation, chanted at funerals, was personified at Rome and worshipped as a goddess. She had a chapel outside the walls of the city, near the porta Viminalis.

Nævĭus, Cn., an ancient Roman poet, of whose life few particulars have been recorded. He was probably a native of Campania, and was born somewhere between B.C. 274 and 264. He appears to have come to Rome early, and he produced his first play in 235. He was attached to the plebeian party; and, with the licence of the old Attic comedy, he made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. He attacked Scipio and the Metelli; but he was indicted by Q. Metellus and thrown into prison, to which circumstance Plautus alludes in his Miles Gloriosus (ii., 2, 56). While in prison he composed two plays, the Hariolus and Leon, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offence by exile. He retired to Utica; and it was here, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war; and here it is certain that he died, either in 204 or 202. Nævius was both an epic and a dramatic poet. Of his epic poem on the first Punic war a few fragments are still extant. It was written in the old Saturnian metre: for Ennius, who introduced the hexameter among the Romans, was not brought to Rome till after the banishment of Nævius. The poem appears to have opened with the story of Æneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history both of Carthage and of Rome. It was extensively copied both by Ennius and Virgil. The latter author took many passages from it, particularly the description of the storm in the first Æneïd, the speech with which Æneas consoles his companions, and the address of Venus to Jupiter. His dramatic writings comprised both tragedies and comedies, most of which were taken from the Greek. Even in the Augustan age Nævius was still a favorite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry, and the lines of his ace (Ep., ii., 1, 63) show that his works, if not so much read as formerly, were still fresh in the memories of men. The best edition of the fragments of Nævius is by Klussman, 8vo, Jena, 1843.

Nain (Ναΐν: now Nain), a city of Galilee, south of Mount Tabor. (Luke, vii., 11.)

Naisus, Naissus, or Næsus (Ναϊσός, Ναϊσσός, Ναῖσσος: now Nissa), an important town of Upper Mœsia, situated on an eastern tributary of the Margus, and celebrated as the birth-place of Constantine the Great. It was enlarged and beautified by Constantine, was destroyed by Attila, but was rebuilt and fortified by Justinian.

[Namadus (Νάμαδος or Ναμάδης, now the Nerbuddah), a considerable river of India intra Gangem, rising in Mons Vindius, and emptying into the Sinus Barygazenus.]

Namnētæ or Namnētes, a people on the western coast of Gallia Lugdunensis, on the northern bank of the Liger, which separated them from Aquitania. Their chief town was Condivincum, afterward Namnetes (now Nantes).

Namūsa, Aufidĭus, a Roman jurist, one of the numerous pupils of Servius Sulpicius.

Nantuātæ or Nantuātes, a people in the southeast of Gallia Belgica, between the Rhodanus and the Rhenus, and at the eastern extremity of the Lacus Lemanus.

Napææ. Vid. Nymphæ.

Napăris, a northern tributary of the Danube: its modern name is uncertain.

Napăta (Νάπατα: probably ruins at El-Kab, at the great bend of the Nile to the southwest, between the fourth and fifth cataracts), the capital of an Æthiopian kingdom north of that of Meroë, was the southernmost point reached by Petronius, under Augustus. Its sovereigns were females, bearing the title of Candace; and through a minister of one of them, Christianity was introduced into Æthiopia in the apostolic age (Acts, viii., 27). This custom of female government has been continued to our own times in the neighboring kingdom of Shendy. In the reign of Nero, Napata was only a small town.

Napŏca or Napūca (Napocensis or Napucensis), a Roman colony in Dacia, on the high road leading through the country between Patavissa and Optatiana.

Nar (now Nera), a river in central Italy, rises in Mount Fiscellus, on the frontiers of Umbria and Picenum, flows in a southwesterly direction, forming the boundary between Umbria and the land of the Sabini, and after receiving the Velinus (now Velino) and Tolenus (now Turano), and passing by Interamna and Narnia, falls into the Tiber not far from Ocriculum. It was celebrated for its sulphureous waters and white color (sulphurea Nar albus aqua, Virg., Æn., vii., 517).

Naraggăra (Ναράγαρα: ruins at the modern Kassir Jebir), one of the most important inland cities of Numidia, between Thagura and Sicca Veneria, was the scene of Scipio's celebrated interview with Hannibal before the battle of Zama.

Narbo Martĭus, at a later time Narbona (Narbonensis: now Narbonne), a town in the south of Gaul, and the capital of the Roman province of Gallia Narbonensis, was situated on the River Atax (now Aude), also called Narbo, and at the head of the Lake Rubresus or Rubrensis (also called Narbonitis), which was connected with the sea by a canal. By this means the town, which was twelve miles from the coast, was made a sea-port. It was a very ancient place, and is supposed to have been originally called Atax. It was made a Roman colony by the consul Q. Marcius or Martius B.C. 118, and hence received the surname Martius; and it was the first colony founded by the Romans in Gaul. Julius Cæsar also settled here the veterans of the tenth legion, whence it received the name of Colonia Decumanorum. It was a handsome and populous town, the residence of the Roman governor of the province and a place of great commercial importance. The coast was celebrated for its excellent oysters. There are scarcely any vestiges of the ancient town, but there are still remains of the canal.

Narbonensis Gallĭa. Vid. Gallia.

Narcissus (Νάρκισσος). 1. A beautiful youth, son of the river-god Cephisus and the nymph Liriope of Thespiæ. He was wholly inaccessible to the feeling of love; and the nymph Echo, who was enamored of him, died of grief. Vid. Echo. One of his rejected lovers, however, prayed to Nemesis to punish him for his unfeeling heart. Nemesis accordingly caused Narcissus to see his own image reflected in a fountain, and to become enamored of it. But, as he could not approach this object, he gradually pined away, and his corpse was metamorphosed into the flower which bears his name.—2. A freedman and secretary of the Emperor Claudius, over whom he possessed unbounded influence. He long connived at the irregularities of Messalina; but, fearing that the empress meditated his death, he betrayed to Claudius her marriage with C. Silius, and obtained the order for her execution, A.D. 48. After the murder of Claudius, Narcissus was put to death by command of Agrippina, 54. He had amassed an enormous fortune, amounting, it is said, to 400,000,000 sesterces, a little over $13,500,000 of our money.—3. A celebrated athlete, who strangled the Emperor Commodus, 192. He was afterward exposed to the lions by the Emperor Severus.

Narisci, a small but brave people in the south of Germany, of the Suevic race, dwelt west of the Marcomanni and east of the Hermunduri, and extended from the Sudeti Montes on the north to the Danube on the south, thus inhabiting part of the Upper Palatinate and the country of the Fichtelgebirge.

Narmalcha. Vid. Naarmalcha.

NARNIA (Narniensis: now Narni) a town in Umbria, situated on a lofty hill on the southern bank of the River Nar, originally called NEQUINUM, was made a Roman colony B.C 299, when its name was changed into Narnia, after the river This town was strongly fortified by nature, being accessible only on the eastern and western sides On the western side it could only be approached by a very lofty bridge which Augustus built over the river.

NARO, sometimes NAR (now Narenta), a river in Dalmatia, which rises in Mount Albius, and falls into the Adriatic Sea.

NARŌNA, a Roman colony in Dalmatia, situated on the River Naro, some miles from the sea, and on the road to Dyrrhachium.

NARSES, king of Persia. Vid SASSANIDÆ.

NARSES (Ναρσῆς), a celebrated general and statesman in the reign of Justinian, was a eunuch. He put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy by two brilliant campaigns, A.D. 552, 553, and annexed Italy again to the Byzantine empire. He was rewarded by Justinian with the government of the country, which he held for many years. He was deprived of this office by Justin, the successor of Justinian, whereupon he invited the Langobards to invade Italy. His invitation was eagerly accepted by their king Alboin; but it is said that Narses soon after repented of his conduct, and died of grief at Rome shortly after the Langobards had crossed the Alps (568). Narses was ninety-five years of age at the time of his death.

NARTHACĬUM (Ναρθάκιον), a town in Thessaly, on Mount Narthacius, southwest of Pharsalus.

NARYX, also NARȲCUS or NARȲCĬUM (Νάρυξ, Νάρυκος, Ναρύκιον: Ναρύκιος, Ναρυκαῖος: now Talanda or Talanti), a town of the Locri Opuntii on the Eubœan Sea, the reputed birth-place of Ajax, son of Oileus, who is hence called Narycius heros. Since Locri Epizephyrii, in the south of Italy, claimed to be a colony from Naryx in Greece, we find the town of Locri called Narycia by the poets, and the pitch of Bruttium also named Narycia.

NĂSĂMŌNES (Νασαμῶνες), a powerful but savage Libyan people, who dwelt originally on the shores of the Great Syrtis, but were driven inland by the Greek settlers of Cyrenaica, and afterward by the Romans. An interesting account of their manners and customs is given by Herodotus (iv., 172), who also tells (ii., 32) a curious story respecting an expedition beyond the Libyan Desert, undertaken by five Nasamonian youths, the result of which was certain important information concerning the interior of Africa. Vid. NIGEIR.

NASĪCA, SCIPĬO. Vid. SCIPIO.

NASIDIĒNUS, a wealthy (beatus) Roman, who gave a supper to Mæcenas, which Horace ridicules in the eighth satire of his second book. It appears from v. 58 that Rufus was the cognomen of Nasidienus.

NASIDĬUS, Q. or L., was sent by Pompey, in B.C. 49, with a fleet of sixteen ships to relieve Massilia when it was besieged by D. Brutus. He was defeated by Brutus, and fled to Africa, where he had the command of the Pompeian fleet. He served in Sicily under Sextus Pompey, whom he deserted in 35. He joined Antony, and commanded part of his fleet in the war with Octavianus, 31.

NASO, OVIDĬUS. Vid. OVIDIUS.

[NASTES (Νάστης), son of Nomion, leader of the Carians before Troy.]

[NASUA, one of the leaders of the Suevi in their irruption into Gaul about the time of Cæsar's arrival in that country.]

NASUS or NESUS. Vid. ŒNIADÆ.

[NATHO (Ναθώ), a nomos of Lower Egypt, probably the same as the one called Neout by Ptolemy, between the Busiritic and Bubastic mouths of the Nile.]

NATĪSO (now Natisone), a small river in Venetia, in the north of Italy, which flows by Aquileia, and falls into the Sinus Tergestinus.

NATTA or NACCA, "a fuller," the name of an ancient family of the Pinaria gens. The Natta satirized by Horace (Sat., i., 6, 124) for his dirty meanness was probably a member of the noble Pinarian family, and therefore attacked by the poet for such conduct.

[NAUBŎLUS (Ναύβολος), king of Tanagra, one of the Argonauts, father of Iphitus, who is hence called Ναυβολίδης in Homer.]

[NAUCLIDES (Ναυκλείδης, Dor. -είδας). 1. A Platæan, the leader of the faction who invited and opened the gates for the Thebans who seized upon Platææ B.C. 431.—2. One of the two Spartan ephors sent with the king Pausanias into Attica, B.C. 403, at the time when the Athenians were hard pressed by Lysander; he cordially co-operated with Pausanias for defeating the designs of Lysander.]

NAUCRĂTES (Ναυκράτης), of Erythræ, a Greek rhetorician, and a disciple of Isocrates, is mentioned among the orators who competed (B.C. 352) for the prize offered by Artemisia for the best funeral oration delivered over Mausolus.

NAUCRĂTIS (Ναύκρατις: Ναυκρατίτης: ruins at the modern Sa-el-Hadjar), a city in the Delta of Egypt, in the Nomus of Saïs, on the eastern bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, which was hence called also Naucraticum Ostium. It was a colony of the Milesians, founded probably in the reign of Amasis, about B.C. 550, and remained a pure Greek city. It was the only place in Egypt where Greeks were permitted to settle and trade. After the Greek and Roman conquests it continued a place of great prosperity and luxury, and was celebrated for its worship of Aphrodite. It was the birth-place of Athenæus, Lyceas, Phylarchus, Polycharmus, and Julius Pollux.

NAUCȲDES (Ναυκύδης), an Argive statuary, son of Mothon, and brother and teacher of Polycletus II. of Argos, flourished B.C. 420

NAULŎCHUS (Ναύλοχος), that is, a place where ships can anchor. 1. A naval station on the eastern part of the northern coast of Sicily, between Mylæ and the promontory Pelorus: [it was between Mylæ and Naulochus that Sextus Pompey was defeated by the fleet of Octavianus under Agrippa.]—2. A small island off Crete, near the promontory Sammonium.—3. A naval station belonging to Mesembria in Thrace.

NAUMACHĬUS (Ναυμάχιος), a Gnomic poet, of uncertain age, some of whose verses are preserved by Stobæus.

NAUPACTUS (Ναύπακτος: Ναυπάκτιος: now Lepanto), an ancient and strongly-fortified town

e Locri Ozolæ, near the promontory Antirn, possessing the largest and best harbor
e whole of the northern coast of the Co-ian Gulf. It is said to have derived its e from the Heraclidæ having here built the with which they crossed over to the Pel-nesus. After the Persian wars it fell into power of the Athenians, who settled here Messenians who had been compelled to e their country at the end of the third Mes-n war, B.C. 455; and during the Pelopon-n war it was the head-quarters of the nians in all their operations against the of Greece. At the end of the Peloponne-war the Messenians were obliged to leave actus, which passed into the hands first of Locrians and afterward of the Achæans.
s given by Philip, with the greater part of ocrian territory, to Ætolia, but it was again
ed to Locris by the Romans.

Nauplia (Ναυπλία: Ναυπλιεύς: now Nau-), the port of Argos, situated on the Saronic, was never a place of importance in any, and was in ruins in the time of Pausa-
. The inhabitants had been expelled by Argives as early as the second Messenian on suspicion of favoring the Spartans, who, onsequence, settled them at Methone in enia. At the present day Nauplia is one of ost important cities in Greece.

Nauplius (Ναύπλιος). 1. Of Argos, son of une (Poseidon) and Amymone, a famous gator, and the founder of the town of Nau-
.—2. Son of Clytoneus, was one of the Arnts, and a descendant of the preceding.—3.
g of Eubœa, and father of Palamedes, Œax, Nausimedon, by Clymene. Catreus had en his daughter Clymene and her sister Aëpe to Nauplius to be carried to a foreign land;
Nauplius married Clymene, and gave Aërope Plisthenes, who became by her the father of amemnon and Menelaus. His son Palamedes had been condemned to death by the Greeks during the siege of Troy; and as Nauplius considered his condemnation to be an act of injustice, he watched for the return of the Greeks, and as they approached the coast of Eubœa he lighted torches on the dangerous promontory of Caphareus. The sailors, thus misguided, suffered shipwreck, and perished in the waves or by the sword of Nauplius.

Nauportus (now Ober or Upper Laibach), an ancient and important commercial town of the Taurisci, situated on the River Nauportus (now Laibach), a tributary of the Savus, in Pannonia Superior. The town fell into decay after the foundation of Æmona (now Laibach), which was only fifteen miles from it. The name of Nauportus is said to have been derived from the Argonauts having sailed up the Danube and the Savus to this place, and here built the town; and it is added that they afterward carried their ships across the Alps to the Adriatic Sea, where they again embarked. This legend, like many others, probably owes its origin to a piece of bad etymology.

Nausicăa (Ναυσικάα), daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phæacians, and Arete, who conducted Ulysses to the court of her father when he was shipwrecked on the coast.

[Nausicles (Ναυσικλῆς), one of the more influential popular leaders of Athens in the time of Philip, leader of an army sent by the Athenians to aid the Phocians; at first on friendly terms with Æschines, but afterward battling on the side of the patriots, and after the disaster of Chæronea, stepping into the place of Demosthenes.]

Nausĭthŏus (Ναυσίθοος), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Peribœa, the daughter of Eurymedon, was the father of Alcinous and Rhexenor, and king of the Phæacians, whom he led from Hyperia in Thrinacia to the island of Scheria, in order to escape from the Cyclopes.

[Naustathmus (Ναύσταθμος). 1. A port town on the eastern coast of Sicily, north of Promontorium Pachynum.—2. A port-town on the Pontus Euxinus, or, rather, on a salt lake joined to the sea (now Hamamli Ghieul).—3. A port in Cyrenaïca, between Erythrum and Apollonia.]

Nautaca (Ναύτακα: now Naksheb or Kesh), a city of Sogdiana, near the Oxus, toward the eastern part of its course.

Nautes. Vid. Nautia Gens.

Nautia Gens, an ancient patrician gens, claimed to be descended from Nautes, one of the companions of Æneas, who was said to have brought with him the Palladium from Troy, which was placed under the care of the Nautii at Rome. The Nautii, all of whom were surnamed Rutili, frequently held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic, but, like many of the other ancient gentes, they disappear from history about the time of the Samnite wars.

Nava (now Nahe), a western tributary of the Rhine in Gaul, which falls into the Rhine at the modern Bingen.

Navalĭa or Nabalĭa, a river on the northern coast of Germany, mentioned by Tacitus, probably the eastern arm of the Rhine.

Navĭus, Attus, a renowned augur in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. This king proposed to double the number of the equestrian centuries, and to name the three new ones after himself and two of his friends, but was opposed by Navius because Romulus had originally arranged the equites under the sanction of the auspices, and consequently no alteration could be made in them without the same sanction. The tale then goes on to say that Tarquinius thereupon commanded him to divine whether what he was thinking of in his mind could be done, and that when Navius, after consulting the heavens, declared that it could, the king held out a whetstone and a razor to cut it with. Navius immediately cut it. His statue was placed in the comitium, on the steps of the senate-house, the place where the miracle had been wrought, and beside the statue the whetstone was preserved. Attus Navius seems to be the best orthography, making Attus an old prænomen, though we frequently find the name written Attius.

Naxos (Νάξος: Νάξιος). 1. (Now Naxia), an island in the Ægean Sea, and the largest of the Cyclades, is situated nearly half way between the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor. It is about eighteen miles in length and twelve in breadth. It was very fertile in antiquity, as it is in the present day, producing an abundance of corn, wine, oil, and fruit. It was especially celebrated for its wine, and hence plays a prominent part in the legends about Bacchus (Dionysus). Here the god is said to have found Ariadne after she had been deserted by Theseus. The marble of the island was also much prized, and was considered equal to the Parian. Naxos is frequently called Dia (Δία) by the poets, which was one of its ancient names. It was likewise called Strongyle (Στρογγύλη) on account of its round shape, and Dionysias (Διονυσιάς) from its connection with the worship of Dionysus (Bacchus). It is said to have been originally inhabited by Thracians and then by Carians, and to have derived its name from a Carian chief, Naxos. In the historical age it was inhabited by Ionians, who had emigrated from Athens. Naxos was conquered by Pisistratus, who established Lygdamis as tyrant of the island about B.C. 540. The Persians in 501 attempted, at the suggestion of Aristagoras, to subdue Naxos; and upon the failure of their attempt, Aristagoras, fearing punishment, induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia. In 490 the Persians, under Datis and Artaphernes, conquered Naxos, and reduced the inhabitants to slavery. The Naxians recovered their independence after the battle of Salamis (480). They were the first of the allied states whom the Athenians reduced to subjection (471), after which time they are rarely mentioned in history. The chief town of the island was also called Naxos; and we also have mention of the small towns of Tragæa and Lestadæ. — 2. A Greek city on the eastern coast of Sicily, south of Mount Taurus, was founded B.C. 735 by the Chalcidians of Eubœa, and was the first Greek colony established in the island. It grew so rapidly in power that in only five or six years after its foundation it sent colonies to Catana and Leontini. It was for a time subject to Hieronymus, tyrant of Gela; but it soon recovered its independence, carried on a successful war against Messana, and was subsequently an ally of the Athenians against Syracuse. In 403 the town was taken by Dionysius of Syracuse and destroyed. Nearly fifty years afterward (358) the remains of the Naxians scattered over Sicily were collected by Andromachus, and a new city was founded on Mount Taurus, to which the name of Tauromenium was given. Vid. TAUROMENIUM.

NAXUĀNA (Ναξουάνα: now Nakshivan), a city of Armenia Major, on the Araxes, near the confines of Media.

NAZARETH, NAZARA (Ναζαρέθ, or -έτ, or -ά: Ναζαραῖος, Ναζωραῖος, Nazarēnus, Nazarēus: now en-Nasirah), a city of Palestine, in Galilee, south of Cana, on a hill in the midst of the range of mountains north of the plain of Esdraëlon.

[NAZARIUS, a Latin rhetorician, who taught eloquence at Bordeaux in the first half of the fourth century A.D. He was author of a panegyric on Constantine, delivered before the Cæsars Crispus and Constantine, which is published in the Panegyrici Veteres.]

NAZIANZUS (Ναζιανζός: Ναζιανζηνός), a city of Cappadocia, on the road from Archelaïs to Tyana, celebrated as the diocese of the Father of the Church, Gregory Nazianzen. Its site is doubtful.

NEÆRA (Νέαιρα), the name of several ny[mphs] and also of several maidens mentioned b[y] poets.

NEÆTHUS (Νέαιθος: now Nieto), a riv[er of] Bruttium, in the south of Italy, falling int[o the] Tarentine Gulf a little north of Croton [...] the captive Trojan women are said to [have] burned the ships of the Greeks.

[NEALCES, a friend of Turnus, slew S[...] in the wars between Turnus and Æne[as in] Italy.]

NEALCES (Νεάλκης), a painter who flo[urished] in the time of Aratus, B.C. 245.

NEANDRĪA (Νεάνδρεια: Νεανδρεύς, pl.), a [town] of the Troad, upon the Hellespont, probabl[y an] Æolian colony. By the time of Augustus i[t had] disappeared.

NEANTHES (Νεάνθης), of Cyzicus, lived [about] B.C. 241, and was a disciple of the Milesian [Phi]liscus, who himself had been a disciple of I[so]rates. He was a voluminous writer, princi[pally] of history.

NEĀPŎLIS (Νεάπολις: Νεαπολίτης, Neap[olita]nus). I. In Europe. 1. (Now Napoli or Na[ples]), a city in Campania in Italy, on the we[stern] slope of Mount Vesuvius and on the River [Se]bethus, was founded by the Chalcidians of [Cu]mæ, on the site of an ancient place called [Par]THĔNŎPĒ (Παρθενόπη), after the Siren of [that] name. Hence we find the town called Part[hen]ope by Virgil and Ovid. The year of the f[oun]dation of Neapolis is not recorded. It was c[all]ed the "New City," because it was rega[rded] simply as a new quarter of the neighboring [city] of Cumæ. When the town is first mentio[ned] in Roman history, it consisted of two parts, [di]vided from each other by a wall, and called [re]spectively Palæopolis and Neapolis. This d[ivi]sion probably arose after the capture of Cu[mæ] by the Samnites, when a large number of [the] Cumæans took refuge in the city they h[ad] founded; whereupon the old quarter was cal[led] Palæopolis, and the new quarter, built to acco[m]modate the new inhabitants, was named Neap[o]lis. There has been a dispute respecting th[e] site of these two quarters; but it is probabl[e] that Palæopolis was situated on the wester[n] side, near the harbor, and Neapolis on the east[]ern side, near the River Sebethus. In B.C. 327 the town was taken by the Samnites, and in 290 it passed into the hands of the Romans, who allowed it, however, to retain its Greek constitution. At a later period it became a municipium, and finally a Roman colony. Under the Romans the two quarters of the city were united, and the name of Palæopolis disappeared. It continued to be a prosperous and flourishing place till the time of the empire; and its beautiful scenery, and the luxurious life of its Greek population, made it a favorite residence with many of the Romans. In the reign of Titus the city was destroyed by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by this emperor in the Roman style. The modern city of Naples does not stand on exactly the same site as Neapolis. The ancient city extended further east than the modern city, since the former was situated on the Sebethus, whereas the latter does not reach so far as the Fiume della Madalena; but the modern city, on the other hand, extends further north and west than the ancient one, since the island of Mega[ris]

in which the Castel del Ovo now stands, situated in ancient times between Pausilypum and Neapolis. In the neighborhood of this there were warm baths, the celebrated villa of Lucullus, and the villa Pausilypi or Pausilypum, bequeathed by Vedius Pollio to Augustus, and which has given its name to the celebrated grotto of Posilippo between Naples and Puzzuoli, at the entrance of which the tomb of Virgil is still shown.—2. A part of Syracuse. Vid. SYRACUSÆ.—3. (Now Napoli), a town on the western coast of the island of Sardinia, celebrated for its warm baths.—4. (Now Kavala), a sea-port town in Thrace, subsequently Macedonia adjecta, on the Strymonic Gulf, between the Strymon and Nessus.—II. In Asia and Africa. 1. (Now Scala Nuova, or near it), a small Ionian city on the coast of Lydia, north of Mycale and southwest of Ephesus. The Ephesians, to whom it at first belonged, exchanged it with the Samians for MARATHESIUM.—2. Two towns of Caria, the one near Harpasa, the other on the coast, perhaps the new site of Myndus.—4. (Ruins at Tutinek?), in Syria, south of Antioch; afterward reckoned to Galatia. — 5. In Palestine, the SYCHEM or SYCHAR of Scripture (Συχέμ, Συχάρ, Σικίμα, etc.: now Nablous), one of the most ancient cities of Samaria, stood in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, and was the religious capital of the Samaritans, whose temple was built upon Mount Gerizim. This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, B.C. 129. Its full name, under the Romans, was Flavia Neapolis. It was the birth-place of Justin Martyr. — 6. A small town of Babylonia, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, opposite to the opening of the King's Canal.—7. In Egypt. Vid. CÆNE.—8. In Northern Africa, on the western side of the Great Syrtis, by some identified with Leptis Magna, by others with the modern Tripoli.—9. (Now Nabal), a very ancient Phœnician colony, on the eastern coast of Zeugitana, near the northern extremity of the great gulf which was called after it Sinus Neapolitanus (now Gulf of Hammamet). Under the Romans it was a libera civitas, and, according to Ptolemy, a colony.

NEARCHUS (Νέαρχος). 1. A distinguished friend and officer of Alexander, was a native of Crete, but settled at Amphipolis. He appears to have occupied a prominent position at the court of Philip, by whom he was banished for participating in the intrigues of Alexander. After the death of Philip he was recalled, and treated with the utmost distinction by Alexander. He accompanied the king to Asia; and in B.C. 325, he was intrusted by Alexander with the command of the fleet which he had caused to be constructed on the Hydaspes. Upon reaching the mouth of the Indus, Alexander resolved to send round his ships by sea from thence to the Persian Gulf, and he gladly accepted the offer of Nearchus to undertake the command of the fleet during this long and perilous navigation. Nearchus set out on the twenty-first of September, 326, and arrived at Susa in safety in February, 325. He was rewarded with a crown of gold for his distinguished services, and, at the same time, obtained in marriage a daughter of the Rhodian Mentor and of Barsine, to whom Alexander himself had been previously married. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander, he received the government of Lycia and Pamphylia, which he held as subordinate to Antigonus. In 317 he accompanied Antigonus in his march against Eumenes, and in 314 he is mentioned again as one of the generals of Antigonus. Nearchus left a history of the voyage, the substance of which has been preserved to us by Arrian, who has derived from it the whole of the latter part of his "Indica."—[2. A Pythagorean philosopher of Tarentum; he adhered to the Roman cause in the second Punic war, notwithstanding the defection of his countrymen, and was on friendly terms with Cato the censor, who lived in his house after the recapture of Tarentum by Fabius Maximus, B.C. 209.]

NEBO, a mountain of Palestine, on the eastern side of the Jordan, opposite to Jericho, was in the southern part of the range called Abarim. It was on a summit of this mountain, called Pisgah, that Moses died.

[NEBRISSA. Vid. NABRISSA.]

NEBRŌDES MONTES, the principal chain of mountains in Sicily, running through the whole of the island, and a continuation of the Apennines.

NECO or NECHO (Νεκῶς, Νέχως, Νεκαῦς, Νεχαώς, Νεχαώ), son of Psammetichus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Egypt in B.C. 617 His reign was marked by considerable energy and enterprise. He began to dig the canal intended to connect the Nile with the Arabian Gulf; but he desisted from the work, according to Herodotus, on being warned by an oracle that he was constructing it only for the use of the barbarian invader. But the greatest and most interesting enterprise with which his name is connected is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phœnicians in his service, who set sail from the Arabian Gulf, and, accomplishing the voyage in somewhat more than two years, entered the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt through the Straits of Gibraltar. His military expeditions were distinguished at first by brilliant success, which was followed, however, by the most rapid and signal reverses. On his march against the Babylonians and Medes, whose joint forces had recently destroyed Nineveh, he was met at Magdolus (Megiddo) by Josiah, king of Judah, who was a vassal of Babylon. In the battle which ensued, Josiah was defeated and mortally wounded, and Necho advanced to the Euphrates, where he conquered the Babylonians, and took Carchemish or Circesium, where he appears to have established a garrison. After the battle at Megiddo he took the town of Cadytis, probably Jerusalem. In 606 Nebuchadnezzar attacked Carchemish, defeated Necho, and would appear also to have invaded Egypt itself. In 601 Necho died, after a reign of sixteen years, and was succeeded by his son Psammis or Psammuthis.

NECTANĂBIS, NECTANĔBUS, or NECTANĔBES (Νεκτάναβις, Νεκτάνεβος, Νεκτανέβης). 1. King of Egypt, the first of the three sovereigns of the Sebennite dynasty, succeeded Nepherites on the throne about B.C. 374, and in the following year successfully resisted the invasion of the Persian force under Pharnabazus and Iphicrates. He died after a reign of ten years, and was succeeded by Tachos.—2. The nephew of Tachos, deprived the latter of the sovereignty in 361, with the assistance of Agesilaus. For some time he defeated all the attempts of Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) to recover Egypt, but he was at length defeated himself, and, despairing of making any further resistance, he fled to Æthiopia, 350. Nectanabis was the third king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign who ever ruled in Egypt.

NĒLEUS (Νηλεύς). 1. Son of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. Neptune (Poseidon) once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. To conceal her shame, she exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learned their parentage; and after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, excluding Æson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro; but Pelias soon afterward expelled his brother, and thus became sole king: thereupon Neleus went with Melampus and Bias to Pylos, which his uncle Aphareus gave to him, and of which he thus became king. Several towns of this name claimed the honor of being the city of Neleus or of his son Nestor, such as Pylos in Messenia, Pylos in Elis, and Pylos in Triphylia; the last of which is probably the one mentioned by Homer in connection with Neleus and Nestor. Neleus was married to Chloris, a daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, according to Homer, and a Theban woman according to others. By her he became the father of Nestor, Chromius, Periclymenus, and Pero, though he had in all twelve sons. When Hercules had killed Iphitus, he went to Neleus to be purified; but Neleus, who was a friend of Eurytus, the father of Iphitus, refused to grant the request of Hercules. In order to take vengeance, Hercules afterward marched against Pylos, and slew all the sons of Neleus, with the exception of Nestor: some later writers add that Neleus himself was also killed. Neleus was now attacked, and his dominions plundered by Augeas, king of the Epeans; but the attacks of the latter were repelled by Nestor. The descendants of Neleus, the Nelidæ, were eventually expelled from their kingdom by the Heraclidæ, and migrated for the most part to Athens.—2. The younger son of Codrus, disputed the right of his elder brother Medon to the crown on account of his lameness, and when the Delphic oracle declared in favor of Medon, he placed himself at the head of the colonists who migrated to Ionia, and himself founded Miletus. His son Æpytus headed the colonists who settled in Priene. Another son headed a body of settlers who re-enforced the inhabitants of Iasus, after they had lost a great number of their citizens in a war with the Carians.—3. NEMAUSUS (Nemausensis: now Nîmes) [one] of the most important towns of Gall[ia Narbo]nensis, was the capital of the Arecom[ici and a] Roman colony. It was situated inlan[d, west of] the Rhone, on the high road from Italy t[o Spain,] and on the southern slope of Mons Ceve[nna. It] was celebrated as the place from which t[he fam]ily of the Antonines came. Though rarel[y men]tioned by ancient writers, the Roman r[emains] at Nismes, which are some of the most [perfect] north of the Alps, prove that the anci[ent Ne]mausus was a large and flourishing c[ity. NEMESIĀNUS, M. AURELIUS OLYMPIUS, a R[o]man poet, probably a native of Africa, flouris[hed] at the court of the Emperor Carus (A.D. 28[3]), carried off the prize in all the poetical cont[ests] of the day, and was esteemed second to [the] youthful prince Numerianus alone, who hono[red] him so far as to permit him to dispute, and t[o] yield to him the palm of verse. We are told tha[t] Nemesianus was the author of poems upon fish[ing], hunting, and aquatics, all of which have p[er]ished with the exception of a fragment of th[e] Cynegetica, extending to three hundred an[d] twenty-five hexameter lines, which, in so fa[r a]s neatness and purity of expression are conc[ern]ed, in some degree justifies the admirat[ion of] his contemporaries. The best edition of [this] fragment is by Stern, published along with [Gra]tius Faliscus, Hal. Sax., 1832.

NĔMĔSIS (Νέμεσις), a Greek goddess, is m[ost] commonly described as a daughter of N[ight], though some call her a daughter of Ereb[us or] of Oceanus. She is a personification of th[e mor]al reverence for law, of the natural fear of com[mitting] a culpable action, and hence of con[science]. In later writers, as Herodotus a[nd] Pindar, Nemesis measures out happiness a[nd] unhappiness to mortals; and he who is bless[ed] with too many or too frequent gifts of fortun[e] is visited by her with losses and suffering[s, in] order that he may become humble. This notio[n] arose from a belief that the gods were envi[ous] of excessive human happiness. NEŌCÆSARĒA (Νεοκαισάρεια: Νεοκαισαρεύς, Ne-ocæsariensis). 1. (Now Niksar), the capital, un-der the Roman empire, of Pontus Polemonia-cus, in Asia Minor, stood on the River Lycus, sixty-three Roman miles east of Amasia. It was a splendid city, and is famous in ecclesi-astical history for the council held there in A.D. 314.—2. (Now Kulat-en-Nejur? ruins), a fortress established by Justinian, on the Euphrates, in the district of Syria called Chalybonitis.

NĒON (Νέων: Νεώνιος, Νεωναῖος), an ancient town in Phocis at the eastern foot of Mount Ti-thorea, a branch of Mount Parnassus, was eighty stadia from Delphi across the mountains. Neon was destroyed by the Persians under Xerxes, but was subsequently rebuilt, and named TITHŌRĒA (Τιθορέα: Τιθορεύς) after the mountain on which it was situated. The new town, however, was not on exactly the same site as the ancient one. Tithorea was situated at the modern Velitza, and Neon at Palæa-Fiva, between four and five miles north of Velitza. Tithorea was destroyed in the Sacred war, and was again rebuilt, but remained an unimportant, though fortified place.

NEONTĪCHOS (Νέον τεῖχος, i. e., New Wall). 1. (Now Ainadjik), one of the twelve cities of Æo-lis, on the coast of Mysia, in Asia Minor, stood on the northern side of the Hermus, on the slope of Mount Sardene, thirty stadia inland from La-rissa. One tradition makes it older than Cyme; but the more probable account is that it was built by the Æolians of Cyme as a fortress against the Pelasgians of Larissa.—2. A fort on the coast of Thrace, near the Chersonesus.

NEOPTŎLĔMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος). 1. Also called PYRRHUS, son of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of Lycomedes; according to some, he was a son of Achilles and Iphigenia, and after the sacrifice of his mother was carried by his father to the island of Scyros. The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given to him by Lycomedes because he had fair (πυῤῥός) hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had borne the name of Pyrrha. He was called Ne-optolemus, that is, young or late warrior, either because he had fought in early youth, or be-cause he had come late to Troy. From his fa-ther he is sometimes called Achillīdes, and from his grandfather or great-grandfather, Pelīdes and Æacides. Neoptolemus was brought up in Scy-ros in the palace of Lycomedes, and was fetched from thence by Ulysses to join the Greeks in the war against Troy, because it had been prophe-sied by Helenus that Neoptolemus and Philoc-tetes were necessary for the capture of Troy. At Troy Neoptolemus showed himself worthy of his great father. He was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse. At the capture of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Jupiter (Zeus), and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father. When the Trojan captives were distributed among the conquerors, An-dromache, the widow of Hector, was given to Neoptolemus, and by her he became the father of Molossus, Pielus, Pergamus, and Amphialus. Respecting his return from Troy and the subse-quent events of his life, the traditions differ. It is related that Neoptolemus returned home by land, because he had been forewarned by Hele-nus of the dangers which the Greeks would have to encounter at sea. According to Homer, Ne-optolemus lived in Phthia, the kingdom of his father, and here he married Hermione, whom her father Menelaus sent to him from Sparta. According to others, Neoptolemus himself went to Sparta to receive Hermione, because he had heard a report that she was betrothed to Ores-tes. Most writers relate that he abandoned his native kingdom of Phthia, and settled in Epirus, where he became the ancestor of the Molossian kings. Shortly after his marriage with Hermi-one, Neoptolemus went to Delphi, where he was murdered; but the reason of his visiting Del-phi, as well as the person by whom he was slain, are differently related. Some say he went to plunder the temple of Apollo, others to present part of the Trojan booty as an offering to the god, and others, again, to consult the god about the means of obtaining children by Hermione. Some relate that he was slain at the instigation of Orestes, who was angry at being deprived of Hermione, and others, by the priest of the tem-ple, or by Machæreus, the son of Dætas. His body was buried at Delphi, and he was wor-shipped there as a hero.—2. I. King of Epirus, was son of Alcetas I. and father of Alexander I., and of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Neoptolemus reigned in conjunc-tion with his brother Arymbas or Arrybas till his death, about B.C. 360.—3. II. King of Epirus, son of Alexander I., and grandson of the preced-ing. At his father's death in 326 he was prob-ably a mere infant, and his pretensions to the throne were passed over in favor of Æacides. It was not till 302 that the Epirots, taking ad-vantage of the absence of Pyrrhus, the son of Æacides rose in insurrection against him, and set up Neoptolemus in his stead. The latter reigned for the space of six years, but was obliged to share the throne with Pyrrhus in 296. He was shortly afterward assassinated by Pyrrhus.—4. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, after whose death he obtained the government of Armenia. In 321 he revolted from Perdiccas, and joined Craterus, but he was defeated by Eumenes, and was slain in battle by the hands of the latter.—5. A general of Mithradates, and brother of Archelaus.—6. An Athenian tragedian, who performed at the games at which Philip of Macedon was slain, 336.—7. Of Paros, a Greek grammarian of uncertain date, wrote several works quoted by Athenæus and the scholiasts.

Nĕpĕte, Nepe or Nepet (Nepesinus: now Nepi), an ancient town of Etruria, but not one of the twelve cities, was situated near the saltus Ciminius, and was regarded as one of the keys and gates of Etruria (claustra portæque Etruriæ, Liv., vi., 9). It appears as an ally of the Romans at an early period, soon after the capture of Rome by the Gauls, and was subsequently made a Roman colony. There are still remains at Nepi of the walls of the ancient city.

Nepos, Cornēlĭus, the contemporary and friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus, was probably a native of Verona, or of some neighboring village, and died during the reign of Augustus. No other particulars with regard to his personal history have been transmitted to us. He is known to have written the following pieces, all of which are now lost: 1. Chronica, an Epitome of Universal History, probably in three books, to which Catullus appears to allude in dedicating his poems to Cornelius Nepos. 2. Exemplorum Libri, probably a collection of remarkable sayings and doings. 3. De Viris Illustribus, perhaps the same work as the preceding, quoted under a different title. 4. Vita Ciceronis. 5. Epistolæ ad Ciceronem. 6. De Historicis. There is still extant a work entitled Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum, containing biographies of several distinguished commanders, which is supposed by many critics to have been the production of Cornelius Nepos. In all MSS., however, this work is ascribed to an unknown Æmilius Probus, living under Theodosius at the end of the fourth century of the Christian era, with the exception, however, of the life of Atticus, and the fragment of a life of Cato the Censor, which are expressly attributed to Cornelius Nepos. These two lives may safely be assigned to Cornelius Nepos; but the Latinity of the other biographies is such that we can not suppose them to have been written by a learned contemporary of Cicero. At the same time, their style presents a striking contrast to the meretricious finery of the later empire; and hence it may be conjectured that Probus abridged the work of Nepos, and that the biographies as they now exist, are in reality epitomes [of] lives actually written by Nepos. The most [use]ful editions of these lives are by Van Staveren, 8vo, Lugd. Bat., 1773; by Tzschucke, 8vo, Göttingen, 1804; by Bremi, 8vo, Zurich, 1820; by Roth, Basil., 8vo, 1841.

Nepos, Jūlĭus, last emperor but one of the West, A.D. 474–475, was raised to the throne by Leo, the emperor of the East. Nepos deposed Glycerius, who was regarded at Constantinople as a usurper (vid. Glycerius); he was in his turn deposed in the next year by Orestes, who proclaimed his son Romulus. Nepos fled into Dalmatia, where he was killed 480.

Nepotiānus, Flavius Popilius, son of Eutropia, the half-sister of Constantine the Great, was proclaimed emperor at Rome in A.D. 350, but was slain by Marcellinus, the general of the usurper Magnentius, after a reign of twenty-eight days.

Neptūnus, called Poseidon by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. Poseidon. Neptunus was the chief marine divinity of the Romans. As the early Romans were not a maritime people, the marine divinities are rarely mentioned, and we scarcely know with certainty what day in the year was set apart as the festival of Neptunus, though it seems to have been the twenty-third of July (X. Kal. Sext.). His temple stood in the Campus Martius, not far from the septa. At his festival the people formed tents (umbræ) of the branches of trees, in which they enjoyed themselves in feasting and drinking. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. Neptunalia. When a Roman commander set sail with a fleet, he first offered up a sacrifice to Neptunus, which was thrown into the sea. In the Roman poets Neptunus is completely identified with the Greek Poseidon, and accordingly, all the attributes of the latter are transferred by them to the former.

Nerātius Priscus, a Roman jurist, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian. It is said that Trajan sometimes had the design of making Neratius his successor in place of Hadrian. He enjoyed a high reputation under Hadrian, and was one of his consiliarii. His works are cited in the Digest.

Nērēis or Nērēïs (Νηρείς, in Hom. Νηρηΐς), a daughter of Nereus and Doris, and used especially in the plural, Nereides (Νηρείδες, Νηρηΐδες), to indicate the fifty daughters of Nereus and Doris. The Nereides were the marine nymphs of the Mediterranean, in contradistinction from the Naiades, or the nymphs of fresh water, and the Oceanides, or the nymphs of the great ocean. Their names are not the same in all writers; one of the most celebrated was Thetis, the mother of Achilles. They are described as lovely divinities, dwelling with their father at the bottom of the sea, and were believed to be propitious to all sailors, and especially to the Argonauts. They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in sea-port towns. The epithets given them by the poets refer partly to their beauty and partly to their place of abode. They are frequently represented in works of art, and commonly as youthful, beautiful, and naked maidens; and they are often grouped with Tritons and other marine beings. Sometimes they appear on gems as half maidens and half fishes.

[Nereïs (Νηρηΐς), daughter of Pyrrhus I., king of Epirus, and wife of Gelon of Syracuse, to whom she bore Hieronymus: she was the last surviving descendant of the royal house of the Æacidæ.]

Nērēïus, a name given by the poets to a descendant of Nereus, such as Phocus and Achilles.

Nerētum or Neritum (Neretinus: now Nardo), a town of the Salentini in Calabria, in the south of Italy.

Nēreus (Νηρεύς), son of Oceanus (Pontus) and Terra (Gæa), and husband of Doris, by whom he became the father of the fifty Nereides. He is described as the wise and unerring old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he dwelt. His empire is the Mediterranean, or more particularly the Ægean Sea, whence he is sometimes called the Ægean. He was believed, like other marine divinities, to have the power of prophesying the future and of appearing to mortals in different shapes; and in the story of Hercules he acts a prominent part, just as Proteus in the story of Menelaus, and Glaucus in that of the Argonauts. Virgil (Æn., ii., 418) mentions the trident as his attribute, and the epithets given him by the poets refer to his old age, his kindliness, and his trustworthy knowledge of the future. In works of art, Nereus, like other sea-gods, is represented with pointed sea-weeds taking the place of hair in the eyebrows, the chin, and the breast.

Nero, Claudius. Nero is said to have signified "brave" in the Sabine tongue. 1. Tib., one of the four sons of Appius Claudius Cæcus, censor B.C. 312, from whom all the Claudii Nerones were descended.—2. C., a celebrated general in the second Punic war. He was prætor 212, and was sent into Spain to oppose Hasdrubal, who eluded his attack, and he was succeeded by Scipio Africanus. Nero was consul in 207 with M. Livius Salinator. Nero marched into the south of Italy against Hannibal, whom he defeated. He then marched into the north of Italy, effected a junction with his colleague M. Livius in Picenum, and proceeded to crush Hasdrubal before his brother Hannibal could come to his assistance. Hasdrubal was defeated and slain on the River Metaurus. This great battle, which probably saved Rome, gave a lustre to the name of Nero, and consecrated it among the recollections of the Romans.

Nero was censor 204, with M. Livius.—3. Tib., prætor 204, with Sardinia for his province; and consul 202, when he obtained Africa as his province, but his fleet suffered so much at sea that he was unable to join Scipio in Africa.—4. Tib. served under Pompey in the war against the pirates, B.C. 67. He is probably the Tiberius Nero who recommended that the members of the conspiracy of Catiline, who had been seized, should be kept confined till Catiline was put down.—5. Tib., father of the Emperor Tiberius, was probably the son of the last. He served as quæstor under Cæsar (48) in the Alexandrine war. He sided with L. Antonius in the war of Perusia (41); and when this town surrendered, he passed over to Sextus Pompey in Sicily, and subsequently to M. Antony in Achæa. On a reconciliation being effected between Antony and Octavianus at the close of the year (40), he returned with his wife to Rome. Livia, who possessed great beauty, excited the passion of Octavianus, to whom she was surrendered by her husband, being then six months gone with child of her second son Drusus. Nero died shortly after, and left Octavianus the tutor of his two sons.

Nero. 1. Roman emperor A.D. 54–68, was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus Cæsar, and sister of Caligula. Nero's original name was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after the marriage of his mother with her uncle, the Emperor Claudius, he was adopted by Claudius (A.D. 50), and was called Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus. Nero was born at Antium on the fifteenth of December, A.D. 37. Shortly after his adoption by Claudius, Nero, being then sixteen years of age, married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messalina (53). Among his early instructors was Seneca. Nero had some talent and taste. He was fond of the arts, and made verses; but he was indolent and given to pleasure, and had no inclination for laborious studies. On the death of Claudius (54), Agrippina secured the succession for her son, to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. His mother wished to govern in the name of her son, and her ambition was the cause of Nero's first crime. Jealousy thus arose between Nero and his mother, which soon broke out into a quarrel, and Agrippina threatened to join Britannicus and raise him to his father's place; whereupon Nero caused Britannicus to be poisoned, at an entertainment where Agrippina and Octavia were present (55). During the early part of Nero's reign, the government of Rome was in the hands of Seneca, and of Burrhus, the præfect of the prætorians, who opposed the ambitious designs of Agrippina. Meantime the young emperor indulged his licentious inclinations without restraint. He neglected his wife for the beautiful but dissolute Poppæa Sabina, the wife of Otho. This abandoned woman aspired to become the emperor's wife; but since she had no hopes of succeeding in her design while Agrippina lived, she used all her arts to urge Nero to put his mother to death. Accordingly, in 59, Agrippina was assassinated by Nero's order, with the approbation at least of Seneca and Burrhus, who saw that the time was come for the destruction either of the mother or the son. Though Nero had no longer any one to oppose him, he felt the punishment of his guilty conscience, and said that he was haunted by his mother's spectre. He attempted to drown his reflections in fresh riot, in which he was encouraged by a band of flatterers. He did not, however, immediately marry Poppæa, being probably restrained by fear of Burrhus and Seneca. But the death of Burrhus in 62, and the retirement of Seneca from public affairs, which immediately followed, left Nero more at liberty. Accordingly, he divorced his wife Octavia, and in eighteen days married Poppæa. Not satisfied with putting away his wife, he falsely charged her with adultery, and banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. In 64 the great fire at Rome happened. Its origin is uncertain, for it is hardly credible that the city was fired by Nero's order, as some ancient writers assert. Out of the fourteen regiones into which Rome was divided, three were totally destroyed, and in seven others only a few half-burned houses remained. The emperor set about rebuilding the city on an improved plan, with wider streets. He found money for his purposes by acts of oppression and violence, and even temples were robbed of their wealth. With these means he began to erect his sumptuous golden palace, on a scale of magnitude and splendor which almost surpasses belief. The vestibule contained a colossal statue of himself one hundred and twenty feet high. The odium of the conflagration, which the emperor could not remove from himself, he tried to throw on the Christians, who were then numerous in Rome, and many of them were put to a cruel death. The tyranny of Nero at last (65) led to the organization of a formidable conspiracy against him, usually called Piso's conspiracy, from the name of one of the principal accomplices. The plot was discovered, and many distinguished persons were put to death, among whom was Piso himself, the poet Lucan, and the philosopher Seneca, though the latter appears to have taken no part in the plot. In the same year, Poppæa died of a kick which her brutal husband gave her in a fit of passion when she was with child. Nero now married Statilia Messallina. The history of the remainder of Nero's reign is a catalogue of his crimes. Virtue in any form was the object of his fear; and almost every month was marked by the execution or banishment of some distinguished man. Among his other victims were Thrasea Pætus and Barea Soranus, both men of high rank, but of spotless integrity. In 67 Nero paid a visit to Greece, and took part in the contests of both the Olympic and Pythian games. He commenced a canal across the Isthmus of Corinth, but the works were afterward suspended by his own orders. While in Greece he sent orders to put to death his faithful general Domitius Corbulo, which the old soldier anticipated by stabbing himself. The Roman world had long been tired of its oppressor: and the storm at length broke out in Gaul, where Julius Vindex, the governor, openly raised the standard of revolt. His example was followed by Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis. Galba was proclaimed emperor by his troops, but he only assumed the title of legatus of the senate and the Roman people. Soon after these news reached Rome, Sabinus, who was præfectus prætorio along with Tigellinus, persuaded the troops to proclaim Galba. Nero was immediately deserted. He escaped from the palace at night with a few freedmen, and made his way to a house about four miles from Rome, which belonged to his freedman Phaon. Here he gave himself a mortal wound when he heard the trampling of the horses on which his pursuers were mounted. The centurion, entering, attempted to stop the flow of blood; but Nero saying, "It is too late. Is this your fidelity?" expired with a horrid stare. Nero's progress in crime is easily traced, and the lesson is worth reading. Without a good education, and with no talent for his high station, he was placed in a position of danger from the first. He was sensual, and fond of idle display, and then he became greedy of money to satisfy his expenses; he was timid, and, by consequence, he became cruel when he anticipated danger; and, like other murderers, his first crime, the poisoning of Britannicus, made him capable of another. But, contemptible and cruel as he was, there are many persons who, in the same station, might run the same guilty career. He was only in his thirty-first year when he died, and he had held the supreme power for thirteen years and eight months. He was the last of the descendants of Julia, the sister of the dictator Cæsar. The most important external events in the reign of Nero were the conquest of Armenia by Domitius Corbulo (vid. CORBULO), and the insurrection of the Britons under Boadicea, which was quelled by Suetonius Paulinus. Vid. PAULINUS.—2. Eldest son of Germanicus and Agrippina, fell a victim to the ambition of Sejanus, who resolved to get rid of the sons of Germanicus in order to obtain the imperial throne for himself. Drusus, the brother of Nero, was persuaded to second the designs of Sejanus, in hopes that the death of his elder brother would secure him the succession to the throne. There was no difficulty in exciting the jealousy of Tiberius; and, accordingly, in A.D. 29, Nero was declared an enemy of the state, was removed to the island of Pontia, and was there either starved to death or perished by his own hands.

NERTOBRĪGA. 1. (Now Valera la Vieja), a town in Hispania Bætica, with the surname Concordia Julia, probably the same place which Polybius calls (xxxv., 2) Ercobrica (Ἐρκόβρικα).—2. (Now Almuna), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Emerita to Cæsaraugusta.

NERŬLUM, a fortified place in Lucania, on the Via Popilia.

[NERUSII (Νερούσιοι), a people among the Alpes Maritimæ in Gallia Narbonensis, on the coast: their capital was Vintium (Οὐίντιον).]

NERVA, COCCEIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 36, brought about the reconciliation between M. Antonius and Octavianus, 40, and in the same the Cocceius mentioned by Horace (Sat., i., 28).—2. M., probably the son of the preceding, and grandfather of the Emperor Nerva. He was consul A.D. 22. In 33 he resolutely starved himself to death, notwithstanding the entreaties of Tiberius, whose constant companion he was. He was a celebrated jurist, and is often mentioned in the Digest.—3. M., the son of the last, and probably father of the emperor, was also a celebrated jurist, and is often cited in the Digest under the name of Nerva filius.—4. M., Roman emperor A.D. 96–98, was born at Narnia, in Umbria, A.D. 32. He was consul with Vespasian 71, and with Domitian 90. On the assassination of Domitian in September, 96, Nerva, who had probably been privy to the conspiracy, was declared emperor at Rome by the people and the soldiers, and his administration at once restored tranquillity to the state. He stopped proceedings against those who had been accused of treason (majestas), and allowed many exiled persons to return to Rome. The class of informers were suppressed by penalties, and some were put to death. At the commencement of his reign, Nerva swore that he would put no senator to death; and he kept his word, even when a conspiracy had been formed against his life by Calpurnius Crassus. Though Nerva was virtuous and humane, he did not possess much energy and vigor; and his feebleness was shown by a mutiny of the Prætorian soldiers. The soldiers demanded the punishment of the assassins of Domitian, which the emperor refused. Though his body was feeble, his will was strong, and he offered them his own neck, and declared his readiness to die. However, it appears that the soldiers effected their purpose, and Nerva was obliged to put Petronius Secundus and Parthenius to death, or to permit them to be massacred by the soldiers. Nerva felt his weakness, but he showed his noble character and his good sense by appointing as his successor a man who possessed both vigor and ability to direct public affairs. He adopted as his son and successor, without any regard to his own kin, M. Ulpius Trajanus, who was then at the head of an army in Germany. Nerva died suddenly on the twenty-seventh of January, A.D. 98, at the age of sixty-five years.

Nervii, a powerful and warlike people in Gallia Belgica, whose territory extended from the River Sabis (now Sambre) to the ocean, and part of which was covered by the wood Arduenna. They were divided into several smaller tribes, the Centrones, Grudii, Levaci, Pleumoxii, and Geiduni. In B.C. 58 they were defeated by Cæsar with such slaughter that out of sixty thousand men capable of bearing arms only five hundred were left.

Nesactium, a town in Istria, on the River Arsia, taken by the Romans B.C. 177.

[Nesæa (Νησαίη, Hom.), a Nereid, a companion of the nymph Cyrene.]

Nesis (now Nisita), a small island off the coast of Campania, between Puteoli and Neapolis, and opposite Mount Pausilypus. This island was a favorite residence of some of the Roman nobles.

[Nesos (now Neso), a small city in the northern part of Eubœa.]

Nessōnis (Νεσσωνίς), a lake in Thessaly, a little south of the River Peneus, and northeast of Larissa, is in summer merely a swamp, but in winter is not only full of water, but even overflows its banks. Nessonis and the neighboring Lake Bœbeis were regarded by the ancients as remains of the vast lake which was supposed to have covered the whole of Thessaly till an outlet was made for its waters through the rocks of Tempe.

Nessus (Νέσσος), a centaur, who carried Deianira across the River Evenus, but, attempting to run away with her, was shot by Hercules with a poisoned arrow, which afterward became the cause of the death of Hercules Vid. p. 359, a.

[Nessus (Νέσσος). Vid. Nestus.]

Nestor (Νέστωρ), king of Pylos, son of Neleus and Chloris, husband of Eurydice, and father of Pisidice, Polycaste, Perseus, Stratius, Aretus, Echephron, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Thrasymedes. Some relate that, after the death of Eurydice, Nestor married Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus, and sister of Agamemnon; but this Anaxibia is elsewhere described as the wife of Strophius and the mother of Pylades. When Hercules invaded the country of Neleus and slew his sons, Nestor alone was spared, either because he was absent from Pylos, or because he had taken no part in carrying off from Hercules the oxen of Geryones. In his youth and early manhood Nestor was a distinguished warrior. He defeated both the Arcadians and Eleans. He took part in the fight of the Lapithæ against the Centaurs, and he is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters and the Argonauts. Although far advanced in age, he sailed with the other Greek heroes against Troy. Having ruled over three generations of men, his advice and authority were deemed equal to that of the immortal gods, and he was renowned for his wisdom, his justice, and his knowledge of war. After the fall of Troy he returned home, and arrived safely in Pylos, where Jupiter (Zeus) granted to him the full enjoyment of old age, surrounded by intelligent and brave sons. Various towns in Peloponnesus, of the name of Pylos, laid claim to being the city of Nestor. On this point, vid. p. 542, a.

[Nestor (Νέστωρ), an academic philosopher, preceptor of Marcellus, son of Octavia.]

Nestŏrĭdes (Νεστορίδης), i. e., a son of Nestor, as Antilochus and Pisistratus.

Nestorĭus, a celebrated Hæresiarch, was appointed patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 428, but, in consequence of his heresy, was deposed at the council of Ephesus, 431. His great opponent was Cyril. Nestorius was subsequently banished to one of the oases in Egypt, and he died in exile probably before 450. Nestorius carefully distinguished between the divine and human nature attributed to Christ, and refused to give to the Virgin Mary the title of Theotocus (Θεοτόκος), or "Mother of God." The opinions of Nestorius are still maintained by the Nestorian Christians.

Nestus, sometimes Nessus (Νέστος: now called Mesto by the Greeks, Karasu by the Turks), a river in Thrace, which rises in Mount Rhodope, flows southeast, and falls into the Ægean Sea west of Abdera and opposite the island of Thasos. The Nestus formed the eastern boundary of Macedonia from the time of Philip and Alexander the Great.

Nesus. Vid. Œniadæ.

Netum (Netīnus: now Noto Antiqua, near Noto), a town in Sicily, southwest of Syracuse, and a dependency of the latter.

Neuri (Νεῦροι, Νευροί), a people of Sarmatia Europæa, whom Herodotus describes as not of Scythian race, though they followed Scythian customs. Having been driven out from their earlier abodes by a plague of serpents, they settled to the northwest of the sources of the Tyras (now Dniester). They were esteemed skillful in enchantment.

Nevirnum. Vid. Noviodunum, No. 2.

Nīcæa (Νικαία: Νικαιεύς, Νικαεύς, Nicæensis, Nicensis). 1. (Ruins at Iznik), one of the most celebrated cities of Asia, stood on the eastern side of the Lake Ascania (now Iznik) in Bithynia. Its site appears to have been occupied in very ancient times by a town called Attæa, and afterward by a settlement of the Bottiæans, called Ancore or Helicore, which was destroyed by the Mysians. Not long after the death of Alexander the Great, Antigonus built on the same spot a city which he named after himself, Antigonēa; but Lysimachus soon after changed the name into Nicæa, in honor of his wife. Under the kings of Bithynia it was often the royal residence, and it long disputed with Nicomedia the rank of capital of Bithynia. The Roman emperors bestowed upon it numerous honors and benefits, which are recorded on its coins. Its position at the junction of several of the chief roads leading through Asia Minor to Constantinople made it the centre of a large traffic. It is very famous in ecclesiastical history as the seat of the great œcumenical council which Constantine convoked in A.D. 325, chiefly for the decision of the Arian controversy, and which drew up the Nicene Creed; that is to say, the first part of the well-known creed so called, the latter part of which was added by the Council of Constantinople in the year 381. The Council of Nice (as we commonly call it) also settled the time of keeping Easter. A second council, held here in 787, decided in favor of the worship of images. In the very year of the great council, Nicæa was overthrown by an earthquake, but it was restored by the Emperor Valens in 368. Under the later emperors of the East, Nicæa long served as the bulwark of Constantinople against the Arabs and Turks: it was taken by the Seljuks in 1078, and became the capital of the Sultan Soliman; it was retaken by the First Crusaders in 1097. After the taking of Constantinople by the Venetians and the Franks, and the foundation of the Latin empire there in 1204, the Greek emperor, Theodorus Lascaris, made Nicæa the capital of a separate kingdom, in which his followers maintained themselves with various success against the Latins of Constantinople on the one side, and the Seljuks of Iconium on the other, and in 1261 regained Constantinople. At length, in 1330, Nicæa was finally taken by Orchan, the son of the founder of the Ottoman empire, Othman. Iznik, the modern Nicæa, is a poor village of about one hundred houses; but the double walls of the ancient city still remain almost comp[lete], [ex]hibiting four large and two small gates. T[here] are also the remains of the two moles w[hich] formed the harbor on the lake, of an aq[ueduct], of the theatre, and of the gymnasium. [In this] last edifice, we are told, there was a po[int from] which all the four gates were visible, so g[reat] was the regularity with which the city [was] built.—2. (Now Nilab), a city of India on [the] borders of the Paropamisadæ, on the wes[t of] the River Cophen.—3. (Now probably n[ear] Darapoor), a city of India, on the River Hy[das]pes (now Jelum), built by Alexander to c[om]memorate his victory over Porus.—4. A f[ort]ress of the Epicnemidian Locrians on the [sea], near the Pass of Thermopylæ, which it c[om]manded. From its important position, [it is] often mentioned in the wars of Greece w[ith] Macedonia and with the Romans. In the [for]mer, its betrayal to Philip by the Thracian [dy]nast Phalæcus led to the termination of the [Sa]cred war, B.C. 346; and after various charg[es] it is found, at the time of the wars with Ro[me], in the hands of the Ætolians.—5. In I[llyria]. Vid. Nicia.—6. An ancient name of Mariana [in] Corsica.—7. (Now Nizza, Nice), a city on t[he] coast of Liguria, a little east of the River Va[rus], a colony of Massilia, and subject to that c[ity]; hence it was considered as belonging to Ga[ul], though it was just beyond the frontier. It fr[...] became important as a stronghold of the Chr[is]tian religion, which was preached there by N[a]zarius at an early period.

Nicander (Νίκανδρος). 1. King of Spar[ta], son of Charilaus, and father of Theopomp[us], reigned about B.C. 809–770.—2. A Greek poe[t], grammarian, and physician, was a native [of] Claros, near Colophon in Ionia, whence he [is] frequently called a Colophonian. He succee[ded] his father as one of the hereditary priests of Apollo Clarius. He appears to have flourished about B.C. 185–135. Of the numerous works of Nicander only two poems are extant, o[ne] entitled Theriaca (Θηριακά), whi[ch] consists of nearly one thousand hexameter lines, and treats of venomous animals and the wounds inflicted by them, and another entitled Alexipharma[ca] (Ἀλεξιφάρμακα), which consists of more than six hundred hexameter lines, and treats of po[i]sons and their antidotes. Among the ancients his authority in all matters relating to toxic[ol]ogy seems to have been considered high. His works are frequently quoted by Pliny, Galen and other ancient writers. His style is harsh and obscure; and his works are now scarcely ever read as poems, and are only consulted by those who are interested in points of zoological and medical antiquities. The best edition is by Schneider, who published the Alexipharmaca in 1792, Halæ, and the Theriaca in 1816, Lips.

Nicānor (Νικάνωρ). 1. Son of Parmenion, a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander, died during the king's advance into Bactria, B.C. 330.—2. A Macedonian officer, who, in the division of the provinces after the death of Perdiccas (321), obtained the government of Cappadocia. He attached himself to the party of Antigonus, who made him governor of Media and the adjoining provinces, which he continued to hold until 312, when he was deprived of them by Seleucus.—3. A Macedonian officer der Cassander, by whom he was secretly dispatched, immediately on the death of Antipater to take the command of the Macedonian garrison at Munychia. Nicanor arrived at Athens before the news of Antipater's death, and thus readily obtained possession of the fortress. Soon afterward he surprised the Piræus also, and placed both fortresses in the hands of Cassander on the arrival of the latter in Attica in 318. Nicanor was afterward dispatched by Cassander with a fleet to the Hellespont, where he gained a victory over the admiral of Polysperchon. On his return to Athens he incurred the suspicion of Cassander, and was put to death.—[4. Surnamed the Elephant, a general under Philip V. of Macedonia, who invaded Attica with an army just before the breaking out of the war between Philip and the Romans, B C. 200: he also commanded the rear-guard of Philip's army at the battle of Cynoscephalæ, B.C. 197.—5. Son of Patroclus, sent by Lysias, the regent of Syria during the absence of Antiochus IV., to reduce the revolted Jews. He was completely defeated and slain by Judas Maccabæus, B.C. 165.—6. Aristotle's adopted son, destined by the philosopher to be his son-in-law.—7. A celebrated grammarian, lived during the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 127. His labors were chiefly devoted to punctuation, and hence he was nicknamed Στιγματίας.]

NICARCHUS (Νίκαρχος). [1. An Arcadian officer in the Greek army of the younger Cyrus: after the defeat and death of Cyrus, he abandoned the Greeks, and went over to the Persians with about twenty of his men.]—2. The author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek Anthology, appears to have lived at Rome near the beginning of the second century of the Christian era.

NICATOR, SELEUCUS. Vid. SELEUCUS.

NICE (Νίκη), called VICTŌRĬA by the Romans, the goddess of victory, is described as a daughter of Pallas and Styx, and as a sister of Zelus (zeal), Cratos (strength), and Bia (force). When Jupiter (Zeus) commenced fighting against the Titans, and called upon the gods for assistance, Nice and her two sisters were the first who came forward, and Jupiter (Zeus) was so pleased with their readiness, that he caused them ever after to live with him in Olympus. Nice had a celebrated temple on the acropolis of Athens, which is still extant and in excellent preservation. She is often seen represented in ancient works of art, especially with other divinities, such as Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva (Athena), and with conquering heroes whose horses she guides. In her appearance she resembles Minerva (Athena), but has wings, and carries a palm or a wreath, and is engaged in raising a trophy, or in inscribing the victory of the conqueror on a shield.

NICĒPHŎRĬUM (Νικηφόριον). 1. (Now Rakkah), a fortified town of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, near the mouth of the River Bilecha (now el Belikh), and due south of Edessa, built by order of Alexander, and probably completed under Seleucus. It is doubtless the same place as the CALLINĬCUS or CALLINĬCUM (Καλλίνικος or -ον), the fortifications of which were repaired by Justinian. Its name was again changed to LEONTŎPŎLIS, when it was adorned with fresh buildings by the Emperor Leo.—2. A fortress on the Propontis, belonging to the territory of Pergamus.

NĪCĒPHŎRĬUS (Νικηφόριος), a river of Armenia Major, on which Tigranes built his residence TIGRANOCERTA. It was a tributary of the Upper Tigris; probably identical with the CENTRITES, or a small tributary of it.

NICĒPHŎRUS (Νικηφόρος). 1. CALLISTUS XANTHOPULUS, the author of the Ecclesiastical History, was born in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and died about 1450. His Ecclesiastical History was originally in twenty-three books, of which there are eighteen extant, extending from the birth of Christ down to the death of the tyrant Phocas in 610. Although Nicephorus compiled from the works of his predecessors, he entirely remodelled his materials, and his style is vastly superior to that of his contemporaries. Edited by Ducæus, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. folio.—2. GREGORAS. Vid. GREGORAS.—3. PATRIARCHA, originally the notary or chief secretary of state to the Emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, subsequently retired into a convent, and was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 806. He was deposed in 815, and died in 828. Several of his works have come down to us, of which the most important is entitled Breviarium Historicum, a Byzantine history, extending from 602 to 770. This is one of the best works of the Byzantine period. Edited by Petavius, Paris, 1616, [and by Bekker, Bonn, 1837].

NICER (now Neckar), a river in Germany falling into the Rhine at the modern Mannheim.

NICERATUS (Νικήρατος). 1. Father of Nicias, the celebrated Athenian general.—2. Son of Nicias, put to death by the thirty tyrants, to whom his great wealth was no doubt a temptation.—3. A Greek writer on plants, one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia.

NICĒTAS (Νικήτας). 1. ACOMINATUS, also called CHONIATES, because he was a native of Chonæ, formerly Colossæ, in Phrygia, one of the most important Byzantine historians, lived in the latter half of the twelfth and the former half of the thirteenth centuries. He held important public offices at Constantinople, and was present at the capture of the city by the Latins in 1204, of which he has given us a faithful description. He escaped to Nicæa, where he died about 1216. The history of Nicetas consists of ten distinct works, each of which contains one or more books, of which there are twenty-one, giving the history of the emperors from 1118 to 1206. The best edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1835.—2. EUGENIANUS, lived probably toward the end of the twelfth century, and wrote "The History of the Lives of Drusilla and Charicles," which is the worst of all the Greek romances that have come down to us. It was published for the first time by Boissonade, Paris, 1819, 2 vols.

NICĬA (now Enza?), a tributary of the Po in Gallia Cisalpina.

[NICIA, a place on the borders of Macedonia and Illyria, between Lychnidus and Heraclea, the same as Nicæa, No. 5.]

NICĬAS (Νικίας). 1. A celebrated Athenian general during the Peloponnesian war, was the son of Niceratus, from whom he inherited a large fortune. His property was valued at one hundred talents. From this cause, combined with his unambitious character, and his aversion to all dangerous innovations, he was naturally brought into connection with the aristocratical portion of his fellow-citizens. He was several times associated with Pericles as strategus, and his great prudence and high character gained for him considerable influence. On the death of Pericles he came forward more openly as the opponent of Cleon, and the other demagogues of Athens; but, from his military reputation, the mildness of his character, and the liberal use which he made of his great wealth, he was looked upon with respect by all classes of the citizens. His timidity led him to buy off the attacks of the sycophants. He was a man of strong religious feeling, and Aristophanes ridicules him in the Equites for his timidity and superstition. His characteristic caution was the distinguishing feature of his military career; and his military operations were almost always successful. He frequently commanded the Athenian armies during the earlier years of the Peloponnesian war. After the death of Cleon (B.C. 422) he exerted all his influence to bring about a peace, which was concluded in the following year (421). For the next few years Nicias used all his efforts to induce the Athenians to preserve the peace, and was constantly opposed by Alcibiades, who had now become the leader of the popular party. In 415 the Athenians resolved on sending their great expedition to Sicily, and appointed Nicias with Alcibiades and Lamachus to the command. Nicias disapproved of the expedition altogether, and did all that he could to divert the Athenians from this course. But his representations produced no effect, and he set sail for Sicily with his colleagues. Alcibiades was soon afterward recalled (vid. Alcibiades), and the sole command was thus virtually left in the hands of Nicias. His early operations were attended with success. He defeated the Syracusans in the autumn, and employed the winter in securing the co-operation of several of the Greek cities, and of the Siculian tribes in the island. In the spring of next year he renewed his attacks upon Syracuse; he succeeded in seizing on Epipolæ, and commenced the circumvallation of Syracuse. About this time Lamachus was slain in a skirmish under the walls. All the attempts of the Syracusans to stop the circumvallation failed. The works were nearly completed, and the doom of Syracuse seemed sealed, when Gylippus, the Spartan, arrived in Sicily. Vid. Gylippus. The tide of success now turned, and Nicias found himself obliged to send to Athens for re-enforcements, and requested, at the same time, that another commander might be sent to supply his place, as his feeble health rendered him unequal to the discharge of his duties. The Athenians voted re-enforcements, which were placed under the command of Demosthenes and Eurymedon; but they would not allow Nicias to resign his command. Demosthenes, upon his arrival in Sicily (413), made a vigorous effort to recover Epipolæ, which the Athenians had lost. He was nearly successful, but was finally driven back with severe loss. Demosthenes now deemed any further attempts against the city hopeless, and therefore proposed to abandon the siege and return to Athens. To this Nicias would not consent. He professed to stand in dread of the Athenians at home; but he appears to have had reasons for believing that a party among the Syracusans themselves were likely, in no long time, to facilitate the reduction of the city. But meantime fresh succors arrived for the Syracusans; sickness was making ravages among the Athenian troops, and at length Nicias himself saw the necessity of retreating. Secret orders were given that every thing should be in readiness for departure, when an eclipse of the moon happened. The credulous superstition of Nicias led to the total destruction of the Athenian armament. The soothsayers interpreted the event as an injunction from the gods that they should not retreat before the next full moon, and Nicias resolutely determined to abide by their decision. The Syracusans resolved to bring the enemy to an engagement, and, in a decisive naval battle, defeated the Athenians. They were now masters of the harbor, and the Athenians were reduced to the necessity of making a desperate effort to escape. The Athenians were again decisively defeated; and having thus lost their fleet, they were obliged to retreat by land. They were pursued by the enemy, and were finally compelled to surrender. Both Nicias and Demosthenes were put to death by the Syracusans.—2. The physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who offered to the Roman consul to poison the king for a certain reward. Fabricius not only rejected his base offer with indignation, but immediately sent him back to Pyrrhus with notice of his treachery. He is sometimes, but erroneously, called Cineas.—3. A Coan grammarian, who lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, with whom he was intimate.—4. A celebrated Athenian painter, flourished about B.C. 320. He was the most distinguished disciple of Euphranor. His works seem to have been all painted in encaustic. One of his greatest paintings was a representation of the infernal regions as described by Homer. He refused to sell this picture to Ptolemy, although the price offered for it was sixty talents.

[Nicippe (Νικίππη). 1. A daughter of Pelops, and the wife of Sthenelus.—2. A daughter of Thespius, the mother of Antimachus by Hercules.]

[Nicippus (Νίκιππος). 1. A native of Cos, who finally made himself tyrant of the island.—2. One of the ephors of the Messenians in B.C. 220.]

Nicochăres (Νικοχάρης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, the son of Philonides, was contemporary with Aristophanes. [The fragments of his comedies are collected in Meineke's Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 465–468, edit minor.]

Nicocles (Νικοκλῆς). 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, son of Evagoras, whom he succeeded B.C. 374. Isocrates addressed him a long panegyric upon his father's virtues, for which Nicocles rewarded the orator with the magnificent present of twenty talents. Scarcely any particulars are known of the reign of Nicocles. He is said to have perished by a violent death but neither the period nor circumstances of this event are recorded.—2. Prince or ruler of Paphos, in Cyprus, during the period which followed the death of Alexander. He was at first one of those who took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus; but, having subsequently entered into secret negotiations with Antigonus, he was compelled by Ptolemy to put an end to his own life, B.C. 310.—3. Tyrant of Sicyon, was deposed by Aratus, after a reign of only four months, B.C. 251.—[4. Of Soli, an officer in the army of Alexander the Great.—5. An Athenian, put to death with his friend Phocion, B.C. 318. As he had always been a warm friend to him, he begged of Phocion, as a last favor, to be allowed to drink the poison before his illustrious friend, a request which Phocion unwillingly conceded.]

[NICOCRATES (Νικοκράτης). 1. A native of Cyprus, collected an extensive library at a very early period.—2. Archon of Athens, B.C. 333.]

NICOCREON (Νικοκρέων), king of Salamis, in Cyprus, at the time of Alexander's expedition into Asia. After the death of Alexander he took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus, and was intrusted by Ptolemy with the chief command over the whole island. Nicocreon is said to have ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to death in a stone mortar, in revenge for an insult which the latter had offered the king when he visited Alexander at Tyre.

NICOLĀUS CHALCOCONDYLES. Vid. CHALCOCONDYLES.

NICOLĀUS DAMASCĒNUS, a Greek historian, and an intimate friend both of Herod the Great and of Augustus. He was, as his name indicates, a native of Damascus, and a son of Antipater and Stratonice. He received an excellent education, and he carried on his philosophical studies in common with Herod, at whose court he resided. In B.C. 13 he accompanied Herod on a visit to Augustus at Rome, on which occasion Augustus made Nicolaus a present of the finest fruit of the palm-tree, which the emperor called Nicolai—a name by which it continued to be known down to the Middle Ages. Nicolaus rose so high in the favor of Augustus that he was on more than one occasion of great service to Herod, when the emperor was incensed against the latter. Nicolaus wrote a large number of works, of which the most important were, 1. A life of himself, of which a considerable portion is still extant. 2. A universal history, which consisted of one hundred and forty-four books, of which we have only a few fragments. 3. A life of Augustus, from which we have some extracts made by command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He also wrote commentaries on Aristotle, and other philosophical works, and was the author of several tragedies and comedies: Stobæus has preserved a fragment of one of his comedies, extending to forty-four lines. The best edition of his fragments is by Orelli, Lips., 1804.

NICOMĂCHUS (Νικόμαχος). 1. Father of Aristotle. Vid. p. 100, a.—2. Son of Aristotle by the slave Herpyllis. He was himself a philosopher, and wrote some philosophical works. A portion of Aristotle's writings bears the name of Nicomachean Ethics, but why we can not tell; whether the father so named them, as a memorial of his affection for his young son, or whether they derived their title from being afterward edited and commented on by Nicomachus.—3. Called Gerasenus, from his native place, Gerasa in Arabia, was a Pythagorean, and the writer of a life of Pythagoras, now lost. His date is inferred from his mention of Thrasyllus, who lived under Tiberius. He wrote on arithmetic and music; and two of his works on these subjects are still extant. The work on arithmetic was printed by Wechel, Paris, 1538; also, after the Theologumena Arithmeticæ, attributed to Iamblichus, Lips., 1817. The work on music was printed by Meursius, in his collection, Lugd. Bat., 1616, and in the collection of Meibomius, Amst., 1652.—4. Of Thebes, a celebrated painter, was the elder brother and teacher of the great painter Aristides. He flourished B.C. 360, and onward He was an elder contemporary of Apelles and Protogenes. He is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers in terms of the highest praise. Cicero says that in his works, as well as in those of Echion, Protogenes, and Apelles, every thing was already perfect. (Brutus, 18.)

NICŎMĒDES (Νικομήδης). 1. I. King of Bithynia, was the eldest son of Zipœtes, whom he succeeded, B.C. 278. With the assistance of the Gauls, whom he invited into Asia, he defeated and put to death his brother Zipœtes, who had for some time held the independent sovereignty of a considerable part of Bithynia. The rest of his reign appears to have been undisturbed, and under his sway Bithynia rose to a high degree of power and prosperity. He founded the city of Nicomedia, which he made the capital of his kingdom. The length of his reign is uncertain, but he probably died about 250. He was succeeded by his son ZIELAS.—2. II. Surnamed EPIPHANES, king of Bithynia, reigned B.C. 149–91. He was the son and successor of Prusias II., and fourth in descent from the preceding. He was brought up at Rome, where he succeeded in gaining the favor of the senate. Prusias, in consequence, became jealous of his son, and sent secret instructions for his assassination. The plot was revealed to Nicomedes, who thereupon returned to Asia, and declared open war against his father. Prusias was deserted by his subjects, and was put to death by order of his son, 149. Of the long and tranquil reign of Nicomedes, few events have been transmitted to us. He courted the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Aristonicus, 131. He subsequently obtained possession of Paphlagonia, and attempted to gain Cappadocia, by marrying Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes VI. He was, however, expelled from Cappadocia by Mithradates; and he was also compelled by the Romans to abandon Paphlagonia, when they deprived Mithradates of Cappadocia.—3. III. Surnamed PHILOPATOR, king of Bithynia (91–74), son and successor of Nicomedes II. Immediately after his accession he was expelled by Mithradates, who set up against him his brother Socrates; but he was restored by the Romans in the following year (90). At the instigation of the Romans, Nicomedes now proceeded to attack the dominions of Mithradates, who expelled him a second time from his kingdom (88). This was the immediate occasion of the first Mithradatic war; at the conclusion of which (84) Nicomedes was again reinstated in his kingdom. He reigned nearly ten years after this second restoration. He died at the beginning of 74, and having no children, by his will bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people.

Nĭcŏmēdīa (Νικομήδεια: Νικομηδεύς, fem. Νικομήδισσα: now ruins at Izmid or Iznikmid), a celebrated city of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, built by King Nicomedes I. (B.C. 264), at the northeastern corner of the Sinus Astacenus (now Gulf of Izmid: compare Astacus). It was the chief residence of the kings of Bithynia, and it soon became one of the most splendid cities of the then known world. Under the Romans it was a colony, and a favorite residence of several of the later emperors, especially of Diocletian and Constantine the Great. Though repeatedly injured by earthquakes, it was always restored by the munificence of the emperors. Like its neighbor and rival, Nicæa, it occupies an important place in the wars against the Turks; but it is still more memorable in history as the scene of Hannibal's death. It was the birth-place of the historian Arrian.

Nicōnĭa or Nicōnĭum, a town in Scythia, on the right bank of the Tyras (now Dniester).

Nĭcŏphon and Nĭcŏphron (Νικοφῶν, Νικόφρων), an Athenian comic poet, son of Theron, and a contemporary of Aristophanes at the close of his career. [The fragments of his comedies are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 468–472, edit. minor.]

Nĭcŏpŏlis (Νικόπολις: Νικοπολίτης, Nicopolitānus). 1. (Ruins at Paleoprevyza), a city at the southwestern extremity of Epirus, on the point of land which forms the northern side of the entrance to the Gulf of Ambracia, opposite to Actium. It was built by Augustus in memory of the battle of Actium, and was peopled from Ambracia, Anactorium, and other neighboring cities, and also with settlers from Ætolia. Augustus also built a temple of Apollo on a neighboring hill, and founded games in honor of the god, which were held every fifth year. The city was received into the Amphictyonic league in place of the Dolopes. It is spoken of both as a libera civitas and as a colony. It had a considerable commerce and extensive fisheries. It was made the capital of Epirus by Constantine, and its buildings were restored both by Julian and by Justinian.—2. (Now Nicopoli), a city of Mœsia Inferior, on the Danube, built by Trajan in memory of a victory over the Dacians, and celebrated as the scene of the great defeat of the Hungarians and Franks by the Sultan Bajazet, on the 28th of September, 1396.—3. (Now *Andere*z, or Devrigni?), a city of Armenia Minor, on or near the Lycus, and not far from the sources of the Halys, founded by Pompey on the spot where he gained his first victory over Mithradates: a flourishing place in the time of Augustus: restored by Justinian.—4. A city in the northeastern corner of Cilicia, near the junction of the Taurus and Amanus.—[5. Or Emmaus, a city of Palestine. Vid. Emmaus.]—6. (Now Kars, Kiassera, or Cæsar's Castle, ruins), a city of Lower Egypt, about two or three miles east of Alexandrea, on the canal between Alexandrea and Canopus, was built by Augustus in memory of his last victory over Antony. Here also, as at Nicopolis opposite to Actium, Augustus founded a temple of Apollo, with games every fifth year. Not being mentioned after the time of the first Cæsars, it would seem to have become a mere suburb of Alexandrea.

[Nicostratus (Νικόστρατος). 1. An Athenian general, son of Diitrephes, was a colleague of Nicias at the capture of Cythera; fell in battle against Agis near Mantinea.—2. An Argive, possessed extraordinary strength of body, and was distinguished also for prudence in council; was sent by the Argives with a body of three thousand men to aid the Persian king Darius Ochus against Egypt.]

Nicostrătus (Νικόστρατος). 1. The youngest of the three sons of Aristophanes, was himself a comic poet. His plays belonged both to the middle and the new comedy. [The fragments of his comedies are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 632–640, edit. minor.—2. A tragic actor, flourished before B.C. 420.]

Nigeir, Nigir, or Nigris (Νίγειρ, Νίγιρ, a compounded form of the word Geir or Gir, which seems to be a native African term for a river in general), changed, by a confusion which was the more easily made on account of the color of the people of the region, into the Latin word Niger, a great river of Æthiopia Interior, which modern usage has identified with the river called Joli-ba (i. e., Great River) and Quorra (or, rather, Kowara), in Western Africa. As early as the time of Herodotus, we find an authentic statement concerning a river of the interior of Libya, which is evidently identical both with the Nigeir of most of the ancient geographers, and with the Quorra. He tells us (ii., 32) that five young men of the Nasamones, a Libyan people on the Great Syrtis, on the northern coast of Africa, started to explore the desert parts of Libya; that, after crossing the inhabited part, and the region of the wild beasts, they journeyed many days through the Desert toward the west, till they came to a plain where fruit-trees grew; and as they ate the fruit, they were seized by some little black men, whose language they could not understand, who led them through great marshes to a city, inhabited by the same sort of little black men, who were all enchanters, and a great river flowed by the city from west to east, and in it there were crocodiles. Herodotus, like his informants, inferred from the course of the river, and from the crocodiles in it, that it was the Nile; but it can hardly be any river but the Quorra; and that the city was Timbuctoo is far more probable than not. The opinion that the Niger was a western branch of the Nile prevailed very generally in ancient times, but by no means universally. Pliny gives the same account in a very confused manner, and makes the Nigris (as he calls it) the boundary between Northern Africa and Æthiopia. Ptolemy, however, who evidently had new sources of information respecting the interior of Africa, makes the Nigeir rise not far from its real source (allowing for the imperfect observations on which his numerical latitudes and longitudes are founded), and follow a direction not very different from what that of the Joli-ba and Quorra would be, if we suppose that the Zirmi, Koji, and Yeo form an unbroken communication between the Quorra and the Lake Tchad. But Ptolemy adds, what the most recent discoveries render a very remarkable statement, that a branch of the Nigeir communicates with the Lake Libya (Λιβύη), which he places in 16° 30′ north latitude, and 35° east longitude (i. e., from the Fortunate Islands = 17° from Greenwich). This is almost exactly the position of Lake Tchad; and, if the Tchadda really flows out of this lake, it will represent the branch of the Nigeir spoken of by Ptolemy, whose informants, however, seem to have inverted the direction of its stream. It is further remarkable that Ptolemy places on the Nigeir a city named Thamondocana in the exact position of Timbuctoo, and that the length of the river, computed from his position, agrees very nearly with its real length. The error of connecting the Niger and the Nile revived after the time of Ptolemy, and has only been exploded by very recent discoveries.

Niger, C. Pescennius, was governor of Syria during the latter part of the reign of Commodus, on whose death he was saluted emperor by the legions in the East, A.D. 193; but in the following year he was defeated and put to death by Septimius Severus. Many anecdotes have been preserved of the firmness with which Niger enforced the most rigid discipline among his troops; but he preserved his popularity by the impartiality which he displayed, and by the example of frugality, temperance, and hardy endurance of toil which he exhibited in his own person.

Nigīra (Νίγειρα, Ptol.: now Jenneh ?), a city on the northern side of the River Nigeir, and the capital of the Nigritæ.

Nigrītæ or -ētes (Νιγρῖται, Νιγρῖται Αἰθίοπες, Νίγρητες), the northernmost of the Æthiopian (i. e., Negro) communities of Central Africa, dwelt about the Nigeir, in the great plain of Soudan.

Nigrītis Lacus (Νιγρῖτις λίμνη), a lake in the interior of Africa, out of which Ptolemy represents the River Nigeir as flowing. He places it about at the true source of the Nigeir (i. e., the Joli-ba); but it is not yet discovered whether the river has its source in a lake. Some modern geographer identify it with the Lake Debo, southwest of Timbuctoo.

Nilūpŏlis or Nīlus (Νείλου πόλις, Νεῖλος), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, in the Nomos Heracleopolites was built on an island in the Nile, twenty geographical miles northeast of Heracleopolis. There was a temple here in which, as throughout Egypt, the River Nile was worshipped as a god.

Nīlus (ὁ Νεῖλος, derived probably from a word which still exists in the old dialects of India, Nilas, i. e., black, and sometimes called Μέλας by the Greeks: Νεῖλος occurs first in Hesiod; Homer calls the river Αἴγυπτος: now Nile, Arab. Bahr-Nil, or simply Bahr, i. e., the River: the modern names of its upper course, in Nubia and Abyssinia, are various). This river, one of the most important in the world, flows through a channel which forms a sort of cleft extending north and south through the high rocky and sandy land of Northeastern Africa. Its western or main branch has not yet been traced to its source, but it has been followed up to a point in 4° 42′ north latitude, and 30° 58′ east longitude, where it is a rapid mountain stream, running at the rate of six knots an hour over a rocky bed, free from alluvial soil. After a course in the general direction of north-northeast as far as a place called Khartum, in 15° 34′ north latitude, and 32° 30′ east longitude, this river, which is called the Bahr-el-Abiad, i. e., White River, receives another large river, the Bahr-el-Azrek, i. e., Blue River, the sources of which are in the highlands of Abyssinia, about 11° north latitude, and 37° east longitude: this is the middle branch of the Nile system, the Astapus of the ancients. The third, or eastern branch, called Tacazze, the Astaboras of the ancients, rises also in the highlands of Abyssinia, in about 11° 40′ north latitude, and 39° 40′ east longitude, and joins the Nile (i. e., the main stream formed by the union of the Abiad and the Azrek), in 17° 45′ north latitude, and about 34° 5′ east longitude: the point of junction was the apex of the island of Meroe. Here the united river is about two miles broad. Hence it flows through Nubia, in a magnificent rocky valley, falling over six cataracts, the northernmost of which, called the First cataract (i. e., to a person going up the river), is and has always been the southern boundary of Egypt. Of its course from this point to its junction with the Mediterranean, a sufficient general description has been given under Ægyptus (p. 17, a.). The branches into which it parted at the southern point of the Delta were, in ancient times, three in number, and these again parted into seven, of which, Herodotus tells us, five were natural and two artificial. These seven mouths were nearly all named from cities which stood upon them: they were called, proceeding from east to west, the Pelusiac, the Tanitic or Saïtic, the Mendesian, the Phatnitic, or Pathmetic, or Bucolic, the Sebennytic, the Bolbitic or Bolbitine, and the Canobic or Canopic. Through the alterations caused by the alluvial deposits of the river, they have now all shifted their positions, or dwindled into little channels, except two, and these are much diminished; namely, the Damiat mouth on the east, and the Rosetta mouth on the west. Of the canals connected with the Nile in the Delta, the most celebrated were the Canobic, which connected the Canobic mouth with the Lake Mareotis and with Alexandrea, and that of Ptolemy (afterward called that of Trajan), which connected the Nile at the beginning of the Delta with the Bay of Heroöpolis at the head of the Red Sea: the formation of the latter is ascribed to King Necho, and its repair and improvement successively to Darius the son of Hystaspes, Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Trajan. That the Delta, and, indeed, the whole alluvial soil of Egypt has been created by the Nile, can not be doubted; but the present small rate of deposit proves that the formation must have been made long before the historical period. The periodical rise of the river has been spoken of under ÆGYPTUS. It is caused by the tropical rains on the highlands in which it rises. The best ancient accounts, preserved by Ptolemy, place its source in a range of mountains in Central Africa, called the Mountains of the Moon; and the most recent information points to a range of mountains a little north of the equator, called Jebel-el-Kumri, or the Blue Mountain, as containing the probable sources of the Bahr Abiad. The ancient Egyptians deified the Nile, and took the utmost care to preserve its water from pollution.

[NILUS (Νεῖλος), the god of the River Nile in Egypt, said to have been a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Memphis and Chione. Pindar calls him a son of Saturn (Cronus).]

NINUS, the reputed founder of the city of Ninus or Nineveh. An account of his exploits is given under Semiramis, his wife, whose name was more celebrated. Vid. SEMIRAMIS.

NINUS, NINIVE (Νίνος, less correctly Νῖνος: in the Old Testament, Nineveh, LXX. Νινευή, Νινευί: Νίνιος, Ninivitæ, pl.), the capital of the great Assyrian monarchy, and one of the most ancient cities in the world, stood on the eastern side of the Tigris, at the upper part of its course, in the district of Aturia. The accounts of its foundation and history are as various as those respecting the Assyrian monarchy in general. Vid. ASSYRIA. The Greek and Roman writers ascribe its foundation to Ninus; but in the book of Genesis (x., 11) we are told, immediately after the mention of the kingdom of Nimrod and his foundation of Babel and other cities in Shinar (i. e., Babylon), that "out of that land went forth Asshur" (or otherwise, "he—i. e., Nimrod—went forth into Assyria"), "and builded Nineveh." There is no further mention of Nineveh in Scripture till the reign of Jeroboam II., about B.C. 825, when the prophet Jonah was commissioned to preach repentance to its inhabitants. It is then described as "an exceeding great city, of three days' journey," and as containing "more than one hundred and twenty thousand persons that can not discern between their right hand and their left hand," which, if this phrase refers to children, would represent a population of six hundred thousand souls. The other passages, in which the Hebrew prophets denounce ruin against it, bear witness to its size, wealth, and luxury, and the latest of them (Zeph., ii., 13) is dated only a few years before the final destruction of the city, which was effected by the Medes and Babylonians about B.C. 606. It is said by Strabo to have been larger than Babylon, and Diodorus describes it as an oblong quadrangle of one hundred and fifty stadia by ninety, making the circuit of the walls four hundred and eighty stadia (more than fifty five statute mi… if so, the city was twice as large as London … gether with its suburbs. Within the last ten years, however, those shapeless mounds have been shown to contain the remains of great palaces, on the walls of which the scenes of Assyrian life and the records of Assyrian conquests are sculptured; while the efforts which had long been made to decipher the cuneiform inscriptions found in Persia and Babylonia, as well as Assyria, have been so far successful as to make it probable that we may soon read the records of Assyrian history from her own monuments. It is as yet premature to form definite conclusions to any great extent. The results of Major Rawlinson's study of the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria are only in process of publication. The excavations conducted by Dr. Layard and M. Botta have brought to light the sculptured remains of immense palaces, not only at the traditional site of Nineveh, namely, Kouyunjik and Nebbi-Yunus, opposite to Mosul, and at Khorsabad, about ten miles to the north-northeast, but also in a mound eighteen miles lower down the river, in the tongue of land between the Tigris and the Great Zab, which still bears the name of Nimroud; and it is clear that these remains belong to different periods, embracing the records of two distinct dynasties, extending over several generations, none of which can be later than B.C 606, while some of them probably belong to a period at least as ancient as the thirteenth, and perhaps even the fifteenth century B.C. There are other mounds of ruins as yet unexplored. Which of these ruins correspond to the true site of Nineveh, or whether (as Dr. Layard suggests) that vast city may have extended all the way along the Tigris from Kouyunjik to Nimroud, and to a corresponding breadth northeast of the river, as far as Khor-

Niobe her..., who had gone to Mount Sipylus, was met...orphosed into stone, and even thus contin... to feel the misfortune with which the gods ... visited her. This is the Homeric story, ...ich later writers have greatly modified and ...arged. The number and names of the chil... of Niobe vary very much in the different ...ounts; for while Homer states that their ...mber was twelve, Hesiod and others men...ed twenty, Alcman only six, Sappho eight..., and Herodotus four; but the most common...eceived number in later times appears to have ...en fourteen, namely, seven sons and seven ...ughters. According to Homer, all the chil...en of Niobe fell by the arrows of Apollo and ...iana (Artemis); but later writers state that one of her sons, Amphion or Amyclas, and one of her daughters, Meliboea, were saved, but that Meliboea, having turned pale with terror at the sight of her dying brothers and sisters, was afterward called Chloris. The time and place at which the children of Niobe were destroyed are likewise stated differently. According to Homer, they perished in their mother's house. According to Ovid, the sons were slain while they were engaged in gymnastic exercises in a plain near Thebes, and the daughters during the funeral of their brothers. Others, again, transfer the scene to Lydia, or make Niobe, after the death of her children, go from Thebes to Lydia, to her father Tantalus on Mount Sipylus, where Jupiter (Zeus), at her own request, metamorphosed her into a stone, which during the summer always shed tears. In the time of Pausanias people still fancied they could see the petrified figure of Niobe on Mount Sipylus. The tomb of the children of Niobe, however, was shown at Thebes. The story of Niobe and her children was frequently taken as a subject by ancient artists. One of the most celebrated of the ancient works of art still extant is the group of Niobe and her children, which filled the pediment of the temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome, and which was discovered at Rome in the year 1583. This group is now at Florence, and consists of the mother, who holds her youngest daughter on her knees, and thirteen statues of her sons and daughters, besides a figure usually called the pædagogus of the children The Romans themselves were uncertain whether the group was the work of Scopas or Praxiteles.

NIPHĀTES (ὁ Νιφάτης, i. e., Snow-mountain now Balan), a mountain chain of Armenia, forming an eastern prolongation of the Taurus from where it is crossed by the Euphrates toward the Lake of Van, before reaching which it turns to the south, and approaches the Tigris below Tigranocerta; thus surrounding on the north and east the basin of the highest course of the Tigris (which is inclosed on the south and southwest by Mount Masius), and dividing it from the valley of the Arsanias (now Murad) or southern branch of the Euphrates. The continuation of Mount Niphates to the southeast, along the eastern margin of the Tigris valley, is formed by the mountains of the Carduchi (now Mountains of Kurdistan).

NIREUS (Νιρεύς), son of Charopus and Aglaia, was, next to Achilles, the handsomest among the Greeks at Troy. He came from the island of Syme (between Rhodes and Cnidus). Later writers relate that he was slain by Eurypylus or Æneas.

[NISA OR NISSA. Vid. NYSA.]

NISÆA. Vid. MEGARA.

NISÆA, NISÆI, NISÆUS CAMPUS (Νίσαια, Νισαῖοι, τὸ Νίσαιον πεδίον), these names are found in the Greek and Roman writers used for various places on the south and southeast of the Caspian: thus one writer mentions a city Nisæa in Margiana, and another a people Nisæi in the north of Aria; but most apply the term Nisæan Plain to a plain in the north of Great Media, near Rhagæ, the pasture ground of a great number of horses of the finest breed, which supplied the studs of the king and nobles of Persia. It seems not unlikely that this breed of horses was called Nisæan from their original home in Margiana (a district famous for its horses), and that the Nisæan plain received its name from the horses kept in it.

NISIBIS (Νίσιβις: Νισιβηνός). 1. Also ANTIOCHĪA MYGDONIÆ (in the Old Testament, Aram Zoba? ruins near Nisibin), a celebrated city of Mesopotamia, and the capital of the district of Mygdonia, stood on the River Mygdonius (now Nahr-al-Huali), thirty-seven Roman miles southwest of Tigranocerta, in a very fertile district. It was the centre of a considerable trade, and was of great importance as a military post. In the successive wars between the Romans and Tigranes, the Parthians, and the Persians, it was several times taken and retaken, until at last it fell into the hands of the Persians in the reign of Jovian.—2. A city of Aria, at the foot of Mount Paropamisus.

NISUS (Νῖσος). 1. King of Megara, was son of Pandion and Pylia, brother of Ægeus, Pallas, and Lycus, and husband of Abrote, by whom he became the father of Scylla. When Megara was besieged by Minos, Scylla, who had fallen in love with Minos, pulled out the purple or golden hair which grew on the top of her father's head, and on which his life depended Nisus thereupon died, and Minos obtained possession of the city. Minos, however, was so horrified at the conduct of the unnatural daughter, that he ordered Scylla to be fastened to the poop of his ship, and afterward drowned her in the Saronic Gulf. According to others, Minos left Megara in disgust; Scylla leaped into the sea, and swam after his ship; but her father, who had been changed into a sea-eagle (haliæëtus), pounced down upon her, whereupon she was metamorphosed into either a fish or a bird called Ciris. Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, is sometimes confounded by the poets with Scylla, the daughter of Phorcus. Hence the latter is sometimes erroneously called Niseia Virgo, and Nisēis. Vid. Scylla. Nisæa, the port town of Megara, is supposed to have derived its name from Nisus, and the promontory of Scyllæum from his daughter.—2. Son of Hyrtacus, and a friend of Euryalus. The two friends accompanied Æneas to Italy, and perished in a night attack against the Rutulian camp.—[3. A noble Dulichian, son of Aretus, and one of the suitors of Penelope.]

Nisȳrus (Νίσυρος: now Nikero), a small island in the Carpathian Sea, a little distance off the promontory of Caria called Triopium, of a round form, eighty stadia (eight geographical miles) in circuit, and composed of lofty rocks, the highest being two hundred and twenty-seven feet high. Its volcanic nature gave rise to the fable respecting its origin, that Neptune (Poseidon) tore it off the neighboring island of Cos to hurl it upon the giant Polybotes. It was celebrated for its warm springs, wine, and millstones. Its capital, of the same name, stood on the northwest of the island, where considerable ruins of its Acropolis remain. Its first inhabitants are said to have been Carians; but already in the heroic age it had received a Dorian population, like other islands near it, with which it is mentioned by Homer as sending troops to the Greeks. It received other Dorian settlements in the historical age. At the time of the Persian war, it belonged to the Carian queen Artemisia; it next became a tributary ally of Athens: though transferred to the Spartan alliance by the issue of the Peloponnesian war, it was recovered for Athens by the victory at Cnidus, B.C. 394. After the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, it was assigned to Rhodes, and, with the rest of the Rhodian republic, was united to the Roman empire about B.C. 70.

[Nitetis (Νίτητις), a daughter of Apries, the Egyptian king, who was driven from his throne by Amasis; Cambyses having demanded of Amasis his daughter in marriage, the latter sent to him Nitetis, having passed her off as his own daughter. Another account, referred to by Herodotus as incorrect, makes Cyrus to have sought Nitetis in marriage, and to have been by her the father of Cambyses.]

Nitiobrĭges, a Celtic people in Gallia Aquitanica, between the Garumna and the Liger, whose fighting force consisted of five thousand men. Their chief town was Aginnum (now Agen).

Nitōcris (Νίτωκρις). 1. A queen of Babylon, mentioned by Herodotus, who ascribes to her many important works at Babylon and its vicinity. It is supposed by most modern writers that she was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, and the mother or grandmother of Labynetus or Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon.—2. A queen of Egypt, was elected to the sovereignty in place of her brother, whom the Egyptians had killed. In order to take revenge upon the murderers of her brother, she built a very long chamber under ground, and when it was finished invited to a banquet in it those of the Egyptians who had had a principal share in the murder. While they were engaged in the banquet, she let in upon them the waters of the Nile by means of a large concealed pipe, and drowned them all; and then, in order to escape punishment, threw herself into a chamber full of ashes. This is the account of Herodotus. We learn from other authorities that she was a celebrated personage in Egyptian legends. She is said to have built the third pyramid, by which we are to understand that she finished the third pyramid, which had been commenced by Mycerinus. Modern writers make her the last sovereign of the sixth dynasty, and state that she reigned six years in place of her murdered husband (not her brother, as Herodotus states), whose name was Menthuôphis. The latter is supposed to be the son or grandson of the Mœris of the Greeks and Romans.

Nitriæ, Nitrariæ (Νιτρίαι, Νίτρια, Νιτραιαι: now Birket-el-Duarah), the celebrated natron lakes in Lower Egypt, which lay in a valley on the southwestern margin of the Delta, and gave to the surrounding district the name of Νιτριῶτις or the Νομὸς Νιτριώτης, and to the inhabitants whose chief occupation was the extraction of the natron from the lakes, the name of Νιτριῶται. This district was the chief seat of the worship of Serapis, and the only place in Egypt where sheep were sacrificed.

Nixi Dii, a general term, applied by the Romans to those divinities who were believed to assist women in child-birth.

[Noas. Vid. Noes.]

Nobĭlĭor, Fulvĭus, plebeians. This family was originally called Pætinus, and the name of Nobilior was first assumed by No. 1, to indicate that he was more noble than any others of this name. 1. Ser., consul B.C. 255, with M. Æmilius Paulus, about the middle of the first Punic war. The two consuls were sent to Africa to bring off the survivors of the army of Regulus. On their way to Africa they gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians; but on their return to Italy they were wrecked off the coast of Sicily, and most of their ships were destroyed.—2. M., grandson of the preceding, curule ædile 195, prætor 193, when he defeated the Celtiberi in Spain, and took the town of Toletum; and consul 189, when he received the conduct of the war against the Ætolians. He took the town of Ambracia, and compelled the Ætolians to sue for peace. On his return to Rome in 187, he celebrated a most splendid triumph. In 179 he was censor with M. Æmilius Lepidus, the pontifex maximus. Fulvius Nobilior had a taste for literature and art; he was a patron of the poet Ennius, who accompanied him in his Ætolian campaign; and he belonged to that party among the Roman nobles who were intro ducing into the city a taste for Greek literature and refinement. He was, therefore, attacked by Cato the censor, who made merry with his name, calling him mobilior instead of nobilior. Fulvius, in his censorship, erected a temple to Hercules and the Muses in the Circus Flaminius, as an indication that the state ought to cultivate the liberal arts; and he adorned it with the paintings and statues which he had brought from Greece upon his conquest of Ætolia.—3. M., son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 171; curule ædile 166, the year in which the Andria of Terence was performed; and consul 159.—4. Q., also son of No. 2, consul 153, when he had the conduct of the war against the Celtiberi in Spain, by whom he was defeated with great loss. He was censor in 136. He inherited his father's love for literature: he presented the poet Ennius with the Roman franchise when he was a triumvir for founding a colony.

[Noëmon. 1. A Lycian warrior, slain by Ulysses before Troy.—2. Son of Phronius, an Ithacan, who gave his vessel to Telemachus for his intended voyage in search of Ulysses.—3. A Trojan warrior, companion of Æneas in Italy, slain by Turnus.]

[Noes (Νόης, Hdt.), or Noas (Val. Flacc.), a southern tributary of the Ister in Thrace.]

Nola (Nolānus: now Nola), one of the most ancient towns in Campania, twenty-one Roman miles southeast of Capua, on the road from that place to Nuceria, was founded by the Ausonians, but afterward fell into the hands of the Tyrrheni (Etruscans), whence some writers call it an Etruscan city. In B.C. 327, Nola was sufficiently powerful to send two thousand soldiers to the assistance of Neapolis. In 313 the town was taken by the Romans. It remained faithful to the Romans even after the battle of Cannæ, when the other Campanian towns revolted to Hannibal; and it was allowed, in consequence, to retain its own constitution as an ally of the Romans. In the Social war it fell into the hands of the confederates, and when taken by Sulla it was burned to the ground by the Samnite garrison. It was afterward rebuilt, and was made a Roman colony by Vespasian. The Emperor Augustus died at Nola. In the neighborhood of the town some of the most beautiful Campanian vases have been found in modern times. According to an ecclesiastical tradition, church bells were invented at Nola, and were hence called Campanæ.

[Nomădes. Vid. Numidia.]

Nomentānus, mentioned by Horace as proverbially noted for extravagance and a riotous mode of living. The scholiasts tell us that his full name was L. Cassius Nomentanus.

Nomentum (Nomentanus: now La Mentana), originally a Latin town founded by Alba, but subsequently a Sabine town, fourteen (Roman) miles from Rome, from which the Via Nomentana (more anciently Via Ficulensis) and the Porta Nomentana at Rome derived their name. The neighborhood of the town was celebrated for its wine.

Nŏmĭa (τὰ Νόμια), a mountain in Arcadia, on the frontiers of Laconia, is said to have derived its name from a nymph Nomia.

[Nomion (Νομίων), of Caria, father of Amphimachus and Nastes, who led the Carians to the Trojan war.]

Nŏmĭus (Νόμιος), a surname of divinities protecting the pastures and shepherds, such as Apollo, Pan, Mercury (Hermes), and Aristæus.

Nonăcris (Νώνακρις: Νωνακριάτης, Νωνακριεύς), a town in the north of Arcadia, northwest of Pheneus, was surrounded by lofty mountains, in which the River Styx took its origin. The town is said to have derived its name from Nonacris, the wife of Lycaon. From this town Mercury (Hermes) is called Nonacriates. Evander Nonacrius, Atalanta Nonacria, and Callisto Nonacrina Virgo. in the general sense of Arcadian.

Nonnus (Νόννος). 1. A Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and lived in the sixth century of the Christian era. Respecting his life nothing is known, except that he was a Christian. He is the author of an enormous epic poem, which has come down to us under the name of Dionysiaca or Bassarica (Διονυσιακά or Βασσαρικά), and which consists of forty-eight books. The work has no literary merit; the style is bombastic and inflated; and the incidents are patched together with little or no coherence. Edited by Græfe, Lips., 1819–1826, 2 vols. 8vo. Nonnus also made a paraphrase of the gospel of St. John in hexameter verse, which is likewise extant. Edited by Heinsius, Lugd. Bat., 1627: [and by Passow, Leipzig, 1834.]—2. Theophanes Nonnus, a Greek medical writer who lived in the tenth century after Christ. His work is entitled a "Compendium of the whole Medical art," and is compiled from previous writers. Edited by Bernard, Gothæ et Amstel., 1794, 1795, 2 vols.

Nōra (τὰ Νῶρα: Νωρανός, Norensis). 1. (Now Torre Forcadizo), one of the oldest cities of Sardinia, founded by Iberian settlers under Norax, stood on the coast of the Sinus Caralitanus, thirty-two Roman miles southwest of Caralis.—2. A mountain fortress of Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia, on the northern side of the Taurus, noted for the siege sustained in it by Eumenes against Antigonus for a whole winter. In the time of Strabo, who calls it Νηροασσός, it was the treasury of Sisinas, a pretender to the throne of Cappadocia.

[Norax (Νῶραξ), son of Mercury (Hermes) and Erythea. Vid. Nora.]

Norba (Norbanensis, Norbanus). 1. (Now Norma), a strongly fortified town in Latium, on the slope of the Volscian Mountains, and near the sources of the Nymphæus, originally belonged to the Latin and subsequently to the Volscian league. As early as B.C. 492 the Romans founded a colony at Norba. It espoused the cause of Marius in the civil war, and was destroyed by fire by its own inhabitants, when it was taken by one of Sulla's generals. There are still remains of polygonal walls, and a subterraneous passage at Norma.—2. Surnamed Cæsarēa (now Alcantara), a Roman colony in Lusitania, on the left bank of the Tagus, northwest of Augusta Emerita. The bridge built by order of Trajan over the Tagus at this place is still extant. It is six hundred feet long by twenty-eight wide, and contains six arches.

Norbānus, C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 95, when he accused Q. Servilius Cæpio of majestas, but was himself accused of the same crime in the following year, on account of disturbances which took place at the trial of Cæpio. In 90 or 89, Norbanus was prætor in Sicily during the Marsic war; and in the civil wars he espoused the Marian party. He was consul in 83, when he was defeated by Sulla near Capua. In the following year, 82, he joined the consul Carbo in Cisalpine Gaul, but their united forces were entirely defeated by Metellus Pius. Norbanus escaped from Italy and fled to Rhodes, where he put an end to his life, when his person was demanded by Sulla.

Norbānus Flaccus. Vid. Flaccus.

Norēia (Νωρήεια: now Neumarkt in Styria), the ancient capital of the Taurisci or Norici in No icum, from which the whole country probably derived its name. It was situated in the centre of Noricum, a little south of the River Murius, and on the road from Virunum to Ovilaba. It is celebrated as the place where Carbo was defeated by the Cimbri, B.C. 113. It was besieged by the Boii in the time of Julius Cæsar. (Cæs., B. G., i., 5.)

Nōrĭcum, a Roman province south of the Danube, which probably derived its name from the town of Noreia, was bounded on the north by the Danube, on the west by Rætia and Vindelicia, on the east by Pannonia, and on the south by Pannonia and Italy. It was separated from Rætia and Vindelicia by the River Ænus (now Inn), from Pannonia on the east by Mons Cetius, and from Pannonia and Italy on the south by the River Savus, the Alpes Carnicæ, and Mons Ocra. It thus corresponds to the greater part of Styria and Carinthia, and a part of Austria, Bavaria, and Salzburg. Noricum was a mountainous country, for it was not only surrounded on the south and east by mountains, but one of the main branches of the Alps, the Alpes Noricæ (in the neighborhood of Salzburg), ran right through the province. In those mountains a large quantity of excellent iron was found; and the Noric swords were celebrated in antiquity. Gold also is said to have been found in the mountains in ancient times. The inhabitants of the country were Celts, divided into several tribes, of which the Taurisci, also called Norici, after their capital Noreia, were the most important. They were conquered by the Romans toward the end of the reign of Augustus, after the subjugation of Rætia by Tiberius and Drusus, and their country was formed into a Roman province. In the later division of the Roman empire into smaller provinces, Noricum was formed into two provinces, Noricum Ripense, along the bank of the Danube, and Noricum Mediterraneum, separated from the former by the mountains which divide Aus[tria] and Styria: they both belonged to the dioc[ese] of Illyricum and the prefecture of Italy.

Novarĭa (Novarensis: now Novara), a tow[n] in Gallia Transpadana, situated on a river o[f] the same name (now Gogna), and on the roa[d] from Mediolanum to Vercellæ, subsequently [a] Roman municipium.

Novatiānus, a heretic, who insisted upon th[e] perpetual exclusion from the Church of al[l] Christians who had fallen away from the fait[h] under the terrors of persecution. On the election of Cornelius to the see of Rome, A.D 251, Novatianus was consecrated bishop of a rival party, but was condemned by the council held in the autumn of the same year. After a vain struggle to maintain his position, he was obliged to give way, and became the founder of a new sect, who from him derived the name of Novatians. It should be observed that the individual who first proclaimed these doctrines was no[t] Novatianus, but an African presbyter under Cyprian, named Novatus. Hence much confusion has arisen between Novatus and Novatianus, who ought, however, to be carefully distinguished. A few of the works of Novatianus are extant. The best edition of them is by Jackson, Lond., 1728.

Novātus. Vid. Novatianus.

Novensĭles or Novensĭdes Dii, Roman gods whose name is probably composed of novi and insides, and therefore signifies the new gods in opposition to the Indigetes, or old native divinities. It was customary among the Romans after the conquest of a neighboring town, to carry its gods to Rome, and there establish their worship.

Novesĭum (now Neuss), a fortified town of the Ubii on the Rhine, and on the road leading from Colonia Agrippinā (now Cologne) to Castra Vetera (now Xanten). The fortifications of this place were restored by Julian in A.D. 359

Noviodūnum, a name given to many Celtic places from their being situated on a hill (dun). 1. (Now Nouan), a town of the Bituriges Cubi in Gallia Aquitanica, east of their capital Avaricum.—2. (Now Nevers), a town of the Ædui in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the road from Augustodunum to Lutetia, and at the confluence of the Niveris and the Liger, whence it was subsequently called Nevirnum, and thus acquired its modern name.—3. A town of the Suessones in Gallia Belgica, probably the same as Augusta Suessonum. Vid. Augusta, No 6.—4. (Now Nion), a town of the Helvetii in Gallia Belgica, on the northern bank of the Lacus Lemanus, was made a Roman colony by [J]us Cæsar, B.C. 45, under the name of Colo- Equestris.—5. (Now Isaczi), a fortress in [Moes]ia Inferior, on the Danube, near which Va- built his bridge of boats across the Danube [in h]is campaign against the Goths.

[N]OVIOMAGUS or NŒOMAGUS. 1. (Now Cas-n de Medoc), a town of the Bituriges Vi- [sc]i in Gallia Aquitanica, northwest of Burdi- [ga]l.—2. A town of the Tricastini in Gallia [Lugd]unensis, probably the modern Nions, though [som]e suppose it to be the same place as Au- [gus]ta Tricastinorum (now Aouste). —3. (Now [Spi]res), the capital of the Nemetes. Vid. NEM- [ET]Æ.—4. (Now Neumagen), a town of the Tre- [ver]i in Gallia Belgica, on the Mosella.—5. (Now [Nim]wegen), a town of the Batavi.—[6. NUCERIA (Nucerīnus). 1. Surnamed ALFA- TERNA (now Nocera), a town in Campania, on the Sarnus (now Sarno), and on the Via Appia, southeast of Nola, and nine (Roman) miles from the coast, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was again taken by Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, when it was burned to the ground. It was subsequently rebuilt, and both Augustus and Nero planted here colonies of veterans. Pompeii was used as the harbor of Nuceria. — 2. Surnamed CAMELLARIA (now Nocera), a town in the interior of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia.—3. (Now Luzzara), a small town in Gallia Cispadana, on the Po, northeast of Brixellum.—4. A town in Apulia, more correctly called LUCERIA.

[NUDIUM (Νούδιον), a settlement of the Minyæ in Elis, early destroyed by the Eleans.]

NUITHONES, a people of Germany, dwelling on the right bank of the Albis (now Elbe), southwest of the Saxones, and north of the Langobardi, in the southeastern part of the modern Mecklenburg.

NUMA MARCIUS. 1. An intimate friend of Numa Pompilius, whom he is said to have accompanied to Rome, where Numa made him the first pontifex maximus. Marcius aspired to the kingly dignity on the death of Pompilius, and he starved himself to death on the election of Tullus Hostilius.—2. Son of the preceding, is said to have married Pompilia, the daughter of Numa Pompilius, and to have become by her the father of Ancus Marcius. Numa Marcius was appointed by Tullus Hostilius præfectus urbi.

NUMA POMPILIUS, the second king of Rome, who belongs to legend and not to history. He was a native of Cures in the Sabine country, and was elected king one year after the death of Romulus, when the people became tired of the interregnum of the senate. He was renowned for his wisdom and his piety; and it was generally believed that he had derived his knowledge from Pythagoras. His reign was long and peaceful, and he devoted his chief care to the establishment of religion among his rude subjects. He was instructed by the Camena Egeria, who visited him in a grove near Rome, and who honored him with her love. He was revered by the Romans as the author of their whole religious worship. It was he who first appointed the pontiffs, the augurs, the flamens, the virgins of Vesta, and the Salii. He founded the temple of Janus, which remained always shut during his reign. The length of his reign is stated differently. Livy makes it forty-three years; Polybius and Cicero thirty-nine years. The sacred books of Numa, in which he prescribed all the religious rites and ceremonies, were said to have been buried near him in a separate tomb, and to have been discovered by accident five hundred years afterward, in B.C. 181. They were carried to the city prætor Petilius, and were found to consist of twelve or seven books in Latin on ecclesiastical law, and the same number of books in Greek on philosophy: the latter were burned on the command of the senate, but the former were carefully preserved. The story of the discovery of these books is evidently a forgery; and the books, which were ascribed to Numa, and which were extant at a later time, were evidently nothing more than works containing an account of the ceremonial of the Roman religion.

NUMANA (now Umana Distrutta), a town in Picenum, on the road leading from Ancona to Aternum, along the coast, was founded by the Siculi, and was subsequently a municipium.

NUMANTIA (Numantīnus: ruins near Puente de Don Guarray), the capital of the Arevacæ or Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, and the most important town in all Celtiberia, was situated near the sources of the Durius, on a small tributary of this river, and on the road leading from Asturica to Cæsaraugusta. It was strongly fortified by nature, being built on a steep and precipitous, though not lofty hill, and accessible by only one path, which was defended by ditches and palisades. It was twenty-four stadia in circumference, but was not surrounded by regular walls, which the natural strength of its position rendered unnecessary. It was long the head-quarters of the Celtiberians in their wars with the Romans; and its protracted siege and final destruction by Scipio Africanus the younger (B.C. 133) is one of the most memorable events in the early history of Spain.

[NUMĀNUS REMULUS, a Rutulian warrior, brother-in-law of Turnus, slain by Ascanius.]

NUMENIUS (Νουμήνιος), of Apamea in Syria, a Pythagoreo-Platonic philosopher, who was highly esteemed by Plotinus and his school, as well as by Origen. He probably belongs to the age of the Antonines. His object was to trace the doctrines of Plato up to Pythagoras, and, at the same time, to show that they were not at variance with the dogmas and mysteries of the Brahmins, Jews, Magi, and Egyptians. Considerable fragments of his works have been preserved by Eusebius, in his Præparatio Evangelica.

NUMERIĀNUS, M. AURĒLĬUS, the younger of the two sons of the Emperor Carus, who accompanied his father in the expedition against the Persians, A.D. 283. After the death of his father, which happened in the same year, Numerianus was acknowledged as joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The army, alarmed by the fate of Carus, who was struck dead by lightning, compelled Numerianus to retreat toward Europe. During the greater part of the march, which lasted for eight months, he was confined to his litter by an affection of the eyes; but the suspicions of the soldiers having become excited, they at length forced their way into the imperial tent, and discovered the dead body of their prince. Arrius Aper, præfect of the prætorians, and father-in-law of the deceased, was arraigned of the murder in a military council, held at Chalcedon, and, without being permitted to speak in his own defence, was stabbed to the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor. Vid. DIOCLETIANUS.

NŬMICĬUS or NŬMICUS (now Numico), a small river in Latium, flowing into the Tyrrhene Sea near Ardea, on the banks of which was the tomb of Æneas, whom the inhabitants called Jupiter Indiges.

[NUMICIUS, TIB. 1. Tribune of the plebs B.C. 320, was, with his colleague Q. Mælius, given over to the Samnites when the Romans resolved not to adhere to the peace made at Caudium. NŬMĬDĬA (Νουμιδία, ἡ Νομαδία and Νομαδική: Νομάς, Nŭmĭda, pl. Νομάδες or Νομάδες Λίβυες, Nŭmĭdæ: now Algier), a country of Northern Africa, which, in its original extent, was divided from Mauretania on the west by the River Malva or Mulucha, and on the east from the territory of Carthage (afterward the Roman province of Africa) by the River Tusca: its northern boundary was the Mediterranean, and on the south it extended indefinitely toward the chain of the Great Atlas and the country of the Gætuli. Intersected by the chain of the Lesser Atlas, and watered by the streams running down from it, it abounded in fine pastures, which were early taken possession of by wandering tribes of Asiatic origin, who, from their occupation as herdsmen, were called by the Greeks, here as elsewhere, Νομάδες, and this name was perpetuated in that of the country. A sufficient account of these tribes, and of their connection with their neighbors on the west, is given under MAURETANIA. The fertility of the country, inviting to agriculture, gradually gave a somewhat more settled character to the people: and, at their first appearance in Roman history we find their two great tribes, the Massylians and the Massæsylians, forming two monarchies, which were united into one under Masinissa B.C. 201. For the historical details, vid. MASINISSA. On Masinissa's death in 148, his kingdom was divided, by his dying directions, between his three sons, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa; but it was soon reunited under MICIPSA, in consequence of the death of both his brothers. His death in 118 was speedily followed by the usurpation of Jugurtha, an account of which and of the ensuing war with the Romans is given under JUGURTHA. On the defeat of Jugurtha in 106, the country became virtually subject to the Romans, but they permitted the family of Masinissa to govern it, with the royal title (vid. HIEMPSAL, No. 2; JUBA, No. 1), until B.C. 46, when Juba, who had espoused the cause of Pompey in the civil wars, was defeated and dethroned by Julius Cæsar, and Numidia was made a Roman province ... seems to have been about the same time or a little later, under Augustus, that the western part of the country was taken from Numidia and added to MAURETANIA, as far east as Saldæ. In B.C. 30 Augustus restored Juba II. to his father's kingdom of Numidia; but in B.C. ... he exchanged it for Mauretania, and Numidia, that is, the country between Saldæ on the west and the Tusca on the east, became a Roman province. It was again diminished by nearly half under Claudius (vid. MAURETANIA); and henceforth, until the Arab conquest, the senatorial province of Numidia denotes the district between the River Ampsaga on the west and the Tusca on the east; its capital was Cirta (now Constantineh). The country, in its later restricted limits, is often distinguished by the name of New Numidia or Numidia Proper. The Numidians are celebrated in military history as furnishing the best light cavalry to the armies, first of Carthage, and afterward of Rome.

Q. Numitorius Pullus, of Fregellæ, betrayed his native town to the Roman prætor L. Opimius, B.C. 125, when it rose in revolt to obtain the Roman franchise.—4. C., was a distinguished man of the aristocratical party, who was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome at the close of B.C. 87.

NURSIA (Nursinus: now Norcia), a town in the north of the land of the Sabines, situated near the sources of the Nar and amid the Apennines, whence it is called by Virgil (Æn., vii., 716) frigida Nursia. It was the birth-place of Sertorius and of the mother of Vespasian.

NYCTEIS (Νυκτηΐς), that is, Antiope, daughter of Nycteus, and mother of Amphion and Zethus. Vid. ANTIOPE, NYCTEUS.

NYCTEUS (Νυκτεύς), son of Hyrieus by the nymph Clonia, and husband of Polyxo, by whom he became the father of Antiope; though, according to others, Antiope was the daughter of the river-god Asopus. Antiope was carried off by Epopeus, king of Sicyon; whereupon Nycteus, who governed Thebes, as the guardian of Labdacus, invaded Sicyon with a Theban army. Nycteus was defeated, and being severely wounded, he was carried back to Thebes, where, previous to his death, he appointed his brother Lycus guardian of Labdacus, and at the same time required him to take vengeance on Epopeus. Vid. LYCUS.

NYCTIMENE, daughter of Epopeus, king of Lesbos, or, according to others, of Nycteus. Pursued and dishonored by her amorous father, she concealed herself in the shade of forests, where she was metamorphosed by Minerva (Athena) into an owl.

NYMPHÆ (Νύμφαι), the name of a numerous class of female divinities of a lower rank, though they are designated by the title of Olympian, are called to the meetings of the gods in Olympus, and are described as the daughters of Jupiter (Zeus). They may be divided into two great classes. The first class embraces those who were recognized in the worship of nature. The early Greeks saw in all the phenomena of ordinary nature some manifestation of the deity: springs, rivers, grottoes, trees, and mountains, all seemed to them fraught with life, and all were only the visible embodiments of so many divine agents. The salutary and beneficent powers of nature were thus personified, and regarded as so many divinities. The second class of nymphs are personifications of tribes, races, and states, such as Cyrene, and many others. I. The nymphs of the first class must again be subdivided into various species, according to the different parts of nature of which they are the representatives. 1. Nymphs of the watery element. To these belong, first, the nymphs of the ocean, Oceanides (Ὠκεανῖναι, Ὠκεανίδες, νύμφαι ἅλιαι), who were regarded as the daughters of Oceanus; and, next, the nymphs of the Mediterranean or inner sea, who were regarded as the daughters of Nereus, and hence were called Nereides (Νηρεΐδες). The rivers were represented by the Potameides (Ποταμηΐδες), who, as local divinities, were named after their rivers as Acheloides, Anigrides, Ismenides, Amnisiades, Pactolides. The nymphs of fresh water, whether of rivers, lakes, brooks, or springs were also designated by the general name Naiades (Νηΐδες), though they had, in addition, specific names (Κρηναῖαι, Πηγαῖαι, Ἑλειονόμοι, Λιμνατίδες, or Λιμνάδες). Even the rivers of the lower regions were described as having their nymphs; hence we read of Nymphæ infernæ paludis and Avernales. Many of these nymphs preside over waters or springs which were believed to inspire those who drank of them. The nymphs themselves were, therefore, thought to be endowed with prophetic power, and to inspire men with the same, and to confer upon them the gift of poetry. Hence all persons in a state of rapture, such as seers, poets, madmen, &c., were said to be caught by the nymphs (νυμφόληπτοι, in Lat. lymphati, lymphatici). As water is necessary to feed all vegetation as well as all living beings, the water-nymphs frequently appear in connection with higher divinities, as, for example, with Apollo, the prophetic god and the protector of herds and flocks; with Diana (Artemis), the huntress and the protectress of game, who was herself originally an Arcadian nymph; with Mercury (Hermes), the fructifying god of flocks; with Bacchus (Dionysus); and with Pan, the Sileni and Satyrs, whom they join in their Bacchic revels and dances.—2. Nymphs of mountains and grottoes, called Oreades (Ὀρειάδες, Ὀροδεμνιάδες), but sometimes also by names derived from the particular mountains they inhabited (e. g., Κιθαιρωνίδες, Πηλιάδες, Κορύκιαι).—3. Nymphs of forests, groves, and glens, were believed some times to appear to and frighten solitary travellers. They are designated by the names Ἀλσηΐδες, Ὑληωροί, Αὐλωνιάδες, and Ναπαῖαι.—4. Nymphs of trees were believed to die together with the trees which had been their abode, and with which they had come into existence. They were called Dryades and Hamadryades (Δρυάδες, Ἁμαδρυάδες or Ἀδρυάδες), from δρῦς, which signifies not only an oak, but any wild-growing lofty tree; for the nymphs of fruit-trees were called Melides (Μηλίδες, also Μηλιάδες, Ἐπιμηλίδες, or Ἁμαμηλίδες). They seem to be of Arcadian origin, and never appear together with any of the great gods. II. The second class of nymphs, who were connected with certain races or localities (Νύμφαι χθόνιαι), usually have a name derived from the places with which they are associated, as Nysiades, Dodonides, Lemniæ. The sacrifices offered to nymphs usually consisted of goats, lambs, milk, and oil, but never of wine. They were worshipped in many parts of Greece, especially near springs, groves, and grottoes. They are represented in works of art as beautiful maidens, either quite naked or only half covered. Later poets sometimes describe them as having sea-colored hair.

NYMPHÆUM (Νυμφαῖον, i. e., Nymph's abode). 1. A mountain, with perhaps a village, by the River Aous, near Apollonia, in Illyricum.—2. A port and promontory on the coast of Illyricum, three Roman miles from Lissus.—3. (Now Cape Ghiorgi), the southwestern promontory of Acte or Athos, in Chalcidice.—4. A sea-port town of the Chersonesus Taurica (now Crimea), on the Cimmerian Bosporus, twenty-five stadia (two and a half geographical miles) from Panticapæum.—5. A place on the coast of Bithynia, thirty stadia (three geographical miles) west of the mouth of the River Oxines.—6. A place in Cilicia, between Celenderis and Soloë.

NYMPHÆUS (Νύμφαιος). 1. (Now Ninfa or Nimpa), a small river of Latium, falling into the sea above Astura; of some note as contributing to the formation of the Pomptine Marshes. It now no longer reaches the sea, but falls into a little lake, called Lago di Monaci.—2. A harbor on the western side of the island of Sardinia, between the Promontorium Mercurii and the town of Tillium.—3. Also called NYMPHĪUS (now Basilimfa), a small river of Sophene in Armenia, a tributary of the Upper Tigris, flowing from north to south past Martyropolis, in the valley between Mons Niphates and Mons Masius.

NYMPHIDĬUS SABĪNUS, commander of the prætorian troops, together with Tigellinus, toward the latter end of Nero's reign. On the death of Nero, A.D. 68, he attempted to seize the throne, but was murdered by the friends of Galba.

NYMPHIS (Νύμφις), son of Xenagoras, a native of the Pontic Heraclea, lived about B.C. 250. He was a person of distinction in his native land, as well as a historical writer of some note. He wrote a work on Alexander and his successors in twenty-four books, and also a history of Heraclea in thirteen books. [The fragments of Nymphis are collected by J. C. Orelli in his edition of Memnon, Leipzig, 1816, p. 95–102, and by C. Müller, Fragm. Græc. Hist., vol. iii., p. 12–16.]

NYMPHODŌRUS (Νυμφόδωρος). 1. A Greek historian of Amphipolis, of uncertain date, the author of a work on the Laws or Customs of Asia (Νόμιμα 'Ασίας), vid. at end of No. 2.—2. Of Syracuse, likewise a historian, seems to have lived about the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He wrote a Periplus of Asia, and a work on Sicily. [The fragments of these works are given by Müller, Fragm. Græc. Hist., vol. ii., p. 375–381; Müller considers the existence of No. 1 doubtful, and adduces some arguments to show that these works are by one and the same author, viz., the Nymphodorus of Syracuse.]

[NYMPHODŌRUS (Νυμφόδωρος), a citizen of Abdera, whose sister married Sitalces, king of Thrace. The Athenians, who had previously regarded Nymphodorus as their enemy, made him their proxenus in B.C. 431, and, through his mediation, obtained the alliance of Sitalces. He also subsequently testified his friendship for the Athenians by several other acts of kindness, and thus did them good service.]

[NȲSA or NYSSA (Νῦσα or Νύσσα). 1. A queen of Bithynia, wife of Nicomedes II., and mother of Nicomedes III.—2. A sister of Mithradates the Great, who was taken prisoner by Lucullus at Cabira, and thus escaped the fate of the other sisters and wives of the king, who were put to death shortly after at Pharnacia.—3. A daughter of Mithradates the Great, who had been betrothed to the King of Cyprus, but accompanied her father in his flight to the kingdom of Bosporus, where she ultimately shared his fate, putting an end to her life by poison, B C. 63.]

NȲSA or NYSSA (Νῦσα, Νύ[illegible]), was the legendary scene of the nurture of Bacchus (Dionysus), whence the name was applied to several places which were sacred to that god. 1. In India, in the district of Goryæa, at the northwestern corner of the Punjab, near the confluence of the Rivers Cophen and Choaspes, probably the same place as Nagāra or Dionysopolis (now Nagar or Naggar). Near it was a mountain of like name.—2. A city or mountain in Æthiopia.—3. (Now Sultan-Hisar, ruins a little west of Nazeli), a city of Caria, on the southern slope of Mount Messogis, built on both sides of the ravine of the brook Eudon, which falls into the Mæander. It was said to have been named after the queen of one of the Antiochi, having been previously called Athymbra and Pythopolis.—4. A city of Cappadocia, near the Halys, on the road from Cæsarea to Archelais, the bishopric of St. Gregory of Nyssa.—5. A town in Thrace, between the Rivers Nestus and Strymon.—6. A town in Bœotia, near Mount Helicon.

NYSÆUS, NYSĪUS, NYSEUS, or NYSIGENA, a surname of Bacchus (Dionysus), derived from Nysa, a mountain or city (see above), where the god was said to have been brought up by nymphs.

NYSEĪDES or NYSIĂDES, the nymphs of Nysa, who are said to have reared Bacchus (Dionysus), and whose names are Cisseïs, Nysa, Erato, Eriphia, Bromia, and Polyhymno.

NYX (Νύξ), called NOX by the Romans, was a personification of Night. Homer calls her the subduer of gods and men, and relates that Jupiter (Zeus) himself stood in awe of her. In the ancient cosmogonies Night is one of the very first created beings, for she is described as the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Erebus, by whom she became the mother of Æther and Hemera. She is further said to have given birth, without a husband, to Moros, the Keres, Thanatos, Hypnos, Dreams, Momus, Oizys, the Hesperides, Mœræ, Nemesis, and similar beings. In later poets, with whom she is merely the personification of the darkness of night, she is sometimes described as a winged goddess, and sometimes as riding in a chariot, covered with a dark garment, and accompanied by the stars in her course. Her residence was in the darkness of Hades.

OĂNUS ('Ωανος: now Frascolari), a small river on the southern coast of Sicily, near Camarina.

[OARACTA ('Οάρακτα, 'Οοράχθα, or [illegible]: now Dsjisme or Khishme, also Broktit), a large and fertile island lying off the coast of Carmania, in the Persian Gulf; in it was found the tomb of Erythras, from whom the Erythræan Sea was fabled to have been named.]

OĂRUS ("Οαρος), a considerable river mentioned by Herodotus as rising in the country of the Thyssagetæ, and falling into the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov) east of the Tanais (now Don). As there is no river which very well answers this description, Herodotus is supposed to refer to one of the eastern tributaries of the Don, such as the Sal or the Manytch.

OĂSIS ("Οασις, Αὔασις, and in later writers "Ωασις) is the Greek form of an Egyptian word

(in Coptic ouahé, an inhabited place), which was used to denote an island in the sea of sand of the great Libyan Desert: the word has been adopted into our language. The Oases are depressions in the great table-land of Libya, preserved from the inroad of the shifting sands by steep hills of limestone round them, and watered by springs, which make them fertile and habitable. With the substitution of these springs for the Nile, they closely resemble that greater depression in the Libyan table-land, the Valley of Egypt. The chief specific applications of the word by the ancient writers are to the two Oases on the west of Egypt, which were taken possession of by the Egyptians at an early period. 1. OASIS MINOR, the Lesser or Second Oasis (Ὄασις Μικρά, or ἡ δευτέρα: now Wah-el-Bahryeh or Wah el-Behnesa), lay west of Oxyrynchus, and a good day's journey from the southwestern end of the Lake Mœris. It was reckoned as belonging to the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, and formed a separate Nomos.—2. OASIS MAJOR, the Greater, Upper, or First Oasis (Ὄ. μεγάλη, ἡ πρώτη, ἡ ἄνω Ὄ., and, in Herodotus, πόλις Ὄασις and νῆσος Μακάρων, now Wah-el-Khargeh), is described by Strabo as seven days' journey west of Abydos, which applies to its northern end, as it extends over more than 1½° of latitude. It belonged to Upper Egypt, and, like the other, formed a distinct nome: these two nomes are mentioned together as "duo Oasitæ" (οἱ δύο Ὀασῖται). When the ancient writers use the word Oasis alone, the Greater Oasis must generally be understood. The Greater Oasis contains considerable ruins of the ancient Egyptian and Roman periods. Between and near these were other Oases, about which we learn little or nothing from the ancient writers, though in one of them, the Wah-el-Gharbee or Wah-el-Dakhleh, three days west of the Greater Oasis, there are the ruins of a Roman temple, inscribed with the names of Nero and of Titus. The Greater Oasis is about level with the valley of the Nile, the Lesser is about two hundred feet higher than the Nile, in nearly the same latitude.—3. A still more celebrated Oasis than either of these was that called AMMON, HAMMON, AMMONIUM, HAMMŌNIS ORACULUM, from its being a chief seat of the worship and oracle of the god Ammon. It was called by the Arabs in the Middle Ages Santariah, and now Siwah. It is about fifteen geographical miles long, and twelve wide: its chief town, Siwah, is in 29° 12′ north latitude, and 26° 17′ east longitude: its distance from Cairo is twelve days, and from the northern coast about one hundred and sixty statute miles: the ancients reckoned it twelve days from Memphis, and five days from Parætonium on the northern coast. It was inhabited by various Libyan tribes, but the ruling people were a race kindred to the Æthiopians above Egypt, who, at a period of unknown antiquity, had introduced, probably from Meroë, the worship of Ammon: the government was monarchical. The Ammonians do not appear to have been subject to the old Egyptian monarchy. Cambyses, after conquering Egypt in B.C. 525, sent an army against them, which was overwhelmed by the sands of the Desert. In B.C. 331, Alexander the Great visited the oracle, which hailed him as the son of Jupiter (Zeus) Ammon. The oracle was also visited by Cato of Utica. Under the Ptolemies and the Romans it was subject to Egypt, and formed part of the Nomos Libya. The most remarkable objects in the Oasis, besides the temple of Ammon, were the palace of the ancient kings, abundant springs of salt water (as well as fresh) from which salt was made, and a well, called Fons Solis, the water of which was cold at noon, and warm in the morning and evening. Considerable ruins of the temple of Ammon are still standing at the town of Siwah. In ancient times the Oasis had no town, but the inhabitants dwelt in scattered villages.—4. In other parts of the Libyan Desert there were oases of which the ancients had some knowledge, but which they do not mention by the name of Oases, but by their specific names, such as AUGILA, PHAZANIA, and others.

OAXES. Vid. OAXUS.

OAXUS (Ὄαξος: Ὀάξιος), called AXUS (Ἄξος) by Herodotus, a town in the interior of Crete, on the River Oaxes, and near Eleutherna, is said to have derived its name from Oaxes or Oaxus, who was, according to some accounts, a son of Acacallis, the daughter of Minos, and, according to others, a son of Apollo by Anchiale.

OBILA (now Avila), a town of the Vettones, in Hispania Tarraconensis.

OBLIVIŌNIS FLUMEN. Vid. LIMÆA.

OBRĪMAS (now Koja-Chai or Sandukli-Chai), an eastern tributary of the Mæander, in Phrygia.

OBRINGA (now Aar), a western tributary of the Rhine, forming the boundary between Germania Superior and Inferior.

OBSĔQUENS, JŪLĬUS, the name prefixed to a fragment entitled De Prodigiis or Prodigiorum Libellus, containing a record of the phenomena classed by the Romans under the general designation of Prodigia or Ostenta. The series extends in chronological order from the consulship of Scipio and Lælius, B.C. 190, to the consulship of Fabius and Ælius, B.C. 11. The materials are derived in a great measure from Livy, whose very words are frequently employed. With regard to the compiler we know nothing. The style is tolerably pure, but does not belong to the Augustan age. The best editions are by Scheffer, Amst., 1679; by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat., 1720; [and by Kapp, Curiæ Regn., 1772.]

OBUCŌLA, OBUCŪLA, or OBULCŪLA (now Monclova), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the road from Hispalis to Emerita and Corduba.

OBULCO (now Porcuna), surnamed PONTIFICENSE, a Roman municipium in Hispania Bætica, three hundred stadia from Corduba.

OCĀLĔA (Ὠκαλέα, Ὠκαλέη, also Ὠκάλεια, Ὠκαλέαι: Ὠκαλεύς), an ancient town in Bœotia, between Haliartus and Alalcomenæ, situated on a river of the same name falling into the Lake Copais, and at the foot of the mountain Tilphusion.

[OCALĒA (Ὠκάλεια), daughter of Mantineus wife of Abas, and mother of Acrisius and Prœtus.]

[OCCIA, a vestal virgin, who died in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 19, after discharging the duties of her priesthood for the long period of fifty-seven years.]

Oceănĭdes. Vid. Nymphæ.

Ocĕănus (Ὠκεανός), in the oldest Greek poets, is the god of the water which was believed to surround the whole earth, and which was supposed to be the source of all the rivers and other waters of the world. This water-god, in the Theogony of Hesiod, is the son of Heaven and Earth (Οὐρανός and Γαῖα), the husband of Tethys, and the father of all the river-gods and water-nymphs of the whole earth. He is introduced in person in the Prometheus of Æschylus. As to the physical idea attached by the early Greeks to the word, it seems that they regarded the earth as a flat circle, which was encompassed by a river perpetually flowing round it, and this river was Oceanus. (This notion is ridiculed by Herodotus.) Out of and into this river the sun and the stars were supposed to rise and set; and on its banks were the abodes of the dead. From this notion it naturally resulted that, as geographical knowledge advanced, the name was applied to the great outer waters of the earth, in contradistinction to the inner seas, and especially to the Atlantic, or the sea without the Pillars of Hercules (ἡ ἔξω θάλαττα, Mare Exterius), as distinguished from the Mediterranean, or the sea within that limit (ἡ ἐντὸς θάλαττα, Mare Internum); and thus the Atlantic is often called simply Oceanus. The epithet Atlantic (ἡ Ἀτλαντικὴ θάλασσα, Herod., ὁ Ἀ. πόντος, Eurip.; Atlantĭcum Mare) was applied to it from the mythical position of Atlas being on its shores. The other great waters which were denoted by the same term are described under their specific names.

Ocēlis (Ὄκηλις: now Ghel.), a celebrated harbor and emporium at the southwestern point of Arabia Felix, just at the entrance to the Red Sea.

Ocellus Lucānus, a Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of some Greek city in Lucania, but we have no particulars of his work. We have still extant under his name a considerable fragment of a work, entitled, "On the Nature of the Whole" (περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς φύσιος), written in the Ionic dialect; but it is much disputed whether it is a genuine work. In this work the author maintains that the whole (τὸ πᾶν, or ὁ κόσμος) had no beginning, and will have no end. Edited by Rudolphi, Lips., 1801–8; [and by Mullach, in the volume entitled Aristotelis de Melisso, Xenophane et Gorgia Disputationes, &c., et Ocelli Lucani, qui fertur, de universa natura libello, Berlin, 1846.]

Ocēlum. 1. A town in the northeast of Lusitania, between the Tagus and the Durius, whose inhabitants, the Ocelenses, also bore the name of Lancienses.—2. (Now Ucello or Uxeau), a town in the Cottian Alps, was the last place in Cisalpine Gaul before entering the territories of King Cottius.

Ocha (Ὄχη), the highest mountain in Eubœa, was in the south of the island, near Carystus, running out into the promontory Caphareus.

[Ochesius (Ὀχήσιος), an Ætolian prince, father of Periphas, who was slain in the Trojan war.]

Ochus. Vid. Artaxerxes III.

Ochus (Ὦχος, Ὦχος), a great river of Central Asia, flowing from the northern side of the Paropamisus (now Hindoo Koosh), according to Strabo, through Hyrcania, into the Cas[pian], according to Pliny and Ptolemy, through [Bac]tria, into the Oxus. Some suppose it [to be] only another name for the Oxus. In the P[ersian] dialect the word denotes a river in general.

[Ocnus, a son of Tiberis and Manto, and reputed founder of Mantua, which he is sa[id to] have named after his mother.]

[Ocra (Ὄκρα), a branch of the Alps in N[ori]cum; according to Strabo, the lowest part of [the] Carnic Alps, between Aquileia and Naupo[rtus], over which a commercial road passed from I[taly] to the north.]

Ocricŭlum (Ocriculānus: ruins near Otricoli), an important municipium in Umbria, situated [on] the Tiber, near its confluence with the Nar, [and] on the Via Flaminia, leading from Rome [to] Narnia, &c. There are ruins of an aqued[uct], an amphitheatre and temples near the mod[ern] Otricoli.

[Ocrīnum Promontorium (now Cape Liz[ard]). Vid. Damnonii.]

Ocrisĭa or Oclisĭa, mother of Servius T[ul]lius. For details, vid. Tullius.

[Octacilius. Vid. Otacilius.]

Octāvĭa. 1. Sister of the Emperor Augustus, was married first to C. Marcellus, consul B.[C.] 50, and subsequently, upon the death of t[he] latter, to Antony, the triumvir, in 40. Th[e] marriage was regarded as the harbinger of lasting peace. Augustus was warmly attached to his sister, and she possessed all the charms and virtues likely to secure a lasting influence over the mind of a husband. Her beauty was universally allowed to be superior to that of Cleopatra, and her virtue was such as to excite admiration in an age of growing licentiousness and corruption. For a time Antony seemed to forget Cleopatra; but he soon became tired of his virtuous wife, and upon his return to the East he forbade her to follow him. When at length the war broke out between Antony and Augustus, Octavia was divorced by her husband; but, instead of resenting the insults she had received from him, she brought up with care his children by Fulvia and Cleopatra. She died B.C. 11. Octavia had five children, three by Marcellus, a son and two daughters, and two by Antony, both daughters. Her son, M. Marcellus, was adopted by Augustus, and was destined to be his successor, but died in 23. Vid. Marcellus, No. 9. The descendants of her two daughters by Antonius successively ruled the Roman world. The elder of them married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and became the grandmother of the Emperor Nero; the younger of them married Drusus, the brother of the Emperor Tiberius, and became the mother of the Emperor Claudius, and the grandmother of the Emperor Caligula. Vid. Antonia.—2. The daughter of the Emperor Claudius, by his third wife, Valeria Messalina, was born about A.D. 42. She was at first betrothed by Claudius to L. Silanus, who put an end to his life, as Agrippina had destined Octavia to be the wife of her son, afterward the Emperor Nero. She was married to Nero in A.D. 53, but was soon deserted by her young and profligate husband for Poppæa Sabina. After living with the latter as his mistress for some time, he resolved to m[arry] ɲize her as his legal wife; and accordingly, divorced Octavia on the alleged ground of nlity, and then married Poppæa, A.D. 62. rtly afterward, Octavia was falsely accused adultery, and was banished to the little isl- of Pandataria, where she was put to death. r untimely end excited general commisera- . Octavia is the heroine of a tragedy ad among the works of Seneca, but the au- of which was more probably Curiatius Ma- nus.

Ctavianus. Vid. Augustus.

Ctavius. 1. Cn., surnamed Rufus, quæs- about B.C. 230, may be regarded as the nder of the family. The Octavii originally ne from the Volscian town of Velitræ, where treet and an altar bore the name of Octavius. . Cn, son of No. 1, plebeian ædile 206, and tor 205, when he obtained Sardinia as his vince. He was actively employed during remainder of the second Punic war, and he s present at the battle of Zama.—3. Cn., son No. 2, was prætor 168, and had the command the fleet in the war against Perseus. He s consul 165. In 162 he was one of three bassadors sent into Syria, but was assassin- d at Laodicea by a Greek of the name of ptines, at the instigation, as was supposed, Lysias, the guardian of the young king An- chus V. A statue of Octavius was placed the rostra at Rome, where it was in the time Cicero.—4. Cn., son of No. 3, consul 128.— M., perhaps younger son of No. 3, was the lleague of Tib. Gracchus in the tribunate of plebs, 133, when he opposed his tribunitian to to the passing of the agrarian law. He s, in consequence, deposed from his office Tib. Gracchus.—6. Cn., a supporter of the istocratical party, was consul 87 with L. rnelius Cinna. After Sulla's departure from ly, in order to carry on the war against Mith- dates, a vehement contest arose between the o consuls, which ended in the expulsion of nna from the city, and his being deprived of e consulship. Cinna soon afterward returned the head of a powerful army, and accompa- ed by Marius. Rome was compelled to sur- nder, and Octavius was one of the first vic- ms in the massacres that followed. His head as cut off and suspended on the rostra.—7. , son of No. 6, consul 75, died in 74, as pro- nsul of Cilicia, and was succeeded in the com- and of the province by L. Lucullus.—8. Cn., andson of No. 4, consul 76.—9. M., son of No. was curule ædile 50, along with M. Cælius. n the breaking out of the civil war in 49, Oc- vius espoused the aristocratical party, and rved as legate to M. Bibulus, who had the preme command of the Pompeian fleet. After e battle of Pharsalia, Octavius sailed to Illyri- m; but, having been driven out of this coun- y (47) by Cæsar's legates, he fled to Africa. e was present at the battle of Actium (31), hen he commanded part of Antony's fleet.— . C., younger son of No. 1, and the ancestor f Augustus, remained a simple Roman eques, ithout attempting to rise any higher in the ate.—11. C., son of No. 10, and great-grand- ther of Augustus, lived in the time of the sec- nd Punic war, in which he served as tribune the soldiers. He was present at the battle of Cannæ (216), and was one of the few who survived the engagement.—12. C., son of No. 11, and grandfather of Augustus, lived quietly at his villa at Velitræ, without aspiring to the dignities of the Roman state.—13. C., son of No. 12, and father of Augustus, was prætor 61, and in the following year succeeded C. Antonius in the government of Macedonia, which he administered with equal integrity and energy. He returned to Italy in 59, died the following year, 58, at Nola, in Campania, in the very same room in which Augustus afterward breathed his last. By his second wife Atia, Octavius had a daughter and a son, the latter of whom was subsequently the Emperor Augustus. Vid. Augustus.—14. L., a legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, 67, was sent by Pompey into Crete to supersede Q. Metellus in the command of the island; but Metellus refused to surrender the command to him. Vid. Metellus, No. 16.

Octāvius Balbus. Vid. Balbus.

Octodūrus (Octodurensis: now Martigny), a town of the Veragri in the country of the Helvetii, is situated in a valley surrounded by lofty mountains, and on the River Drance, near the spot where it flows into the Rhone. The ancient town, like the modern one, was divided by the Drance into two parts. The inhabitants had the Jus Latii.

Octogēsa, a town of the Ilergetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Iberus, probably south of the Sicoris.

Octolŏphus, a place of uncertain site, in the north of Thessaly or the south of Macedonia.

Ocȳpĕte. Vid. Harpyiæ.

Ocȳrŏe (Ὠκυρόη). 1. One of the daughters of Oceanus and Tethys.—2. Daughter of the centaur Chiron, possessed the gift of prophecy, and is said to have been changed into a mare.

Odenāthus, the ruler of Palmyra, checked the victorious career of the Persians after the defeat and capture of Valerian, A.D. 260, and drove Sapor out of Syria. In return for these services, Gallienus bestowed upon Odenathus the title of Augustus. Odenathus was soon afterward murdered by some of his relations, not without the consent, it is said, of his wife Zenobia, 266. He was succeeded by Zenobia.

Odessus (Ὀδησσός: Ὀδησσίτης, Ὀδησσεύς). 1. (Now Varna), also called Odyssus and Odissus at a later time, a Greek town in Thracia (in the later Mœsia Inferior), on the Pontus Euxinus, nearly due east of Marcianopolis, was founded by the Milesians in the territory of the Crobyzi in the reign of Astyages, king of Media (B.C. 594–559). The town possessed a good harbor, and carried on an extensive commerce.—2. A sea-port in Sarmatia Europæa, on the north of the Pontus Euxinus and on the River Sangarius, west of Olbia and the mouth of the Borysthenes. It was some distance northeast of the modern Odessa.

[Odītes. 1. A centaur, slain by Mopsus.—2. An Æthiopian, slain by Clymenus at the nuptials of Perseus.]

[Odius (Ὀδίος). 1. The leader of the Halizones, who were in alliance with the Trojans, was slain by Agamemnon before Troy.—2. A herald in the camp of the Greeks before Troy.]

Odoăcer, usually called king of the Heruli, was the leader of the barbarians who overthrew the Western empire, A.D. 476. He took the title of king of Italy, and reigned till his power was overthrown by Theodoric, king of the Goths. Odoacer was defeated in three decisive battles by Theodoric (489–490), and then took refuge in Ravenna, where he was besieged for three years. He at last capitulated on condition that he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterward murdered by his rival.

ODOMANTĬCE (Ὀδομαντική), a district in the northeast of Macedonia, between the Strymon and the Nestus, inhabited by the Thracian tribe of the Odomanti or Odomantes.

ODRY̆SÆ (Ὀδρύσαι), the most powerful people in Thrace, dwelt, according to Herodotus, on both sides of the River Artiscus, a tributary of the Hebrus, but also spread further west over the whole plain of the Hebrus. Soon after the Persian wars, Teres, king of the Odrysæ, obtained the sovereignty over several of the other Thracian tribes, and extended his dominions as far as the Black Sea. He was succeeded by his son Sitalces, who became the master of almost the whole of Thrace. His empire comprised all the territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon; and it is described by Thucydides as the greatest of all the kingdoms between the Ionian Gulf and the Euxine, both in revenue and opulence. Sitalces assisted the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war against Perdiccas, king of Macedonia. Vid. SITALCES. He died B.C. 424, and was succeeded by his nephew Seuthes I. On the death of the latter, about the end of the Peloponnesian war, the power of the Odrysæ declined. For the subsequent history of the Odrysæ, vid. THRACIA.

[ODRYSSES (Ὀδρύσσης), a tributary of the Rhyndacus, in Mysia.]

ODYSSĒA (Ὀδύσσεια), a town of Hispania Bætica, situated north of Abdera, amid the mountains of Turdetania, with a temple of Minerva (Athena), said to have been built by Odysseus (Ulysses). Its position is quite uncertain. Some of the ancients supposed it to be the same as OLISIPO.

ODYSSEUS. Vid. ULYSSES.

ŒA (Ἐώα, Ptol.: Œensis: ruins at Tripoli?), a city on the northern coast of Africa, in the Regio Syrtica (i. e., between the Syrtes), was one of the three cities of the African Tripolis, and, under the Romans, a colony by the name of Ælia Augusta Felix. It had a mixed population of Libyans and Sicilians.

ŒA (Οἴα), a town in the island of Ægina, twenty stadia from the capital.

ŒĂGRUS or ŒĂGER (Οἴαγρος), king of Thrace, was the father, by the muse Calliope, of Orpheus and Linus. Hence the sisters of Orpheus are called Œagrides, in the sense of the Muses. The adjective Œagrius is also used by the poets as equivalent to Thracian. Hence Œagrius Hæmus, Œagrius Hebrus, &c.

ŒANTHE or ŒANTHĪA (Οἰάνθη, Οἰάνθεια: Οἰανθεύς: now Galaxidhi), a town of the Locri Ozolæ on the coast, near the entrance of the Crissæan Gulf.

ŒĂSO or ŒASSO (now Oyarzun), a town of the Vascones, on the northern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the River Magrada.

ŒAX (Οἴαξ), son of Nauplius and Clymene, and brother of Palamedes and Nausimedon.

[ŒBALIDES, ŒBALIS. Vid. ŒBALUS.]

ŒBĂLUS (Οἴβαλος). 1. Son of Cynortas, husband of Gorgophone, and father of Tyndareus, Pirene, and Arene, was king of Sparta, where he was afterward honored with a heroum. According to others, he was son of Perieres and grandson of Cynortas, and was married to the nymph Batea, by whom he had several children. The patronymic Œbalides is not only applied to his descendants, but to the Spartans generally, as Hyacinthus, Castor, Pollux, &c. The feminine patronymic Œbalis and the adjective Œbalius are applied in the same way. Hence Helen is called by the poets Œbalis and Œbalia pellex; the city of Tarentum is termed Œbalia arx, because it was founded by the Lacedæmonians; and since the Sabines were, according to some tradition, a Lacedæmonian colony, we find the Sabine king Titus Tatius named Œbalius Titus, and the Sabine women Œbalides matres. (Ov., Fast., i., 260; iii., 230.)—2. Son of Telon, by a nymph of the stream Sebethus, near Naples, ruled in Campania.

[ŒBARES (Οἰβάρης). 1. A groom of Darius Hystaspis, who by a stratagem secured the Persian throne for his master, after the assassination of Smerdis.—2. Son of Megabazus, was viceroy of Dascyleum, in Bithynia, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis.]

ŒCHALĬA (Οἰχαλία: Οἰχαλιεύς, Οἰχαλιῶτις). 1. A town in Thessaly, on the Peneus, near Tricca.—2. A town in Thessaly, belonging to the territory of Trachis.—3. A town in Messenia, on the frontier of Arcadia, identified by Pausanias with Carnasium, by Strabo with Andania.—4. A town of Eubœa, in the district Eretria. The ancients were divided in opinion which of these places was the residence of Eurytus, whom Hercules defeated and slew. The original legend probably belonged to the Thessalian Œchalia, and was thence transferred to the other towns.

ŒCŪMĔNĬUS (Οἰκουμένιος), bishop of Tricca, in Thessaly, a Greek commentator on various parts of the New Testament, probably flourished about A.D. 950. He has the reputation of a judicious commentator, careful in compilation, modest in offering his own judgment, and [illegible] in expression. Most of his commentaries were published at Paris, 1631.

ŒDĬPUS (Οἰδίπους), son of Laius and Jocasta of Thebes. The tragic fate of this hero is more celebrated than that of any other legendary personage, on account of the frequent use which the tragic poets have made of it. In their hands it underwent various changes and embellishments, but the common story ran as follows. Laius, son of Labdacus, was king of Thebes, and husband of Jocaste, a daughter of Menœceus, and sister of Creon. An oracle had informed Laius that he was destined to perish by the hands of his own son. Accordingly, when Jocaste gave birth to a son, they pierced his feet, bound them together, and exposed the child on Mount Cithæron. There he was found by a shepherd of King Polybus of Corinth, and called from his swollen feet Œdipus Having been carried to the palace, the king and his wife Merope (or Periboea) brought him up as their own child. Once, however, Œdipus was taunted by a Corinthian with not being the king's son, whereupon he proceeded to Delphi to consult the oracle. The oracle replied that he was destined to slay his father and commit incest with his mother. Thinking that Polybus was his father, he resolved not to return to Corinth; but on his road between Delphi and Daulis he met his real father Laius. Polyphontes, the charioteer of Laius, bade Œdipus make way for them, whereupon a scuffle ensued, in which Œdipus slew both Laius and his charioteer. In the mean time, the celebrated Sphinx had appeared in the neighborhood of Thebes. Seated on a rock, she put a riddle to every Theban that passed by, and whoever was unable to solve it was killed by the monster. This calamity induced the Thebans to proclaim that whoever should deliver the country of the Sphinx should be made king; and should receive Jocaste as his wife. Œdipus came forward, and when he approached the Sphinx she gave the riddle as follows: "A being with four feet has two feet and three feet, and only one voice; but its feet vary, and when it has most it is weakest." Œdipus solved the riddle by saying that it was man, who in infancy crawls upon all fours, in manhood stands erect upon two feet, and in old age supports his tottering legs with a staff. The Sphinx, enraged at the solution of the riddle, thereupon threw herself down from the rock. Œdipus now obtained the kingdom of Thebes, and married his mother, by whom he became the father of Eteocles, Polynices, Antigone, and Ismene. In consequence of this incestuous alliance, of which no one was aware, the country of Thebes was visited by a plague. The oracle, on being consulted, ordered that the murderer of Laius should be expelled. Œdipus accordingly pronounced a solemn curse upon the unknown murderer, and declared him an exile; but when he endeavored to discover him, he was informed by the seer Tiresias that he himself was both the parricide and the husband of his mother. Jocaste now hung herself, and Œdipus put out his own eyes. From this point traditions differ; for, according to some, Œdipus in his blindness was expelled from Thebes by his sons and brother-in-law, Creon, who undertook the government, and he was accompanied by Antigone in his exile to Attica; while, according to others, he was imprisoned by his sons at Thebes, in order that his disgrace might remain concealed from the eyes of the world. The father now cursed his sons, who agreed to rule over Thebes alternately, but became involved in a dispute, in consequence of which they fought in single combat, and slew each other. Hereupon Creon succeeded to the throne, and expelled Œdipus. After long wanderings, Œdipus arrived in the grove of the Eumenides, near Colonus, in Attica; he was there honored by Theseus in his misfortune, and, according to an oracle, the Eumenides removed him from the earth, and no one was allowed to approach his tomb. According to Homer, Œdipus, tormented by the Erinnyes of his mother, continued to reign at Thebes after her death; he fel. in battle, and was honored at Thebes with funeral solemnities.

[ŒNANTHE (Οἰνάνθη), mother of Agathocles, the infamous minister of Ptolemy Philopator, and of Agathoclea, through whom she possessed great influence with the king. After the accession of Epiphanes, she, with her family, was given up to the multitude, and by them torn to pieces.]

ŒNĔŌN (Οἰνεών: Οἰνεωνεύς), a sea-port town of the Locri Ozolæ. east of Naupactus.

ŒNEUS (Οἰνεύς), son of Portheus, husband of Althæa, by whom he became the father of Tydeus and Meleager, and was thus the grandfather of Diomedes. He was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Ætolia. This is Homer's account; but, according to later authorities, he was the son of Porthaon and Euryte, and the father of Toxeus, whom he himself killed, Thyreus (Phereus), Clymenus, Periphas, Agelaus, Meleager, Gorge, Eurymede, Melanippe, Mothone, and Deianira. His second wife was Melanippe, the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus, according to some accounts; though, according to others, Tydeus was his son by his own daughter Gorge. He is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius, who imprisoned and ill used him. He was subsequently avenged by Diomedes, who slew Agrius and his sons, and restored the kingdom either to Œneus himself, or to his son-in-law Andræmon, as Œneus was too old. Diomedes took his grandfather with him to Peloponnesus, but some of the sons, who lay in ambush, slew the old man near the altar of Telephus in Arcadia. Diomedes buried his body at Argos, and named the town of Œnoe after him. According to others, Œneus lived to extreme old age with Diomedes at Argos, and died a natural death. Homer knows nothing of all this; he merely relates that Œneus once neglected to sacrifice to Diana (Artemis), in consequence of which she sent a monstrous boar into the territory of Calydon, which was hunted by Meleager. The hero Bellerophon was hospitably entertained by Œneus, and received from him a costly girdle as a present.

ŒNĬĂDÆ (Οἰνιάδαι: now Trigardon or Trikhardo), an ancient town of Acarnania, situated on the Achelous, near its mouth, and surrounded by marshes caused by the overflowing of the river, which thus protected it from hostile attacks. It was called in ancient times ERYSICHE (Ἐρυσίχη), and its inhabitants ERYSICHÆI (Ἐρυσιχαῖοι); and it probably derived its later name from the mythical Œneus, the grandfather of Diomedes. Unlike the other cities of Acarnania, Œniadæ espoused the cause of the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war. At the time of Alexander the Great, the town was taken by the Ætolians, who expelled the inhabitants; but the Aetolians were expelled in their turn by Philip V., king of Macedonia, who surrounded the place with strong fortifications. The Romans restored the town to the Acarnanians. The fortress Nesus or Nasus, belonging to the territory of Œniadæ, was situated in a small lake near Œniadæ.

ŒNĪDES, a patronymic from Œneus, and hence given to Meleager, the son of Œneus, and Diomedes, the grandson of Œneus

[Œno (Οἰνώ). Vid. Anius.]

Œnoanda or Œneanda, a town of Asia Minor, in the northwest of Pisidia, or the district of Cabalia, subject to Cibyra.

[Œnoatis (Οἰνωᾶτις), a surname of Diana (Artemis), who was worshipped in Argolic Œnoe, where a temple was said to have been built to her by Prœtus.]

Œnobaras (Οἰνοβάρας), a tributary of the Orontes, flowing through the plain of Antioch, in Syria.

Œnŏē (Οἰνόη: Οἰνοαῖος). 1. A demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, near Eleutheræ, on the frontiers of Bœotia, frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war.—2. A demus of Attica, near Marathon, belonging to the tribe Aiantis, and also to the Tetrapolis.—3. A fortress of the Corinthians, on the Corinthian Gulf, between the promontory Olmiæ and the frontier of Megaris.—4. A town in Argolis, on the Arcadian frontier, at the foot of Mount Artemisium.—5. A town in Elis, near the mouth of the Selleis.—6. A town in the island Icarus or Icaria.

Œnŏmăus (Οἰνόμαος). 1. King of Pisa in Elis, was son of Mars (Ares) and Harpinna, the daughter of Asopus, and husband of the Pleiad Sterope, by whom he became the father of Hippodamia. According to others, he was a son of Mars (Ares) and Sterope, or a son of Alxion. An oracle had declared that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law; and as his horses were swifter than those of any other mortal, he declared that all who came forward as suitors for Hippodamia's hand should contend with him in the chariot-race; that whoever conquered should receive her; and that whoever was conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Neptune (Poseidon), on the Corinthian Isthmus. The suitor started with Hippodamia in a chariot, and Œnomaus then hastened with his swift horses after the lovers. He had overtaken and slain many a suitor, when Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, to take out the linch-pins from the wheels of his master's chariot, and he received from Neptune (Poseidon) a golden chariot and most rapid horses. In the race which followed, the chariot of Œnomaus broke down, and he fell out and was killed. Thus Pelops obtained Hippodamia and the kingdom of Pisa. There are some variations in this story, such as that Œnomaus was himself in love with his daughter, and for this reason slew her lovers. Myrtilus also is said to have loved Hippodamia, and, as she favored the suit of Pelops, she persuaded Myrtilus to take the linch-pins out of the wheels of her father's chariot. As Œnomaus was breathing his last, he pronounced a curse upon Myrtilus. This curse had its desired effect; for, as Pelops refused to give to Myrtilus the reward he had promised, or as Myrtilus had attempted to dishonor Hippodamia, Pelops thrust him down from Cape Geræstus. Myrtilus, while dying, likewise pronounced a curse upon Pelops, which was the cause of all the calamities that afterward befell his house. The tomb of Œnomaus was shown on the River Cladeus in Elis. His house was destroyed by lightning, and only one pillar of it remained standing.—[2. A Trojan hero, slain by Idomeneus before Troy.—3. A Grecian hero, slain by Hector.]—4. Of Gadara, a Cynic philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian, or somewhat later, but before Porphyry. He wrote a work to expose the oracles, of which considerable fragments are preserved by Eusebius.—5. A tragic poet. Vid. Diogenes, No.

Œnōne (Οἰνώνη), daughter of the river-god Cebren, and wife of Paris, before he carried off Helen. Vid. Paris.

Œnōne or Œnopĭa, the ancient name of Ægina.

Œnophўta (τὰ Οἰνόφυτα: now Inia), a town in Bœotia, on the left bank of the Asopus, and on the road from Tanagra to Oropus, memorable for the victory gained here by the Athenians over the Bœotians, B.C. 456.

Œnŏpĭdes (Οἰνοπίδης), of Chios, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, perhaps a contemporary of Anaxagoras. Œnopides derived most of his astronomical knowledge from the priests and astronomers of Egypt, with whom he lived for some time. He obtained from this source his knowledge of the obliquity of the ecliptic, the discovery of which he is said to have claimed. The length of the solar year was fixed by Œnopides at three hundred and sixty-five days, and somewhat less than nine hours. He is said to have discovered the twelfth and twenty-third propositions of the first book of Euclid, and the quadrature of the meniscus.

[Œnopia, ancient name of Ægina. Vid. Ægina.]

Œnŏpĭon (Οἰνοπίων), son of Bacchus (Dionysus) and husband of the nymph Helice, by whom he became the father of Thalus, Euanthes, Melas, Salagus, Athamas, and Merope, Aerope or Hæro. Some writers call Œnopion a son of Rhadamanthys by Ariadne, and a brother of Staphylus. From Crete he migrated with his sons to Chios, which Rhadamanthys had assigned to him as his habitation. When king of Chios, the giant Orion sued for the hand of his daughter Merope. As Œnopion refused to give her to Orion, the latter violated Merope, whereupon Œnopion put out his eyes, and expelled him from the island. Orion went to Lemnos; he was afterward cured of his blindness, and returned to Chios to take vengeance on Œnopion. But the latter was not to be found in Chios, for his friends had concealed him in the earth, so that Orion, unable to discover him, went to Crete.

Œnōtri, Œnōtrĭa. Vid. Italia.

Œnōtrĭdes, two small islands in the Tyrrhene Sea, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the town of Elea or Velia and the mouth of the Helos.

Œnŏtrŏpæ. Vid. Anius.

Œnōtrus (Οἴνωτρος), youngest son of Lycaon, emigrated with a colony from Arcadia to Italy, and gave the name of Œnotria to the district in which he settled.

Œnūs (Οἰνοῦς: now Kelesina), a river in Laconia, rising on the frontier of Arcadia, and flowing into the Eurotas north of Sparta. There was a town of the same name upon this river, celebrated for its wine.

Œnussæ (Οἰνοῦσσαι, Οἰνοῦσαι). 1. A group of islands lying off the southern point of Messenia, opposite to the port of Phœnicus: the two largest of them are now called Sapienza and Cabrera.—2. (Now Spalmadori or Egonuses), a group of five islands between Chios and the coast of Asia Minor.

[Œobazus (Οἰόβαζος). 1. A Persian, who, when Darius Hystaspis was on the point of marching from Susa on his Scythian expedition, besought him to leave him one of his three sons, all of whom were in the army. Darius ordered them all three to be put to death.—2. Father of Siromitres, who led the Paricanians in the Greek expedition of Xerxes.—3. A noble Persian, who, when the Greek fleet appeared in the Hellespont after the battle of Mycale, fled from Cardia to Sestus; he afterward fell into the hands of the Thracians, and was by them sacrificed to their god Pleistorus.]

[Œolycus (Οἰόλυκος), a son of Theras of Sparta, and brother of Ægeus, was honored at Sparta with a heroum.]

Œōnus (Οἰωνός), son of Licymnius of Midea in Argolis, first victor at Olympia in the foot-race. He is said to have been killed at Sparta by the sons of Hippocoon, but was avenged by Hercules, whose kinsman he was, and was honored with a monument near the temple of Hercules.

Oĕrŏē (Ὠερόη), an island in Bœotia, formed by the River Asopus, and opposite Platææ.

[Œsalces, brother of Gala, king of the Numidian tribe of the Massylians, whom he succeeded on the throne, according to the Numidian law of inheritance.]

Œscus (now Isker or Esker), called Oscĭus (Ὄσκιος) by Thucydides, and Scius (Σκίος) by Herodotus, a river in Mœsia, which rises in Mount Scomius according to Thucydides, or in Mount Rhodope according to Pliny, but in reality on the western slope of Mount Hæmus, and flows into the Danube near a town of the same name (now Oreszovitz).

[Œstrymnides Insulæ, a group of islands rich in tin and copper, in the Sinus Œstrymnicus; probably the same with the Cassiterides (q. v.) on the coast of Britannia.]

Œsȳma (Οἰσύμη: Οἰσυμαῖος), called Æsȳma (Αἰσύμη) by Homer (Il., viii., 304), an ancient town in Thrace, between the Strymon and the Nestus, a colony of the Thasians.

Œta (Οἴτη, τὰ Οἰταίων ὄρεα: now Katavothra), a rugged pile of mountains in the south of Thessaly, an eastern branch of Mount Pindus, extended south of Mount Othrys along the southern bank of the Sperchius to the Maliac Gulf at Thermopylæ, thus forming the northern barrier of Greece. Strabo and Livy give the name of Callidromus to the eastern part of Œta, an appellation which does not occur in Herodotus and the earlier writers. Respecting the pass of Mount Œta, vid. Thermopylæ. Œta was celebrated in mythology as the mountain on which Hercules burned himself to death. From this mountain the south of Thessaly bordering on Phocis was called Œtæa (Οἰταία), and its inhabitants Œtæi (Οἰταῖοι).

Œtylus (Οἴτυλος: Οἰτύλιος: now Vitylo), also called Tylus (Τύλος), an ancient town in Laconia, on the Messenian Gulf, south of Thalamæ, called after an Argive hero of this name.

Ofella, a man of sound sense and of a straightforward character, whom Horace contrasts with the Stoic quacks of his time.

Ofella, Q. Lucrĕtius, orignally belonged to the Marian party, but deserted to Sulla, who appointed him to the command of the army employed in the blockade of Præneste, B.C. 82 Ofella became a candidate for the consulship in the following year, although he had not yet been either quæstor or prætor, thus acting in defiance of one of Sulla's laws. He was, in consequence, put to death by Sulla's orders.

Ofilĭus, a distinguished Roman jurist, was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, and a friend of Cicero and Cæsar. His works are often cited in the Digest.

Oglasa (now Monte Christo), a small island off the coast of Etruria.

Ogulnĭi, Q. and Cn., two brothers, tribunes of the plebs B.C. 300, carried a law by which the number of the pontiffs was increased from four to eight, and that of the augurs from four to nine, and which enacted that four of the pontiffs and five of the augurs should be taken from the plebs. Besides these eight pontiffs there was the pontifex maximus, who is generally not included when the number of pontiffs is spoken of.

Ogȳgĭa (Ὠγυγία). 1. The mythical island of Calypso is placed by Homer in the navel or central point of the sea, far away from all lands. Later writers pretended to find it in the Ionian Sea, near the promontory Lacinium, in Bruttium.—[2. Vid. Ogygus.]

Ogȳgus or Ogȳges (Ὤγυγος), sometimes called a Bœotian autochthon, and sometimes son of Bœotus, and king of the Hectenes, is said to have been the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of Lake Copais rose above its banks, and inundated the whole valley of Bœotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. The name of Ogygus is also connected with Attic story, for in Attica an Ogygian flood is likewise mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleusis, and as the father of Daira, the daughter of Oceanus. In the Bœotian tradition he was the father of Alalcomenia, Thelxinœa, and Aulis. Bacchus is called Ogygius deus because he is said to have been born at Thebes.

Ogȳris (Ὤγυρις), an island of the Erythræan Sea (now Indian Ocean), off the coast of Carmania, at a distance of two thousand stadia (two hundred geographical miles), noted as the alleged burial-place of the ancient king Erythras; but vid. Oaracta.

Oicles or Oicleus (Οἰκλῆς, Οἰκλεύς), son of Antiphates, grandson of Melampus, and father of Amphiaraus, of Argos. He is also called a son of Amphiaraus, or a son of Mantius, the brother of Antiphates. Oicles accompanied Hercules on his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, and was there slain in battle. According to other traditions, he returned home from the expedition, and dwelt in Arcadia, where he was visited by his grandson Alcmæon and where his tomb was shown.

OILEUS ('Οϊλεύς), son of Hodœdocus and Laonome, grandson of Cynus, and great-grandson of Opus, was a king of the Locrians, and married to Eriopis, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence called Oilīdes, Oiliădes, and Ajax Oïlei. Oïleus was also the father of Medon by Rhene. He is mentioned among the Argonauts.

[OLARION or OLARIONENSIS INSULA (now Oléron), an island in the Sinus Aquitanicus, on the west coast of Gallia.]

OLBA or OLBE ('Ολβη), an ancient inland city of Cilicia, in the mountains above Soloë, and between the Rivers Lamus and Cydnus. Its foundation was ascribed by mythical tradition to Ajax the son of Teucer, whose alleged descendants, the priests of the very ancient temple of Jupiter (Zeus), once ruled over all Cilicia Aspera. In later times it belonged to Isauria, and was the see of a bishop.

OLBĂSA ('Ολβασα). 1. A city of Cilicia Aspera, at the foot of the Taurus, north of Selinus, and northwest of Caÿstrus; not to be confounded with OLBA.—2. A city in the southeast of Lycaonia, southwest of Cybistra, in the district called Antiochiana.—3. A city in the north of Pisidia, between Pednelissus and Selge.

OLBE. Vid. OLBA.

OLBĬA ('Ολβία). 1. (Now probably Eoubes, near Hières), a colony of Massilia, on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, on a hill called Olbianus, east of Telo Martius (now Toulon).—2. (Now probably Terra Nova), a very ancient city, near the northern end of the eastern side of the island of Sardinia, with the only good harbor on this coast, and therefore the usual landing-place for persons coming from Rome. A mythical tradition ascribed its foundation to the Thespiadæ. — 3. In Bithynia. Vid. ASTACUS. The Gulf of Astacus was also called from it Sinus Olbianus.—4. A fortress on the western frontier of Pamphylia, on the coast, west of the River Catarrhactes; not improbably on the same site as the later ATTALIA.—5. Vid. BORYSTHENES.

[OLBIUS ('Ολβιος), a river in the north of Arcadia, near Pheneus, by the Arcadians also called AROANIUS.]

OLCĂDES, an ancient people in Hispania Tarraconensis, north of Carthago Nova, near the sources of the Anas, in a part of the country afterward inhabited by the Oretani. They are mentioned only in the wars of the Carthaginians with the inhabitants of Spain. Hannibal transplanted some of the Olcades to Africa. Their chief towns were Althæa and Carteia, the site of both of which is uncertain; the latter place must not be confounded with the celebrated CARTEIA in Bætica.

OLCINĬUM (Olciniātæ: now Dulcigno), an ancient town on the coast of Illyria, southwest of Scodra, belonging to the territory of Gentius.

OLEĂRUS. Vid. OLIARUS.

OLEASTRUM. 1. A town of the Cosetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Dertosa to Tarraco, probably the place from which the plumbum Oleastrense derived its name.—2. A town in Hispania Bætica, near Gades.

OLEN ('Ωλήν), a mythical personage, who is represented as the earliest Greek lyric poet, and the first author of sacred hymns in hexameter verse. He is closely connected w the worship of Apollo, of whom, in one lege he was made the prophet. His connection w Apollo is also marked by his being called H perborean, and one of the establishers of acles, though the more common story made h a native of Lycia. He is said to have settl at Delos. His name seems to signify sing the flute-player. Of the ancient hymns wh went under his name, Pausanias mentions th to Juno (Hera), to Achæïa, and to Ilithyia. t last was in celebration of the birth of Apo and Diana (Artemis).

[OLENIA RUPES ('Ωλενία πέτρα), the Olen rock mentioned in the Iliad (ii., 617); accord to Strabo, the summit of Mount Scollis in Ach ia, on the borders of Elis.]

[OLENNIUS, one of the chief centurions pl ed in command over the Frisii; by his harshne he caused an insurrection of the people, fr whose fury flight alone preserved him, B.C. 2]

OLĔNUS ('Ωλενος : 'Ωλένιος). 1. An ancie town in Ætolia, near New Pleuron, and at th foot of Mount Aracynthus, is mentioned b Homer, but was destroyed by the Ætolians a an early period.—2. A town in Achaia, betwee Patræ and Dyme, refused to join the Achæa league on its restoration in B.C. 280. In th time of Strabo the town was deserted. The goat Amalthæa, which suckled the infant Jupiter (Zeus), is called Olenia capella by the poets, either because the goat was supposed to have been born near the town of Olenus, and to have been subsequently transferred to Crete, or because the nymph Amalthæa, to whom the goat belonged, was a daughter of Olenus.

OLGASSYS ('Ολγασσυς : now Al-Gez Dagh), a lofty, steep, and rugged mountain chain of Asia Minor, extending nearly west and east through the east of Bithynia, and the centre of Paphlagonia to the River Halys, nearly parallel to the chain of Olympus, of which it may be considered as a branch. Numerous temples were built upon it by the Paphlagonians.

OLIĂRUS ('Ωλίαρος, 'Ωλέαρος : 'Ωλιάριος : now Antiparos), a small island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, west of Paros, originally colonized by the Phœnicians, is celebrated in modern times for its stalactite grotto, which is not mentioned by ancient writers.

OLIGYRTUS ('Ολίγυρτος), a fortress in the northeast of Arcadia, on a mountain of the same name, between Stymphalus and Caphyæ.

[OLINA (now probably Orne), a small river in the west of Gallia Lugdunensis, between the mouth of the Sequana and the promontory Go bæum, flowing through the territory of the Vi ducasses.]

OLISĬPO (now Lisbon), a town in Lusitania on the right bank of the Tagus, near its mouth, and a Roman municipium with the surname Felicitas Julia. It was celebrated for its swift horses. Its name is sometimes written ULISSIPPO, because it was supposed by some to have been the town which Ulysses was said to have founded in Spain; but the town to which this legend referred was situated in the mountains of Turdetania.

OLĪZŌN ('Ολιζών), a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia and on the Pagasæan Gulf mentioned by Homer.

Ollĭus (now Oglio), a river in Gallia Transpadana, falls into the Po southwest of Mantua.

[Ollius, T., the father of Poppæa Sabina, was put to death toward the end of the reign of Tiberius.]

Olmiæ (Ὀλμιαί), a promontory in the territory of Corinth, which separated the Corinthian and Alcyonian Gulfs.

[Olmīus (Ὀλμειός), a small river flowing from Helicon, which unites with the Permessus near Haliartus, and soon after falls into Lake Copaïs.]

Oloossōn (Ὀλοοσσών: Ὀλοοσσόνιος: now Elassona), a town of the Perrhæbi in Thessaly, in the district of Hestiæotis. Homer (Il., ii., 739) calls it "white," an epithet which it obtained, according to Strabo, from the whiteness of its soil.

Olophyxus (Ὀλόφυξος: Ὀλοφύξιος), a town of Macedonia, on the peninsula of Mount Athos.

[Olōrus or Orolus (Ὄλορος or Ὄρολος). 1. A king of Thrace, whose daughter, Hegesipyla, was married to Miltiades.—2. Apparently grandson of the above, and son of Hegesipyla, was probably the offspring of a second marriage contracted by her after the death of Miltiades. This Olorus was the father of Thucydides.]

Olpæ or Olpe (Ὄλπαι, Ὀλπή: Ὀλπαῖος). 1. (Now Arapi), a town of the Amphilochi, in Acarnania, on the Ambracian Gulf, northwest of Argos Amphilochicum.—2. A town of the Locri Ozolæ.

Olūrus (Ὄλουρος: Ὀλούριος). 1. A town in Achaia, near Pellene, on the Sicyonian frontier. —2. Also Olūris (Ὄλουρις), called Dorium Δώριον) by Homer, a town in Messenia, south of the River Neda.

Olūs (Ὀλοῦς: Ὀλούντιος), a town and harbor on the eastern coast of Crete, near the promontory of Zephyrium.

Olybrĭus, Anicĭus, Roman emperor A.D. 472, was raised to this dignity by Ricimer, who deposed Anthemius. He died in the course of the same year, after a reign of three months and thirteen days. His successor was Glycerius.

Olympēne, and Olympēni or Olympiēni (Ὀλυμπηνή, Ὀλυμπηνοί, Ὀλυμπιηνοί), the names of the district about the Mysian Olympus, and of its inhabitants.

Olympĭa (Ὀλυμπία), the name of a small plain in Elis, in which the Olympic games were celebrated. It was surrounded on the north and northeast by the mountains Cronion and Olympus, on the south by the River Alphēus, and on the west by the River Cladĕus. In this plain was the sacred grove of Jupiter (Zeus), called Altis (Ἄλτις, an old Elean form of ἄλσος, a grove), situated at the angle formed by the confluence of the rivers Alpheus and Cladeus, and three hundred stadia distant from the town of Pisa. The Altis and its immediate neighborhood were adorned with numerous temples, statues, and public buildings, to which the general appellation of Olympia was given; but there was no town of this name. The Altis was surrounded by a wall. It contained the following temples: 1. The Olympiēum, or temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Olympius, which was the most celebrated of all the buildings at Olympia, and which contained the master-piece of Greek art, the colossal statue of Jupiter (Zeus) by Phidias. The statue was made of ivory and gold, and the god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar-wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, and precious stones. Vid. Phidias. 2. The Heræum, or temple of Hera (Juno), which contained the celebrated chest of Cypselus, and was situated north of the Olympiēum. 3. The Metrōum, or temple of the Mother of the gods. The other public buildings in the Altis most worthy of notice were the Thesauri, or treasuries of the different states which had sent dedicatory offerings to the Olympian Jupiter (Zeus), situated at the foot of Mount Cronion; the Zanes, or statues of Jupiter (Zeus), which had been erected from fines imposed upon those who had been guilty of fraud or other irregularities in the Olympic contests, and which were placed on a stone platform near the Thesauri; the Prytaneum, in which the Olympic victors dined after the contests had been brought to a close; the Bouleuterion, in which all the regulations relating to the games were made, and which contained a statue of Jupiter (Zeus) Horcius, before which the usual oaths were taken by the judges and the combatants; the Philippeum, a circular building of brick, surmounted with a dome, which was erected by Philip after the battle of Chæronea, and which was situated near one of the gates of the Altis, close to the Prytaneum; the Hippodamīum, a sacred inclosure, erected in honor of Hippodamīa; the Pelopium, a sacred inclosure, erected in honor of Pelops. The two chief buildings outside the Altis were the Stadium, to the east of Mount Cronion, in which the gymnastic games were celebrated, and the Hippodromus, a little southeast of the Stadium, in which the chariot-races took place. At the place which formed the connection between the Stadium and Hippodromus, the Hellanodicæ, or judges of the Olympic games, had their seats For details, vid. Dict. of Antiq., arts. Hippodromus and Stadium. The Olympic games were celebrated from the earliest times in Greece, and their establishment was assigned to various mythical personages. There was an interval of four years between each celebration of the festival, which interval was called an Olympiad; but the Olympiads were not employed as a chronological era till the victory of Corœbus in the foot-race, B.C. 776. An account of the Olympic games and of the Olympiads is given in the Dict. of Antiq., arts. Olympia and Olympias.

Olympĭas (Ὀλυμπιάς). 1. Wife of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of Neoptolemus I., king of Epirus. She was married to Philip B.C. 359. The numerous amours of Philip, and the passionate and jealous character of Olympias, occasioned frequent disputes between them; and when Philip married Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus (337), Olympias withdrew from Macedonia, and took refuge at the court of her brother Alexander, king of Epirus. It was generally believed that she lent her support to the assassination of Philip, 336; but it is hardly credible that she evinced her approbation of that deed in the open manner asserted by some writers. After the death of Philip she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed great influence through the affection of Alexander. On the death of the latter (323) she withdrew from Macedonia, where her enemy Antipater had the undisputed control of affairs, and took refuge in Epirus. Here she continued to live, as it were, in exile, until the death of Antipater (3.9) presented a new opening to her ambition. She gave her support to the new regent Polysperchon, in opposition to Cassander, who had formed an alliance with Eurydice the wife of Philip Arrhidæus, the nominal king of Macedonia. In 317, Olympias, resolving to obtain the supreme power in Macedonia, invaded that country along with Polysperchon, defeated Eurydice in battle, and put both her and her husband to death. Olympias followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of one hundred of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles. Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnesus, hastened to turn his arms against Macedonia. Olympias, on his approach, threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she was closely blockaded by Cassander throughout the winter. At length, in the spring of 316, she was compelled to surrender to Cassander, who caused her to be put to death. Olympias was not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit which distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that must forever disgrace her name. —[2. Daughter of Pyrrhus I., king of Epirus, and wife of her brother Alexander II. After his death she assumed the regency of the kingdom on behalf of her two sons, Pyrrhus and Ptolemy; and, in order to strengthen herself against the Ætolians, gave her daughter Phthia in marriage to Demetrius II., king of Macedonia. When her sons had attained to manhood, she resigned the sovereignty into the hands of Pyrrhus, but he did not long retain it; for both he and his brother Ptolemy were soon removed by death, and Olympias was so deeply affected by this double loss that she soon after died of grief.]

Olympiŏdōrus ('Ὀλυμπιόδωρος). 1. A native of Thebes in Egypt, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He wrote a work in twenty-two books (entitled 'Ἱστορικοὶ λόγοι), which comprised the history of the Western empire under the reign of Honorius, from A.D. 407 to October, A.D. 425. Olympiodorus took up the history from about the point at which Eunapius had ended. Vid. Eunapius. The original work of Olympiodorus is lost, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius. After the death of Honorius, Olympiodorus removed to Byzantium, to the court of the Emperor Theodosius. Hierocles dedicated to this Olympiodorus his work on Providence and Fate. Vid. Hierocles. Olympiodorus was a heathen. [The fragments of his history are published in the Byzantine Historians, with Dexippus, &c., by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829.]—2. A peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandrea, where Proclus was one of his pupils.—3. The last philosopher of celebrity in the Neo-Platonic school of Alexandrea. He lived in the first half of the sixth century after Christ, in the reign of the Emperor Justinian. His life of Plato, and commentaries on several of Plato's dialogues, are still extant. [Edited by Fr. Creuzer, Frankfort, 1821-2[illegible]—4. An Aristotelic philosopher, the author [of a] commentary on the Meteorologica of Aristo[tle], which is still extant, lived at Alexandrea in [the] latter half of the sixth century after Ch[rist]. Like Simplicius, to whom, however, he is [in]ferior, he endeavors to reconcile Plato and [Ar]istotle.

[Olympiodorus ('Ὀλυμπιόδωρος). 1. An At[he]nian general, commanded a body of three hu[nd]red picked men at the battle of Platææ, w[ho] were engaged in a service from which all [the] other Greeks shrank.—2. An Athenian gene[ral], who, when Athens was attacked by Cassand[er], compelled the latter to withdraw his forc[es]. He also subsequently rid the city of the Ma[ce]donian garrison which Demetrius had station[ed] there, and successfully defended Athens agai[nst] Demetrius himself.]

Olympĭus ('Ὀλύμπιος), the Olympian, occ[urs] as a surname of Jupiter (Zeus), Hercules, [the] Muses (Olympiades), and, in general, of all [the] gods who were believed to live in Olympus, [in] contradistinction from the gods of the low[er] world.

Olympĭus Nemesiānus. Vid. Nemesianus.

Olympus ('Ὄλυμπος), the name of two Gree[k] musicians, of whom one is mythical and th[e] other historical. 1. The elder Olympus belong[s] to the mythical genealogy of Mysian and Phryg[ian] flute-players—Hyagnis, Marsyas, Olympus—to each of whom the invention of the flute was ascribed, under whose names we have the mythical representation of the contest between the Phrygian auletic and the Greek citharœdic music. Olympus was said to have been a native of Mysia, and to have lived before the Trojan war. Olympus not unfrequently appears on works of art as a boy, sometimes instructed by Marsyas, and sometimes as witnessing and lamenting his fate.—2. The true Olympus was a Phrygian, and perhaps belonged to a family of native musicians, since he was said to be descended from the first Olympus. He flourished about B.C. 660–620. Though a Phrygian by origin, Olympus must be reckoned among the Greek musicians, for all the accounts make Greece the scene of his artistic activity; and he may be considered as having naturalized in Greece the music of the flute, which had previously been almost peculiar to Phrygia.

[Olympus ('Ὄλυμπος), the physician in ordinary to Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, aided her in committing suicide, B.C. 30, and afterward published an account of her death.]

Olympus ('Ὄλυμπος). I. In Europe. 1. (Grk. Elymbo, Turk. Semavat-Evi, i. e., Abode of the Celestials). The eastern part of the great chain of mountains which extends west and east from the Acroceraunian promontory on the Adriatic to the Thermaic Gulf, and which formed the northern boundary of ancient Greece proper. In a wide sense, the name is sometimes applied to all that part of this great chain which lies east of the central range of Pindus, and which is usually called the Cambunian Mountains, but the more specific and ordinary use of the name Olympus is to denote the extreme eastern part of the chain, which, striking off from the Cambunian Mountains to the southeast, skirts the southern end of the slip of coast called Pieria, and forms at its termination the northern wall of the Vale of TEMPE. Its shape is that of a blunt cone, with its outline picturesquely broken by minor summits; its height is about nine thousand seven hundred feet, and its chief summit is covered with perpetual snow. From its position as the boundary between Thessaly and Macedonia, it is sometimes reckoned to the former, sometimes to the latter. In the Greek mythology, Olympus was the chief seat of the third dynasty of gods, of which Zeus (Jupiter) was the head. It was a really local conception with the early poets, to be understood literally, and not metaphorically, that these gods

> "On the snowy top
> Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,
> Their highest heaven."

Indeed, if Homer uses either of the terms Ὄλυμπος and οὐρανός metaphorically, it is the latter that is a metaphor for the former. Even the fable of the giants scaling heaven must be understood in this sense; not that they placed Pelion and Ossa upon the top of Olympus to reach the still higher heaven, but that they piled Pelion on the top of Ossa, and both on the lower slopes of Olympus, to scale the summit of Olympus itself, the abode of the gods. Homer describes the gods as having their several palaces on the summit of Olympus; as spending the day in the palace of Zeus (Jupiter), round whom they sit in solemn conclave, while the younger gods dance before them, and the Muses entertain them with the lyre and song. They are shut in from the view of men upon the earth by a wall of clouds, the gates of which are kept by the Hours. The same conceptions are found in Hesiod, and to a great extent in the later poets; with whom, however, even as early as the lyric poets and the tragedians, the idea becomes less material, and the real abode of the gods is gradually transferred from the summit of Olympus to the vault of heaven (i. e., the sky) itself. This latter is also the conception of the Roman poets, so far, at least, as any definite idea can be framed out of their compound of Homer's language with later notions.—2. A hill in Laconia, near Sellasia, overhanging the River Œnus.—3. Another name for Mount Lycæus in Arcadia.—II. In Asia. 1. The MYSIAN OLYMPUS (Ὄλυμπος ὁ Μύσιος: now Keshish Dagh, Ala Dagh, Ishik Dagh, and Kush-Dagh), a chain of lofty mountains in the northwest of Asia Minor, forming, with Ida, the western part of the northernmost line of the mountain system of that peninsula. It extends from west to east through the northeast of Mysia and the southwest of Bithynia, and thence, inclining a little northward, it first passes through the centre of Bithynia, then forms the boundary between Bithynia and Galatia, and then extends through the south of Paphlagonia to the River Halys. Beyond the Halys, the mountains in the north of Pontus form a continuation of the chain.—2. (Now Yanar Dagh), a volcano on the eastern coast of Lycia, above the city of Phœnicus (now Yanar). The names of the mountain and of the city are often interchanged. Vid. PHŒNICUS.

OLYNTHUS (Ὄλυνθος: Ὀλύνθιος: now Aio Mamas), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic Gulf, and at a little distance from the coast, between the peninsulas of Pallene and Sithonia. It was the most important of the Greek cities on the coast of Macedonia, though we have no record of its foundation. It afterward fell into the hands of the Thracian Bottiæi, when they were expelled from their own country by the Macedonians. Vid. BOTTIÆI. It was taken by Artabazus, one of the generals of Xerxes, who peopled it with Chalcidians from Torone; but it owed its greatness to Perdiccas, who persuaded the inhabitants of many of the smaller towns in Chalcidice to abandon their own abodes and settle in Olynthus. This happened about the commencement of the Peloponnesian war; and from this time Olynthus appears as a prosperous and flourishing town, with a population of five thousand inhabitants capable of bearing arms. It became the head of a confederacy of all the Greek towns in this part of Macedonia, and it long maintained its independence against the attacks of the Athenians, Spartans, and Macedonians; but in B.C. 379 it was compelled to submit to Sparta, after carrying on war with this state for four years. When the supremacy of Sparta was destroyed by the Thebans, Olynthus recovered its independence, and even received an accession of power from Philip, who was anxious to make Olynthus a counterpoise to the influence of Athens in the north of the Ægean. With this view Philip gave Olynthus the territory of Potidæa, after he had wrested this town from the Athenians in 356. But when he had sufficiently consolidated his power to be able to set at defiance both Olynthus and Athens, he threw off the mask, and laid siege to the former city. The Olynthians earnestly besought Athens for assistance, and were warmly supported by Demosthenes in his Olynthiac orations; but as the Athenians did not render the city any effectual assistance, it was taken and destroyed by Philip, and all its inhabitants sold as slaves (347). Olynthus was never restored, and the remnants of its inhabitants were at a later time transferred by Cassander to Cassandrea. At the time of its prosperity Olynthus used the neighboring town of MECYBERNA as its sea-port.

[OLYNTHUS (Ὄλυνθος), a son of Hercules and Bolbe, from whom the town of Olynthus was believed to have received its name.]

OMĂNA or OMĂNUM (Ὄμανα, Ὄμανον). 1. A celebrated port on the northeastern coast of Arabia Felix, a little above the easternmost point of the peninsula, Promontorium Syagros (now Ras el Had), on a large gulf of the same name. The people of this part of Arabia were called OMANĪTÆ (Ὀμανῖται) or OMANI, and the name is still preserved in that of the district, Oman.—2. (Now probably Schaina), a sea-port town in the east of Carmania; the chief emporium on that coast for the trade between India, Persia, and Arabia.

OMANĪTÆ and OMĂNUM. Vid. OMANA.

OMBI (Ὄμβοι: Ὀμβῖται: ruins at Koum Ombou, i. e., Hill of Ombou), the last great city of Upper Egypt, except Syene, from which it was distant about thirty miles, stood on the eastern bank of the Nile, in the Ombites Nomos, and was celebrated as one of the chief seats of the worship of the crocodile. Juvenal's fifteenth satire is founded on a religious war between the people of Ombi and those of Tentyra, who hated the crocodile; but as Tentyra lies so much further down the Nile, with several intervening cities celebrated, as well as Ombi, for crocodile worship, critics have suspected an error in the names, and some have proposed to read Coptos or Copton for Ombos in v. 35. It seems, however, better to suppose that Juvenal used the name without reference to topographical precision. Opposite to Ombi, on the left bank, was the town of Contra-Ombos.

Omphăle (Ὀμφάλη), daughter of the Lydian king Iardanus, and wife of Tmolus, after whose death she undertook the government herself. When Hercules, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was afflicted with a serious disease, and was informed by the oracle that he could only be cured by serving some one for wages for the space of three years, Mercury (Hermes) sold Hercules to Omphale. The hero became enamored of his mistress, and, to please her, he is said to have spun wool and put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. She bore Hercules several children.

[Omphalion (Ὀμφαλίων), a painter, was originally the slave, and afterward the disciple of Nicias, the son of Nicomedes. He painted the walls of the temple of Messene with figures of personages celebrated in the mythological legends of Messenia.]

Omphalĭum (Ὀμφάλιον: Ὀμφαλίτης), a town in Crete, in the neighborhood of Cnosus.

On. Vid. Heliopolis.

[Onărus (Ὄναρος), a priest of Bacchus (Dionysus) in Naxos, whom, according to one account, Ariadne married after she had been abandoned by Theseus.]

Onătas (Ὀνάτας). 1. Of Ægina, the son of Micon, was a distinguished statuary and painter, contemporary with Polygnotus, Ageladas, and Hegias. He flourished down to about B.C. 460, that is, in the age immediately preceding that of Phidias.—[2. A Pythagorean philosopher of Croton, who wrote a work, Περὶ θεοῦ καὶ θείου, some extracts from which are preserved by Stobæus.]

Oncæ (Ὄγκαι), a village in Bœotia, near Thebes, from which one of the gates of Thebes derived its name (Ὀγκαῖαι), and which contained a sanctuary of Minerva (Athena), who was hence called Minerva (Athena) Onca.

[Oncēum (Ὄγκειον), a place in Arcadia, on the banks of the Ladon, with a temple of Ceres (Demeter) Erinnys, said to have derived its name from Oncus, son of Apollo, its founder.]

Onchesmus or Onchismus (Ὀγχησμός, Ὀγχισμός: now Orchido), a sea-port town of Epirus in Chaonia, opposite the western extremity of Corcyra. The ancients derived its name from Anchises, whence it is named by Dionysius the "Harbor of Anchises" (Ἀγχίσου λιμήν). From this place Cicero calls the wind blowing from Epirus toward Italy Onchesmites.

Onchestus (Ὀγχηστός: Ὀγχήστιος). 1. An ancient town of Bœotia, said to have been founded by Onchestus, son of Neptune (Poseidon), was situated a little south of the Lake Copais, near Haliartus. It contained a celebrated temple and grove of Neptune (Poseidon), and the place of meeting of the Bœotian Amphictyony. The ruins of this town are still seen on the southwestern slope of the mountain Faga.—2. A river in Thessaly, which rises in the neighborhood of Eretria, and flows past Cynoscephalæ, and falls into the Lake Bœbeïs. It is, perhaps, the same as the River Onochonus (Ὀνόχωνος) mentioned by Herodotus.

Onesicrĭtus (Ὀνησίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Astypalæa, and by others of Ægina. When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus chief pilot of the fleet, a post which he held not only during the descent of the Indus, but throughout the voyage from the mouth of that river to the Persian Gulf, which was conducted under the command of Nearchus. Though an eye-witness of much that he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative, so that he early fell into discredit as an authority.

[Onetor (Ὀνήτωρ). 1. Priest of the Idæan Jove in Troy.—2. Father of Phrontis, the helmsman of Menelaus.]

Oningis or Oringis. Vid. Oringis.

Onīros (Ὄνειρος), the Dream-God, was a personification of dreams. According to Homer, Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the western Oceanus, and the deceitful dreams come through an ivory gate, while the true ones issue from a gate made of horn. Hesiod calls dreams the children of night; and Ovid, who calls them children of Sleep, mentions three of them by name, viz., Morpheus, Icelus or Phobetor, and Phantasus. Euripides called them sons of Gæa (Terra), and conceived them as genii with black wings.

Onŏba, surnamed Æstuāria (now Huelva). 1. A sea-port town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica, between the mouths of the Bætis and Anas, on an æstuary formed by the River Luxia. There are remains of a Roman aqueduct at Huelva.—[2. Another city of Bætica in the interior, near Corduba.]

[Onomacles (Ὀνομακλῆς), an Athenian general, sent with Phrynichus and Scironides, B.C. 412, to besiege Miletus, but was driven off by the arrival of a Peloponnesian fleet: he was afterward sent to act against Chios. It was probably this same Onomacles who was one of the thirty tyrants, B.C. 404.]

Onomacrĭtus (Ὀνομάκριτος), an Athenian, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry. He lived about B.C. 520–485. He enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus until he was detected by Lasus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an oracle of Musæus, for which Hipparchus banished him. He seems to have gone into Persia, where the Pisistratidæ, after their expulsion from Athens, took him again into favor, and employed him to persuade Xerxes to engage in his expedition against Greece, by reciting to him all the ancient or

-ies which seemed to favor the attempt. It appears that Onomacritus had made a collection and arrangement of the oracles ascribed to Musæus. It is further stated that he made interpolations in Homer as well as in Musæus, and that he was the real author of some of the poems which went under the name of Orpheus.

Onomarchus (Ὀνόμαρχος), general of the Phocians in the Sacred war, succeeded his brother Philomelus in this command, B.C. 353. In the following year he was defeated in Thessaly by Philip, and perished in attempting to reach by swimming the Athenian ships, which were lying off the shore. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified as a punishment for his sacrilege.

[Onomastus (Ὀνόμαστος), a confidential officer of Philip V. of Macedon, for whom he held the government of the sea-coast of Thrace, and whose instrument he was in many acts of oppression and cruelty.]

Onosander (Ὀνόσανδρος), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics (entitled Στρατηγικὸς λόγος), which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book, and it is still held in considerable estimation. He appears to have lived about A.D. 50. In his style he imitated Xenophon with some success. Edited by Schwebel, Nürnberg, 1761; and by Corae, Paris, 1822.

Onu-gnathus (Ὄνου γνάθος: now Elaphonisi), an island and a promontory on the southern coast of Laconia, west of Cape Malea.

Onuphis (Ὄνουφις), the capital of the Nomos Onuphites in the Delta of Egypt. It site is uncertain, but it was probably near the middle of the Delta.

[Onytes, a companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

[Opheltes (Ὀφελέστης). 1. A Trojan warrior, slain by Teucer.—2. A Pæonian warrior in the Trojan ranks, slain by Achilles.]

Ophelion (Ὠφελίων), an Athenian comic poet, probably of the Middle Comedy, B.C. 380. [The few fragments of his plays remaining are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 687–8. edit. minor.]

Ophellas (Ὀφέλλας), of Pella in Macedonia, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he followed the fortunes of Ptolemy. In B.C. 322 he conquered Cyrene for Ptolemy, of which city he held the government on behalf of the Egyptian king for some years. But soon after 313 he threw off his allegiance to Ptolemy, and continued to govern Cyrene as an independent state for nearly five years. In 308 he formed an alliance with Agathocles, and marched against Carthage; but he was treacherously attacked by Agathocles near this city, and was slain.

Opheltes (Ὀφέλτης). 1. Also called Archemorus. Vid. Archemorus.—2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who attempted to carry off Bacchus (Dionysus), and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins.

[Opheltius (Ὀφέλτιος). 1. A Trojan warrior, slain by Euryalus.—2. A Grecian warrior before Troy, slain by Hector.]

[Ophiodes (Ὀφιώδης), an island of the Arabicus Sinus, lying off Berenice, on the coast of Egypt, very rich in topaz, and therefore called by Pliny Topazos: now Zamargat?]

Ophion (Ὀφίων). 1. One of the oldest of the Titans, was married to Eurynome, with whom he ruled over Olympus, but, being conquered by Saturn (Cronos) and Rhea, he and Eurynome were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus.—2. A giant, who perished in the battle with Jupiter (Zeus).—3. Father of the centaur Amycus, who is hence called Ophiŏnides.

Ophionenses or Ophienses (Ὀφιονεῖς, Ὀφιεῖς), a people in the northeast of Ætolia.

Ophir (in the Old Testament, LXX., Σουφίρ, Σωφίρ, Σωφάρα), a place frequently referred to in the Old Testament as proverbial for its gold, and to which Solomon, in conjunction with Hiram, king of Tyre, sent a fleet, which brought back gold, and sandal-wood, and precious stones. These ships were sent from Ezion-geber, at the head of the Red Sea, whence also King Jehoshaphat built ships to go to Ophir for gold; but this voyage was stopped by a shipwreck. It is clear, therefore, that Ophir was on the shores of the Erythræum Mare of the ancients, or our Indian Ocean. Among the most plausible conjectures as to its site are, (1.) That it was on the coast of India, or a name for India itself. (2.) That it was on the coast of Arabia, in which case it is not necessary to suppose that Arabia furnished all the articles of commerce which were brought from Ophir, for Ophir may have been a great emporium of the Indian and Arabian trade. (3.) That it is not the name of any specific place, but a general designation for the countries (or any of them) on the shores of the Indian Ocean, which supplied the chief articles of Indian and Arabian commerce.

Ophis (Ὄφις). 1. A river in Arcadia, which flowed by Mantinēa.—[2. (Now Of?), a river of Pontus, which formed the boundary between the territory of the Tzani and Colchis.]

Ophiūsa or Ophiussa (Ὀφιόεσσα, Ὀφιοῦσσα, Ὀφιοῦσα, i. e., abounding in snakes). 1. Vid Pityusæ.—2. Or Ophiussa (now perhaps Palanca), a town of European Scythia, on the left bank of the Tyras (now Dniester).—3. A little island near Crete.—4. (Now Afsia or Rabbi), a small island in the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara), off the coast of Mysia, northwest of Cyzicus, and southwest of Proconnesus.—5. Vid Rhodus.—6. Vid. Tenos.

[Ophlimus (Ὄφλιμος: now Kemer Dagh or Oktar Dagh,) a branch of Mount Paryadres, in Pontus Proper, which, in connection with Lithrus, northwest of Amasea, bounds the large and fertile district of Phanaroea.]

Ophrynium (Ὀφρύνειον: now probably Fren-Kevi), a small town of the Troad, near the Lake of Pteleos, between Dardanus and Rhœteum, with a grove consecrated to Hector.

Opĭci. Vid. Osci.

Opilius Macrīnus. Vid. Macrinus.

Opilĭus, Aurelĭus, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and finally grammar. He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus (B.C. 92), whom he accompanied to Smyrna, and there the two friends grew old together in the enjoyment of each other's society. He composed several learned works, one of which, named Musa, is referred to by A. Gellius.

Opimius. 1. Q., consul B.C. 154, when he subdued some of the Ligurian tribes north of the Alps, who had attacked Massilia. He was notorious in his youth for his riotous living.—2. L., son of the preceding, was prætor 125, in which year he took Fregellæ, which had revolted against the Romans. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and was a violent opponent of C. Gracchus. He was consul in 121, and took the leading part in the proceedings which ended in the murder of Gracchus. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than three hundred persons. For details, vid. p. 334, a. In the following year (120) he was accused of having put Roman citizens to death without trial; but he was defended by the consul C. Papirius Carbo, and was acquitted. In 112 he was at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and was bribed by Jugurtha to assign to him the better part of the country. Three years after he was condemned under the law of the tribune C. Mamilius Limetanus, by which an inquiry was made into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. Opimius went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct toward C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratical party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius. The year in which Opimius was consul (121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum, and was preserved for an almost incredible space of time.

Opis (Ὦπις), an important commercial city of Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, at the confluence of the Physcus (now Odorneh) with the Tigris; not mentioned later than the Christian era.

Opitergium (Opiterginus: now Oderzo), a Roman colony in Venetia, in the north of Italy, on the River Liquentia, near its source, and on the high road from Aquileia to Verona. In the Marcomannic war it was destroyed by the Quadi, but it was rebuilt, and afterward belonged to the Exarchate. From it the neighboring mountains were called Montes Opitergini.

[Opites (Ὀπίτης,) a Greek warrior, slain by Hector in the Trojan war.]

[Oppianicus, name of three persons, two of whom play a prominent part in the oration of Cicero for Cluentius. 1. Statius Albius Opp., accused by his step-son, A. Cluentius, of having attempted to procure his death by poisoning, B.C. 74; was condemned.—2. Son of the preceding, accused Cluentius in B.C. 66 of three distinct acts of poisoning.—3. C. Oppianicus, brother of No. 1, said to have been poisoned by him.]

Oppianus (Ὀππιανός), the author of two Greek hexameter poems still extant, one on fishing, entitled Halieutica (Ἁλιευτικά), and the other on hunting, entitled Cynegetica (Κυνηγετικά). Modern critics, however, have shown that these two poems were written by two different persons of this name. 1. The author of the Halieutica, was born either at Corycus or Anazarba, in Cilicia, and flourished about A.D. 180. The poem consists of about three thousand five hundred hexameter lines, divided into five books, of which the first two treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other three of the art of fishing.—2. The author of the Cynegetica, was a native of Apamea or Pella, in Syria, and flourished a little later than the other Oppianus, about A.D. 206. His poem, which is addressed to the Emperor Caracalla, consists of about two thousand one hundred hexameter lines, divided into four books. The best edition of the two poems is by Schneider, Argent., 1776, and second edition, Lips., 1813. There is also a prose paraphrase of a poem on hawking (Ἰξευτικά) attributed to Oppianus, but it is doubtful to which of the two authors of this name it belongs. Some critics think that the work was probably written by Dionysius.

Oppius. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 215, carried a law to curtail the expenses and luxuries of the Roman women. It enacted that no woman should have more than half an ounce of gold, nor wear a dress of different colors, nor ride in a carriage in the city, or in any town, or within a mile of it, unless on account of public sacrifices. This law was repealed in 195, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the elder Cato.—2. Q., a Roman general in the Mithradatic war, B.C. 88, fell into the hands of Mithradates, but was subsequently surrendered by the latter to Sulla.—3. C., an intimate friend of C. Julius Cæsar, whose private affairs he managed in conjunction with Cornelius Balbus. Oppius was the author of several works, referred to by the ancient writers, but all of which have perished. The authorship of the histories of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars was a disputed point as early as the time of Suetonius, some assigning them to Oppius, and others to Hirtius. But the similarity in style and diction between the work on the Alexandrine war and the last book of the Commentaries on the Gallic war leads to the conclusion that the former, at all events, was the work of Hirtius. The book on the African war was probably written by Oppius. He also wrote the lives of several distinguished Romans, such as Scipio Africanus the elder, Marius, Pompey, and probably Cæsar.

Ops, a female Roman divinity of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opimus, opulentus, inops, and copia. She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and the protectress of every thing connected with agriculture. Her abode was in the earth, and hence those who invoked her used to touch the ground. Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus; for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; but she had likewise a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the vicus Jugarius, not far from the temple of Saturnus. She had an altar in common with Ceres. The festivals of Ops are called Opalia and Opiconsivia, from her surname Consiva, connected with the verb serere, to sow.

[OPS (Ωψ), son of Pisenor, and father of Euryclea, the nurse of Telemachus.]

OPTĀTUS. [1. A freedman of Tiberius Claudius, and præfectus classis, brought the scar (scarus) fish from the Carpathian Sea to the waters on the coast of Italy.]—2. Bishop of Milevi in Numidia, flourished under the emperors Valentinian and Valens. He wrote a work, still extant, against the errors of the Donatists, entitled De Schismate Donatistarum adversus Parmenianum. Edited by Dupin, Paris, fol., 1700.

OPUS (Ὀποῦς, contraction of Ὀπόεις: Ὀπούντιος). 1. (Now Talanda or Talanti?), the capital of the Opuntian Locrians, was situated, according to Strabo, fifteen stadia (not quite two miles) from the sea, and sixty stadia from its harbor Cynos; but, according to Livy, it was only one mile from the coast. It was the birthplace of Patroclus. The bay of the Eubœan Sea, near this town, was called OPUNTIUS SINUS. Vid. LOCRI.—2. A small town in Elis.

[OPUS (Ὀποῦς). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Protogenia, was king of the Epeans and father of Cambyse.—2. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Cambyse, step-son of Locrus, and grandson of No. 1; said to have given name to the Opuntii Locri.]

ORA. 1. (Ὄρα), a city of Carmania, near the borders of Gedrosia.—2. (Ὦρα), a city in the northwest of India, near the sources of the Indus.

ORÆ. Vid. ORITÆ.

ORBĒLUS (Ὄρβηλος), a mountain in the northeast of Macedonia, on the borders of Thrace, extends from Mount Rhodope along the Strymon to Mount Pangæus.

ORBILĬUS PUPILLUS, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, best known to us from his having been the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagosus from the severe floggings which his pupils received from him. (Hor., Ep., ii., 1, 71.) He was a native of Beneventum, and after serving as an apparitor of the magistrates, and also as a soldier in the army, he settled at Rome in the fiftieth year of his age, in the consulship of Cicero, B.C. 63. He lived nearly one hundred years, but had lost his memory long before his death.

[ORBITANIUM, a city of Samnium, northwest of Beneventum.]

ORBŌNA, a female Roman divinity, was invoked by parents who had been deprived of their children and desired to have others, and also in dangerous maladies of children.

ORCĂDES INSŬLÆ (now Orkney and Shetland Isles), a group of several small islands off the northern coast of Britain, with which the Romans first became acquainted when Agricola sailed round the north of Britain.

ORCHŎMĔNUS (Ὀρχόμενος: Ὀρχομένιος). 1. (Now Scripu), an ancient, wealthy, and powerful city of Bœotia, the capital of the Minyean empire in the ante-historical ages of Greece, and hence called by Homer the Minyean Orchomenus (Ὀρχ. Μινύειος). It was situated northwest of the Lake Copais, on the River Cephisus, and was built on the slope of a hill, on the summit of which stood the acropolis. It is said to have been originally called Andreis (Ἀνδρηΐς), from Andreus, the son of Peneus, who emigrated from the Peneus in Thessaly; to have been afterward called Phlegya (Φλεγύα), from Phlegyas, a son of Mars (Ares) and Chryse, and to have finally obtained its later name from Orchomenus, son of Jupiter (Zeus) or Eteocles and the Danaid Hesione, and father of Minyas This Orchomenus was regarded as the real founder of the Minyean empire, which, before the time of the Trojan war, extended over the whole of the west of Bœotia. The cities of Coronea, Haliartus, Lebedea, and Chæronea were subject to it; and even Thebes at one time was compelled to pay it tribute. It lost, however, much of its power after its capture by Hercules, but in the time of the Trojan war it still appears as a powerful city. Sixty years after the Trojan war it was taken by the Bœotians, its empire was completely destroyed, and it became a member of the Bœotian league. All this belongs to the mythical period. In the historical age it continued to exist as an independent town till B.C. 367, when it was taken and destroyed by the Thebans, and its inhabitants murdered or sold as slaves. In order to weaken Thebes, it was rebuilt at the instigation of the Athenians, but was soon destroyed again by the Thebans; and although it was again restored by Philip in 338, it never recovered its former prosperity; and in the time of Strabo was in ruins. The most celebrated building in Orchomenus was the so-called treasury of Minyas, but which, like the similar monument at Mycenæ, was more probably a family vault of the ancient heroes of the place. It was a circular vault of massive masonry embedded in the hill, with an arched roof, and had a side door of entrance. The remains of this building are extant, and its form may still be traced, though the whole of the stone-work of the vault has disappeared. Orchomenus possessed a very ancient temple of the Charites or Graces, and here was celebrated in the most ancient times a musical festival, which was frequented by poets and singers from all parts of the Hellenic world. There was a temple of Hercules seven stadia north of the town, near the sources of the River Melas. Orchomenus is memorable on account of the great victory which Sulla gained in its neighborhood over Archelaus, the general of Mithradates, B.C. 86—2. (Now Kalpaki), an ancient town of Arcadia, mentioned by Homer with the epithet πολύμηλος, to distinguish it from the Minyean Orchomenus, is said to have been founded by Orchomenus son of Lycaon. It was situated on a hill northwest of Mantinea, and its territory included the towns of Methydrium, Theisoa, Teuthis, and the Tripolis. In the Peloponnesian war Orchomenus sided with Sparta, and was taken by the Athenians. After the battle of Leuctra, the Orchomenians did not join the Arcadian confederacy in consequence of its hatred against Mantinea. In the contests between the Achæans and Ætolians, it was taken successively by Cleomenes and Antigonus Doson, but it eventually became a member of the Achæan league—3. A town on the confines of Macedonia and Thessaly, and hence sometimes said to belong to the former, and sometimes to the latter country.

ORCUS. Vid. HADES.

ORDESSUS (Ὀρδησσός), a tributary of the Ister

[Oresbius ('Ορέσβιος), a Bœotian warrior in the Greek army before Troy, slain by Hector.]

Orestæ ('Ορέσται), a people in the north of Epirus, on the borders of Macedonia, inhabiting the district named after them, Orestis or Orestias. They were originally independent, but were afterward subject to the Macedonian monarchs. They were declared free by the Romans in their war with Philip. According to the legend, they derived their name from Orestes, who is said to have fled into this country after murdering his mother, and to have there founded the town of Argos Oresticum.

Orestes ('Ορέστης). 1. Son of Agamemnon and Clytæmnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigenia). According to the Homeric account, Agamemnon, on his return from Troy, was murdered by Ægisthus and Clytæmnestra before he had an opportunity of seeing him. In the eighth year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenæ and slew the murderer of his father. This simple story of Orestes has been enlarged and embellished in various ways by the tragic poets. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended to dispatch Orestes also, but that by means of Electra he was secretly carried to Strophius, king in Phocis, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse, who allowed Ægisthus to kill her own child, supposing it to be Orestes. In the house of Strophius, Orestes grew up with the king's son Pylades, with whom he had formed that close and intimate friendship which has become proverbial. Being frequently reminded by messengers from Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret to Argos. Here he pretended to be a messenger of Strophius, who had come to announce the death of Orestes, and brought the ashes of the deceased. After visiting his father's tomb, and sacrificing upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, and soon afterward slew both Ægisthus and Clytæmnestra in the palace. Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized with madness. He now fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinnyes of his mother. At length, by Apollo's advice, he took refuge with Minerva (Athena) at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areopagus to decide his fate. The Erinnyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Minerva (Athena). According to another modification of the legend, Orestes consulted Apollo how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and to fetch from that country the image of [Diana] (Artemis), which was believed to have [fallen] there from heaven, and to carry it to A[thens]. Orestes and Pylades accordingly went to [Tau]ris, where Thoas was king. On their a[rrival] they were seized by the natives in order [to be] sacrificed to Diana (Artemis), according [to the] custom of the country. But Iphige[nia, the] priestess of Diana (Artemis), was the s[ister of] Orestes, and, after recognizing each oth[er, all] three escaped with the statue of the go[ddess]. After his return to Peloponnesus, Orestes [took] possession of his father's kingdom at My[cenæ], which had been usurped by Aletes or Me[gapenthes]. When Cylarabes of Argos died without [leaving] any heir, Orestes became king of Argos [also]. The Lacedæmonians likewise made him [their] king of their own accord, because they p[refer]red him, the grandson of Tyndareus, to [Nico]stratus and Megapenthes, the sons of Men[elaus] by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocia[ns in]creased his power by allying themselves [with] him. He married Hermione, the daught[er of] Menelaus, and became by her the father of [Tis]amenus. The story of his marriage with [Her]mione, who had previously been marr[ied to] Neoptolemus, is related elsewhere. Vid. [Her]mione, Neoptolemus. He died of the b[ite of] a snake in Arcadia, and his body, in accord[ance] with an oracle, was afterward carried from [Te]gea to Sparta, and there buried; his bones [are] said to have been found, during a truce in [a war] between the Lacedæmonians and Tegea[ns], under a blacksmith's shop in Tegea.—2. [Re]gent of Italy during the short reign of his [son] son Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 475–476. [He] was born in Pannonia, and served for s[ome] years under Attila; after whose death he [rose] to eminence at the Roman court. Having [been] intrusted with the command of an army by [Ju]lius Nepos, he deposed this emperor, and p[lac]ed his son Romulus Augustulus on the thro[ne], but in the following year he was defeated [by] Odoacer and put to death. Vid. Odoacer.—[3.] L. Aurelius Orestes, consul B.C. 126, received Sardinia as his province, where he remained upward of three years. C. Gracchus was quæstor to Orestes in Sardinia.—4. Cn. Aurelius Orestes, originally belonged to the Aure[lia] gens, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Aufidius, the historian, when the latter was an old man. Orestes was consul 71 B.C.

Oresteum, Orestheum, or Oresthasium ('Ορέστειον, 'Ορέσθειον, 'Ορεσθάσιον), a town in the south of Arcadia, in the district Mænalia, not far from Megalopolis.

Orestĭas. 1. The country of the Orestæ. Vid. Orestæ.—2. A name frequently given by the Byzantine writers to Hadrianopolis in Thrace.

[Orestis. Vid. Orestæ.]

Orētāni, a powerful people in the southwest of Hispania Tarraconensis, bounded on the south by Bætica, on the north by the Carpetani, on the west by Lusitania, and on the east by the Bastetani; their territory corresponded to the eastern part of Granada, the whole of La Mancha, and the western part of Murcia. Their chief town was Castulo.

OREUS (Ὠρεός: Ὠρείτης), a town in the north of Eubœa, on the River Callas, at the foot of the mountain Telethrium, and in the district Hestiæotis, was itself originally called Hestiæa or Histiæa. After the Persian wars, Oreus, with the rest of Eubœa, became subject to the Athenians; but on the revolt of the island in B.C. 445, Oreus was taken by Pericles, its inhabitants expelled, and their place supplied by two thousand Athenians. The site of Oreus made it an important place, and its name frequently occurs in the Grecian wars down to the dissolution of the Achæan league.

ORFIUS, M., a Roman eques, of the municipium of Atella, was a tribune of the soldiers in Cæsar's army, whom Cicero strongly recommended in B.C. 59 to his brother Quintus, who was then one of Cæsar's legates.]

ORGETŎRIX, the noblest and richest among the Helvetii, formed a conspiracy to obtain the royal power B.C. 61, and persuaded his countrymen to emigrate from their own country. Two years were devoted to making the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Orgetorix having meantime transpired, and the Helvetii having attempted to bring him to trial, he suddenly died, probably, as was suspected, by his own hands.

ORIBASIUS (Ὀρειβάσιος or Ὀριβάσιος), an eminent Greek medical writer, born about A.D. 325, either at Sardis in Lydia, or at Pergamus in Mysia. He early acquired a great professional reputation. He was an intimate friend of the Emperor Julian, with whom he became acquainted several years before Julian's accession to the throne. He was almost the only person to whom Julian imparted the secret of his apostacy from Christianity. He accompanied Julian in his expedition against Persia, and was with him at the time of his death, 363. The succeeding emperors, Valentinian and Valens, confiscated the property of Oribasius, and banished him. He was afterward recalled from exile, and was alive at least as late as 395. Of the personal character of Oribasius we know little or nothing, but it is clear that he was much attached to paganism and to the heathen philosophy. He was an intimate friend of Eunapius, who praises him very highly, and wrote an account of his life. We possess at present three works of Oribasius: 1. Collecta Medicinalia (Συναγωγαὶ Ἰατρικαί), or sometimes Hebdomecontabiblos (Ἑβδομηκοντάβιβλος), which was compiled at the command of Julian, when Oribasius was still a young man. It contains but little original matter, but is very valuable on account of the numerous extracts from writers whose works are no longer extant. More than half of this work is now lost, and what remains is in some confusion. There is no complete edition of the work. 2. An abridgment (Σύνοψις) of the former work, in nine books. It was written thirty years after the former. 3. Euporista, or De facile Parabilibus (Εὐπόριστα), in four books. Both this and the preceding work were intended as manuals of the practice of medicine.

ORĬCUM or ORĬCUS (Ὤρικον, Ὤρικος: Ὠρίκιος: now Ericho), an important Greek town on the coast of Illyria, near the Ceraunian Mountains and the frontiers of Epirus. According to tradition, it was founded by the Eubœans, who were cast here by a storm on their return from Troy; but according to another legend, it was a Colchian colony. The town was strongly fortified, but its harbor was not very secure. It was destroyed in the civil wars, but was rebuilt by Herodes Atticus. The turpentine tree (terebinthus) grew in the neighborhood of Oricus.

ORIGĔNES (Ὠριγένης), usually called ORIGEN, one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, was born at Alexandrea A.D. 186. He received a careful education from his father, Leonides, who was a devout Christian; and he subsequently became a pupil of Clement of Alexandrea. His father having been put to death in the persecution of the Christians in the tenth year of Severus (202), Origen was reduced to destitution; whereupon he became a teacher of grammar, and soon acquired a great reputation. At the same time he gave instruction in Christianity to several of the heathen; and, though only in his eighteenth year, he was appointed to the office of catechist, which was vacant through the dispersion of the clergy consequent on the persecution. The young teacher showed a zeal and self-denial beyond his years. Deeming his profession as teacher of grammar inconsistent with his sacred work, he gave it up; and he lived on the merest pittance. His food and his periods of sleep were restricted within the narrowest limits; and he performed a strange act of self-mutilation, in obedience to what he regarded as the recommendation of Christ. (Matth., xix., 12.) At a later time, however, he repudiated this literal understanding of our Lord's words. About 211 or 212 Origen visited Rome, where he made, however, a very short stay. On his return to Alexandrea he continued to discharge his duties as catechist, and to pursue his biblical studies. About 216 he paid a visit to Cæsarea in Palestine, and about 230 he travelled into Greece. Shortly after his return to Alexandrea he had to encounter the open enmity of Demetrius, the bishop of the city. He was first deprived of his office of catechist, and was compelled to leave Alexandrea; and Demetrius afterward procured his degradation from the priesthood and his excommunication. The charges brought against him are not specified; but his unpopularity appears to have arisen from the obnoxious character of some of his opinions, and was increased by the circumstance that even in his lifetime his writings were seriously corrupted. Origen withdrew to Cæsarea in Palestine, where he was received with the greatest kindness. Among his pupils at this place was Gregory Thaumaturgus, who afterward became his panegyrist. In 235 Origen fled from Cæsarea in Palestine, and took refuge at Cæsarea in Cappadocia, where he remained concealed two years. It was subsequent to this that he undertook a second journey into Greece, the date of which is doubtful. In the Decian persecution (249–251), Origen was put to the torture; but, though his life was spared, the sufferings which he underwent hastened his end. He died in 253 or 254, in his sixty-ninth year, at Tyre, in which city he was buried. The following are the most important of Origen's works: 1. The Hexapla which consisted of six copies of the Old Testament, ranged in parallel columns. The first column contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters, the second the same text in Greek characters, the third the version of Aquila, the fourth that of Symmachus, the fifth the Septuagint, the sixth the version of Theodotion. Besides the compilation and arrangement of these versions, Origen added marginal notes, containing, among other things, an explanation of the Hebrew names. Only fragments of this valuable work are extant, the best edition of which is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1714. 2. Exegetical works, which comprehend three classes: (1.) Tomi, which Jerome renders Volumina, containing ample commentaries, in which he gave full scope to his intellect. (2.) Scholia, brief notes on detached passages. (3.) Homiliæ, popular expositions, chiefly delivered at Cæsarea. In his various expositions Origen sought to extract from the Sacred Writings their historical, mystical or prophetical, and moral significance. His desire of finding continually a mystical sense led him frequently into the neglect of the historical sense, and even into the denial of its truth. This capital fault has at all times furnished ground for depreciating his labors, and has no doubt materially diminished their value: it must not, however, be supposed that his denial of the historical truth of the Sacred Writings is more than occasional, or that it has been carried out to the full extent which some of his accusers have charged upon him. 3. De Principiis (Περὶ ἀρχῶν). This work was the great object of attack with Origen's enemies, and the source from which they derived their chief evidence of his various alleged heresies. It was divided into four books. Of this work some important fragments are extant; and the Latin version of Rufinus has come down to us entire; but Rufinus took great liberties with the original, and the unfaithfulness of his version is denounced in the strongest terms by Jerome. 4. Exhortatio ad Martyrium (Εἰς μαρτύριον προτρεπτικὸς λόγος), or De Martyrio (Περὶ μαρτυρίου), written during the persecution under the Emperor Maximin (235–238), and still extant. 5. Contra Celsum Libri VIII. (Κατὰ Κέλσου τόμοι ή), still extant. In this important work Origen defends the truth of Christianity against the attacks of Celsus. Vid. Celsus. There is a valuable work entitled Philocalia (Φιλοκαλία), which is a compilation by Basil of Cæsarea and his friend Gregory of Nazianzus, made almost exclusively from the writings of Origen, of which many important fragments have been thus preserved. Few writers have exercised greater influence by the force of their intellect and the variety of their attainments than Origen, or have been the occasion of longer and more acrimonious disputes. Of his more distinctive tenets, several had reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, to the subject of the incarnation, and to the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, which, as well as the pre-existence of other human souls, he affirmed. He was charged, also, with holding the corporeity of angels, and with other errors as to angels and dæmons. He held the freedom of the human will, and ascribed to man a nature less corrupt and depraved than was consistent with orthodox views of the operation of divine grace. He held the doctrine of the universal restoration of the guilty, conceiving that the devil alone would suffer eternal punishment. The best edition of his works is by Delarue, Paris, 1733–1759, 4 vols. fol.; [reprinted in 25 vols. 8vo, 1831–48, under the editorial care of Lommatsch.]

Oringis or Oningis, probably the same place as Aurinx, a wealthy town in Hispania Bætica, with silver mines, near Munda.

Orīon ('Ωρίων), son of Hyrieus, of Hyria, in Bœotia, a handsome giant and hunter, said to have been called by the Bœotians Candaon. Once he came to Chios (Ophiusa), and fell in love with Aero or Merope, the daughter of Œnopion by the nymph Helice. He cleared the island from wild beasts, and brought the spoils of the chase as presents to his beloved; but as Œnopion constantly deferred the marriage, Orion once when intoxicated offered violence to the maiden. Œnopion now implored the assistance of Bacchus (Dionysus), who caused Orion to be thrown into a deep sleep by satyrs, in which state Œnopion deprived him of his sight. Being informed by an oracle that he should recover his sight if he would go toward the east and expose his eye-balls to the rays of the rising sun, Orion followed the sound of a Cyclops' hammer, went to Lemnos, where Vulcan (Hephæstus) gave to him Cedalion as his guide. Having recovered his sight, Orion returned to Chios to take vengeance on Œnopion; but, as the latter had been concealed by his friends, Orion was unable to find him, and then proceeded to Crete, where he lived as a hunter with Diana (Artemis). The cause of his death, which took place either in Crete or Chios, is differently stated. According to some, Eos (Aurora), who loved Orion for his beauty, carried him off, but as the gods were angry at this, Diana (Artemis) killed him with an arrow in Ortygia. According to others, he was beloved by Diana (Artemis), and Apollo, indignant at his sister's affection for him, asserted that she was unable to hit with her arrow a distant point which he showed her in the sea. She thereupon took aim, and hit it, but the point was the head of Orion, who had been swimming in the sea. A third account, which Horace follows (Carm., ii., 4, 72), states that he attempted to violate Artemis (Diana), and was killed by the goddess with one of her arrows. A fourth account, lastly, states that he boasted he would conquer every animal, and would clear the earth from all wild beasts; but the earth sent forth a scorpion which destroyed him. Æsculapius attempted to recall him to life, but was slain by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning. The accounts of his parentage and birth-place vary in the different writers, for some call him a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Euryale, and others say that he was born of the earth, or a son of Œnopion. He is further called a Theban or Tanagræan, but probably because Hyria, his native place, sometimes belonged to Tanagra and sometimes to Thebes. After his death Orion was placed among the stars, where he appears as a giant with a girdle, sword, a lion's skin, and a club. The constellation of Orion set at the commencement of November, at which time storms and rain were frequent; hence he is often called imbrifer, nimbosus, or aquosus.

Orion and Orus ('Ωρίων and 'Ωρος), names of several ancient grammarians, who are frequently confounded with each other. It appears, however, that we may distinguish three writers of these names. 1. Orion, a Theban grammarian, who taught at Cæsarea in the fifth century after Christ, and is the author of a lexicon, still extant, published by Sturz, Lips., 1820.—2. Orus, of Miletus, a grammarian, lived in the second century after Christ, and was the author of the works mentioned by Suidas. —3. Orus, an Alexandrine grammarian, who taught at Constantinople not earlier than the middle of the fourth century after Christ.

Orippo, a town in Hispania, on the road between Gades and Hispalis.

Orītæ, Horitæ, or Oræ ('Ωρεῖται, 'Ωραι), a people of Gedrosia, who inhabited a district on the coast nearly two hundred miles long, abounding in wine, corn, rice, and palm-trees, the modern Urboo on the coast of Beloochistan. Some of the ancient writers assert that they were of Indian origin, while others say that, though they resembled the Indians in many of their customs, they spoke a different language.

Orithyia ('Ωρείθυια). 1. Daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. Once, as she had strayed beyond the River Ilissus, she was seized by Boreas and carried off to Thrace, where she bore to Boreas Cleopatra, Chione, Zetes, and Calais.—[2. One of the Nereids, mentioned in Homer.]

[Orīus ("Ορειος), son of the Thessalian sorceress Mycale, one of the Lapithæ, slain by Gryneus at the nuptials of Pirithous.]

[Ormenium. Vid. Ormenus.]

Orměnus ('Ορμενος). 1. Son of Cercaphus, grandson of Æolus, and father of Amyntor, was believed to have founded the town of Ormenium, in Thessaly. From him Amyntor is sometimes called Ormenides, and Astydamia, his grand-daughter, Ormenis.—[2. Name of two Trojan warriors, who were slain, the one by Teucer, the other by Polypœtes, in the Trojan war.]

[Orminius Mons (now Derne jailasi ?), a range of mountains in the northeast of Bithynia, terminating in Promontorium Posidium, on the coast.]

Orněæ ('Ορνεαί: 'Ορνεάτης), an ancient town in Argolis, near the frontiers of the territory of Phlius, and one hundred and twenty stadia from Argos. It was originally independent of Argos, but was subdued by the Argives in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 415.

Orneus ('Ορνεύς), son of Erechtheus, father of Peteus, and grandfather of Menestheus; from him the town of Orneæ was believed to have derived its name.

[Ornytus ("Ορνυτος). 1. An Arcadian hero, who led an army from Teuthis to join the Greeks against Troy, but during the stay at Aulis he had a quarrel with Agamemnon, and, in consequence, led his forces back.—2. A Tyrrhenian, companion of Æneas in Italy, slain by Camilla.]

Oroanda ('Ορόανδα: 'Οροανδεύς, or -ικός, Oroandensis), a mountain city of Pisidia, southeast of Antiochia, from which the "Oroandicus tractus" obtained its name.

Oroătis ('Ορόατις: now Tab), the largest of the minor rivers which flow into the Persian Gulf, formed the boundary between Susiana and Persia.

Orŏbiæ ('Οροβίαι), a town on the coast of Eubœa, not far from Ægæ, with an oracle of Apollo.

[Orobii, a Gallic people in Gallia Transpadana, in whose territory, according to Pliny, lay the cities Comum and Bergomum.]

Orōdes ('Ορώδης), the name of two kings of Parthia. Vid. Arsaces, No. 14, 17.

Orœtes ('Οροίτης), a Persian, was made satrap of Sardis by Cyrus, which government he retained under Cambyses. In B.C. 522 he decoyed Polycrates into his power by specious promises, and put him to death. But being suspected of aiming at the establishment of an independent sovereignty, he was himself put to death by order of Darius.

Orontes ('Ορόντης). 1. (Now Nahr-el-Asy), the largest river of Syria, has two chief sources in Cœlesyria, the one in the Antilibanus, the other further north, in the Libanus; flows northeast into a lake south of Emesa, and thence north past Epiphania and Apamea, till near Antioch, where it suddenly sweeps round to the southwest, and falls into the sea at the foot of Mount Pieria. According to tradition, its earlier name was Typhon (Τυφών), and it was called Orontes from the person who first built a bridge over it.—2. A mountain on the southern side of the Caspian, between Parthia and Hyrcania.—3. A people of Assyria, east of Gaugamela.

[Orontes ('Ορόντης). 1. A Lycian leader, an ally of the Trojans, accompanied Æneas after the fall of Troy, and perished by shipwreck.—2. Related to the Persian royal family, accompanied the younger Cyrus against Artaxerxes, having been pardoned by Cyrus though he had revolted from him. He was again convicted of treason during the expedition, was tried by a court-martial, and condemned to death. His fate was never made public.—3. A Persian, satrap of Armenia, married Rhodogune, the daughter of Artaxerxes: he commanded one of the divisions of the king's army during the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, and was a party to the treacherous massacre of the Greek generals. He was afterward disgraced in consequence of mismanaging the war with Evagoras, and attempting to deprive Tiribazus of his command and his army. Vid. Tiribazus. —4. A descendant of Hydarnes (one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian), is mentioned by Strabo as the last Persian prince who reigned in Armenia before the division of the country by Antiochus the Great between two of his officers, Artaxias and Zariadris.]

Orōpus ('Ωρωπός: 'Ωρώπιος: now Oropo), a town on the eastern frontiers of Bœotia and Attica, near the Euripus, originally belonged to the Bœotians, but was at an early time seized by the Athenians, and was long an object of contention between the two nations. At length, after being taken and retaken several times, it remained permanently in the hands of the Athenians, and is always reckoned by later writers as a town of Attica. Its sea-port was Delphinium, at the mouth of the Asopus, about one and a half miles from the town.

Orosius, Paulus, a Spanish presbyter, a native of Tarragona, flourished under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for St. Augustine, he passed over into Africa about A.D. 413. After remaining in Africa about two years, Augustine sent him into Syria, to counteract the influence of Pelagius, who had resided for some years in Palestine. Orosius found a warm friend in Jerome, but was unable to procure the condemnation of Pelagius, and was himself anathematized by John, bishop of Jerusalem, when he brought a formal charge against Pelagius. Orosius subsequently returned to Africa, and there, it is believed, died, but at what period is not known. The following works by Orosius are still extant. 1. Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII., dedicated to St. Augustine, at whose suggestion the task was undertaken. The pagans having been accustomed to complain that the ruin of the Roman empire must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities, whose worship had been abandoned, Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from the earliest epoch the world had been the scene of calamities as great as the Roman empire was then suffering. The work, which extends from the Creation down to A.D. 417, is, with exception of the concluding portion, extracted from Justin, Eutropius, and inferior second-hand authorities. Edited by Havercamp, Lugd. Bat., 1738 and 1767. 2. Liber Apologeticus de Arbitrii Libertate, written in Palestine, A.D. 415, appended to the edition of the History by Havercamp. 3. Commonitorium ad Augustinum, the earliest of the works of Orosius, composed soon after his first arrival in Africa.

Orospĕda or Ortospĕda (now Sierra del Mundo), the highest range of mountains in the centre of Spain, began in the centre of Mount Idubeda, ran first west and then south, and terminated near Calpe at the Fretum Herculeum. It contained several silver mines, whence the part in which the Bætis rises was called Mount Argentarius, or the Silver Mountain.

Orpheus (Ὀρφεύς), a mythical personage, was regarded by the Greeks as the most celebrated of the early poets, who lived before the time of Homer. His name does not occur in the Homeric or Hesiodic poems, but it already had attained to great celebrity in the lyric period. There were numerous legends about Orpheus, but the common story ran as follows: Orpheus, the son of Œagrus and Calliope, lived in Thrace at the period of the Argonauts, whom he accompanied in their expedition. Presented with the lyre by Apollo, and instructed by the Muses in its use, he enchanted with its music not only the wild beasts, but the trees and rocks upon Olympus, so that they moved from their places to follow the sound of his golden harp. The power of his music caused the Argonauts to seek his aid, which contributed materially to the success of their expedition: at the sound of his lyre the Argo glided down into the sea; the Argonauts tore themselves away from the pleasures of Lemnos; the Symplegades, or moving rocks, which threatened to crush the ship between them, were fixed in their places; and the Colchian dragon, which guarded the golden fleece, was lulled to sleep: other legends of the same kind may be read in the Argonaut[illegible] which bears the name of Orpheus. After [illegible] return from the Argonautic expedition he t[illegible] up his abode in a cave in Thrace, and empl[illegible]ed himself in the civilization of its wild inhab[illegible]ants. There is also a legend of his having vi[illegible]ited Egypt. The legends respecting the l[illegible] and recovery of his wife, and his own de[illegible] are very various. His wife was a nymph na[illegible] Agriope or Eurydice. In the older accou[illegible] the cause of her death is not referred to. T[illegible] legend followed in the well-known passages [illegible] Virgil and Ovid, which ascribes the death [illegible] Eurydice to the bite of a serpent, is no do[illegible] of high antiquity; but the introduction of Ar[illegible]tæus into the legend can not be traced to [illegible] writer older than Virgil himself. He follo[illegible] his lost wife into the abodes of Pluto (Hade[illegible] where the charms of his lyre suspended [illegible] torments of the damned, and won back his wi[illegible] from the most inexorable of all deities; but [illegible] prayer was only granted upon this conditi[illegible] that he should not look back upon his resto[illegible] wife till they had arrived in the upper worl[illegible] at the very moment when they were about [illegible] pass the fatal bounds, the anxiety of love ove[illegible] came the poet; he looked round to see th[illegible] Eurydice was following him, and he beheld h[illegible] caught back into the infernal regions. Hi[illegible] grief for the loss of Eurydice led him to tre[illegible] with contempt the Thracian women, who, in re[illegible]venge, tore him to pieces under the excitemen[illegible] of their Bacchanalian orgies. After his death the Muses collected the fragments of his body, and buried them at Libethra, at the foot of Olympus, where the nightingale sang sweetly over his grave. His head was thrown into the Hebrus, down which it rolled to the sea, and was borne across to Lesbos, where the grave in which it was interred was shown at Antissa. His lyre was also said to have been carried to Lesbos; and both traditions are simply poetical expressions of the historical fact that Lesbos was the first great seat of the music of the lyre: indeed, Antissa itself was the birth-place of Terpander, the earliest historical musician. The astronomers taught that the lyre of Orpheus was placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars at the intercession of Apollo and the Muses. In these legends there are some points which are sufficiently clear. The invention of music, in connection with the services of Apollo and the Muses, its first great application to the worship of the gods, which Orpheus is therefore said to have introduced, its power over the passions, and the importance which the Greeks attached to the knowledge of it, as intimately allied with the very existence of all social order—are probably the chief elementary ideas of the whole legend. But then comes in one of the dark features of the Greek religion, in which the gods envy the advancement of man in knowledge and civilization, and severely punish any one who transgresses the bounds assigned to humanity. In a later age the conflict was no longer viewed as between the gods and man, but between the worshippers of different divinities; and especially between Apollo, the symbol of pure intellect, and Bacchus (Dionysus), the deity of the senses: hence Orpheus, the servant of Apollo, falls a victim to the jealousy of Bacchus (Dionysus), and the fury of his worshippers.—Orphic Societies and Mysteries. About the time of the first development of Greek philosophy, societies were formed, consisting of persons called the followers of Orpheus (οἱ Ὀρφικοί), who, under the pretended guidance of Orpheus, dedicated themselves to the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus). They performed the rites of a mystical worship, but instead of confining their notions to the initiated, they published them to others, and committed them to literary works. The Bacchus (Dionysus) to whose worship the Orphic rites were annexed, was Bacchus (Dionysus) Zagreus, closely connected with Ceres (Demeter) and Cora (Proserpina). The Orphic legends and poems related in great part to this Bacchus (Dionysus), who was combined, as an infernal deity, with Pluto (Hades), and upon whom the Orphic theologers founded their hopes of the purification and ultimate immortality of the soul. But their mode of celebrating this worship was very different from the popular rites of Bacchus. The Orphic worshippers of Bacchus did not indulge in unrestrained pleasure and frantic enthusiasm, but rather aimed at an ascetic purity of life and manners. All this part of the mythology of Orpheus, which connects him with Bacchus (Dionysus), must be considered as a later invention, quite irreconcilable with the original legend, in which he is the servant of Apollo and the Muses: but it is almost hopeless to explain the transition. Many poems ascribed to Orpheus were current as early as the time of the Pisistratidæ. Vid. ONOMACRITUS. They are often quoted by Plato, and the allusions to them in later writers are very frequent. The extant poems, which bear the name of Orpheus, are the forgeries of Christian grammarians and philosophers of the Alexandrean school; but among the fragments, which form a part of the collection, are some genuine remains of that Orphic poetry which was known to Plato, and which must be assigned to the period of Onomacritus, or perhaps a little earlier. The Orphic literature, which in this sense may be called genuine, seems to have included Hymns, a Theogony, Oracles, &c. The apocryphal productions which have come down to us are, 1. Argonautica, an epic poem in one thousand three hundred and eighty-four hexameters, giving an account of the expedition of the Argonauts. 2. Hymns, eighty-seven or eighty-eight in number, in hexameters, evidently the productions of the Neo-Platonic school. 3. Lithica (Λιθικά), treats of properties of stones, both precious and common, and their uses in divination. 4. Fragments, chiefly of the Theogony. It is in this class that we find the genuine remains of the literature of the early Orphic theology, but intermingled with others of a much later date. The best edition is by Hermann, Lips., 1805.

[ORSABARIS (Ὀρσάβαρις), a daughter of Mithradates the Great, taken prisoner by Pompey, and served to adorn his triumph, B.C. 61.]

[ORSEÏS (Ὀρσηΐς), a nymph, mother by Hellen of Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus.]

[ORSILOCHUS (Ὀρσίλοχος). 1. Son of the river-god Alpheus and of Telegone, father of Diocles prince at Pheræ, and guest friend of Ulysses.—2. Son of Diocles, grandson of No. 1, accompanied Agamemnon to the Trojan war, and was slain before Troy by Æneas.—3. Son of Idomeneus of Crete.—4. A Trojan, who accompanied Æneas to Italy; he was slain by Camilla.]

[ORTHAGORAS (Ὀρθαγόρας). 1. A geographical writer, whose age is uncertain: he wrote a work on India, and another concerning the Red Sea.—2. A flute-player of Thebes; according to Athenæus, an instructor of Epaminondas in flute-playing.]

[ORTHE (Ὀρθη), a place in the Thessalian district Perrhæbia, mentioned in the second book of the Iliad; supposed by Strabo to be the Acropolis of Phalanna.]

ORTHĬA (Ὀρθία, Ὀρθίς, or Ὀρθωσία), a surname of the Diana (Artemis) who is also called Iphigenia or Lygodesma, and must be regarded as the goddess of the moon. Her worship was probably brought to Sparta from Lemnos. It was at the altar of Diana (Artemis) Orthia that Spartan boys had to undergo the flogging called diamastigosis.

ORTHŌSĬA (Ὀρθωσία). 1. A city of Caria, on the Mæander, with a mountain of the same name, where the Rhodians defeated the Carians, B.C. 167.—2. (Now Ortosa), a city of Phœnice, south of the mouth of the Eleutherus, and twelve Roman miles from Tripolis.

ORTHRUS (Ὄρθρος), the two-headed dog of Geryones, who was begotten by Typhon and Echidna, and was slain by Hercules. Vid. p. 358, a.]

[ORTONA (now Ortona a Mare), a port-town of the Frentani, according to the Itineraries on the road from Aternum to Histonium.]

ORTOSPANA or -UM (Ὀρτόσπανα: now Cabul?), a considerable city of the Paropamisadæ, at the sources of a western tributary of the River Coës, and at the junction of three roads, one leading north into Bactria, and the others south and east into India. It was also called Carura or Cabura.

ORTYGĬA (Ὀρτυγία). 1. The ancient name of Delos. Since Diana (Artemis) and Apollo were born at Delos, the poets sometimes call the goddess Ortygia, and give the name of Ortygiæ boves to the cattle pastured by Apollo. The ancients connected the name with Ortyx (Ὄρτυξ), a quail. Vid. p. 435, b.—2. An island near Syracuse. Vid. SYRACUSÆ.—3. A grove near Ephesus, in which the Ephesians pretended that Apollo and Diana (Artemis) were born. Hence Propertius calls the Cayster, which flowed near Ephesus, Ortygius Cayster.

charged with sacrilege, and on this or some other gr und was crucified by Alexander.]

Osca. 1. (Now Huesca in Arragonia), an important town of the Ilergetes and a Roman colony in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Ilerda, with silver mines; whence Livy speaks of argentum Oscience, though these words may perhaps mean silver money coined at Osca.—2. (West of Huescar in Granada), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica.

Oscĕla. Vid. Lepontii.

Osci or Opici (Ὀσκοι, Ὀπικοί), one of the most ancient tribes of Italy, inhabited the centre of the peninsula, from which they had driven out the Siculi. Their principal settlement was in Campania, but we also find them in parts of Latium and Samnium. They were subdued by the Sabines and Tyrrhenians, and disappeared from history at a comparatively early period. They were called in their own language Uskus. They are identified by many writers with the Ausones or Aurunci; but others think that the latter is a collective name for all the people dwelling in the plain, and that the Osci were a branch of the Ausones. The Oscan language was closely connected with the other ancient Italian dialects, out of which the Latin language was formed; and it continued to be spoken by the people of Campania long after the Oscans had disappeared as a separate people. A knowledge of it was preserved at Rome by the Fabulæ Atellanæ, which were a species of farce or comedy written in Oscan.

Osi, a people in Germany, probably in the mountains between the sources of the Oder and the Gran, were, according to Tacitus, tributary to the Sarmatians, and spoke the Pannonian language.

[Osinius, king of Clusium, aided Æneas in his wars with Turnus in Italy.]

Osīris (Ὄσιρις), the great Egyptian divinity, and husband of Isis. According to Herodotus, they were the only divinities who were worshipped by all the Egyptians. His Egyptian name is said to have been Hysiris, which is interpreted to mean "son of Isis," though some said that it meant "many-eyed." He is said to have been originally king of Egypt, and to have reclaimed his subjects from a barbarous life by teaching them agriculture, and enacting wise laws. He afterward travelled into foreign lands, spreading wherever he went the blessings of civilization. On his return to Egypt he was murdered by his brother Typhon, who cut his body into pieces and threw them into the Nile. After a long search Isis discovered the mangled remains of her husband, and with the assistance of her son Horus defeated Typhon, and recovered the sovereign power, which Typhon had usurped. Vid. Isis.

Osroēne (Ὀσροηνή: Ὀσροηνοί, pl.: now Pashalik of Orfah), the westernmost of the two portions into which Northern Mesopotamia was divided by the River Chaboras (now Khabour), which separated it from Mygdonia on the east and from the rest of Mesopotamia on the south; the Euphrates divided it on the west and southwest from the Syrian districts of Chalybonitis, Cyrrhestice, and Commagene; and on the north it was separated by Mount Masius from Armenia. Its name was said to be derived from Osroes, an Arabian chieftain, who, in the time of the Seleucidæ, established over it a petty principality, with Edessa for its capital, which lasted till the reign of Caracalla, and respecting the history of which, vid. Abgarus.

A celebrated mountain in the north of Magnesia, in Thessaly, connected with Pelion on the southeast, and divided from Olympus on the northwest by the Vale of Tempe. It is one of the highest mountains in Greece, but much less lofty than Olympus. It is mentioned by Homer in the legend of the war of the Giants, respecting which, vid. Olympus.—[2. Ossigerda or Osicerda (Ossigerdensis), a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman municipium.

Ossĭgi (now Maquiz), a town of the Turduli in Hispania Bætica, on the spot where the Bætis first enters Bætica.

Ossonŏba (now Estoy, north of Faro), a town of the Turdetani in Lusitania, between the Tagus and Anas.

Osteōdes (Ὀστεώδης νῆσος: now Alicur), an island at some distance from the north coast of Sicily, opposite the town of Soli.

Ostĭa (Ostiensis: now Ostia,) a town at the mouth of the River Tiber, and the harbor of Rome, from which it was distant sixteen miles by land, was situated on the left bank of the left arm of the river. It was founded by Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome, was a Roman colony, and eventually became an important and flourishing town. In the civil wars it was destroyed by Marius, but it was soon rebuilt with greater splendor than before. The Emperor Clandius constructed a new and better harbor on the right arm of the Tiber, which was enlarged and improved by Trajan. This new harbor was called simply Portus Romanus or Portus Augusti, and around it there sprang up a flourishing town, also called Portus (the inhabitants Portuenses). The old town of Ostia, whose harbor had been already partly filled up by sand, now sank into insignificance, and only continued to exist through its salt-works (salinæ), which had been established by Ancus Marcius. The ruins of Ostia are between two and three miles from the coast, as the sea has gradually receded in consequence of the accumulation of sand deposited by the Tiber.

Otacilius Crassus, T. 1. A Roman general during the second Punic war, was prætor B.C. 217, and subsequently proprætor in Sicily. In 215 he crossed over to Africa, and laid waste the Carthaginian coast. He was prætor for the second time, 214, and his command was prolonged during the next three years. He died in Sicily, 211.—[2. Otacilius Crassus, one of Pompey's officers, had the command of the town of Lissus in Illyria, and cruelly murdered two hundred and twenty of Cæsar's soldiers, who had surrendered to him on the promise that they should be uninjured. Shortly after this he abandoned Lissus, and joined the main body of the Pompeian army.]

Otacilius Pilitus, L., a Roman rhetorician who opened a school at Rome B.C. 81, was originally a slave, but having exhibited talent and a love of literature, he was manumitted by his master. Cn. Pompeius Magnus was one of his pupils, and he wrote the history of Pompey and of his father likewise.

Otanes (Ὀτάνης). 1. A Persian, son of Pharnaspes, was the first who suspected the imposture of Smerdis the Magian, and took the chief part in organizing the conspiracy against the pretender (B.C. 521). After the accession of Darius Hystaspis, he was placed in command of the Persian force which invaded Samos for the purpose of placing Syloson, brother of Polycrates, in the government.—2. A Persian, son of Sisamnes, succeeded Megabyzus (B.C. 506) in the command of the forces on the sea-coast, and took Byzantium, Chalcedon, Antandrus, and Lamponium, as well as the islands of Lemnos and Imbros. He was probably the same Otanes who is mentioned as a son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis, and as a general employed against the revolted Ionians in 499.

Otho, L. Roscius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 67, was a warm supporter of the aristocratical party. He opposed the proposal of Gabinius to bestow upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; and in the same year he proposed and carried the law which gave to the equites a special place at the public spectacles, in fourteen rows or seats (in quattuordecim gradibus sive ordinibus), next to the place of the senators, which was in the orchestra. This law was very unpopular; and in Cicero's consulship (63) there was such a riot occasioned by the obnoxious measure that it required all his eloquence to allay the agitation.

Otho, Salvius. 1. M., grandfather of the Emperor Otho, was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Ferentinum in Etruria. His father was a Roman eques; his mother was of low origin, perhaps even a freedwoman. Through the influence of Livia Augusta, in whose house he had been brought up, Otho was made a Roman senator, and eventually obtained the prætorship, but was not advanced to any higher honor.—2. L., son of the preceding, and father of the Emperor Otho, stood so high in the favor of Tiberius, and resembled this emperor so strongly in person, that it was supposed by most that he was his son. He was consul suffectus in A.D. 33; was afterward proconsul in Africa; and in 42 was sent into Illyricum, where he restored discipline among the soldiers, who had lately rebelled against Claudius. At a later time he detected a conspiracy which had been formed against the life of Claudius.—3. L., surnamed Titianus, elder son of No. 2, was consul 52, and proconsul in Asia 63, when he had Agricola for his quæstor. It is related to the honor of the latter that he was not corrupted by the example of his superior officer, who indulged in every kind of rapacity. On the death of Galba in January, 69, Titianus was a second time made consul, with his brother Otho, the emperor. On the death of the latter, he was pardoned by Vitellius.—4. M., Roman emperor from January 15th to April 16th, A.D. 69, was the younger son of No. 2. He was born in the early part of 32. He was of moderate stature, ill made in the legs, and had an effeminate appearance. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries; but when the emperor took possession of his wife, the beautiful but profligate Poppæa Sabina, Otho was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last ten years of Nero's life. Otho attached himself to Galba when he revolted against Nero, in the hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But when Galba adopted L. Piso on the 10th of January, 69, Otho formed a conspiracy against Galba, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers at Rome, who put Galba to death. Meantime Vitellius had been proclaimed emperor at Cologne by the German troops on the 3d of January, and his generals forthwith set out for Italy to place their master on the throne. When these news reached Otho, he marched into the north of Italy to oppose the generals of Vitellius. The fortune of war was at first in his favor. He defeated Cæcina, the general of Vitellius, in more than one engagement; but his army was subsequently defeated in a decisive battle near Bedriacum by the united forces of Cæcina and Valens, whereupon he put an end to his own life at Brixellum, in the thirty-seventh year of his age.

Othryades (Ὀθρυάδης). 1. A patronymic given to Panthous or Panthus, the Trojan priest of Apollo, as the son of Othryas.—2. A Spartan, one of the three hundred selected to fight with an equal number of Argives for the possession of Thyrea. Othryades was the only person who survived the battle, and was left for dead. He spoiled the dead bodies of the enemy, and remained at his post, while Alcenor and Chromius, the two survivors of the Argive party, hastened home with the news of victory, supposing that all their opponents had been slain. As the victory was claimed by both sides, a general battle ensued, in which the Argives were defeated. Othryades slew himself on the field, being ashamed to return to Sparta as the one survivor of her three hundred champions.

[Othryoneus (Ὀθρυονεύς), an ally of Priam, from Cabesus, was a suitor for the hand of Cassandra, Priam's daughter, and promised, in return, to drive the Greeks from before Troy; but he was slain by Idomeneus.]

Othrys (Ὄθρυς: [now Goura or Katavothry? the highest summit Jerako, according to Leake]), a lofty range of mountains in the south of Thes saly, which extended from Mount Tymphrestus, or the most southerly part of Pindus, to the eastern coast and the promontory between the Pagasæan Gulf and the northern point of Eubœa. It shut in the great Thessalian plain on the south.

[OTREUS (Ὀτρεύς), king of Phrygia, whom Priam aided against the Amazons.]

[OTRŒA (Ὀτροία), a city of Bithynia, above Lake Ascania, said to have derived its name from Otreus, probably the same as the town of Phrygia mentioned by Plutarch under the name of Otryæ (Ὀτρύαι) in his life of Lucullus.]

OTUS, and his brother EPHIALTES, are better known by their name of the Aloïdæ. Vid. ALOEUS.—[2. Of Cyllene, a Greek warrior at the siege of Troy, slain by Polydamas.]

OVIDIUS NASO, P., the Roman poet, was born at Sulmo, in the country of the Peligni, on the 20th of March, B.C. 43. He was descended from an ancient equestrian family, but possessing only moderate wealth. He, as well as his brother Lucius, who was exactly a year older than himself, was destined to be a pleader, and received a careful education to qualify him for that calling. He studied rhetoric under Arellius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and attained to considerable proficiency in the art of declamation. But the bent of his genius showed itself very early. The hours which should have been spent in the study of jurisprudence were employed in cultivating his poetical talent. The elder Seneca, who had heard him declaim, tells us that his oratory resembled a solutum carmen, and that any thing in the way of argument was irksome to him. His father denounced his favorite pursuit as leading to inevitable poverty; but the death of his brother, at the early age of twenty, probably served in some degree to mitigate his father's opposition, for the patrimony which would have been scanty for two might amply suffice for one. Ovid's education was completed at Athens, where he made himself thoroughly master of the Greek language. Afterward he travelled with the poet Macer in Asia and Sicily. It is a disputed point whether he ever actually practiced as an advocate after his return to Rome. The picture Ovid himself draws of his weak constitution and indolent temper prevents us from thinking that he ever followed his profession with perseverance, if indeed at all. The same causes deterred him from entering the senate, though he had put on the latus clavus when he assumed the toga virilis, as being by birth entitled to aspire to the senatorial dignity. (Trist., iv., 10, 29.) He became, however, one of the Triumviri Capitales; and he was subsequently made one of the Centumviri, or judges who tried testamentary and even criminal causes; and in due time he was promoted to be one of the Decemviri, who assembled and presided over the court of the Centumviri. Such is all the account that can be given of Ovid's business life. He married twice in early life at the desire of his parents, but he speedily divorced each of his wives in succession. The restraint of a wife was [irk]some to a man like Ovid, who was devoted [to] gallantry and licentious life. His chief mist[ress] in the early part of his life was the one wh[om] he celebrates in his poems under the name [of] Corinna. If we may believe the testimony [of] Sidonius Apollinaris, Corinna was no le[ss a] personage than Julia, the accomplished [but] abandoned daughter of Augustus. There [are] several passages in Ovid's Amores which [ren]der the testimony of Sidonius highly prob[able.] Thus it appears that his mistress was a m[ar]ried woman, of high rank, but profligate mor[als,] all which particulars will suit Julia. How l[ong] Ovid's connection with Corinna lasted there [is] no means of deciding; but it probably cea[sed] before his marriage with his third wife, wh[om] he appears to have sincerely loved. We [can] hardly place his third marriage later than [his] thirtieth year, since a daughter, Perilla, was [the] fruit of it (Trist., iii., 7, 3), who was grown [up] and married at the time of his banishm[ent.] Perilla was twice married, and had a child [by] each husband. Ovid was a grandfather be[fore] he lost his father at the age of ninety; a[nd] after whose decease his mother also died. [Till] his fiftieth year Ovid continued to reside [at] Rome, where he had a house near the Capi[tol,] occasionally taking a trip to his Pelignian fa[rm.] He not only enjoyed the friendship of a la[rge] circle of distinguished men, but the regard a[nd] favor of Augustus and the imperial family. B[ut] in A.D. 9 Ovid was suddenly commanded by [an] imperial edict to transport himself to Tomi, [a] town on the Euxine, near the mouths of [the] Danube, on the very border of the empire. H[e] underwent no trial, and the sole reason for h[is] banishment stated in the edict was his hav[ing] published his poem on the Art of Love (Ars Amatoria). It was not, however, an exilium, but a relegatio; that is, he was not utterly cut off from all hope of return, nor did he lose his citizenship. The real cause of his banishment has long exercised the ingenuity of scholars. The publication of the Ars Amatoria was certainly a mere pretext. The poem had been published nearly ten years previously; and, moreover, whenever Ovid alludes to that, the ostensible cause, he invariably couples with it another which he mysteriously conceals. According to some writers, the real cause was his intrigue with Julia. But this is sufficiently refuted by the fact that Julia had been an exile since B.C. 2. Other writers suppose that he had been guilty of an intrigue with the younger Julia, the daughter of the elder one; and the remarkable fact that the younger Julia was banished in the same year with Ovid leads very strongly to the inference that his fate was in some way connected with hers. But Ovid states himself that his fault was an involuntary one; and the great disparity of years between the poet and the younger Julia renders it improbable that there had been an intrigue between them. He may more probably have become acquainted with Julia's profligacy by accident, and by his subsequent conduct, perhaps, for instance, by concealing it, have given offence to Livia, or Augustus, or both. Ovid draws an affecting picture of the miseries to which he was exposed in his place of exile. He com plains of the inhospitable soil, of the severity of the climate, and of the perils to which he was exposed, when the barbarians plundered the surrounding country, and insulted the very walls of Tomi. In the most abject terms he supplicated Augustus to change his place of banishment, and besought his friends to use their influence in his behalf. In the midst of all his misfortunes, he sought some relief in the exercise of his poetical talents. Not only did he finish his Fasti in his exile, besides writing the Ibis, the Tristia, Ex Ponto, &c., but he likewise acquired the language of the Getæ, in which he composed some poems in honor of Augustus. These he publicly recited, and they were received with tumultuous applause by the Tomitæ. With his new fellow-citizens, indeed, he had succeeded in rendering himself highly popular, insomuch that they honored him with a decree, declaring him exempt from all public burdens. He died at Tomi in the sixtieth year of his age, A.D. 18. The following is a list of Ovid's works, arranged, as far as possible, in chronological order: 1. Amorum Libri III., the earliest of the poet's works. According to the epigram prefixed, the work, as we now possess it, is a second edition, revised and abridged, the former one having consisted of five books. 2. Epistolæ Heroïdum, twenty-one in number. 3. Ars Amatoria, or De Arte Amandi, written about B.C. 2. At the time of Ovid's banishment this poem was ejected from the public libraries by command of Augustus. 4. Remedia Amoris, in one book. 5. Nux, the elegiac complaint of a nut-tree respecting the ill treatment it receives from wayfarers, and even from its own master. 6. Metamorphoseon Libri XV. This, the greatest of Ovid's poems in bulk and pretensions, appears to have been written between the age of forty and fifty. It consists of such legends or fables as involved a transformation, from the Creation to the time of Julius Cæsar, the last being that emperor's change into a star. It is thus a sort of cyclic poem, made up of distinct episodes, but connected into one narrative thread with much skill. 7. Fastorum Libri XII., of which only the first six are extant. This work was incomplete at the time of Ovid's banishment. Indeed, he had perhaps done little more than collect the materials for it; for that the fourth book was written in Pontus appears from verse eighty-eighth. The Fasti is a sort of poetical Roman calendar, with its appropriate festivals and mythology, and the substance was probably taken in a great measure from the old Roman annalists. The work shows a good deal of learning, but it has been observed that Ovid makes frequent mistakes in his astronomy, from not understanding the books from which he took it. 8. Tristium Libri V., elegies written during the first four years of Ovid's banishment. They are chiefly made up of descriptions of his afflicted condition, and petitions for mercy. The tenth elegy of the fourth book is valuable, as containing many particulars of Ovid's life. 9. Epistolarum ex Ponto Libri IV., are also in the elegiac metre, and much the same in substance as the Tristia, to which they were subsequent. It must be confessed that age and misfortune seem to have damped Ovid's genius both in this and the preceding work. Even the versification is more slovenly, and some of the lines very prosaic. 10. Ibis, a satire of between six hundred and seven hundred elegiac verses, also written in exile. The poet inveighs in it against an enemy who had traduced him. Though the variety of Ovid's imprecations displays learning and fancy, the piece leaves the impression of an impotent explosion of rage. The title and plan were borrowed from Callimachus. 11. Consolatio ad Liviam Augustam, is considered by most critics not to be genuine, though it is allowed on all hands to be not unworthy of Ovid's genius. 12. The Medicamina Faciei and Halieuticon are mere fragments, and their genuineness not altogether certain. Of his lost works, the most celebrated was his tragedy, Medea, of which only two lines remain. That Ovid possessed a great poetical genius is unquestionable, which makes it the more to be regretted that it was not always under the control of a sound judgment. He possessed great vigor of fancy, warmth of coloring, and facility of composition. Ovid has himself described how spontaneously his verses flowed; but the facility of composition possessed more charms for him than the irksome but indispensable labor of correction and retrenchment. Ovid was the first to depart from that pure and correct taste which characterizes the Greek poets, and their earlier Latin imitators. His writings abound with those false thoughts and frigid conceits which we find so frequently in the Latin poets · and in this respect he must be regarded as unantique. The best edition of Ovid's complete works is by Burmann, Amsterdam, 1727, 4 vols. 4to. [Of the separate works, the most useful editions are, the Metamorphoses, by Gierig (cura Jahn), Leipzig, 1821–23, and by Loers, Leipzig, 1843; the Fasti, by Merkel, Berlin, 1841, and by Keightley, London, 1848; the Tristia, by Loers, Treves, 1839; Ars Amatoria (including Heroides, &c.), by Jahn, Leipzig, 1828; the Heroides, by Loers, Cologne, 1829.]

[OXATHRES (Ὀξάθρης). 1. Youngest son of Darius II. by Parysatis, brother of Artaxerxes Mnemon, was treated with kindness by his brother, and even admitted to unusual honors. —2. Brother of Darius Codomannus, was distinguished for his bravery, and took a conspicuous part in the battle of Issus, B.C. 333. He accompanied Darius in his flight, but was taken prisoner by Alexander, who treated him with kindness, and gave him an honorable post about his own person.]

OXIA PALUS, is first mentioned distinctly by Ammianus Marcellinus as the name of the Sea of Aral, which the ancients in general did not distinguish from the Caspian. When Ptolemy, however, speaks of the OXIĀNA PALUS (ἡ Ὠξειανὴ λίμνη) as a small lake in the steppes of Sogdiana, he is perhaps following some vague account of the separate existence of the Sea of Aral, and the same remark may be applied to Pliny's account that the source (instead of the termination) of the River Oxus was in a lake of the same name.

[OXIÆ (Ὀξεῖαι, sc. νῆσοι), i. e., INSULÆ, the θοαί of Homer; a group of islands at the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to the ECHINADES INSULÆ.]

Oxiāni (Ὠξιανοί, Οὐξιανοί), a people of Sogdiana, on the north of the Oxus.

Oxii Montes (τὰ Ὤξεια, or Οὔξεια, ὄρη: now probably Ak-tagh), a range of mountains between the Rivers Oxus and Jaxartes; the northern boundary of Sogdiana toward Scythia.

Oxus or Oaxus (Ὄξος, Ὦξος: now Jihoun or Amou), a great river of Central Asia, rose, according to some of the ancient geographers, on the northern side of the Paropamisus Mountains (now Hindoo-Koosh), and, according to others, in the Emodi Mountains, and flowed northwest, forming the boundary between Sogdiana on the north, and Bactria and Margiana on the south, and then, skirting the north of Hyrcania, it fell into the Caspian. The Jihoun now flows into the southwestern corner of the Sea of Aral; but there are still distinct traces of a channel extending in a southwestern direction from the Sea of Aral to the Caspian, by which at least a portion, and probably the whole, of the waters of the Oxus found their way into the Caspian; and very probably the Sea of Aral itself was connected with the Caspian by this channel. The ancient geographers mention, as important tributaries of the Oxus, the Ochus, the Margus, and the Bactrus, which are now intercepted by the sands of the Desert. The Oxus is a broad and rapid river, navigable through a considerable portion of its course. It formed, in ancient times, a channel of commercial intercourse between India and Western Asia, goods being brought down it to the Caspian, and thence up the Cyrus and across Armenia into Asia Minor. It occupies also an important place in history, having been in nearly all ages the extreme boundary between the great monarchies of Southwestern Asia and the hordes which wander over the central steppes. Cyrus and Alexander both crossed it; but the former effected no permanent conquests on its northern side; and the conquests of the latter in Sogdiana, though for a time preserved under the Bactrian kings, were always regarded as lying beyond the limits of the civilized world, and were lost at the fall of the Bactrian kingdom. Herodotus does not mention the Oxus by name, but it is supposed to be the river which he calls Araxes.

[Oxyartes (Ὀξυάρτης), or Oxartes (Ὀξάρτης), a Bactrian, father of Roxana, the wife of Alexander the Great. He was one of the chiefs who accompanied Bessus into Sogdiana. After the death of Bessus, he deposited his wife and daughters for safety in a rock fortress in Sogdiana, which was deemed impregnable, but which soon fell into the hands of Alexander. After the espousal of Alexander to Roxana, Oxyartes made his submission, and was treated with distinction by the conqueror, and was appointed satrap of the province of Paropamisus, or India south of the Caucasus, which he continued to hold after the death of Alexander, and probably to the period of his own death some years subsequently.]

Oxybii, a Ligurian people on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, west of the Alps, and between the Flumen Argenteum (now Argens) and Antipolis (now Antibes). They were neighbors of the Salluvii and Deciates.

Oxydracæ (Ὀξυδράκαι), a warlike people of India intra Gangem, in the Punjab, between Rivers Hydaspes (now Jhelum) and Acesines (now Chenab), in whose capital Alexander was wounded. They called themselves descendants of Bacchus (Dionysus).

Oxylus (Ὄξυλος), the leader of the Heraclidæ in their invasion of Peloponnesus, and subsequently king of Elis. Vid. p. 364, b.

[Oxyntas (Ὀξύντας), son of Jugurtha, was led captive, together with his father, before the triumphal car of Marius, B.C. 104; but his life was spared, and he was placed in custody at Venusia, where he remained till B.C. 90, when he was adorned with the insignia of royalty, to gather around him the Numidians in the service of the Roman general L. Cæsar. The device proved successful, but the subsequent fate of Oxyntas is unknown.]

Oxyrhynchus (Ὀξύρυγχος: ruins at Behneseh), a city of Middle Egypt, on the western bank of the canal which runs parallel to the Nile on its western side (now Bahr Yusuf); was the capital of the Nomos Oxyrhynchites, and the chief seat of the worship of the fish called oxyrynchus.

[Ozene (Ὀζηνή, now Uzen or Ougein), in the time of Ptolemy the capital of the kingdom Larica, in India intra Gangem, and the residence of a prince who bore the title Tiascanus. It carried on an extensive traffic, exported onyxes, myrrh, and fine cotton stuff, and supplied the great commercial city Barygaza with all the necessaries of life.]

Ozogardana, a city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, the people of which preserved a lofty throne or chair of stone, which they called Trajan's judgment-seat.

[Pacarius Decimus, procurator of Corsica in A.D. 69, wished to send assistance to Vitellius, but was murdered by the inhabitants.]

Pacatiāna. Vid. Phrygia.

Paccius or Paccius Antiochus, a physician about the beginning of the Christian era, who was a pupil of Philonides of Catana, and lived probably at Rome. He made a large fortune by the sale of a certain medicine of his own invention, the composition of which he kept a profound secret. At his death he left his prescription as a legacy to the Emperor Tiberius, who, in order to give it as wide a circulation as possible, ordered a copy of it to be placed in all the public libraries.

Paches (Πάχης), an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war, took Mytilene and reduced Lesbos, B.C. 427. On his return to Athens he was brought to trial on some charge, and, perceiving his condemnation to be certain, drew his sword and stabbed himself in the presence of his judges.

Pachymĕres, Georgius, an important Byzantine writer, was born about A.D. 1242 at Nicæa, but spent the greater part of his life at Constantinople. He was a priest, and opposed the union of the Greek and Latin Churches. Pachymeres wrote several works, the most important of which is a Byzantine History, containing an account of the emperors Michael Palæ-logus and Andronicus Palæologus the elder, in thirteen books. The style is remarkably good and pure for the age. Edited by Possinus, Rome, 1666–1669, 2 vols. fol., and by Bekker, Bonn, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

PACHȲNUS or PACHȲNUM (now Capo Passaro), a promontory at the southeastern extremity of Sicily, and one of the three promontories which give to Sicily its triangular figure, the other two being Pelorum and Lilybæum. By the side of Pachynus was a bay, which was used as a harbor, and which is called by Cicero PORTUS PACHYNI (now Porto di Palo).

[PACIANUS, bishop of Barcelona, in Spain, flourished A.D. 370. He was renowned for his eloquence, and wrote several books, especially one against the Novatians. His works have been published by Tilius, Paris, 1538, and in the Biblioth. Patrum Maxima.]

[PACIDII, two generals of the Pompeian party in Africa under Metellus Scipio, one of whom fell in the battle of Tegea, B.C. 46.]

PACĪLUS, the name of a family of the patrician Furia gens, mentioned in the early history of the republic: [the most celebrated were, 1. C. FURIUS PACILUS FUSUS, consul B.C. 441 with M'. Papirius Crassus, censor B.C. 435 with M. Geganius Macerinus, and subsequently one of the consular tribunes in B.C. 426.—2. C. FURIUS P., son of the preceding, consul B.C. 412 with Q. Fabius Vibulanus Ambustus.—3. C. FURIUS P., consul B.C. 251 with L. Cæcilius Metellus in the first Punic war.]

[PACONIUS, M. 1. A Roman knight, violently dispossessed of his property by the tribune Clodius.—2. M., a legatus of Silanus, proconsul of Asia, was one of his accusers in A.D. 22. Paconius was put to death by Tiberius on a charge of treason.]

PACŎRUS (Πάκορος). 1. Son of Orodes I., king of Parthia. His history is given under ARSACES, No. 14.—2. King of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, No. 24.

PACTŌLUS (Πακτωλός: now Sarabat), a small but celebrated river of Lydia, rose on the northern side of Mount Tmolus, and flowed north past Sardis into the Hermus, which it joined thirty stadia below Sardis. The golden sands of Pactolus have passed into a proverb. Lydia was long the California of the ancient world, its streams forming so many gold "washings;" and hence the wealth of the Lydian kings, and the alleged origin of gold money in that country. But the supply of gold was only on the surface, and by the beginning of our era it was so far exhausted as not to repay the trouble of collecting it.

PACTȲAS (Πακτύας), a Lydian, who, on the conquest of Sardis (B.C. 546), was charged by Cyrus with the collection of the revenue of the province. When Cyrus left Sardis on his return to Ecbatana, Pactyas induced the Lydians to revolt against Cyrus; but when an army was sent against him, he first fled to Cyme, then to Mytilene, and eventually to Chios. He was surrendered by the Chians to the Persians.

PACTȲE (Πακτύη: now St. George), a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, on the Propontis, thirty-six stadia from Cardia, to which Alcibiades retired when he was banished by the Athenians, B.C. 407

PACTYĬCA (Πακτυϊκή), the country of the Pactyes (Πάκτυες), in the northwest of India, west of the Indus, and in the thirteenth satrapy of the Persian empire, is most probably the northeastern part of Afghanistan, about Jellalabad.

[PACULLA, ANNIA or MINIA, a Campanian woman, one of the chief agents in introducing the worship of Bacchus into Rome, B.C. 186.]

PACUVĬUS, M., one of the early Roman tragedians, was born about B.C. 220, at Brundisium, and is said to have been the son of the sister of Ennius. Pacuvius appears to have been brought up at Brundisium, but he afterward repaired to Rome. Here he devoted himself to painting and poetry, and obtained so much distinction in the former art, that a painting of his in the temple of Hercules, in the forum boarium, was regarded as only inferior to the celebrated painting of Fabius Pictor. After living many years at Rome, for he was still there in his eightieth year, he returned to Brundisium on account of the failure of his health, and died in his native town, in the ninetieth year of his age, B.C. 130. We have no further particulars of his life save that his talents gained him the friendship of Lælius, and that he lived on the most intimate terms with his younger rival Accius. Pacuvius was universally allowed by the ancient writers to have been one of the greatest of the Latin tragic poets. (Hor., Ep., ii., 1, 56.) He is especially praised for the loftiness of his thoughts, the vigor of his language, and the extent of his knowledge. Hence we find the epithet doctus frequently applied to him. He was also a favorite with the people, with whom his verses continued to be esteemed in the time of Julius Cæsar. His tragedies were taken from the great Greek writers; but he did not confine himself, like his predecessors, to a mere translation of the latter, but worked up his materials with more freedom and independent judgment. Some of the plays of Pacuvius were not based upon the Greek tragedies, but belonged to the class called Prætextata, in which the subjects were taken from Roman story. One of these was entitled Paulus, which had as its hero L. Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, king of Macedonia. The fragments of Pacuvius are published by Bothe, Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragm., Lips., 1834.

[PADÆI (Παδαῖοι), a rude nomad tribe in Northwestern India (perhaps in the modern Multan or Ajmer), who not only ate raw flesh, but also devoured the sick and old of their own people.]

PĂDUS (now Po), the chief river of Italy, whose name is said to have been of Celtic origin, and to have been given it on account of the pine-trees (in Celtic padi) which grew on its banks. In the Ligurian language it was called Bodencus or Bodincus. Almost all later writers identified the Padus with the fabulous Eridanus, from which amber was obtained, and hence the Roman poets frequently give the name of Eridanus to the Padus. The reason of this identification appears to have been, that the Phœnician vessels received at the mouths of the Padus the amber which had been transported by land from the coasts of the Baltic to those of the Adriatic. The Padus rises from two springs on the eastern side of Mount Vesulus (now Monte Viso) in the Alps, and flows with a general easterly direction through the great plain of Cisalpine Gaul, which it divides into two parts, Gallia Cispadana and Gallia Transpadana. It receives numerous affluents, which drain the whole of this vast plain, descending from the Alps on the north and the Apennines on the south. These affluents, increased in the summer by the melting of the snow on the mountains, frequently bring down such a large body of water as to cause the Padus to overflow its banks. The whole course of the river, including its windings, is about four hundred and fifty miles. About twenty miles from the sea the river divides itself into two main branches, of which the northern one was called Padoa (now Maestra, Po Grande, or Po delle Fornaci), and the southern one Olana (now Po d'Ariano); and each of these now falls into the Adriatic by several mouths. The ancient writers enumerate seven of these mouths, some of which were canals. They lay between Ravenna and Altinum, and bore the following names, according to Pliny, beginning with the southern and ending with the northern: 1. Padusa, also called Augusta Fossa, was a canal dug by Augustus, which connected Ravenna with the Po. 2. Vatrenus, also called Eridanum Ostium or Spineticum Ostium (now Po di Primaro), from the town of Spina at its mouth. 3. Ostium Caprasiæ (now Porto Interito di bell' Ochio). 4. Ostium Sagis (now Porto di Magnavacca). 5. Olane or Volane, the southern main branch of the river, mentioned above. 6. Padoa, the northern main branch, subdivided into several small branches called Ostia Carbonaria. 7. Fossæ Philistinæ, connecting the river, by means of the Tartarus, with the Athesis.

PADŪSA. Vid. PADUS.

PÆAN (Παιάν, Παιήων or Παιών), that is, "the healing," is, according to Homer, the designation of the physician of the Olympian gods, who heals, for example, the wounded Mars (Ares) and Pluto (Hades). After the time of Homer and Hesiod, the word Pæan became a surname of Æsculapius, the god who had the power of healing. The name was, however, used also in the more general sense of deliverer from any evil or calamity, and was thus applied to Apollo and Thanatos, or Death, who are conceived as delivering men from the pains and sorrows of life. With regard to Apollo and Thanatos, however, the name may at the same time contain an allusion to παίειν, to strike, since both are also regarded as destroyers. From Apollo himself the name Pæan was transferred to the song dedicated to him, that is, to hymns chanted to Apollo for the purpose of averting an evil, and to warlike songs, which were sung before or during a battle.

PÆĀNĬA (Παιανία: Παιανιεύς), a demus in Attica, on the eastern slope of Mount Hymettus, belonging to the tribe Pandionis. It was the demus of the orator Demosthenes.

[PÆANIUS (Παιάνιος), the author of a translation of the history of Eutropius into Greek, whose age is uncertain, but who seems to have lived not long after Eutropius himself. The version is printed in Havercamp's and Verheyk's editions of Eutropius.]

PÆMĀNI, a people of German origin in Gallia Belgica.

PÆŎNES (Παίονες), a powerful Thracian [people], who in early times were spread over a [great] part of Macedonia and Thrace. According [to] a legend preserved by Herodotus, they were [of] Teucrian origin; and it is not impossible [that] they were a branch of the great Phrygian [peo]ple, a portion of which seems to have settl[ed in] Europe. In Homer the Pæonians appear [as] allies of the Trojans, and are represented [as] having come from the River Axius. In his[tor]ical times they inhabited the whole of the [north] of Macedonia, from the frontiers of Illyri[a to] some little distance east of the River Strym[on]. Their country was called PÆŎNĬA (Παιο[νία]). The Pæonians were divided into several tri[bes], independent of each other, and governed [by] their own chiefs, though at a later period [they] appear to have owned the authority of one k[ing]. The Pæonian tribes on the lower course of [the] Strymon were subdued by the Persians, [B.C.] 513, and many of them were transplanted [to] Phrygia; but the tribes in the north of [the] country maintained their independence. T[hey] were long troublesome neighbors to the Ma[ce]donian monarchs, whose territories they f[re]quently invaded and plundered; but they w[ere] eventually subdued by Philip, the father of Al[ex]ander the Great, who allowed them neverthel[ess] to retain their own monarchs. They contin[ued] to be governed by their own kings till a m[uch] later period, and these kings were often vir[tu]ally independent of the Macedonian monarch[s]. Thus we read of their king Audoleon, wh[ose] daughter Pyrrhus married. After the conque[st] of Macedonia by the Romans, 168, the part [of] Pæonia east of the Axius formed the secon[d], and the part of Pæonia west of the Axius form[ed] the third of the four districts into which Ma[ce]donia was divided by the Romans.

PÆŌNĬUS (Παιώνιος). 1. Of Ephesus, an arch[i]itect, probably lived between B.C. 420 and 3[80]. In conjunction with Demetrius, he finally com[]pleted the great temple of Diana (Artemis) a[t] Ephesus, which Chersiphron had begun; and with Daphnis the Milesian, he began to build a[t] Miletus a temple of Apollo, of the Ionic order. The latter was the famous Didymæum, or tem[]ple of Apollo Didymus, the ruins of which are still to be seen near Miletus. The former temple, in which the Branchidæ had an oracle of Apollo, was burned at the capture of Miletus by the army of Darius, 498. The new temple, which was on a scale only inferior to that of Diana (Artemis), was never finished.—2. Of Mende, in Thrace, a statuary and sculptor, flourished about 435.

PÆOPLÆ (Παιόπλαι), a Pæonian people on the lower course of the Strymon and the Angites, who were subdued by the Persians, and transplanted to Phrygia by order of Darius, B.C. 513. They returned to their native country with the help of Aristagoras, 500; and we find them settled north of Mount Pangæus in the expedition of Xerxes, 480.

PÆRISĂDES or PARISĂDES (Παιρισάδης or Παρισάδης), the name of two kings of Bosporus. 1. Son of Leucon, succeeded his brother Spartacus, B.C. 349, and reigned thirty-eight years. He continued the same friendly relations with the Athenians which were begun by his father Leucon.—2. The last monarch of the first dynasty that ruled in Bosporus. The pressure of the Scythian tribes induced Pærisades to cede his sovereignty to Mithradates the Great. The date of this event can not be placed earlier than 112, nor later than 98.

Pæstānus Sinus. Vid. Pæstum.

Pæstum (Pæstanus), called Posīdōnĭa (Ποσειδωνία: Ποσειδωνιάτης) originally, was a city in Lucania, situated between four and five miles southeast of the mouth of the Silarus, and near the bay which derived its name from the town (Ποσειδωνιάτης κόλπος, Pæstanus Sinus: now Gulf of Salerno). Its origin is uncertain, but it was probably in existence before it was colonized by the Sybarites about B.C. 524. It soon became a powerful and flourishing city; but, after its capture by the Lucanians (between 438 and 424), it gradually lost the characteristics of a Greek city, and its inhabitants at length ceased to speak the Greek language. Its ancient name of Posidonia was probably changed into that of Pæstum at this time. Under the supremacy of the Romans, who founded a Latin colony at Pæstum about B.C. 274, the town gradually sank in importance; and in the time of Augustus it is only mentioned on account of the beautiful roses grown in the neighborhood. The ruins of Pæstum are striking and magnificent. They consist of the remains of walls, of an amphitheatre, of two fine temples, and of another building. The two temples are in the Doric style, and are some of the most remarkable ruins of antiquity.

Pæsus (Παισός), a town in the Troad, mentioned by Homer, but destroyed before the time of Strabo, its population having been transplanted to Lampsacus. Its site was on a river of the same name (now Beiram-Dere), between Lampsacus and Parium.

Pætīnus, the name of a family of the Fulvia gens, which was eventually superseded by the name of Nobilior. Vid. Nobilior.

Pætus, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signified a person who had a slight cast in the eye.

Pætus, Ælĭus. 1. P., probably the son of Q. Ælius Pætus, a pontifex, who fell in the battle of Cannæ. He was plebeian ædile B.C. 204, prætor 203, magister equitum 202, and consul 201. In his consulship he fought a battle with the Boii, and made a treaty with the Ingauni Ligures. In 199 he was censor with P. Scipio Africanus. He afterward became an augur, and died 174, during a pestilence at Rome. He is mentioned as one of the Roman jurists.—2. Sex., brother of the last, curule ædile 200, consul 198, and censor 193 with Cn. Cethegus. He was a jurist of eminence, and a prudent man, whence he got the cognomen Catus. He is described in a line of Ennius as "Egregie cordatus homo Catus Ælius Sextus." He is enumerated among the old jurists who collected or arranged the matter of law, which he did in a work entitled Tripartita or Jus Ælianum. This was a work on the Twelve Tables, which contained the original text, an interpretation, and the Legis actio subjoined. It was probably the first commentary written on the Twelve Tables.—3. Q. son of No. 1, was elected augur 174 in place of his father, and was consul 167 when he laid waste the territory of the Ligurians.

Pætus, P. Autrōnĭus, was elected consul for B.C. 65 with P. Cornelius Sulla; but he and Sulla were accused of bribery by L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, and condemned. Their election was accordingly declared void, and their accusers were chosen consuls in their stead. Enraged at his disappointment, Pætus conspired with Catiline to murder the consuls Cotta and Torquatus; and this design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who gave the signal prematurely before the whole of the conspirators had assembled. Vid. Catilina. Pætus afterward took an active part in the Catilinarian conspiracy, which broke out in Cicero's consulship, 63. After the suppression of the conspiracy Pætus was brought to trial for the share he had had in it; he was condemned, and went into exile to Epirus, where he was living when Cicero himself went into banishment in 58. Cicero was then much alarmed lest Pætus should make an attempt upon his life.

Pætus, C. Cæsennĭus, sometimes called Cæsonĭus, consul A.D. 61, was sent by Nero in 63 to the assistance of Domitius Corbulo in Armenia. He was defeated by Vologeses, king of Parthia, and purchased peace of the Parthians on the most disgraceful terms. After the accession of Vespasian he was appointed governor of Syria, and deprived Antiochus IV. king of Commagene, of his kingdom.

Păgæ or Pēgæ (Παγαί, Att. Πηγαί: Παγαῖος: now Psatho), a town in Megaris, a colony from Megara, was situated at the eastern extremity of the Alcyonian Sea, and was the most important town in the country after Megara. It possessed a good harbor.

Pagăsæ, called by the Romans Păgăsa, -æ (Παγασαί: now Volo), a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia, and on the bay called after it Sinus Pagasæus or Pagasicus (Παγασητικὸς κόλπος: now Gulf of Volo). It was the port of Iolcos, and afterward of Pheræ, and is celebrated in mythology as the place where Jason built the ship Argo. Hence some of the ancients derived its name from πήγνυμι; but others connected the name with the fountains (πηγαί) in the neighborhood. The adjective Pagasæus is applied to Jason on account of his building the ship Argo, and to Apollo because he had a sanctuary at Pagasæ. The adjective is also used in the general sense of Thessalian: thus Alcestis, the wife of Admetus, is called by Ovid Pagasæa conjux.

Pagræ (Πάγραι: now Pagras, Bagras, Bargas), a city of Syria, on the eastern side of Mount Amanus, at the foot of the pass called by Ptolemy the Syrian Gates, on the road between Antioch and Alexandrea: the scene of the battle between Alexander Balas and Demetrius Nicator, B.C. 145.

Pagus (Πάγος), a remarkable conical hill, from five hundred to six hundred feet high, a little north of Smyrna in Ionia. It was crowned with a shrine of Nemesis, and had a celebrated spring

PALÆMON (Παλαίμων). 1. Son of Athamas and Ino, was originally called Melicertes. When his mother, who was driven mad by Juno (Hera), had thrown herself, with her boy, into the sea, both were changed into marine divinities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palæmon. For details, vid. ATHAMAS. According to some, Melicertes, after his apotheosis, was called Glaucus, whereas, according to another version, Glaucus is said to have leaped into the sea from his love of Melicertes. The body of Melicertes, according to the common tradition, was washed by the waves, or carried by dolphins into the port Schœnus on the Corinthian isthmus, or to that spot on the coast where the altar of Palæmon subsequently stood. There the body was found by his uncle Sisyphus, who ordered it to be carried to Corinth, and on the command of the Nereides he instituted the Isthmian games and sacrifices of black bulls in honor of the deified Palæmon. In the island of Tenedos it is said that children were sacrificed to him, and the whole worship seems to have had something gloomy about it. The Romans identified Palæmon with their own god Portunus or Portumnus. Vid. PORTUNUS.—2. Q. REMMIUS PALÆMON, a grammarian in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was a native of Vicentia (now Vicenza), in the north of Italy, and was originally a slave; but having been manumitted, he opened a school at Rome, where he became the most celebrated grammarian of his time, though his moral character was infamous. He is twice mentioned by Juvenal (vi. 451; vii., 251). He was the master of Quintilian.

PALÆPHĂTUS (Παλαίφατος). 1. Of Athens, a mythical epic poet of the ante-Homeric period. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but he appears to have been usually placed after Phemonoe (vid. PHEMONOE), though some writers assigned him even an earlier date.—2. Of Paros or Priene, lived in the time of Artaxerxes. Suidas attributes to him the work "On Incredible Tales," spoken of below.—3. Of Abydus, an historian, lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and is stated to have been loved by the philosopher Aristotle.—4. An Egyptian or Athenian, and a grammarian. His most celebrated work was entitled Troica (Τρωϊκά), which is frequently referred to by the ancient grammarians. There is extant a small work in fifty-one sections, entitled Παλαίφατος περὶ ἀπίστων, or "Of Incredible Tales," giving a brief account of some of the most celebrated Greek legends. It is an abstract of a much larger work, which is lost. It was to the original work to which Virgil refers (Ciris, 88): "Docta Palæphatia testatur voce papyrus." It is doubtful who was the author of this work; but as he adopts the rationalistic interpretation of the myths, he must be looked upon as a disciple of Euemerus (vid. EVEMERUS), and may thus have been an Alexandrine Greek, and the same person as No. 4. The best edition is by Westermann, in the Mythographi Græci, Brunswick, 1843.

PALÆRUS (Παλαιρός: Παλαιρεύς), a town the coast of Acarnania, near Leucas.

PALÆSTE (now Palasa), a town of Epirus, the coast of Chaonia, and a little south of the Acroceraunian Mountains: here Cæsar land his forces when he crossed over to Greece carry on the war against Pompey.

PALÆSTĪNA (Παλαιστίνη, ἡ Παλαιστίνη Συρ Παλαιστινός, Palæstinus, and rarely Palæsti ensis: now Palestine, or the Holy Land), is t Greek and Roman form of the Hebrew w which was used to denote the country of t Philistines, and which was extended to t whole country. In the Scriptures it is cal CANAAN, from Canaan, the son of Ham, wh descendants were its first inhabitants; the LA OF ISRAEL, the LAND OF PROMISE, the LAND JEHOVAH, and the HOLY LAND. The Roma usually called it JUDÆA, extending to the wh country the name of its southern part. It w regarded by the Greeks and Romans as a p of Syria. Its extent is pretty well defined natural boundaries, namely, the Mediterrane on the west; the mountains of Lebanon on th north; the Jordan and its lakes on the east, i the original extent of the country as defined i the Old Testament, but in the wider and u extent of the country, the Arabian Desert wa its boundary on the east; and on the south an southwest, the deserts which stretch north of the head of the Red Sea as far as the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean: here it was separated from Egypt by the small stream called in Scripture the River of Egypt (probably the brook El-Arish), which fell into the Mediterranean a Rhinocolura (now El-Arish), the frontier town of Egypt. The southern boundary of the territory east of Jordan was the River Arnon (now Wady-el-Mojib). The extent of country within these limits was about eleven thousand square miles. The political boundaries varied at different periods. By the covenant of God with Abraham (Gen., xv., 18), the whole land was given to his descendants, from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates; but the Israelites never had the faith or courage to take permanent possession of this their lot; the nearest approach made to the realization of the promise was in the reigns of David and Solomon, when the conquests of the former embraced a large part of Syria, and the latter built Tadmor (afterward Palmyra) in the Syrian Desert; and, for a time, the Euphrates seems to have been the border of the kingdom on the northeast (vid. 2 Sam viii., 3; 1 Chron., xviii., 3). On the west again, the Israelites never had full possession of the Mediterranean coast, a strip of which, north of Mount Carmel, was always retained by the Phœnicians (vid. PHŒNICE); and another portion in the southwest was held by the Philistines, who were independent, except during brief intervals. On the south and east, again portions of the land were frequently subjugated by the neighboring people of Amalek, Edom Midian, Moab, Ammon, &c. On the north, except during the reigns of David and Solomon Palestine ceased at the southern entrance of the valley of Cœlesyria, and at Mount Hermon in Antilibanus. In the physical formation of Pal estine, the most remarkable feature is the depression which is formed by the valley of the Jordan and its lakes (vid. JORDANES), between which and the Mediterranean the country is intersected by mountains, chiefly connected with the Lebanon system, and running north and south. Between these ranges, and between the central range and the western coast, are some comparatively extensive plains, such as those of Esdraelon and Sharon, and several smaller valleys; in the south of the country the mountains gradually subside into the rocky deserts of Arabia Petræa. The valleys and slopes of the hills are extremely fertile, and were much more so in ancient times, when the soil on the mountain sides was preserved by terraces, which are now destroyed through neglect or wantonness. This division of the country has only a few small rivers (besides mountain streams), which fall into the Mediterranean: the chief of them are the Belus, just south of Ptolemaïs (now Acre), the Kishon, flowing from Mount Tabor, through the plain of Esdraelon, and falling into the Bay of Acre north of Mount Carmel, the Chorseus, north of Cæsarea, the Kanah, west of Sebaste (Samaria), the Jarkon, north of Joppa, the Eshcol, near Askelon, and the Besor, near Gaza. On the east of the Jordan, the land rises toward the rocky desert of the Hauran (the ancient Auranitis), and the hills bordering the Syrian Desert, its lower portion, near the river, forming rich pastures, watered by the eastern tributaries of the Jordan, the chief of which are the Hieromax, the Jabbok, and the Arnon, the last flowing into the Dead Sea. The earliest inhabitants of Palestine were the several tribes of Canaanites. It is unnecessary to recount in detail those events with which we are familiar through the sacred history: the divine call of Abraham from Mesopotamia to live as a stranger in the land which God promised to his descendants, and the story of his, and his son's, and his grandson's residence in it till Israel and his family removed to Egypt: their return and conquest of the land of Canaan and of the portion of territory east of the Jordan, and the partition of the whole among the twelve tribes: the contests with the surrounding nations, and the government by judges, till the establishment of the monarchy under Saul: the conquests of David, the splendid reign of Solomon, and the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam into the kingdom of Israel, including two thirds of the country west of Jordan, and all east of it, and the kingdom of Judah, including the southern portion which was left, between the Mediterranean on the west, and the Dead Sea and a small extent of Jordan on the east: and the histories of these two monarchies down to their overthrow by the Assyrians and Babylonians respectively. The former of these conquests made an important change in the population of Palestine by the removal of the greater part of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Israel, and the settlement in their place of heathen nations from other parts of the Assyrian empire, thus restricting the country occupied by the genuine Israelites within the limits of the kingdom of Judah. Hence the names of Judæa and Jews applied to the country and the people in their subsequent history. Between these last and the mixed people of North Palestine a deadly enmity arose; the natural dislike of the pure race of Israel to heathen foreigners being aggravated by the wrongs they suffered from them, especially at their return from the Babylonish captivity, and still more by the act of religious usurpation of which the remnant of the Northern Israelites were guilty at a later period, in setting up a temple for themselves on Mount Gerizim. Vid. SAMARIA. The date assigned to the Assyrian conquest of the kingdom of Israel is B.C. 721. The remainder of the history of the kingdom of Judah (passing over its religious history, which is most important during this period) consists of alternate contests with, and submissions to, the kings of Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon, till the conquest of the country by Nebuchadnezzar and the removal of a part of its people to Babylonia, in 598, and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, after the rebellion of Zedekiah, in 588, when a still larger portion of the people were carried captive to Babylon, while others escaped to Egypt In 584, during the siege of Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar sent a further portion of the Jews into captivity; but there was still a considerable remnant left in the land, and (what is very important) foreign settlers were not introduced; so that, when Cyrus, after overthrowing the Babylonian empire, issued his edict for the return of the Jews to their own land (B.C. 536), there was no great obstacle to their quiet settlement in it. They experienced some trouble from the jealousy and attacks of the Samaritans, and the changeful dispositions of the Persian court; but at length, by the efforts of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah, the new temple was finished and dedicated in 516, and Jerusalem was rebuilt. Fresh bands of Jewish exiles returned under Ezra, 458, and Nehemiah, 445; and, between this time and that of the Macedonian conquest, Judæa was repeopled by the Jews, and through the tolerance of the Persian kings, it was governed virtually by the high-priests. In B.C. 332, after Alexander had taken Tyre and Gaza, he visited Jerusalem, and received the quiet submission of the Jews, paying the most marked respect to their religion. Under the successors of Alexander, Palestine belonged alternately to Egypt and Syria, the contest between whose kings for its possession are too complicated to recount here; but its internal government seems to have been pretty much in the hands of the high-priests, until the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes provoked the successful revolt under the Maccabees or Asmonæans, whose history is given under MACCABÆI, and the history of the Idumæan dynasty, who succeeded them, is given under ANTIPATER, HERODES, and ARCHELAUS. The later Asmonæan princes had regained the whole of Palestine, including the districts of Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee (besides Idumæa), west of the Jordan, and the several districts of Peræa, Batanea, Gaulonitis, Ituræa, and Trachonitis or Auranitis, east of it; and this was the extent of Herod's kingdom. But, from B.C. 63, when Pompey took Jerusalem, the country was really subject to the Romans. At the death of Herod, his kingdom was divided between his sora as tetrarchs, under the sanction of Augustus, Archelaus receiving Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, Herod Antipas Galilee and Peræa, and Philip Batanæa, Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis; all standing to the Roman empire in a relation of virtual subjection, which successive events converted into an integral union. First, A.D. 7, Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and Judæa was placed under a Roman procurator: next, about 31, Philip died, and his government was united to the province of Syria, and was in 37 again conferred on Herod Agrippa I., with the title of king, and with the addition of Abilene, the district round Damascus. In 39, Herod Antipas was banished to Gaul, and his tetrarchy was added to the kingdom of Herod Agrippa; and two years later he received from Claudius the government of Judæa and Samaria, and thus Palestine was reunited under a nominal king. On his death in 44, Palestine again became a part of the Roman province of Syria under the name of Judæa, which was governed by a procurator. The Jews were, however, most turbulent subjects of the Roman empire, and at last they broke out into a general rebellion, which, after a most sanguinary war, was crushed by Vespasian and Titus; and the latter took and destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Under Constantine, Palestine was divided afresh into the three provinces of P. Prima in the centre, P. Secunda in the north, and P. Tertia, the south of Judæa, with Idumæa.

Palamēdes (Παλαμήδης). 1. Son of Nauplius and Clymene. He joined the Greeks in their expedition against Troy; but Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Ulysses, envious of his fame, caused a captive Phrygian to write to Palamedes a letter in the name of Priam, and bribed a servant of Palamedes to conceal the letter under his master's bed. They then accused Palamedes of treachery; upon searching his tent, they found the letter which they themselves had dictated, and thereupon they caused him to be stoned to death. When Palamedes was led to death, he exclaimed, "Truth, I lament thee, for thou hast died even before me." According to some traditions, it was Ulysses alone who hated and persecuted Palamedes. The cause of this hatred is also stated differently. According to some, Ulysses hated him because he had been compelled by him to join the Greeks against Troy; according to others, because he had been severely censured by Palamedes for returning with empty hands from a foraging excursion into Thrace. The manner in which Palamedes perished is likewise related differently. Some say that Ulysses and Diomedes induced him to descend into a well, where they pretended they had discovered a treasure, and when he was below they cast stones upon him, and killed him; others state that he was drowned by them while fishing; and others, that he was killed by Paris with an arrow. The place where he was killed is either Colonæ in Troas, or in Tenedos, or at Geræstus. The story of Palamedes, which is not mentioned by Homer, seems to have been first related in the Cypria, and was afterward developed by the tragic poets, especially by Euripides, and lastly by the sophists, who liked to look upon Palamedes as their pattern. The tragic poets and sophists describe him as a sage among the Greeks, and as a poet; as [he is] said to have invented light-houses, meas[ures], scales, the discus, dice, the alphabet, and [the] art of regulating sentinels.—2. A Greek g[ram]marian, was a contemporary of Athenæus, [who] introduces him as one of the speakers [in his] work.

Pales, a Roman divinity of flocks and [herds], is described by some as a male, a[nd by] others as a female divinity. Hence some [mod]ern writers have inferred that Pales was a [com]bination of both sexes; but such a monst[rosity] is altogether foreign to the religion of the [Ro]mans. Some of the rites performed at the [fes]tival of Pales, which was celebrated on the [21st] of April, the birth-day of the city of R[ome], would seem to indicate that the divinity w[as] female; but, besides the express statemen[t to] the contrary, there are also other reasons [for] believing that Pales was a male divinity. [The] name seems to be connected with Palatinus, [the] centre of all the earliest legends of Rome, [and] the god himself was with the Romans the [em]bodiment of the same idea as Pan among [the] Greeks. Palīci (Παλικοί), were Sicilian gods, twin sons of Jupiter (Zeus) and the nymph Thalia, the daughter of Vulcan (Hephæstus). Sometimes they are called sons of Vulcan (Hephæstus) by Ætna, the daughter of Oceanus. Thalia, from fear of Juno (Hera), prayed to be swallowed up by the earth; her prayer was granted, but in due time she sent forth from the earth two boys, who, according to the absurd etymology of the ancients, were called Παλικοί, from τὸ πάλιν ἱκέσθαι. They were worshipped in the neighborhood of Mount Ætna, near Palice, and in the earliest times human sacrifices were offered to them. Their sanctuary was an asylum for runaway slaves, and near it there gushed forth from the earth two sulphurous fountains called Deilloi, or brothers of the Palici, at which solemn oaths were taken. The oaths were written on tablets, and thrown into one of the fountains; if the tablet swam on the water, the oath was considered to be true; but if it sank down, the oath was regarded as a perjury, and was believed to be punished instantaneously by blindness or death.

Palinūrum (now Cape Palinuro), a promontor[y] on the western coast of Lucania, which was said to have derived its name from Palinurus, the son of Iasus, and pilot of the ship of Æneas, who fell into the sea, and was murdered on the coast by the natives.

[PALIURUS (Παλίουρος), a town of Africa on the borders of Cyrenaica and Marmarica, on a river of the same name.]

[PALLA (Πάλλα) or PALÆ (now probably Porto Pollo), a city on the south coast of Corsica, at the termination of the Roman road running along the eastern coast.]

PALLACŌPAS (Παλλακόπας), a canal in Babylonia, cut from the Euphrates, at a point eight hundred stadia (eighty geographical miles) south of Babylon, westward to the edge of the Arabian Desert, where it lost itself in marshes.

PALLĬDAS (Παλλάδας), the author of a large number of epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a pagan and an Alexandrean grammarian. He lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era, for in one of his epigrams he speaks of Hypatia, the daughter of Theon, as still alive. Hypatia was murdered in A.D. 415.

PALLĬDĬUM (Παλλάδιον), properly any image of Pallas Athena (Minerva), but generally applied to an ancient image of this goddess, which was kept hidden and secret, and was revered as a pledge of the safety of the town where it existed. Among these ancient images of Pallas none is more celebrated than the Trojan Palladium, concerning which there was the following tradition: Minerva (Athena) was brought up by Triton; and when his daughter Pallas and Minerva (Athena) were once wrestling together for the sake of exercise, Jupiter (Zeus) interfered in the struggle, and suddenly held the ægis before the face of Pallas. Pallas, while looking up to Jupiter (Zeus), was wounded by Minerva (Athena), and died. Minerva (Athena), in her sorrow, caused an image of the maiden to be made, round which she hung the ægis. When Electra had come as a suppliant to the Palladium, Jupiter (Zeus) hurled it down from heaven upon the earth, because it had been sullied by the hands of one who was no longer a pure maiden. The image fell upon the earth at Troy when Ilus was just beginning to build the city. Ilus erected a sanctuary to it. According to some, the image was dedicated by Electra, and according to others, it was given by Jupiter (Zeus) to Dardanus. The image itself is said to have been three cubits in height, with its legs close together, and holding in its right hand a spear, and in the left a spindle and a distaff. This Palladium remained at Troy until Ulysses and Diomedes contrived to carry it away, because the city could not be taken so long as it was in the possession of that sacred treasure. According to some accounts, Troy contained two Palladia, one of which was carried off by Ulysses and Diomedes, while the other was conveyed by Æneas to Italy, or the one taken by the Greeks was a mere imitation, while that which Æneas brought to Italy was the genuine image. But this two-fold Palladium was probably a mere invention, to account for its existence in more than one place. Several towns both in Greece and Italy claimed the honor of possessing the genuine Trojan Palladium, as, for example, Argos and Athens, where it was believed that Demophon took it from Diomedes on his return from Troy. Vid. DEMOPHON. This Palladium at Athens, however, was different from another image of Pallas there, which was also called Palladium, and stood on the acropolis. In Italy the cities of Rome, Lavinium, Luceria, and Siris likewise pretended to possess the Trojan Palladium.

PALLADĬUS (Παλλάδιος). 1. Of Methone, a sophist or rhetorician, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great.—2. Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia, to which he was raised A.D. 400 He was ordained by Chrysostom; and on the banishment of the latter, Palladius was accused of holding the opinions of Origen, and, fearful of the violence of his enemies, he fled to Rome, 405. Shortly afterward he ventured to return to the East, but was arrested and banished to the extremity of Upper Egypt. He was afterward restored to his bishopric of Helenopolis, from which he was translated to that of Aspona or Aspuna in Galatia, perhaps about 419 or 420. Three works in Greek have come down to us under the name of Palladius, but there has been considerable dispute whether they were written by one individual or more: (1.) Historia Lausiaca, "the Lausiac History," so called from its being dedicated to Lausus, a chamberlain at the imperial court. This work contains internal proofs of having been written by the Bishop of Helenopolis. It gives biographical notices or characteristic anecdotes of a number of ascetics with whom Palladius was personally acquainted, or concerning whom he received information from those who had known them personally. Edited by Meursius, Lugd. Bat., 1616. (2.) The Life of Chrysostom, was probably written by a different person from the Bishop of Helenopolis. Edited by Bigotius, Paris, 1680. (3.) De Gentibus Indiæ et Bragmanibus (Brahmans). The authorship of this work is uncertain. It appears that the writer himself had visited India. Edited by Camerarius in Liber Gnomologicus, 8vo, Lips., without date; and by Bissæus, London, 1665.—3. Surnamed Iatrosophista, a Greek medical writer, of whose life nothing is known. He lived after Galen. We possess three works commonly attributed to him, namely, two books of commentaries on Hippocrates, and a short treatise on Fevers, all of which are taken chiefly from Galen.—4. PALLADĬUS RUTILĬUS TAURUS ÆMILIĀNUS, the author of a treatise De Re Rustica, in the form of a Farmer's Calendar, the various operations connected with agriculture and a rural life being arranged in regular order, according to the seasons in which they ought to be performed. It is comprised in fourteen books: the first is introductory; the twelve following contain the duties of the twelve months in succession, commencing with January; the last is a poem, in eighty-five elegiac couplets, upon the art of grafting (De Insitione). A considerable portion of the work is taken from Columella. The date of the author is uncertain, but it is most probable that he lived in the middle of the fourth century of the Christian era. The work was very popular in the Middle Ages. Edited in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ by Gesner, Lips., 1735; reprinted by Ernesti in 1773, and by Schneider, Lips., 1794.

PALLANTIA (Pallantinus: now Palencia), the chief town of the Vaccæi in the north of Hispania Tarraconensis, and on a tributary of the Durius.

PALLANTIAS and PALLANTIS, patronymics given to Aurora, the daughter of the giant Pallas.

PALLANTIUM (Παλλάντιον: Παλλαντιεύς), an ancient town of Arcadia near Tegea, said to have been founded by Pallas, the son of Lycaon. Evander is said to have come from this place, and to have called the town, which he founded on the banks of the Tiber, Pallantium (afterward Palantium and Palatium), after the Arcadian town. On the foundation of Megalopolis, most of the inhabitants of Pallantium settled in the new city; and the town remained almost deserted, till it was restored by Antoninus Pius, and exempted from taxes on account of its supposed connection with the imperial city.

[PALLANTIUS, epithet of Evander. Vid. PALLAS, No. 4.]

PALLAS (Πάλλας). 1. One of the Titans, son of Crius and Eurybia, husband of Styx, and father of Zelus, Cratos, Bia, and Nice.—2. A giant, slain by Minerva (Athena) in the battle with the gods.—3. According to some traditions, the father of Minerva (Athena), who slew him when he attempted to violate her.—4. Son of Lycaon, and grandfather of Evander, is said to have founded the town of Pallantium in Arcadia. Hence Evander is called by the poets Pallantius heros.—5. Son of Evander, and an ally of Æneas, was slain by the Rutulian Turnus.—6. Son of the Athenian king Pandion, and father of Clytus and Butes. His two sons were sent with Cephalus to implore assistance of Æacus against Minos. Pallas was slain by Theseus. The celebrated family of the Pallantidæ at Athens traced their origin from this Pallas.

PALLAS (Παλλάς), a surname of ATHENA (Minerva). In Homer this name always appears united with that of Athena, as Παλλὰς Ἀθήνη, or Παλλὰς Ἀθηναίη; but in later writers we also find Pallas alone instead of Athena (Minerva). Some ancient writers derive the name from πάλλειν, to brandish, in reference to the goddess brandishing the spear or ægis; others derive it from the giant Pallas, who was slain by Athena (Minerva). But it is more probable that Pallas is the same word as πάλλαξ, i. e., a virgin or maiden.

PALLAS, a favorite freedman of the Emperor Claudius. In conjunction with another freedman, Narcissus, he administered the affairs of the empire. After the death of Messalina, Pallas persuaded the weak emperor to marry Agrippina; and as Narcissus had been opposed to this marriage, he now lost his former power, and Pallas and Agrippina became the rulers of the Roman world. It was Pallas who persuaded Claudius to adopt the young Domitius (afterward the Emperor Nero), the son of Agrippina; and it was doubtless with the assistance of Pallas that Agrippina poisoned her husband. Nero, soon after his accession, became tired of his mother's control, and, as one step toward emancipating himself from her authority, he deprived Pallas of all his public offices, and dismissed him from the palace in 56. He was suffered to live unmolested for some years, till at length his immense wealth excited the rapacity of Nero, who had him removed by poison in [illegible] His enormous wealth, which was acquired during the reign of Claudius, had become proverbial, as we see from the line in Juvenal (i., 109) ego possideo plus Pallante et Licinio. The brother of Pallas was Antonius or Claudius Felix, who was appointed by Claudius procurator of Judæa. Vid. FELIX, ANTONIUS.

PALLAS LACUS. Vid. TRITON.

PALLĒNE (Παλλήνη). 1. (Παλληναῖος, Παλλήνιος), the most westerly of the three peninsulas running out from Chalcidice in Macedonia. It is said to have been formerly called Phlegra (Φλέγρα), and on the narrow isthmus which connected it with the main land stood the important town of Potidæa.—2. (Παλληνεύς, rarely Παλληναῖος), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochis, was situated on one of the slopes of Pentelicus, a few miles southwest of Marathon. It possessed a temple of Minerva (Athena), surnamed Pallenis (Παλληνίς) from the place; and in its neighborhood the contest between Pisistratus and the party opposed to him took place.

PALMA (now Palma), a Roman colony on the southwest coast of the island Balearis Major (now Majorca).

[PALMA, A. CORNELIUS, was consul in A.D. 99, and a second time in 109. Between his first and second consulships he was governor of Syria, and conquered the part of Arabia around Petra about A.D. 105. He was put to death by order of Hadrian on the latter's accession to the throne in 117.]

PALMARIA (now Palmaruola), a small uninhabited island off the coast of Latium and the Promontory Circeium.

[PALMUS, a Trojan warrior wounded by Mezentius, who stripped him of his armor.]

PALMȲRA (Πάλμυρα: Παλμυρηνός, Palmyrenus; in the Old Testament, Tadmor: ruins at Tadmor), a celebrated city of Syria, stood in an oasis of the great Syrian Desert, which from its position must have been in the earliest times a halting-place for the caravans between Syria and Mesopotamia. Here Solomon built a city which was called in Hebrew Tadmor, that is, the city of palm-trees; and of this name the Greek Πάλμυρα is a translation. It lies in 34° 18′ north latitude, and 38° 14′ east longitude, and was reckoned two hundred and thirty-seven Roman miles from the coast of Syria, one hundred and seventy-six northeast of Damascus, eighty east of Emesa, and one hundred and thirteen southeast of Apamea. With the exception of a tradition that it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, we hear nothing of it till the time of the government of the East by M. Antonius, who marched to surprise it, but the inhabitants retreated with their movable property beyond the Euphrates. Under the early Roman emperors it was a free city and a great commercial emporium. Its position on the border between the Parthian and Roman dominions gave it the command of the trade of both, but also subjected it to the injuries of war. Under Hadrian and the Antonines it was highly favored and reached its greatest splendor. The history of its temporary elevation to the rank of a capital in the third century is related under ODENATHUS and ZENOBIA. On its capture by Aurelian in 270, it was plundered, and soon afterward an insurrection of its inhabitants led to its partial destruction. It was fortified by Justinian, but never recovered from its fall. In the Arabian conquest it was one of the first cities taken; but it was still inhabited by a small population, chiefly of Jews, till it was taken and plundered by Timour (Tamerlane) in 1400. It has long been entirely deserted, except when a horde of Bedouins pitch their tents among its splendid ruins. Those ruins, which form a most striking object in the midst of the Desert, are of the Roman period, and decidedly inferior in the style of architecture, as well as in grandeur of effect, to those of Baalbek (vid. HELIOPOLIS), the sister deserted city of Syria. The finest remains are those of the temple of the Sun; the most interesting are the square sepulchral towers of from three to five stories. The streets and the foundations of the houses are traceable to some extent; and there are several inscriptions in Greek and in the native Palmyrene dialect, besides one in Hebrew and one or two in Latin. The surrounding district of PALMYRÊNE contained the Syrian Desert from the eastern border of Cœlesyria to the Euphrates.

[PALMYRENE (Παλμυρηνή). Vid. PALMYRA.]

[PALMYS (Πάλμυς), a warrior from Ascania, who came to the aid of the Trojans against the Greeks.]

[PALUS MÆOTIS (Μαιῶτις λίμνη). Vid. MÆOTIS.]

[PALUDES POMPTINÆ. Vid. POMPTINÆ PALUDES.]

PAMĪSUS (Πάμισος). 1. A southern tributary of the Peneus in Thessaly.—2. (Now Pirnatza), the chief river of Messenia, rises in the eastern part of the country, forty stadia east of Ithome, flows first southwest, and then south through the Messenian plain, and falls into the Messenian Gulf.—3. A small river in Laconia, falls into the Messenian Gulf near Leuctra. It was at one time the ancient boundary between Laconia and Messenia.

[PAMMĔNES (Παμμένης). 1. A Theban general of considerable celebrity, was connected with Epaminondas by political and friendly ties. When Philip was sent as a hostage to Thebes, he was placed under the care of Pammenes. He distinguished himself in the defence and support of Megalopolis, and defeated the forces of the Persian king Ochus.—2. An Athenian rhetorician, a contemporary of Cicero, who calls him the most eloquent man in Greece. M. Brutus studied under him.]

PAMPHĬA or PAMPHĬUM (Παμφία, Πάμφιον), a village of Ætolia, destroyed by the Macedonians.

PAMPHĬLA (Παμφίλη), a female historian of considerable reputation, who lived in the reign of Nero. She is described by some writers as a native of Epidaurus, by others as an Egyptian. Her principal work, of which Photius has given some extracts, was a kind of Historical Miscellany (entitled συμμίκτων ἱστορικῶν ὑπομνημάτων λόγοι). It was not arranged according to subjects or according to any settled plan, but it was more like a common-place book, in which each piece of information was set down as it fell under the notice of the writer. Modern scholars are best acquainted with the name of Pamphila from a statement in her work, preserved by A. Gellius (xv., 23), by which is ascertained the year of the birth of Hellanicus, Herodotus, and Thucydides respectively.

PAMPHĬLUS (Πάμφιλος). 1. A disciple of Plato, who is only remembered by the circumstance that Epicurus, when a young man, heard him at Samos. Epicurus used to speak of him with great contempt, that he might not be thought to owe any thing to his instruction; for it was the great boast of Epicurus that he was the sole author of his own philosophy.—2. An Alexandrean grammarian, of the school of Aristarchus, and the author of a lexicon, which is supposed by some scholars to have formed the foundation of the lexicon of Hesychius. He appears to have lived in the first century of our era.—3. A philosopher or grammarian of Nicopolis, the author of a work on agriculture, of which there are considerable fragments in the Geoponica.—4. Presbyter of Cæsarea, in Palestine, saint and martyr, and celebrated for his friendship with Eusebius, who, as a memorial of this intimacy, assumed the surname of Pamphilus. Vid. EUSEBIUS. He suffered martyrdom A.D. 307. The life of Pamphilus seems to have been entirely devoted to the cause of biblical literature. He was an ardent admirer and follower of Origen. He formed, at Cæsarea, an important public library, chiefly of ecclesiastical authors. Perhaps the most valuable of the contents of this library were the Tetraplà and Hexapla of Origen, from which Pamphilus, in conjunction with Eusebius, formed a new recension of the Septuagint, numerous copies of which were put into circulation.—5. Of Amphipolis, one of the most distinguished of the Greek painters, flourished about B.C. 390-350. He was the disciple of Eupompus, the founder of the Sicyonian school of painting, for the establishment of which, however, Pamphilus seems to have done much more than even Eupompus himself. Of his own works we have most scanty accounts; but as a teacher of his art he was surpassed by none of the ancient masters. According to Pliny, he was the first artist who possessed a thorough acquaintance with all branches of knowledge, especially arithmetic and geometry, without which he used to say that the art could not be perfected. All science, therefore, which could in any way contribute to form the perfect artist, was included in his course of instruction, which extended over ten years, and for which the fee was no less than a talent. Among those who paid this price for his tuition were Apelles and Melanthius. Not only was the school of Pamphilus remarkable for the importance which the master attached to general learning, but also for the minute attention which he paid to accuracy in drawing.

PAMPHŌS (Πάμφως), a mythical poet, who is placed by Pausanias later than Olen, and much earlier than Homer. His name is connected particularly with Attica.

PAMPHȲLĬA (Παμφυλία : Πάμφυλος, Παμφύλιος, Pamphylius), in its original and more restricted sense, was a narrow strip of the southern coast of Asia Minor, extending in a sort of arch along the SINUS PAMPHYLĬUS (now Gulf of Adalia), between Lycia on the west and Cilicia on the east, and on the north bordering on Pisidia. Its boundaries, as commonly stated, were Mount Climax on the west, the River Melas on the east, and the foot of Mount Taurus on the north; but the statements are not very exact: Strabo gives to the coast of Pamphylia a length of six hundred and forty stadia, from Olbia on the west to Ptolemaïs, some distance east of the Melas, and he makes its width barely two miles; and there are still other different accounts. It was a belt of mountain coast-land, intersected by rivers flowing down from the Taurus in a short course, but several of them with a considerable body of water: the chief of them, going from west to east, were the CATARRHACTES, CESTRUS, EURYMEDON, and MELAS (No. 6), all navigable for some distance from their mouths. The inhabitants were a mixture of races, whence their name Πάμφυλοι, of all races (the genuine old form, the other in -ιοι is later). Besides the aboriginal inhabitants of the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) family and Cilicians, there were very early Greek settlers and later Greek colonies in the land. Tradition ascribed the first Greek settlements to MOPSUS, after the Trojan war, from whom the country was in early times called MOPSOPIA. It was successively a part of the Persian, Macedonian, Greco-Syrian, and Pergamene kingdoms, and passed by the will of Attalus III. to the Romans (B.C. 130), under whom it was made a province; but this province of Pamphylia included also Pisidia and Isauria, and afterward a part of Lycia. Under Constantine Pisidia was again separated from Pamphylia.

PAMPHYLIUM MARE, PAMPHYLIUS SINUS (τὸ Παμφύλιον πέλαγος, Παμφύλιος κόλπος: now Gulf of Adalia), the great gulf formed in the southern coast of Asia Minor by the direction of the Taurus chain and by Mount Solyma, between the Promontorium Sacrum or Chelidonium (now Cape Khelidonia), the southeastern point of Lycia, and Promontorium Anemurium (now Cape Anemour), the southern point of Cilicia. Its depth from north to south, from Promontorium Sacrum to Olbia, is reckoned by Strabo at three hundred and sixty-seven stadia (36·7 geographical miles), which is too little.

PAMPHYLUS (Πάμφυλος), son of Ægimius and brother of Dymas, was king of the Dorians at the foot of Mount Pindus, and along with the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus.

PAN (Πάν), the great god of flocks and shepherds among the Greeks. He is usually called a son of Mercury (Hermes) by the daughter of Dryops; but he is also described as a son of Mercury (Hermes) by Callisto, by Œneis or Thymbris, or by Penelope, whom the god visited in the shape of a ram, or as a son of Penelope by Ulysses, or by all her suitors in common. He was perfectly developed from his birth, and when his mother saw him she ran away through fear; but Mercury (Hermes) carried him to Olympus, where all the gods were delighted with him, and especially Bacchus (Dionysus). From his delighting all the gods, the Homeric hymn derives his name. He was originally only an Arcadian god, and Arcadia was always the principal seat of his worship. From this country his name and worship afterward spread over other parts of Greece, but at Athens his worship was not introduced till the time of the battle of Marathon. In Arcadia he was the god of forest pastures, flocks, and shepherds, and dwelt in grottoes, wandered on the summits of mountains and rocks, and in valleys, either amusing himself with the chase, or leading the dances of the nymphs. As the god of flocks, both wild and tame animals, it was his province to increase and guard them; but he was also a hunter, and hunters owed their success or failure to him. The Arcadian hunters used to scourge the statue of the god if they had been disappointed in the chase. During the heat of mid-day he used to slumber, and was very indignant when any one disturbed him. As the god of flocks, bees also were under his protection, as well as the coast where fishermen carried on their pursuit. As the god of every thing connected with pastoral life, he was fond of music, and the inventor of the syrinx or shepherd's flute, which he himself played in a masterly manner, and in which he instructed others also, such as Daphnis. He is thus said to have loved the poet Pindar, and to have sung and danced his lyric songs, in return for which Pindar erected to him a sanctuary in front of his house. Pan, like other gods who dwelt in forests, was dreaded by travellers, to whom he sometimes appeared, and whom he startled with sudden awe or terror. Thus, when Phidippides, the Athenian, was sent to Sparta to solicit its aid against the Persians, Pan accosted him, and promised to terrify the barbarians if the Athenians would worship him. Hence sudden fright without any visible cause was ascribed to Pan, and was called a Panic fear. He is further said to have had a terrific voice, and by it to have frightened the Titans in their fight with the gods. It seems that this feature, namely, his fondness of noise and riot, was the cause of his being considered the minister and companion of Cybele and Bacchus (Dionysus). He was, at the same time, believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and to have even instructed Apollo in this art. While roaming in his forests he fell in love with Echo, by whom or by Pitho he became the father of Iynx. His love of Syrinx, after whom he named his flute, is well known from Ovid (Met., i., 691, seq.). Fir-trees were sacred to him, since the nymph Pitys, whom he loved, had been metamorphosed into that tree; and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of cows, rams, lambs, milk, and honey. Sacrifices were also offered to him in common with Bacchus (Dionysus) and the nymphs. The various epithets which are given him by the poets refer either to his singular appearance, or are derived from the names of the places in which he was worshipped. The Romans identified with Pan their own god Inuus, and also Faunus, which name is merely another form of Pan. In works of art Pan is represented as a voluptuous and sensual being, with horns, puck-nose, and goat's feet, sometimes in the act of dancing, and sometimes playing on the syrinx.

PANACĒA (Πανάκεια), i. e., "the all-healing," a daughter of Æsculapius, who had a temple at Oropus.

PANACHAICUS MONS (τὸ Παναχαϊκὸν ὄρος) [illegible] mountain in Achaia, six thousand three hundred feet high, immediately behind Patræ.

PANACRA (Πάνακρα), a mountain in Crete, a branch of Mount Ida.

PANACTUM (Πάνακτον), a town on the frontiers of Attica and Bœotia, originally belonged to Bœotia, and, after being a frequent object of contention between the Athenians and Bœotians, at length became permanently annexed to Attica.

PANÆNUS (Πάναινος), a distinguished Athenian painter, who flourished B.C. 448. He was the nephew of Phidias, whom he assisted in decorating the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia. He was also the author of a series of paintings of the battle of Marathon, in the Pœcile at Athens.

[PANÆTIUS (Παναίτιος). 1. Tyrant of Leontini. He was the first who raised himself to power in that way in Sicily.—2. A native of Tenos, commanded a vessel of the Tenians in the armament of Xerxes against Greece, apparently by compulsion, for, just before the battle of Salamis, Panætius with his vessel deserted the Persians and joined the Greeks.]

PANÆTĬUS (Παναίτιος), a native of Rhodes, and a celebrated Stoic philosopher, studied first at Pergamum under the grammarian Crates, and subsequently at Athens under the Stoic Diogenes of Babylon, and his disciple Antipater of Tarsus. He afterward went to Rome, where he became an intimate friend of Lælius and of Scipio Africanus the younger. In B.C. 144 he accompanied Scipio on the embassy which he undertook to the kings of Egypt and Asia in alliance with Rome. Panætius succeeded Antipater as head of the Stoic school, and died at Athens, at all events before 111. The principal work of Panætius was his treatise on the theory of moral obligation (περὶ τοῦ καθήκοντος), in three books, from which Cicero took the greater part of his work De Officiis. Panætius had softened down the harsh severity of the older Stoics, and, without giving up their fundamental definitions, had modified them so as to make them applicable to the conduct of life, and had clothed them in the garb of eloquence.

PANÆTOLĪUM, a mountain in Ætolia, near Thermon, in which town the Panætolium or general assembly of the Ætolians was held.

[PANARA. Vid. PANCHÆA.]

[PANCHÆA (Παγχαία), a fabled island in the Eastern or Indian Ocean, which Euhemerus pretended to have discovered, and to have found in its capital, Panara, a temple of the Triphylian Jupiter, containing a column inscribed with the date of the births and deaths of many of the gods. (Vid. EUHEMERUS.) Virgil makes mention of Panchæa and its turiferæ arenæ, by which he evidently refers to Arabia Felix.]

PANDA, a river in the country of the Siraci, in the interior of Sarmatia Asiatica (Tac., Ann., xii., 16).

PANDĂRĔŌS (Πανδάρεως), son of Merops of Miletus, is said to have stolen from the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete the golden dog which Vulcan (Hephæstus) had made, and to have carried it to Tantalus. When Jupiter (Zeus) sent Mercury (Hermes) to Tantalus to claim the dog back, Tantalus declared that it was not in his possession. The god, however, took the animal by force, and threw Mount Sipylus upon Tantalus. Pandareos fled to Athens, and thence to Sicily, where he perished with his wife Harmothoe. The story of Pandareos derives more interest from that of his three daughters. Aëdon, the eldest of them, was married to Zethus, the brother of Amphion, by whom she became the mother of Itylus. From envy of Amphion, who had many children, she determined to murder one of his sons, Amaleus, but in the night she mistook her own son for her nephew, and killed him. The two other daughters of Pandareos, Merope and Cleodora (according to Pausanias, Camira and Clytia), were, according to Homer, deprived of their parents by the gods, and remained as helpless orphans in the palace. Venus (Aphrodite), however, fed them with milk, honey, and wine. Juno (Hera) gave them beauty and understanding far above other women. Diana (Artemis) gave them dignity, and Minerva (Athena) skill in the arts. When Venus (Aphrodite) went up to Olympus to arrange the nuptials for her maidens, they were carried off by the Harpies.

PANDĂRUS (Πάνδαρος). 1. A Lycian, son of Lycaon, commanded the inhabitants of Zelea on Mount Ida in the Trojan war. He was distinguished in the Trojan army as an archer, and was said to have received his bow from Apollo. He was slain by Diomedes, or, according to others, by Sthenelus. He was afterward honored as a hero at Pinara in Lycia.—2. Son of Alcanor, and twin-brother of Bitias, was one of the companions of Æneas, and was slain by Turnus.

PANDATĀRĬA (now Vendutene), a small island in the Tyrrhenian Sea off the coast of Campania, to which Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was banished.

PANDĒMOS (Πάνδημος), i. e., "common to all the people," a surname of Venus (Aphrodite), used in a two-fold sense: 1. As the goddess of low, sensual pleasures, as Venus vulgivaga or popularis, in opposition to Venus Urania, or the heavenly Venus (Aphrodite). 2. As the goddess uniting all the inhabitants of a country into one social or political body. Under the latter view she was worshipped at Athens along with Peitho (persuasion), and her worship was said to have been instituted by Theseus at the time when he united the scattered townships into one great body of citizens. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of white goats.

PANDĪON (Πανδίων). 1. I. King of Athens, son of Erichthonius by the Naiad Pasithea, was married to Zeuxippe, by whom he became the father of Procne and Philomela, and of the twins Erechtheus and Butes. In a war against Labdacus, king of Thebes, he called upon Tereus of Daulis in Phocis for assistance, and afterward rewarded him by giving him his daughter Procne in marriage. Vid. TEREUS. It was in his reign that Bacchus (Dionysus) and Ceres (Demeter) were said to have come to Attica.—2. II. King of Athens, son of Cecrops and Metiadusa. Being expelled from Athens by the Metionidæ, he fled to Megara, and there married Pylia, the daughter of King Pylas. When the latter, in consequence of a murder, migrated into Peloponnesus, Pandion obtained the government of Megara. He became the father of Ægeus, Pallas, Nisus, Lycus, and a natural son, Œneus, and also of a daughter, who was married to Sciron. After his death his four sons, called the Pandiŏnĭdæ (Πανδιονίδαι), returned from Megara to Athens, and expelled the Metionidæ. Ægeus obtained Athens, Lycus the eastern coast of Attica, Nisus Megaris, and Pallas the southern coast.—[3. A Greek in the army against Troy, a companion of Teucer.]

[PANDOCUS (Πάνδοκος), a Trojan, slain by Ajax before Troy.]

PANDŌRA (Πανδώρα), the name of the first woman on earth. When Prometheus had stolen the fire from heaven, Jupiter (Zeus), in revenge, caused Vulcan (Hephæstus) to make a woman out of earth, who by her charms and beauty should bring misery upon the human race. Venus (Aphrodite) adorned her with beauty; Mercury (Hermes) bestowed upon her boldness and cunning; and the gods called her Pandora, or All-gifted, as each of the gods had given her some power by which she was to work the ruin of man. Mercury (Hermes) took her to Epimetheus, who made her his wife, forgetting the advice of his brother Prometheus, that he should not receive any gifts from Jupiter (Zeus.) In the house of Epimetheus was a closed jar, which he had been forbidden to open. But the curiosity of a woman could not resist the temptation to know its contents; and when she opened the lid, all the evils incident to man poured out. She had only time to shut down the lid, and prevent the escape of hope. Later writers relate that Pandora brought with her from heaven a box (and not a jar) containing all human ills, upon opening which all escaped and spread over the earth, Hope alone remaining. At a still later period, the box is said to have contained all the blessings of the gods, which would have been preserved for the human race had not Pandora opened the vessel, so that the winged blessings escaped PANDOSIA (Πανδοσία). 1. (Now Kastri), a town of Epirus in the district Thesprotia, on the River Acheron, and in the territory of the Cassopæi.—2. (Now Castel Franco?), a town in Bruttium, near the frontiers of Lucania, situated on the River Acheron, and also either upon or at the foot of three hills, was originally a residence of native Œnotrian chiefs. It was here that Alexander of Epirus fell, B.C. 326, in accordance with an oracle.

PANDRŎSOS (Πάνδροσος), i. e., "the all-bedewing" or "refreshing," was a daughter of Cecrops and Agraulos, and a sister of Erysichthon, Herse, and Aglauros. She was worshipped at Athens along with Thallo, and had a sanctuary there near the temple of Minerva (Athena) Polias.

PANĔAS. Vid. CÆSAREA, No. 2.

PANĔUM or -IUM (Πάνειον, Πάνιον, i. e., Pan's abode), the Greek name of the cave, in a mountain at the southern extremity of the range of Antilibanus, out of which the River Jordan takes its rise, a little above the town of Paneas or Cæsarea Philippi. The mountain, in whose southern side the cave is, was called by the same name, and the surrounding district was called Paneas.

PANGÆUM or PANGÆUS (Παγγαῖον, Πάγγαιος: now Pangea), a celebrated range of mountains in Macedonia, between the Strymon and Nestus, and in the neighborhood of Phil[ippi], with gold and silver mines, and with [splendid] roses.

PANHELLĒNĬUS (Πανελλήνιος), i. e., the [god] worshipped by all the Hellenes. This sur[name] is said to have been given to Jupiter (Zeus) [by] Æacus, when he offered a propitiatory sacri[fice] on behalf of all the Greeks for the purpose [of] averting a famine. In Ægina there was a sanc[tuary] of Jupiter (Zeus) Panhellenius, which [was] said to have been founded by Æacus: and [a] festival, Panhellenia, was celebrated there.

PANĬUM (Πάνιον). 1. A town on the coast [of] Thrace, near Heraclea.—[2. Vid. PANEUM.]

PANNŎNĬA, one of the most important of [the] Roman provinces between the Danube and [the] Alps, was separated on the west from Noricum by the Mons Cetius, and from Upper Italy [by] the Alpes Juliæ, on the south from Illyria by [the] Savus, on the east from Dacia by the Danube, and on the north from Germany by the same river. It thus corresponded to the eastern [part] of Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, the whole of Hungary between the Danube and the Save, Slavonia, and a part of Croatia and Bosnia. The mountains in the south and west of the country, on the borders of Illyria, Italy, and Noricum, belonged to the Alps, and are therefore called by the general name of the Alpes Pannonicæ, of which the separate names are Ocra, Carvancas, Cetius, and Albii or Albani Montes. The principal rivers of Pannonia, besides the Danube, were the DRAVUS (now Drave), SAVUS (now Save), and Arrabo (now Raab), all of which flow into the Danube. The Pannonians (Pannonii), sometimes called Pæonians by the Greek writers, were probably of Illyrian origin, and were divided into numerous tribes. They were a brave and warlike people, but are described by the Roman writers as cruel, faithless, and treacherous. They maintained their independence of Rome till Augustus, after his conquest of the Illyrians (B.C. 35), turned his arms against the Pannonians, who were shortly afterward subdued by his general Vibius. In A.D. 7 the Pannonians joined the Dalmatians and the other Illyrian tribes in their revolt from Rome, and were with difficulty conquered by Tiberius, after a desperate struggle, which lasted three years (A.D. 7–9). It was after the termination of this war that Pannonia appears to have been reduced to the form of a Roman province, and was garrisoned by several Roman legions. The dangerous mutiny of these troops after the death of Augustus (A.D. 14) was with difficulty quelled by Drusus. From this time to the end of the empire Pannonia always contained a large number of Roman troops, on account of its bordering on the Quadi and other powerful barbarous nations. We find at a later time that Pannonia was the regular quarters of seven legions. In consequence of this large number of troops always stationed in the country, several towns were founded and numerous fortresses were erected along the Danube. Pannonia originally formed only one province, but was soon divided into two provinces, called Pannonia Superior and Pannonia ferior. These were separated from one an- ;er by a straight line drawn from the River nbo south as far as the Savus, the country st of this line being P. Superior, and the par t P. Inferior. Each of the provinces was erned by a separate proprætor; but they re frequently spoken of in the plural under name of Pannoniæ. In the fourth century, part of P. Inferior between the Arrabo, the nube, and the Dravus was formed into a arate province by Galerius, who gave it the ne of Valeria in honor of his wife. But as Inferior had thus lost a great part of its ter- ry, Constantine added to it a portion of P. perior, comprising the upper part of the course the Dravus and the Savus. P. Superior was r called Pannonia Prima, and P. Inferior nonia Secunda; and all three Pannonian vinces (together with the two Noric prov- es and Dalmatia) belonged to the six Illyrian vinces of the Western Empire. In the mid- of the fifth century Pannonia was taken session of by the Huns. After the death of ila it passed into the hands of the Ostro- hs, and subsequently into those of the Lan- ards.

PANOMPHÆUS (Πανομφαῖος), i. e., the author all signs and omens, a surname of Jupiter us), who had a sanctuary on the Hellespont ween Capes Rhœteum and Sigeum.

PĂNŌPE (Πανόπη), a nymph of the sea, daugh- of Nereus and Doris.

PANŌPES, one of the followers of Æneas in voyage to Italy, distinguished at the funeral nes celebrated in Sicily in honor of Anchi- s.

PANŎPEUS (Πανοπεύς), son of Phocus and As- opea, accompanied Amphitryon on his expe- ion against the Taphians or Teleboans, and k an oath not to embezzle any part of the oty; but, having broken his oath, he was pun- ed by his son Epeus becoming unwarlike. is also mentioned among the Calydonian aters.

PĂNŎPEUS (Πανοπεύς, Hom.), PĂNŎPĒÆ (Πανο- αί), or PĂNŎPE (Πανόπη, Thuc.; ethnic Πανο- ύς, now Agio Vlasi), an ancient town in Pho- s, on the Cephisus, and near the frontiers of eotia, twenty stadia west of Chæronea, said have been founded by Panepeus, son of Pho- s.

[PANOPION URBINIUS, was proscribed by the umvirs in B.C. 43, but was preserved by the elity of one of his slaves, who exchanged esses with his master, dismissed him by the ck door as the soldiers were entering the villa, en placed himself in the bed of Panopion, and owed himself to be killed for his master.]

PANORMUS (Πάνορμος), that is, "All-Port," or place always fit for landing, the name of sev- al harbors. 1. (Πανορμίτης, Panormīta, Panor- itanus: now Palermo), an important town on e northern coast of Sicily and at the mouth the River Orethus, was founded by the Phœ- cians, and at a later time received its Greek me from its excellent harbor. From the Phœ- cians it passed into the hands of the Cartha- nians, in whose power it remained for a long ne, and who made it one of the chief stations for their fleet. It was taken by the Romans in the first Punic war, B.C. 254, and was subse- quently made a Roman colony.—2. (Now Porto Raphti), the principal harbor on the eastern coast of Attica, near the demus Prasiæ, and op posite the southern extremity of Eubœa.—3. (Now Tekieh), a harbor in Achaia, fifteen stadia east of the promontory Rhium.—4. A harbor in Epirus, in the middle of the Acroceraunian rocks.—5. (Ruins near Mylopotamo), a town and harbor on the northern coast of Crete.—6. The outer harbor of Ephesus, formed by the mouth of the River Caÿster. Vid. p. 282, a.

PANSA, C. VIBĬUS, a friend and partisan of Cæsar, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 51, and was appointed by Cæsar in 46 to the govern- ment of Cisalpine Gaul as successor to M. Bru- tus. Cæsar subsequently nominated him and Hirtius consuls for 43. Pansa was consul in that year along with Hirtius, and fell before Mutina in the month of April. The details are given under HIRTIUS.

PANTĂGȲAS, PANTĂGĬAS, or PANTĂGĬES (Παν- τακύας: now Fiume di Porcari), a small river on the eastern coast of Sicily, which flowed into the sea between Megara and Syracuse.

[PANTÆNUS (Πάνταινος), the teacher of Cle- mens of Alexandrea, and master of the cate- chetical school in that city about A.D. 181: in philosophy he had been in the Stoic school, and had adopted their principles, and hence was designated the Stoic. He was selected, on ac- count of his learning and piety, to conduct a missionary enterprise to India.]

PANTĂLĔŌN (Πανταλέων). 1. Son of Ompha- lion, king or tyrant of Pisa in Elis at the period of the thirty-fourth Olympiad (B.C. 644), as- sembled an army, with which he made himself master of Olympia, and assumed by force the sole presidency of the Olympic games. The Eleans, on this account, would not reckon this as one of the regular Olympiads. Pantaleon assisted the Messenians in the second Mes- senian war.—[2. A son of Alyattes, king of Lydia, by an Ionian woman. His claim to the throne in preference to his brother Crœsus was put forward by his partisans during the lifetime of Alyattes, but that monarch decided in favor of Crœsus.—3. A Macedonian of Pydna, an officer in the service of Alexander, who was appointed by him governor of Memphis.]

PANTHĒA. Vid. ABRADATAS.

PANTHĒUM (Πάνθειον), a celebrated temple at Rome, in the Campus Martius, which is still extant, and used as a Christian church. It is in a circular form, surmounted by a dome, and contains a noble Corinthian portico of sixteen pillars. In its general form it resembles the Colosseum in the Regent's Park. It was built by M. Agrippa in his third consulship, B.C. 27, as the inscription on the portico still testifies. All the ancient authors call it a temple, and there is no reason for supposing, as some mod- ern writers have done, that it was originally an entrance to the public baths. The name is commonly derived from its being supposed to be sacred to all the gods; but Dion Cassius expressly states that it was dedicated to Mars and Venus. The temple of Julius Cæsar was erected by Augustus in the interior of the tem- ple, and that of Augustus in the pronaos. It was restored by the Emperor Septimius Severus, A.D. 202. Between 608 and 610 it was consecrated as a Christian church by the pope Boniface IV., with the approbation of the Emperor Phocas. In 655 the plates of gilded bronze that covered the roof were carried to Constantinople by command of Constans II. The Pantheon is the largest circular building of antiquity; the interior diameter of the rotunda is one hundred and forty-two feet, and the height from the pavement to the summit about one hundred and forty-eight feet. The portico is one hundred and three feet wide, and the columns forty-seven feet high.

[PANTHŒDAS (Πανθοίδας), a Spartan, sent out by the ephors in B.C. 403 against Clearchus, who had gone to Byzantium against orders. He was slain in battle in 377 against Pelopidas, near Tanagra.]

PANTHŎUS, contr. PANTHŪS (Πάνθοος, Πάνθους), one of the elders at Troy, husband of Phrontis, and father of Euphorbus, Polydamas, and Hyperenor. Hence both Euphorbus and Polydamas are called Panthoides. He is said to have been originally a priest of Apollo at Delphi, and to have been carried to Troy by Antenor on account of his beauty. He continued to be a priest of Apollo, and is called by Virgil (Æn., ii., 319) Othryades, or son of Othryas.

[PANTIAS (Παντίας), of Chios, a statuary of the school of Sicyon, son and pupil of Sostratus, who was the seventh in the succession of disciples from Aristocles of Cydonia.]

PANTICAPÆUM (Παντικάπαιον: Παντικαπαῖος, Παντικαπαιεύς, Παντικαπιάτης: now Kertsch), a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, was situated on a hill twenty stadia in circumference on the Cimmerian Bosporus, and opposite the town of Phanagoria in Asia. It derived its name from the River Panticapes. It was founded by the Milesians about B.C. 541, and from its position and excellent harbor soon became a place of great commercial importance. It was the residence of the Greek kings of the Bosporus, and hence is sometimes called Bosporus. Justinian caused it to be surrounded with new walls.

PANTICAPES (Παντικάπης), a river in European Sarmatia, which, according to Herodotus, rises in a lake, separates the agricultural and nomad Scythians, flows through the district Hylæa, and falls into the Borysthenes. It is usually identified with the modern Somara, but without sufficient grounds.

PANYASIS (Πανύασις). 1. A Greek epic poet, was a native of Halicarnassus, and a relation of the historian Herodotus, probably his uncle. Panyasis began to be known about B.C. 489, continued in reputation till 467, and was put to death by Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, about 457. The most celebrated of the poems of Panyasis was his Heraclea or Heracleas, which gave a detailed account of the exploits of Hercules. It consisted of fourteen books and nine thousand verses. Another poem of Panyasis bore the name of Ionica (Ἰωνικά), and contained seven thousand verses; it related the history of Neleus, Codrus, and the Ionic colonies. In later times the works of Panyasis were extensively read and much admired; the Alexandrine grammarians ranked him with Homer, Hesiod, Pisander, and Antimachus, as one of the five principal epic poets. [The fragments are collected by Tzschirner, Panyasidis Fragmenta, &c., Breslau, 1842; and by Dübner, at the end of Epici Græci Minores, in Didot's Bibliotheca Græca.]—2. A philosopher, also a native of Halicarnassus, who wrote two books "On Dreams" (Περὶ ὀνείρων), was perhaps a grandson of the poet.

[PANYASUS (Πανύασσος: now Spirnazza), a river of Illyris Græca, which empties, south of Dyrrachium, into the Ionian Sea.]

PAPHLĂGŎNĬA (Παφλαγονία: Παφλαγών, pl. -όνες, Paphlăgo), a district on the northern side of Asia Minor, between Bithynia on the west and Pontus on the east, being separated from the former by the River Parthenius, and from the latter by the Halys; on the south it was divided by the chain of Mount Olympus (according to others by Olgassys) from Phrygia in the earlier times, but from Galatia afterward: and on the north it bordered on the Euxine. These boundaries, however, are not always exactly observed. Xenophon brings the Paphlagonians as far east as Themiscyra and the Jasonian promontory. It appears to have been known to the Greeks in the mythical period. The Argonautic legends mentioned Paphlagon, the son of Phineus, as the hero eponymus of the country. In the Homeric Catalogue, Pylæmenes leads the Paphlagonians, as allies of the Trojans, from the land of the Heneti, about the River Parthenius, a region famed for its mules; and from this Pylæmenes the later princes of Paphlagonia claimed their descent, and the country itself was sometimes called PYLÆMENIA. Herodotus twice mentions the Halys as the boundary between the Paphlagonians and the Syrians of Cappadocia; but we learn also from him and from other authorities that the Paphlagonians were of the same race as the Cappadocians (i. e., the Semitic or Syro-Arabian), and quite distinct, in their language and their customs, from their Thracian neighbors on the west. They were good soldiers, especially as cavalry, but uncivilized and superstitious. The country had also other inhabitants, probably of a different race, namely, the Heneti and the Caucones; and Greek settlements were established on the coast at an early period. The Paphlagonians were first subdued by Crœsus. Under the Persian empire they belonged to the third satrapy, but their satraps made themselves independent, and assumed the regal title, maintaining themselves in this position (with a brief interruption, during which Paphlagonia was subject to Eumenes) until the conquest of the country by Mithradates, who added the eastern part of his own kingdom, and made over the western part to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who gave it to his son Pylæmenes. After the fall of Mithradates the Romans added the north of Paphlagonia, along the coast, to Bithynia, and the interior was left to the native princes, as tributaries to Rome; but, the race of these princes becoming soon extinct, the whole of Paphlagonia was made Roman, and Augustus made it a part of the province of Galatia. It was made a separate province under Constantine; but the eastern part, from Sinope to the Halys, was assigned to Pontus, under the name of Hellespontus. Paphlagonia was a mountain ous country, being intersected from west to east by three chains of the Olympus system, namely, the Olympus itself on the southern border, Olgassys in the centre, and a minor chain with no specific name nearer to the coast. The belt of land between this last chain and the sea was very fertile, and the Greek cities of Amastris and Sinope brought a considerable commerce to its shore; but the inland parts were chiefly covered with native forests, which were celebrated as hunting grounds. The country was famed for its horses and mules, and in some parts there were extensive sheep-walks; and its rivers were particularly famous for their fish The country was divided into nine districts, the names of which are not of enough importance to be specified here.

Paphus (Πάφος), son of Pygmalion by the statue into which life had been breathed by Venus (Aphrodite). From him the town of Paphus is said to have derived its name; and Pygmalion himself is called the Paphian hero. (Ov., Met., x., 290.)

Paphus (Πάφος: Πάφιος), the name of two towns on the western coast of Cyprus, near each other, and called respectively "Old Paphos" (Παλαίπαφος) and "New Paphos" (Πάφος νέα). Old Paphos was situated near the promontory Zephyrium, on the River Bocarus, ten stadia from the coast, where it had a good harbor; while New Paphos lay more inland, in the midst of a fertile plain, sixty stadia from the former. Old Paphos was the chief seat of the worship of Venus (Aphrodite), who is said to have landed at this place after her birth among the waves, and who is hence frequently called the Paphian goddess (Paphia). Here she had a celebrated temple, the high priest of which exercised a kind of religious superintendence over the whole island. Every year there was a grand procession from New Paphos to the temple of the goddess in the old city. There were two legends respecting the foundation of Paphos, one describing the Syrian king Cinyras as its founder, and the other the Arcadian Agapenor on his return from Troy. These statements are reconciled by the supposition that Cinyras was the founder of Old Paphos and Agapenor of New Paphos. There can be no doubt of the Phœnician origin of Old Paphos, and that the worship of Venus (Aphrodite) was introduced here from the East; but an Arcadian colony can not be admitted. When Paphos is mentioned by later writers without any epithet, they usually mean the New City; but when the name occurs in the poets, we are generally to understand the Old City, as the poets, for the most part, speak of the place in connection with the worship of Venus (Aphrodite). Old Paphos was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Augustus, but was rebuilt by order of the emperor, and called Augusta. Under the Romans New Paphos was the capital of one of the four districts into which the island was divided. Old Paphos corresponds to the modern Kukla or Konuklia, and New Paphos to the modern Baffa.

Papĭas (Παπίας), an early Christian writer said to have been a hearer of the Apostle John, and a companion of Polycarp, was bishop of Hierapolis, on the borders of Phrygia. He taught the doctrine of the Millennium, maintaining that there will be, for one thousand years after the resurrection of the dead, a bodily reign of Christ on this earth. Only fragments of his works are extant.

Papiniānus, Æmilĭus, a celebrated Roman jurist, was præfectus prætorio under the Emperor Septimius Severus, whom he accompanied to Britain. The emperor died at York A.D. 211, and is said to have commended his two sons, Caracalla and Geta, to the care of Papinian. On the death of his father, Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office, and shortly afterward put him to death. There are five hundred and ninety-five excerpts from Papinian's works in the Digest. These excerpts are from the thirty-seven books of Quæstiones, a work arranged according to the order of the Edict, the nineteen books of Responsa, the two books of Definitiones, the two books De Adulteriis, a single book De Adulteriis, and a Greek work or fragment, which probably treated of the office of ædile both at Rome and in other towns. No Roman jurist had a higher reputation than Papinian. Nor is his reputation unmerited. It was not solely because of the high station that he filled, his penetration, and his knowledge, that he left an imperishable name; his excellent understanding, guided by integrity of purpose, has made him the model of a true lawyer.

Papinĭus Statĭus. Vid. Statius.

Papirĭa Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Papirii were divided into the families of Crassus, Cursor, Maso, and Mugillanus, and the plebeian Papirii into those of Carbo, Pætus, and Turdus. Of these the families of Carbo, Cursor, Maso, and Mugillanus alone require mention.

Papiriānæ Fossæ, a village in Etruria, on the Via Æmilia, between Luna and Pisa.

Papirĭus, C. or Sex., the author of a supposed collection of the Leges Regiæ, which was called Jus Papirianum or Civile Papirianum. He is said to have lived in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus.

Papius Mutĭlus. Vid. Mutilus.

Pappŭa (Παππούα), a lofty rugged mountain on the extreme border of Numidia, perhaps the same as the Thammes of Ptolemy, and as the mountain abounding with wild cats, near the city of Melitene, to which Diodorus Siculus refers (xx., 58), but without mentioning its name.

Pappus (Πάππος), of Alexandrea, one of the later Greek geometers, is said by Suidas to have lived under Theodosius (A.D. 379–395). Of the works of Pappus, the only one which has come down to us is his celebrated Mathematical Collections (Μαθηματικῶν συναγωγῶν βιβλία). This work, as we have it now in print, consists of the last six of eight books. Only portions of these books have been published in Greek. There are two Latin editions of Pappus: the first by Commandinus, Pisauri, 1588; and the second by Manolessius, Bononiæ, 1660.

Paprēmis (Πάπρημις), a city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Papremites, and sacred to the Egyptian god whom the Greeks identified with Mars (Ares). It is only mentioned by Herodotus, and is perhaps the same as the Chois of later times.

Papus, Æmilius. 1. M., dictator B.C. 321.—2. Q., twice consul, 282 and 278, and censor 275. In both his consulships and in his censorship he had as colleague C. Fabricius Luscinus.—3. L., consul 225, defeated the Cisalpine Gauls with great slaughter. He was censor 220 with C. Flaminius.

Parachelōītis (Παραχελωῖτις), the name of the plain in Acarnania and Ætolia, near the mouth of the Achelous, and through which that river flows.

Parachoăthras (Παραχοάθρας, τὰ Παραχοάθρα: now Mountains of Louristan), a part of the chain of mountains forming the eastern margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, was the boundary between Susiana and Media. The same name is given to an eastern branch of the chain, which formed the boundary between Parthia and the desert of Carmania. Strabo places it too far north.

Parætăcēne (Παραιτακηνή: Παραιτακεί, Παραιτακηνοί, Parætăcæ, Parætacēni), the name of various mountainous regions in the Persian empire, is the Greek form of a Persian word, signifying mountainous. 1. The best known of those districts was on the borders of Media and Persis, and was inhabited by a people of Median origin, who are mentioned several times by the historians of Alexander and his successors.—2. A district between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes, on the borders of Bactria and Sogdiana.—3. A district between Arachosia and Drangiana, also called Sacastana, from its inhabitants, the Scythian Sacæ.

Parætŏnium or Ammōnĭa (Παραιτόνιον, ἡ Ἀμμωνία: now El-Bareton or Marsa-Labeit), an important city on the northern coast of Africa, belonged to Marmarica in its widest sense, but politically to Egypt, namely, to the Nomos Libya: hence this city on the west and Pelusium on the east are called "cornua Ægypti." It stood near the Promontory Artos or Pythis (now Ras-el-Hazeit), and was reckoned two hundred Roman miles west of Alexandrea, between seventy and eighty miles, or, according to Strabo, nine hundred stadia (all too small) east of the Catabathmos Major, and one thousand three hundred stadia north of Ammonium in the Desert (now Siwah), which Alexander the Great visited by the way of Parætonium. The city was forty stadia in circuit. It was an important sea-port, a strong fortress, and a renowned seat of the worship of Isis. It was restored by Justinian, and continued a place of some consequence till its complete destruction by the late Pasha of Egypt, Mehemet Ali, in 1820.

Părĭgon Sinus (Παράγων κόλπος: now Gulf of Oman), a gulf of the Indicus Oceanus, on the coast of Gedrosia, namely, the gulf formed in the northwest of the Indian Ocean by the approach of the northeastern coast of Arabia to that of Beloochistan and Persia, outside of the entrance to the Persian Gulf.

Parălĭa (Παραλία), the sea-coast district of Attica, around the Promontory of Sunium, extending upward as far as Halæ Axonides on the western coast, and Prasiæ on the eastern coast. The inhabitants of this district, the Paralii (Πάραλιοι), were one of the three political parties into which Attica was divided at the time of Pisistratus, the other two being the Diacrii (Διάκριοι), or Highlanders, and the Pediasii ([illegible]), inhabitants of the plain.

Părălus (Πάραλος), the younger of the legitimate sons of Pericles. He and his bro Xanthippus were educated by their father w the greatest care, but they both appear to h been of inferior capacity, which was any t but compensated by worth of character, th Paralus seems to have been a somewhat m hopeful youth than his brother. They both victims to the plague, B.C. 429.

Parapotămĭi or ĭa (Παραποτάμιοι, -αμία: Belissi), an ancient town in Phocis, situated a steep hill, and on the left bank of the Ri Cephisus, from which it derives its name was near the frontiers of Bœotia, being forty stadia from Chæronea, and sixty st from Orchomenus. It is probably mentioned Homer (Il., ii., 522). It was destroyed by Xer but was rebuilt, and was destroyed a second t in the Sacred war.

Parasōpĭa (Παρασωπία), a district in the s of Bœotia on both banks of the Æsopus, the habitants of which were called Parasōpii (Πα σώπιοι).

[Parasopias (Παρασωπιάς), a city of The in the district Œtæa.]

Parcæ. Vid. Moiræ.

Parentĭum (now Parenzo), a town in Is with a good harbor, inhabited by Roman citize but not a Roman colony, thirty-one miles fr Pola.

Păris (Πάρις), also called Alexander (Ἀλ ανδρος), was the second son of Priam and Hecu ba. Before his birth Hecuba dreamed that sh had brought forth a fire-brand, the flames o which spread over the whole city. According as soon as the child was born, he was given t a shepherd, who was to expose him on Mount Ida. After the lapse of five days, the shepherd, on returning to Mount Ida, found the child still alive, and fed by a she-bear. Thereupon he carried the boy home, and brought him up along with his own child, and called him Paris. When Paris had grown up, he distinguished himself as a valiant defender of the flocks and shepherds, and hence received the name of Alexander, i. e., the defender of men. He also succeeded in discovering his real origin, and was received by Priam as his son. He now married Œnone, the daughter of the river-god Cebren, by whom, according to some, he became the father of Corythus. But the most celebrated event in the life of Paris was his abduction of Helen. This came to pass in the following way. Once upon a time, when Peleus and Thetis solemnized their nuptials, all the gods were invited to the marriage, with the exception of Eris, or Strife. Enraged at her exclusion, the goddess threw a golden apple among the guests, with the inscription, "To the fairest." Thereupon Juno (Hera), Venus (Aphrodite), and Minerva (Athena) each claimed the apple for herself. Jupiter (Zeus) ordered Mercury (Hermes) to take the goddesses to Mount Gargarus, a portion of Ida, to the beautiful shepherd Paris, who was there tending his flocks, and who was to decide the dispute. The goddesses accordingly appeared before him. Juno (Hera) promised him the sovereignty of Asia and great riches, Minerva (Athena) great glory and renown in war and Venus (Aphrodite) the fairest of women for his wife. Paris decided in favor of Venus (Aphrodite), and gave her the golden apple. This judgment called forth in Juno (Hera) and Minerva (Athena) fierce hatred against Troy. Under the protection of Venus (Aphrodite), Paris now sailed to Greece, and was hospitably received in the palace of Menelaus at Sparta. Here he succeeded in carrying off Helen, the wife of Menelaus, who was the most beautiful woman in the world. The accounts of this rape are not the same in all writers. According to the more usual account, Helen followed her seducer willingly, owing to the influence of Venus (Aphrodite), while Menelaus was absent in Crete. Others relate that the goddess deceived Helen by giving to Paris the appearance of Menelaus; and others, again, say that Helen was carried off by Paris by force, either during a festival or during the chase. On his return to Troy, Paris passed through Egypt and Phœnicia, and at length arrived at Troy with Helen and the treasures which he had treacherously taken from the hospitable house of Menelaus. In regard to this voyage the accounts again differ; for, according to some, Paris and Helen reached Troy three days after their departure; whereas, according to later traditions, Helen did not reach Troy at all, for Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera) allowed only a phantom resembling her to accompany Paris to Troy, while the real Helen was carried to Proteus in Egypt, and remained there until she was fetched by Menelaus. The abduction of Helen gave rise to the Trojan war. Before her marriage with Menelaus she had been wooed by the noblest chiefs in all parts of Greece. Her former suitors now resolved to revenge her abduction, and sailed against Troy. Vid. AGAMEMNON. Homer describes Paris as a handsome man, fond of the female sex and of music, and not ignorant of war, but as dilatory and cowardly, and detested by his own friends for having brought upon them the fatal war with the Greeks. He fought with Menelaus before the walls of Troy, and was defeated, but was carried off by Venus (Aphrodite). He is said to have killed Achilles, either by one of his arrows, or by treachery in the temple of the Thymbræan Apollo. Vid. ACHILLES. On the capture of Troy, Paris was wounded by Philoctetes with an arrow of Hercules, and then returned to his long-abandoned wife Œnone. But she, remembering the wrongs she had suffered, or, according to others, being prevented by her father, refused to heal the wound. He then went back to Troy and died. Œnone quickly repented, and hastened after him with remedies, but came too late, and in her grief hung herself. According to others, she threw herself from a tower, or rushed into the flames of the funeral pile on which the body of Paris was burning. Paris is represented in works of art as a beautiful youth, without a beard, with a Phrygian cap, and sometimes with an apple in his hand, in the act of presenting it to Venus (Aphrodite).

PĂRIS, the name of two celebrated pantomimes. 1. The elder Paris lived in the reign of the Emperor Nero, with whom he was a great favorite. He was originally a slave of Domitia the aunt of the emperor, and he purchased his freedom by paying her a large sum of money. Paris was afterward declared, by order of the emperor, to have been free-born (ingenuus), and Domitia was compelled to restore to him the sum which she had received for his freedom. When Nero attempted to become a pantomime, he put Paris to death as a dangerous rival.—2. The younger Paris, and the more celebrated of the two, was a native of Egypt, and lived in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was also a great favorite. He was put to death by Domitian because he had an intrigue with Domitia, the wife of the emperor.

PARISĬI. Vid. LUTETIA PARISIORUM.

PĂRĬUM (τὸ Πάριον: Παριᾶνός, Παριηνός, Παριανεύς: ruins at Kemer), a city of Mysia, on the northern coast of the Troad, on the Propontis, between Lampsacus and Priapus, was founded by a colony from Miletus, mingled with natives of Paros and Erythræ, and became a flourishing sea-port, having a better harbor than that of Priapus. Under Augustus it was made a Roman colony, by the name of Colonia Pariana Julia Augusta. It was a renowned seat of the worship of Cupid (Eros), Bacchus (Dionysus), and Apollo. The surrounding district was called ἡ Παριανή.

PARMA (Parmensis: now Parma), a town in Gallia Cispadana, situated on a river of the same name and on the Via Æmilia, between Placentia and Mutina, was originally a town of the Boii, but was made a Roman colony B.C 183, along with Mutina, and from that time became a place of considerable importance. It suffered some injury in the civil war after Cæsar's death, but was enlarged and embellished by Augustus, and received the name of Colonia Julia Augusta. After the fall of the Western Empire it was for a time called Chrysopolis, or the "Gold-City," but for what reason we do not know. The country around Parma was originally marshy; but the marshes were drained by the consul Scaurus, and converted into fertile land. The wool of Parma was particularly good.

PARMĔNĬDES (Παρμενίδης), a distinguished Greek philosopher, was a native of Elea in Italy. According to Plato, Parmenides, at the age of sixty-five, came to Athens to the Panathenæa, accompanied by Zeno, then forty years old, and became acquainted with Socrates, who at that time was quite young. Supposing Socrates to have been nineteen or twenty years of age at the time, we may place the visit of Parmenides to Athens in B.C. 448, and consequently his birth in 513. Parmenides was regarded with great esteem by Plato and Aristotle; and his fellow-citizens thought so highly of him, that every year they bound their magistrates to render obedience to the laws which he had enacted for them. The philosophical opinions of Parmenides were developed in a didactic poem, in hexameter verse, entitled On Nature, of which only fragments remain. In this poem he maintained that the phenomena of sense were delusive, and that it was only by mental abstraction that a person could attain to the knowledge of the only reality, a One and All, a continuous and self-existent substance, which could not be perceived by the senses. But although he believed the phenomena of sense to be delusive, nevertheless he adopted two elements, Warm and Cold, or Light and Darkness. The best edition of the fragments of Parmenides is by Karsten, in Philosophorum Græc. Veterum Oper. Reliquiæ, Amstelod., 1835.

Parmĕnĭon (Παρμενίων). 1. Son of Philotas, a distinguished Macedonian general in the service of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. Philip held him in high esteem, and used to say of him that he had never been able to find more than one general, and that was Parmenion. In Alexander's invasion of Asia, Parmenion was regarded as second in command. At the three great battles of the Granicus, Issus, and Arbela, while the king commanded the right wing of the army, Parmenion was placed at the head of the left, and contributed essentially to the victory on all those memorable occasions. The confidence reposed in him by Alexander appears to have been unbounded, and he is continually spoken of as the most attached of the king's friends, and as holding, beyond all question, the second place in the state. But when Philotas, the only surviving son of Parmenion, was accused in Drangiana (B.C. 330) of being privy to the plot against the king's life, he not only confessed his own guilt when put to the torture, but involved his father also in the plot. Whether the king really believed in the guilt of Parmenion, or deemed his life a necessary sacrifice to policy after the execution of his son, he caused his aged friend to be assassinated in Media before he could receive the tidings of his son's death. The death of Parmenion, at the age of seventy years, will ever remain one of the darkest stains upon the character of Alexander It is questionable whether even Philotas was really concerned in the conspiracy, and we may safely pronounce that Parmenion had no connection with it. — 2. Of Macedonia, an epigrammatic poet, whose verses were included in the collection of Philip of Thessalonica, whence it is probable that he flourished in, or shortly before, the time of Augustus.

[Parmeniscus (Παρμενίσκος), a grammarian and commentator, of whose writings a few fragments remain.]

Parnassus (Παρνασσός, Παρνασός, Ion. Παρνησός), the name, in its widest signification, of a range of mountains, which extends from Œta and Corax southeast through Doris and Phocis, and under the name of Cirphis (Κίρφις) terminates at the Corinthian Gulf between Cirrha and Anticyra. But in its narrower sense, Parnassus indicates the highest part of the range a few miles north of Delphi. Its two highest summits were called Tithorĕa (Τιθορέα: now Velitza), and Lycorēa (Λυκώρεια: now Liakura), the former being northwest and the latter northeast of Delphi; and hence Parnassus is frequently described by the poets as double-headed. Immediately above Delphi the mountain forms a semicircular range of lofty rocks, at the foot of which the town was built. These rocks were called Phædriades (Φαιδριάδες), or the "Resplendent," from their facing the south, and thus receiving the full rays of the sun during the most brilliant part of the day. The sides of Parnassus were well wooded: at its foot grew myrtle, laurel, and olive-trees, and higher up, firs; and its summit was covered with snow during the greater part of the year. It contained numerous caves, glens, and romantic ravines. It is celebrated as one of the chief seats of Apollo and the Muses, and an inspiring source of poetry and song. On Mount Lycorea was the Corycian cave, from which the Muses are sometimes called the Corycian nymphs. Just above Delphi was the far-famed Castalian spring, which issued from between two cliffs, called Nauplia and Hyamplia. These cliffs are frequently called by the poets the summits of Parnassus, though they are in reality only small peaks at the base of the mountain. The mountain also was sacred to Bacchus (Dionysus), and on one of its summits the Thyades held their Bacchic revels. Between Parnassus Proper and Mount Cirphis was the valley of the Plistus, through which the sacred road ran from Delphi to Daulis and Stiris; and at the point where the road branched off to these two places (called σχιστή), Œdipus slew his father Laius. —2. A town in the north of Cappadocia, on a mountain of the same name (now Pascha Daghi), probably on the River Halys, and on the road between Ancyra and Archelais.

Parnēs (Πάρνης, gen. Πάρνηθος: now Oza or Nozia), a mountain in the northeast of Attica, in some parts as high as four thousand feet, was a continuation of Mount Cithæron, from which it extended eastward as far as the coast at Rhamnus. It was well wooded, abounded in game, and on its lower slopes produced excellent wine. It formed part of the boundary between Bœotia and Attica; and the pass through it between these two countries was easy of access, and was therefore strongly fortified by the Athenians. On the summit of the mountain there was a statue of Jupiter (Zeus) Parnethius, and there were likewise altars of Jupiter (Zeus) Semaleos and Jupiter (Zeus) Ombrius or Apemius.

Parnōn (Πάρνων: now Malevo), a mountain six thousand three hundred and thirty-five feet high, forming the boundary between Laconia and the territory of Tegea in Arcadia.

Paropamisădæ (Παροπαμισάδαι) or Paropamisii, the collective name of several communities dwelling in the southern slopes of Mount Paropamisus (vid. next article), and of the country they inhabited, which was not known by any other name. It was divided on the north from Bactria by the Paropamisus; on the west from Aria, and on the south from Drangiana and Arachosia, by indefinite boundaries; and on the east from India by the River Indus, thus corresponding to the eastern part of Afghanistan and the strip of the Punjab west of the Indus. Under the Persian empire it was the northeasternmost district of Ariana. It was conquered by Alexander when he passed through it on his march to India; but the people soon regained their independence, though parts of the country were nominally included in the limits of the Greco-Syrian and Bactrian kingdoms. It is a rugged mountain region, intersected by branches of the Paropamisus. In the north the climate is so severe that, according to the ancient writers, confirmed by modern travellers, the snow almost buries the houses; but in the south the valleys of the lower mountain slopes yield all the products of the warmer regions of Asia. In its north was the considerable river Cophes or COPHEN (now Cabool), flowing into the Indus, and having a tributary, Choäs, Choës, or CHOASPES (No. 2). The particular tribes, included under the general name of Paropamisadæ, were the Cabolitæ (Καβολῖται) in the north, whose name and position point to Cabool, the Paisii (Παρσιοί) in the south-west, the Ambautæ (Ἀμβαῦται) in the east, on the River Choas, the Parsuëtæ (Παρσυῆται) on the south, and the Ἀριστόφυλοι, probably a dominant tribe of a different race, on the west. At the time of the Macedonian conquest the people were little civilized, but quiet and inoffensive. The chief cities were Ortospana and Alexandrea, the latter founded by Alexander the Great.

PAROPAMISUS (Παροπάμισος, and several other forms, of which the truest is probably Παροπάνισος: now Hindoo-Koosh), a word no doubt derived, as many other words beginning like it, from the Old Persian paru, a mountain, is the name of a part of the great mountain-chain which runs from west to east through the centre of the southern portion of the highlands of Central Asia, and divides the part of the continent, which slopes down to the Indian Ocean, from the great central table-land of Tartary and Thibet. It is a prolongation of the chain of Anti-Taurus. The name was applied to that part of the chain between the Sariphi Mountains (now Mountains of Kohistan) on the west and Mount Imaus (now Himalaya) on the east, or from about the sources of the River Margus on the west to the point where the Indus breaks through the chain on the east. They were believed by the ancients to be among the highest mountains in the world (which they are), and to contain the sources of the Oxus and the Indus; the last statement being an error which naturally arose from confounding the cleft by which the Indus breaks through the chain with its unknown source. When Alexander the Great crossed these mountains, his followers—regarding the achievement as equivalent to what a Greek considered as the highest geographical adventure, namely, the passage of the Caucasus—conferred this glory on their chief by simply applying the name of Caucasus to the mountain chain which he had thus passed; and then, for the sake of distinction, this chain was called Caucasus Indicus, and this name has come down to our times in the native form of Hindoo-Koosh, and in others also. The name Paropamisus is also applied sometimes to the great southern branch of this chain (now Soliman Mountains) which skirts the valley of the Indus on the west, and which is more specifically called PARYETI or PARSYETÆ.

PARŌPUS (Paropinus), a small town in the interior of Sicily, north of the Nebrodes Montes.

PARŌRĒA (Παρώρεια). 1. A town in Thrace, on the frontiers of Macedonia, whose inhabitants were the same people as the Paroræi of Pliny.—2. Or PARŌRĬA (Παρωρία), a town in the south of Arcadia, north of Megalopolis, said to have been founded by Paroreus, son of Tricolonus, and a grandson of Lycaon, the inhabitants of which took part in the building of Megalopolis.

PARŌRĒĀTÆ (Παρωρεᾶται), the most ancient inhabitants of the mountains in Triphylia in Elis, who were expelled by the Minyæ.

PARORIOS. Vid. PHRYGIA.

PAROS (Πάρος: Πάριος: now Paro), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the larger of the Cyclades, was situated south of Delos and west of Naxos, being separated from the latter by a channel five or six miles wide. It is about thirty-six miles in circumference. It is said to have been originally colonized by Cretans, but was afterward inhabited by Ionians, and became so prosperous, even at an early period, as to send out colonies to Thasos and to Parium on the Propontis. In the first invasion of Greece by the generals of Darius, Paros submitted to the Persians; and after the battle of Marathon, Miltiades attempted to reduce the island, but failed in his attempt, and received a wound, of which he died. Vid. MILTIADES. After the defeat of Xerxes, Paros came under the supremacy of Athens, and shared the fate of the other Cyclades. Its name rarely occurs in subsequent history. The most celebrated production of Paros was its marble, which was extensively used by the ancient sculptors. It was chiefly obtained from a mountain called Marpessa. The Parian figs were also highly prized. The chief town of Paros was situated on the western coast, and bore the same name as the island. The ruins of it are still to be seen at the modern Paroikia. Paros was the birth-place of the poet Archilochus. In Paros was discovered the celebrated inscription called the Parian Chronicle, which is now preserved at Oxford. The inscription is cut on a block of marble, and in its perfect state contained a chronological account of the principal events in Greek history from Cecrops, B.C. 1582, to the archonship of Diognetus, 264. [This inscription, so far as it is preserved, was reprinted in Chandler's Marmora Oxoniensia, Oxford, 1763, fol.; by Boeckh in his Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum, vol. ii., p. 293, sqq.; and by Müller in Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol i., p. 533–590.]

PARRHĂSĬA (Παῤῥασία: Παῤῥάσιοι), a district in the south of Arcadia, to which, according to Pausanias, the towns Lycosura, Thocnia, Trapezus, Proseis, Acacesium, Acontium, Macaria, and Dasea belonged. The Parrhasii are said to have been one of the most ancient of the Arcadian tribes. At the time of the Peloponnesian war they were under the supremacy of Mantinea, but were rendered independent of that city by the Lacedæmonians. Homer (Il., ii., 608) mentions a town Parrhasia, said to have been founded by Parrhasus, son of Lycaon, or by Pelasgus, son of Arestor. The adjective Parrhasius is frequently used by the poets as equivalent to Arcadian.

PARRHĂSĬUS (Παῤῥάσιος), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of Ephesus, the son and pupil of Evenor. He practiced his art chiefly at Athens, and by some writers he is called an Athenian, probably because the Athenians had bestowed upon him the right of citizenship. He flourished about B.C. 400. Parrhasius did for painting, at least in pictures of gods and heroes, what had been done for sculpture by Phidias in divine subjects, and by Polycletus in the human figure: he established a canon of proportion, which was followed by all the artists that came after him. Several interesting observations on the principles of art which he followed are made in a dialogue with Socrates, as reported by Xenophon (Mem., iii., 10). The character of Parrhasius was marked in the highest degree by that arrogance which often accompanies the consciousness of preeminent ability. In epigrams inscribed on his works he not only made a boast of his luxurious habits, but he also claimed the honor of having assigned with his own hand the precise limits of the art, and fixed a boundary which never was to be transgressed. Respecting the story of his contest with Zeuxis, vid. ZEUXIS. Of the works of Parrhasius, the most celebrated seems to have been his picture of the Athenian People.

PARSII. Vid. PAROPAMISADÆ.

PARSĬCI MONTES (τὰ Παρσικὰ ὄρη, now Bushkurd Mountains in the west of Beloochistan), a chain of mountains running northeast from the Paragon Sinus (now Gulf of Oman), and forming the boundary between Carmania and Gedrosia. At the foot of these mountains, in the west of Gedrosia, were a people called PARSĪDÆ, with a capital PARSIS (now perhaps Serbah).

PARSYĒTÆ (Παρσυῆται), a people on the borders of Arachosia and the Paropamisadæ, with a mountain of the same name, which is probably identical with the PARYETI Montes and with the Soliman Mountains.

PARTHĂLIS, the chief city of the Calingæ, a tribe of the Gangaridæ, in India intra Gangem, at the head of the Sinus Gangeticus (now Sea of Bengal).

PARTHĒNĬAS (Παρθενίας), also called PARTHĔNĬA, a small river in Elis, which flows into the Alpheus east of Olympia, not far from Harpinna.

PARTHĔNĬUM (Παρθένιον). 1. A town in Mysia, south of Pergamum.—2. (Now Felenk-burun), a promontory in the Chersonesus Taurica, on which stood a temple of the Tauric Diana (Artemis), from whom it derived its name. It was in this temple that human sacrifices were offered to the goddess.

PARTHĔNĬUM MARE (τὸ Παρθενικὸν πέλαγος), the southeastern part of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Cyprus.

PARTHĔNĬUS (Παρθένιος), of Nicæa, or, according to others, of Myrlea, a celebrated grammarian, is said by Suidas to have been taken prisoner by Cinna in the Mithradatic war, to have been manumitted on account of his learning, and to have lived to the reign of Tiberius. If this statement is true, Parthenius must have attained a great age, since there were seventy-seven years from the death of Mithradates to the accession of Tiberius. Parthenius taught Virgil Greek, and he seems to have been very popular among the distinguished Romans of his time. The Emperor Tiberius imitated his poems, and placed his works and statues in the public libraries along with the most [illegible] ancient writers. Parthenius wrote many po[ems], but the only one of his works which has c[ome] down to us is in prose, and entitled Περὶ ἐ[ρωτι]κῶν παθημάτων. It contains thirty-six b[rief] love-stories, which ended in an unfortu[nate] manner. It is dedicated to Cornelius Gal[lus], and was compiled for his use, that he m[ight] avail himself of the materials in the comp[osi]tion of epic and elegiac poems. The best [edi]tion is by Westermann, in the Mythographi G[ræ]ci, Brunswick, 1843.

PARTHĔNĬUS (Παρθένιος). 1. A mountain [on] the frontiers of Argolis and Arcadia, thr[ough] which was an important pass leading from [Ar]golis to Tegea. This pass is still called Part[h][illegible] but the mountain itself, which rises to the hei[ght] of three thousand nine hundred and ninety-th[ree] feet, bears the name of Roino. It was on t[his] mountain that Telephus, the son of Herc[ules] and Auge, was said to have been suckled b[y a] hind; and it was here, also, that the god Pa[n was] said to have appeared to Phidippides, the At[he]nian courier, shortly before the battle of Ma[ra]thon.—2. (Also Παρθένης: now Chati-Su or B[ar]tan-Su), the chief river of Paphlagonia, rises [in] Mount Olgassys, and flows northwest into t[he] Euxine ninety stadia west of Amastris, form[ing] in the lower part of its course the boundary be[]tween Bithynia and Paphlagonia.

PARTHĔNŌN (ὁ Παρθενών, i. e., the virgin's chamber), was the usual name of one of th[e] finest, and, in its influence upon art, one of t[he] most important edifices ever built, the temp[le] of Minerva (Athena) Parthenos on the Acropolis of Athens. It was also called HECATOMPEDON (Ἑκατόμπεδον) or HECATOMPEDOS (Ἑκατόμπεδος, sc. νεώς), from its being one hundred feet in on[e] of its chief dimensions, probably in the breadth of the top step on which the front pillars stand. It was erected, under the administration of Pericles, on the site of the older temple of Minerva (Athena), burned during the Persian invasion, and was completed by the dedication of the statue of the goddess, B.C. 438. Its architects were Ictinus and Callicrates, but all the works were under the superintendence of Phidias. It was built entirely of Pentelic marble. Its dimensions were two hundred and twenty-seven English feet long, one hundred and one broad, and sixty-five high; it was fifty feet longer than the edifice which preceded it. Its architecture was of the Doric order, and of the purest kind. It consisted of an oblong central building (the cella or νεώς), surrounded on all sides by a peristyle of pillars, forty-six in number, eight at each end and seventeen at each side (reckoning the corner pillars twice), elevated on a platform, which was ascended by three steps all round the building. Within the porticoes, at each end, was another row of six pillars, standing on a level with the floor of the cella, and two steps higher than that of the peristyle. The cella was divided into two chambers of unequal size, the prodomus or pronaos (πρόδομος, πρόναος), and the opisthodomus (ὀπισθόδομος) or posticum; the former, which was the larger, contained the statue of the goddess, and was the true sanctuary, the latter being probably used as a treasury and vestry. Both these chambers had inner rows of pillars (in two stories, one over the oth[er] , sixteen in the former and fou. in the latter, porting the partial roof, for the large cham- , at least, had its centre open to the sky. hnically, the temple is called peripteral octa- e hypæthral. It was adorned, within and hout, with colors and gilding, and with sculp- s which are regarded as the master-pieces ncient art. The colossal chryselephantine ry and gold) statue of Minerva (Athena), ch stood at the end of the prodomus, opposite he entrance, was the work of Phidias him- , and surpassed every other statue in the ient world, except that of Jupiter (Zeus) at mpia by the same artist. The other sculp- s were executed under the direction of dias by different artists, as may still be seen lifferences in their style; but the most im- tant of them were doubtless from the hand Phidias himself: (1.) The tympana of the pedi- ts (i. e., the inner flat portion of the triangu- gable-ends of the roof above the two end ticoes) were filled with groups of detached ssal statues, those of the eastern or prin- l front representing the birth of Minerva hena), and those of the western front the test between Minerva (Athena) and Neptune seidon) for the land of Attica. (2.) In the ze of the entablature (i. e., the upper of the portions into which the surface between columns and the roof is divided), the me- s between the triglyphs (i. e., the square spaces ween the projections answering to the ends beams if the roof had been of wood) were ed with sculptures in high relief, ninety-two all, fourteen on each front, and thirty-two on ch side, representing subjects from the Attic thology, among which the battle of the Athe- ns with the Centaurs forms the subject of fifteen metopes from the southern side, which now in the British Museum. (3.) Along the of the external wall of the cella, under the ling of the peristyle, ran a frieze, sculptured th a representation of the Panathenaic pro- ssion in very low relief. A large number of slabs of this frieze were brought to England Lord Elgin, with the fifteen metopes just men- oned, and a considerable number of other frag- ents, including some of the most important, ough mutilated, statues from the pediments; d the whole collection was purchased by the tion in 1816, and deposited in the British Mu- um, where may also be seen excellent models the ruins of the Parthenon, and of the temple conjecturally restored. The worst of the in- ries which it has suffered from war and pillage s inflicted in the siege of Athens by the Vene- ns in 1687, when a bomb exploded in the very ntre of the Parthenon, and threw down much both the side walls. Its ruins are still, wever, in sufficient preservation to give a od idea of the construction of all its principal rts.

Parthĕnŏpæus (Παρθενοπαῖος), one of the ven heroes who accompanied Adrastus in his pedition against Thebes. He is sometimes lled a son of Mars (Ares) or Milanion and Ata- nta, sometimes of Meleager and Atalanta, and metimes of Talaus and Lysimache. His son, the nymph Clymene, who marched against hebes as one of the Epigoni, is called Proma- us, Stratolaus, Thesimenes, or Tlesimenes. Parthenopæus was killed at Thebes by Asphodicus, Amphidicus, or Periclymenus.

Parthĕnŏpolis (Παρθενόπολις), a town in Mœsia Inferior, near the Pontus Euxinus, and between Calatis and Tomi.

Parthĭa, Parthyæa, Parthiēnē (Παρθία, Παρθυαία, Παρθυηνή: Πάρθοι, Παρθυαῖοι, Parthi, Parthiēni: now Khorassan), a country of Asia, to the southeast of the Caspian. Its extent was different at different times; but, as the term was generally understood by the ancient geographers, it denoted the partly mountainous and partly desert country on the south of the mountains which hem in the Caspian on the southeast (Mons Labuta), and which divided Parthia on the north from Hyrcania. On the northeast and east, a branch of the same chain, called Masdoranus, divided it from Aria; on the south the deserts of Parthia joined those of Carmania, and further westward the Mons Parachoathras divided Parthia from Persis and Susiana; on the west and northwest it was divided from Media by boundaries which can not be exactly marked out. Of this district only the northern part, in and below the mountains of Hyrcania, seems to have formed the proper country of the Parthi, who were a people of Scythian origin. The ancient writers tell us that the name means exiles; but this is uncertain. They were a very warlike people, and especially celebrated as horse-archers. Their tactics, of which the Romans had fatal experience in their first wars with them, became so celebrated as to pass into a proverb. Their mail-clad horsemen spread like a cloud round the hostile army, and poured in a shower of darts; and then evaded any closer conflict by a rapid flight, during which they still shot their arrow backward upon the enemy. Under the Persian empire, the Parthians, with the Chorasmii, Sogdii, and Arii, formed the sixteenth satrapy: under Alexander and the Greek kings of Syria, Parthia and Hyrcania together formed a satrapy. About B.C. 250 they revolted from the Seleucidæ, under a chieftain named Arsaces, who founded an independent monarchy, the history of which is given under Arsaces. During the period of the downfall of the Syrian kingdom, the Parthians overran the provinces east of the Euphrates, and about B.C. 130 they overthrew the kingdom of Bactria, so that their empire extended over Asia from the Euphrates to the Indus, and from the Indian Ocean to the Paropamisus, or even to the Oxus; but on this northern frontier they had to maintain a continual conflict with the nomad tribes of Central Asia. On the west their progress was checked by Mithradates and Tigranes, till those kings fell successively before the Romans, who were thus brought into collision with the Parthians. After the memorable destruction of Crassus and his army, B.C. 53 (vid. Crassus), the Parthians threatened Syria and Asia Minor; but their progress was stopped by two signal defeats, which they suffered from Antony's legate Ventidius in 39 and 38. The preparations for renewing the war with Rome were rendered fruitless by the contest for the Parthian throne between Phraates IV. and Tir dates, which led to an appeal to Augustus, and to the restoration of the standards of Crassus, B.C. 20; an event to which the Roman poets often allude in terms of flattery to Augustus, almost as if he had conquered the Parthian empire. It is to be observed that the poets of the Augustan age use the names Parthi, Persæ, and Medi indifferently. The Parthian empire had now begun to decline, owing to civil contests and the defection of the governors of provinces, and had ceased to be formidable to the Romans. There were, however, continual disputes between the two empires for the protectorate of the kingdom of Armenia. In consequence of one of these disputes, Trajan invaded the Parthian empire, and obtained possession for a short time of Mesopotamia; but his conquests were surrendered under Hadrian, and the Euphrates again became the boundary of the two empires. There were other wars at later periods, which resulted in favor of the Romans, who took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and made the district of Osroëne a Roman province. The exhaustion which was the effect of these wars at length gave the Persians the opportunity of throwing off the Parthian yoke. Led by Artaxerxes (Ardshir), they put an end to the Parthian kingdom of the Arsacidæ, after it had lasted four hundred and seventy-six years, and established the Persian dynasty of the Sassanidæ, A.D. 226. Vid. Arsaces, Sassanidæ.

Parthĭni or Parthēni (Παρθινοί, Παρθηνοί), an Illyrian people, in the neighborhood of Dyrrhachium.

Parthiscus or Parthissus, a river in Dacia, probably the same as the Tibiscus. Vid. Tibiscus.

Paryadres (Παρυάδρης: now Kara-bel Dagh, or Kut-Tagh), a mountain chain of Western Asia, running southwest and northeast from the east of Asia Minor into the centre of Armenia, and forming the chief connecting link between the Taurus and the mountains of Armenia. It was considered as the boundary between Cappadocia (i. e., Pontus Cappadocius) and Armenia (i. e., Armenia Minor). In a wide sense the name seems sometimes to extend so far northeast as to include Mount Abus (now Ararat) in Armenia.

Paryēti Montes (τὰ Παρυητῶν ὄρη, from the Indian word paruta, i. e., a mountain: now Soliman Mount), the great mountain chain which runs north and south on the western side of the valley of the Indus, and forms the connecting link between the mountains which skirt the northern coast of the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean, and the parallel chain, further north, called the Paropamisus or Indian Caucasus; or, between the eastern extensions of the Taurus and Anti-Taurus systems, in the widest sense. This chain formed the boundary between Arachosia and the Paropamisadæ: it now divides Beloochistan and Afghanistan on the west from Scinde and the Punjab on the east, and it meets the Hindoo-Koosh in the northeastern corner of Afghanistan, between Cabool and Peshawur. Its ancient inhabitants were called Paryētæ (Παρυῆται); and the name Paruta is found in old Persian inscriptions and in the Zendavesta (the old Persian sacred book) as that of a people.

Parysătis (Παρύσατις or Παρυσάτις), daughter of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, king of Persia, was given by her father in marriage to her own brother Darius, surnamed Ochus, who in B.C. 424 succeeded Xerxes II. on the throne of Persia. The feeble character of Darius threw the chief power into the hands of Parysatis, whose administration was little else than a series of murders. Four of her sons grew up to manhood. The eldest of these, Artaxerxes Mnemon, was born before Darius had obtained the sovereign power, and on this pretext Parysatis sought to set aside his claims to the throne in favor of her second son Cyrus. Failing in this attempt, she nevertheless interposed after the death of Darius, 405, to prevent Artaxerxes from putting Cyrus to death, and prevailed with the king to allow him to return to his satrapy in Asia Minor. After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (401), she did not hesitate to display her grief for the death of her favorite son by bestowing funeral honors on his mutilated remains; and she subsequently succeeded in getting into her power all the authors of the death of Cyrus, whom she put to death by the most cruel tortures. She afterward poisoned Statira, the wife of Artaxerxes. The feeble and indolent king was content to banish her to Babylon; and it was not long before he recalled her to his court, where she soon recovered all her former influence. Of this she availed herself to turn his suspicions against Tissaphernes, whom she had long hated as having been the first to discover the designs of Cyrus to his brother, and who was now put to death by Artaxerxes at her instigation, 396. She appears to have died soon afterward.

Pasargăda or -æ (Πασαργάδα, Πασαργάδαι), the older of the two capitals of Persia (the other and later being Persepolis), is said to have been founded by Cyrus the Great on the spot where he gained his great victory over Astyages. The tomb of Cyrus stood here in the midst of a beautiful park. The exact site is doubtful. Strabo describes it as lying in the hollow part of Persis, on the River Cyrus, southeast of Persepolis, and near the borders of Carmania. Most modern geographers identify it with Murghab, northeast of Persepolis, where there are the remains of a great sepulchral monument of the ancient Persians. Others place it at Fasa or at Darab-gherd, both southeast of Persepolis, but not answering Strabo's description in other respects so well as Murghab. Others identify it with Persepolis, which is almost certainly an error.

Pasargădæ (Πασαργάδαι), the most noble of the three chief tribes of the ancient Persians, the other two being the Maraphii and Maspii. The royal house of the Achæmenidæ were of the race of the Pasargadæ. They had their residence chiefly in and about the city of Pasargada.

[Pasēas (Πασέας), father of the Sicyonian tyrant Abantidas; after the death of his son he made himself tyrant, but was soon after slain by Nicocles.]

Pasias, a Greek painter, belonged to the Sicyonian school, and flourished about B.C. 220.

Pasion (Πασίων). [1. A Megarian, in the service of Cyrus the younger when he besieged Miletus: he afterward joined him with seven hundred men at Sardis in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes. Having taken offence at Cyrus's allowing Clearchus to retain the soldiers who had deserted from him at Tarsus, Pasion himself abandoned the cause of Cyrus, and sailed away from Myriandrus for Greece with his most valuable effects. He was not pursued, and Cyrus did not even detain his wife and children, who were in his power at Tralles.] —2. A wealthy banker at Athens, was originally a slave of Antisthenes and Archestratus, who were also bankers. In their service he displayed great fidelity as well as aptitude for business, and was manumitted as a reward. He afterward set up a banking concern on his own account, by which, together with a shield manufactory, he greatly enriched himself, while he continued all along to preserve his old character for integrity, and his credit stood high throughout Greece. He did not, however, escape an accusation of fraudulently keeping back some money which had been intrusted to him by a foreigner from the Euxine. The plaintiff's case is stated in an oration of Isocrates (τραπεζιτικός), still extant. Pasion did good service to Athens with his money on several occasions. He was rewarded with the freedom of the city, and was enrolled in the demus of Acharnæ. He died at Athens in B.C. 370, after a lingering illness, accompanied with failure of sight. Toward the end of his life his affairs were administered to a great extent by his freedman Phormion, to whom he let his banking shop and shield manufactory, and settled in his will that he should marry his widow Archippe, with a handsome dowry, and undertake the guardianship of his younger son Pasicles. His elder son, Apollodorus, grievously diminished his patrimony by extravagance and law-suits.

PĀSĬPHĂË (Πασιφάη), daughter of Helios (the Sun) and Perseis, and a sister of Circe and Æetes, was the wife of Minos, by whom she became the mother of Androgeos, Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Acalle, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phædra. Hence Phædra is called Pasiphaëia (Ov., Met., xv., 500). Respecting the passion of Pasiphaë for the beautiful bull, and the birth of the Minotaurus, vid. p. 517, b.

PASĬTĔLES (Πασιτέλης). 1. A statuary, who flourished about B.C. 468, and was the teacher of Colotes, the contemporary of Phidias.—2. A statuary, sculptor, and silver-chaser, of the highest distinction, was a native of Magna Græcia, and obtained the Roman franchise with his countrymen in B.C. 90. He flourished at Rome from about 60 to 30. Pasiteles also wrote a treatise in five books upon celebrated works of sculpture and chasing PASĬTHĔA (Πασιθέα). 1. One of the Charites, or Graces, also called Aglaia.—2. One of the Nereids.

PASITIGRIS (Πασιτίγρης or Πασίτιγρις: now probably [Shat-el-Arab]), a considerable river of Asia, rising in the mountains east of Mesobatene, on the confines of Media and Persis, and flowing first west by north to Mount Zagros or Parachoathras, then, breaking through this chain, it turns to the south, and flows through Susiana into the head of the Persian Gulf, after receiving the Eulæus on its western side. Some geographers make the Pasitigris a tributary of the Tigris PASSĀRŌN (Πασσάρων: near Dhramisius, south west of Joannina), a town of Epirus in Molossia, and the ancient capital of the Molossian kings. It was destroyed by the Romans, together with seventy other towns of Epirus, after the conquest of Macedonia, B.C. 168.

PATĂRA (τὰ Πάταρα: Παταρεύς: ruins at Patara), one of the chief cities of Lycia, was a flourishing sea-port, on a promontory of the same name (ἡ Παταρων ἄκρα), sixty stadia (six geographical miles) east of the mouth of the Xanthus. It was early colonized by Dorians from Crete, and became a chief seat of the worship of Apollo, who had here a very celebrated oracle, which uttered responses in the winter only, and from whose son Patarus the name of the city was mythically derived. It was restored and enlarged by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who called it Arsinoë, but it remained better known by its old name.

[PATARBEMIS (Πατάρβημις), one of the principal officers of Apries, king of Egypt, having been sent to arrest and bring to him Amasis, but having failed in so doing, was shamefully mutilated by the king; this conduct caused a revolt of the Egyptians.]

PĂTĂVĪUM (Patavīnus: now Padova or Padua), an ancient town of the Veneti in the north of Italy, on the Medoacus Minor, and on the road from Mutina to Altinum, was said to have been founded by the Trojan Antenor. It became a flourishing and important town in early times, and was powerful enough in B.C. 302 to drive back the Spartan king Cleomenes with great loss when he attempted to plunder the surrounding country. Under the Romans Patavium was the most important city in the north of Italy, and, by its commerce and manufactures (of which its woollen stuffs were the most celebrated), it attained great opulence. According to Strabo, it possessed five hundred citizens, whose fortune entitled them to the equestrian rank. It was plundered by Attila; and, in consequence of a revolt of its citizens, it was subsequently destroyed by Agilolf, king of the Langobards, and razed to the ground; hence the modern town contains few remains of antiquity. Patavium is celebrated as the birth-place of the historian Livy. In its neighborhood were the Aquæ Patavinæ, also called Aponi Fons, respecting which, vid. p. 78, b.

PATERCŬLUS, C. VELLEIUS, a Roman historian, was probably born about B.C. 19, and was descended from a distinguished Campanian family. He adopted the profession of arms; and, soon after he had entered the army, he accompanied C. Cæsar in his expedition to the East, and was present with the latter at his interview with the Parthian king in A.D. 2. Two years afterward, A.D. 4, he served under Tiberius in Germany, succeeding his father in the rank of præfectus equitum, having previously filled in succession the offices of tribune of the soldiers and tribune of the camp. For the next eight years Paterculus served under Tiberius, either as præfectus or legatus, in the various campaigns of the latter in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and, by his activity and ability, gained the favor of the future emperor. He was quæstor A.D. 7, but he continued to serve as legatus under Tiberius. He accompanied his commander on his return to Rome in 12, and took a prominent part in the triumphal procession of Tiberius, along with his brother Magius Celer. The two brothers were prætors in 15. Paterculus was alive in 30, as he drew up his history in that year for the use of M. Vinicius, who was then consul; and it is conjectured, with much probability, that he perished in the following year (31), along with the other friends of Sejanus. The favorable manner in which he had so recently spoken in his history of this powerful minister would be sufficient to insure his condemnation on the fall of the latter. The work of Paterculus, which has come down to us, is a brief historical compendium in two books, and bears the title C. Velleii Paterculi Historiæ Romanæ ad M. Vinicium Cos. Libri II. The beginning of the work is wanting, and there is also a portion lost after the eighth chapter of the first book. The object of this compendium was to give a brief view of universal history, but more especially of the events connected with Rome, the history of which occupies the main portion of the book. It commenced apparently with the destruction of Troy, and ended with the year 30. In the execution of his work, Velleius has shown great skill and judgment. He does not attempt to give a consecutive account of all the events of history; he seizes upon a few only of the more prominent facts, which he describes at sufficient length to leave them impressed upon the recollection of his hearers. His style, which is a close imitation of Sallust's, is characterized by clearness, conciseness, and energy. In his estimate of the characters of the leading actors in Roman history, he generally exhibits both discrimination and judgment; but he lavishes the most indiscriminate praises, as might have been expected, upon his patron Tiberius. Only one manuscript of Paterculus has come down to us; and as this manuscript abounds with errors, the text is in a very corrupt state. The best editions are by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat., 1789; by Orelli, Lips., 1835; by Bothe, Turici, 1837; [and by Kritz, Lips., 1840.]

Paternus, Tarruntēnus, a jurist, is probably the same person who was præfectus prætorio under Commodus, and was put to death by the emperor on a charge of treason. He was the author of a work in four books, entitled De Re Militari or Militarium, from which there are two excerpts in the Digest.

Patmos (Πάτμος: now Patmo), one of the islands called Sporades, in the Icarian Sea, at about equal distances south of Samos and west of the Promontorium Posidium on the coast of Caria, celebrated as the place to which the Apostle John was banished, and in which he wrote the Apocalypse. The natives still affect to show the cave where St. John saw the apocalyptic visions (τὸ σπήλαιον τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως). On the eastern side of the island was a city with a harbor.

Patræ (Πάτραι, Πατρέες, Herod.: Πατρεῖς; now Patras), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, was situated west of Rhium, near the opening of the Corinthian Gulf. It is said to have been originally called Aroe (Ἀρόη), and to have been founded by the autochthon Eumelus; and after the expulsion of the Ionians, to have been taken possession of by Patreus, from whom it derived its name. The town is rarely mentioned in early Greek history, and was chiefly of importance as the place from which the Peloponnesians directed their attacks against the opposite coast of Ætolia. Patræ was one of the four towns which took the leading part in founding the second Achæan league. In consequence of assisting the Ætolians against the Gauls in B.C. 279, Patræ became so weakened that most of the inhabitants deserted the town and took up their abodes in the neighboring villages. Under the Romans it continued to be an insignificant place till the time of Augustus, who rebuilt the town after the battle of Actium, again collected its inhabitants, and added to them those of Rhypæ. Augustus further gave Patræ dominion over the neighboring towns, and even over Locris, and also bestowed upon it the privileges of a Roman colony: hence we find it called on coins Colonia Augusta Aroe Patrensis. Strabo describes Patræ in his time as a flourishing and populous town, with a good harbor, and it was frequently the place at which persons landed sailing from Italy to Greece. The modern Patras is still an important place, but contains few remains of antiquity.

Patrocles (Πατροκλῆς), a Macedonian general in the service of Seleucus I. and Antiochus I., kings of Syria. Patrocles held, both under Seleucus and Antiochus, an important government over some of the eastern provinces of the Syrian empire. During the period of his holding this position, he collected accurate geographical information, which he afterward published to the world; but, though he is frequently cited by Strabo, who placed the utmost reliance on his accuracy, neither the title nor exact subject of his work is mentioned. It seems clear, however, that it included a general account of India, as well as of the countries on the banks of the Oxus and the Caspian Sea. Patrocles regarded the Caspian Sea as a gulf or inlet of the ocean, and maintained the possibility of sailing thither by sea from the Indian Ocean.

Patrocli Insŭla (Πατρόκλου νῆσος: now Gedaronesi or Gaidronisi), a small island off the southwestern coast of Attica, near Sunium.

Patroclus (Πάτροκλος or Πατροκλῆς), the celebrated friend of Achilles, was son of Menœtius of Opus, and grandson of Actor and Ægina, whence he is called Actorides. His mother is commonly called Sthenele, but some mention her under the name of Periapis or Polymele. Æacus, the grandfather of Achilles, was a brother of Menœtius, so that Achilles and Patroclus were kinsmen as well as friends. While still a boy, Patroclus involuntarily slew Clysonymus, son of Amphidamas. In consequence of this accident, he was taken by his father to Peleus at Phthia, where he was educated together with Achilles. He is said to have taken part in the expedition against Troy on account of his attachment to Achilles. He fought bravely against the Trojans, until his friend withdrew from the scene of action, when Patroclus followed his example. But when the Greeks were hard pressed, he begged Achilles to allow him to put on his armor, and with his men to hasten to the assistance of the Greeks. Achilles granted the request, and Patroclus succeeded in driving back the Trojans and extinguishing the fire which was raging among the ships. He slew many enemies, and thrice made an assault upon the walls of Troy; but on a sudden he was struck by Apollo, and became senseless. In this state Euphorbus ran him through with his lance from behind, and Hector gave him the last and fatal blow. Hector also took possession of his armor. A long struggle now ensued between the Greeks and Trojans for the body of Patroclus; but the former obtained possession of it, and brought it to Achilles, who was deeply grieved, and vowed to avenge the death of his friend. Thetis protected the body with ambrosia against decomposition, until Achilles had leisure solemnly to burn it with funeral sacrifices. His ashes were collected in a golden urn which Bacchus (Dionysus) had once given to Thetis, and were deposited under a mound, where the remains of Achilles were subsequently buried. Funeral games were celebrated in his honor. Achilles and Patroclus met again in the lower world; or, according to others, they continued after their death to live together in the island of Leuce.

[PATRON, an Arcadian, mentioned by Virgil as one of those engaged in the games celebrated by Æneas in Sicily in honor of his father.]

PATRON. [1. A native of Phocis, commander of the Greek mercenaries who accompanied Darius after the battle of Gaugamela. When Bessus and his accomplices were conspiring against Darius, Patron with his Greeks remained faithful to him.]—2. An Epicurean philosopher, lived for some time in Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero and others. From Rome he removed to Athens, and there succeeded Phædrus as president of the Epicurean school, B.C. 52.

PATTĂLA. Vid. PATTALENE.

PATTALĒNE or PATALĒNE (Παατταληνή, Παταληνή: now Lower Scinde), the name of the great delta formed by the two principal arms by which the Indus falls into the sea. At the apex of the delta stood the city PATTĂLA or PATĂLA (now probably Hyderabad). The name is probably a native Indian word, namely, the Sanscrit patála, which means the western country, and is applied to the western part of Northern India about the Indus, in contradistinction to the eastern part about the Ganges.

PATULCĬUS, a surname of Janus. Vid. JANUS.

PATŪMUS (Πάτουμος: in the Old Testament, Pithom: probably near Habaseyh or Belbeis), an Egyptian city in the Arabian Desert, on the eastern margin of the Delta, near Bubastis, and near the commencement of Necho's Canal from the Nile to the Red Sea; built by the Israelites during their captivity (Exod., i., 11).

PAULĪNA or PAULLĪNA. 1. LOLLIA. Vid. LOLLIA.—2. POMPEIA, wife of Seneca the philosopher, and probably the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus, who commanded in Germany in the reign of Nero. When her husband was condemned to death, she opened her veins along with him. After the blood had flowed some time, Nero commanded her veins to be bound up; she lived a few years longer, but with a paleness which testified how near she had been to death.

PAULĪNUS. .. POMPEIUS, commanded in Germany along with L. Antistius Vetus in A.D. 58, and completed the dam to restrain the inundation of the Rhine, which Drusus had commenced sixty-three years before. Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Brevitate Vitæ; and the Pompeia Paulina, whom the philosopher married, was probably the daughter of this Paulinus.—2. SUETŌNIUS, proprætor in Mauretania, in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, A.D. 42, when he conquered the Moors who had revolted, and advanced as far as Mount Atlas. He had the command of Britain in the reign of Nero, from 59 to 62. For the first two years all his undertakings were successful; but during his absence on an expedition against the island of Mona (now Anglesey), the Britons rose in rebellion under Boadicea (61). They at first met with great success, but were conquered by Suetonius on his return from Mona. Vid. BOADICEA. In 66 he was consul; and, after the death of Nero in 68, he was one of Otho's generals in the war against Vitellius. It was against his advice that Otho fought the battle at Bedriacum. He was pardoned by Vitellius after Otho's death.—3. Of Milan (Mediolanensis), was the secretary of St. Ambrose, after whose death he became a deacon, and repaired to Africa, where, at the request of St. Augustine, he composed a biography of his former patron. This biography, and two other small works by Paulinus, are still extant.—4. MEROPIUS PONTIUS ANICIUS PAULINUS, bishop of Nola, and hence generally designated Paulinus Nolanus, was born at Bourdeaux, or at a neighboring town, which he calls Embromagum, about A.D. 353. His parents were wealthy and illustrious, and he received a careful education, enjoying in particular the instructions of the poet Ausonius. After many years spent in worldly honors, he withdrew from the world, and was eventually chosen bishop of Nola in 409. He died in 431. The works of Paulinus are still extant, and consist of Epistolæ (fifty-one in number), Carmina (thirty-two in number, composed in a great variety of metres), and a short tract entitled Passio S. Genesii Arelatensis. Edited by Le Brun, 4to, Paris, 1685, reprinted at Veron., 1736.

PAULLUS or PAULUS, a Roman cognomen in many gentes, but best known as the name of a family of the Æmilia gens. The name was originally written with a double l, but subsequently with only one l.

PAULUS (Παῦλος), Greek writers. 1. ÆGINĒTA a celebrated medical writer, of whose personal history nothing is known except that he was born in Ægina, and that he travelled a good deal, visiting, among other places, Alexandrea. He probably lived in the latter half of the seventh century after Christ. He wrote several medical works in Greek, of which the principal one is still extant, with no exact title, but commonly called De Re Medica Libri Septem. This work is chiefly a compilation from former writers. The Greek text has been twice published, Venet., 1528. and Basil., 1538 There is an excellent English translation by Adams, London, 1834, seq.—2. Of ALEXANDREA, wrote, in A.D. 378, an Introduction to Astrology (Εἰςαγωγὴ εἰς τὴν ἀποτελεσματικήν), which has come down to us, edited by Schatus or Schato, Wittenberg, 1586.—3. Of SAMOSATA, a celebrated heresiarch of the third century, was made bishop of Antioch about A.D. 260. He was condemned and deposed by a council held in 269. Paulus denied the distinct personality of the Son of God, and maintained that the Word came and dwelt in the man Jesus.—4. SILENTIARIUS, so called, because he was chief of the silentiarii, or secretaries of the Emperor Justinian. He wrote various poems, of which the following are extant: (1.) A Description of the Church of St. Sophia (Ἔκφρασις τοῦ ναοῦ τῆς ἁγίας Σοφίας), consisting of one thousand and twenty-nine verses, of which the first one hundred and thirty-four are iambic, the rest hexameter. This poem gives a clear and graphic description of the superb structure which forms its subject, and was recited by its author at the second dedication of the church (A.D. 562), after the restoration of the dome, which had fallen in. Edited by Græfe, Lips., 1822, and by Bekker, Bonn, 1837, in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians. (2.) A Description of the Pulpit (Ἔκφρασις τοῦ ἄμβωνος), consisting of three hundred and four verses, is a supplement to the former poem. It is printed in the editions mentioned above. (3.) Epigrams, eighty-three in all, given in the Anthologia. Among these is a poem On the Pythian Baths, (Εἰς τὰ ἐν Πυθίοις θέρμα).

PAULUS, ÆMILIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 302, and magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, 301. — 2. M., consul 255 with Ser. Fulvius Pætinus Nobilior, about the middle of the first Punic war. Vid. NOBILIOR, No. 1.—3. L., son of No. 2, consul 219, when he conquered Demetrius off the island of Pharos in the Adriatic, and compelled him to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. He was consul a second time in 216 with C. Terentius Varro. This was the year of the memorable defeat at Cannæ. Vid. HANNIBAL. The battle was fought against the advice of Paulus; and he was one of the many distinguished Romans who perished in the engagement, refusing to fly from the field when a tribune of the soldiers offered him his horse. Hence we find in Horace (Carm., i., 12), "animæque magnæ prodigum Paulum, superante Pœno." Paulus was a stanch adherent of the aristocracy, and was raised to the consulship by the latter party to counterbalance the influence of the plebeian Terentius Varro.—4. L., afterward surnamed MACEDONICUS, son of No. 3, was born about 230 or 229, since at the time of his second consulship, 168, he was upward of sixty years of age. He was one of the best specimens of the high Roman nobles. He would not condescend to flatter the people for the offices of the state, maintained with strictness severe discipline in the army, was deeply skilled in the law of the augurs, to whose college he belonged, and maintained throughout life a pure and unspotted character. He was elected curule ædile 192; was prætor 191, and obtained Further Spain as his province, where he carried on war with the Lusitani; and was consul 181 when he conquered the Ingauni, a Ligurian people. For the next thirteen years he lived quietly at Rome, devoting most of his time to the education of his children. He was consul a second time in 168, and brought the war against Perseus to a conclusion by the defeat of the Macedonian monarch, near Pydna, on the 22d of June. Perseus shortly afterward surrendered himself to Paulus. Vid. PERSEUS. Paulus remained in Macedonia during the greater part of the following year as proconsul, and arranged the affairs of Macedonia, in conjunction with ten Roman commissioners, whom the senate had dispatched for the purpose. Before leaving Greece he marched into Epirus, where, in accordance with a cruel command of the senate, he gave to his soldiers seventy towns to be pillaged because they had been in alliance with Perseus. The triumph of Paulus, which was celebrated at the end of November, 167, was the most splendid that Rome had yet seen. It lasted three days. Before the triumphal car of Æmilius walked the captive monarch of Macedonia and his children, and behind it were his two illustrious sons, Q. Fabius Maximus and P. Scipio Africanus the younger, both of whom had been adopted into other families. But the glory of the conqueror was clouded by family misfortune. At this very time he lost his two younger sons; one, twelve years of age, died only five days before his triumph, and the other, fourteen years of age, only three days after his triumph. The loss was all the severer, since he had no son left to carry his name down to posterity. In 164 Paulus was censor with Q. Marcius Philippus, and died in 160, after a long and tedious illness. The fortune he left behind him was so small as scarcely to be sufficient to pay his wife's dowry. The Adelphi of Terence was brought out at the funeral games exhibited in his honor. Æmilius Paulus was married twice. By his first wife, Papiria, the daughter of C. Papirius Maso, consul 231, he had four children, two sons, one of whom was adopted by Fabius Maximus and the other by P. Scipio, and two daughters, one of whom was married to Q. Ælius Tubero, and the other to M. Cato, son of Cato the censor. He afterward divorced Papiria; and by his second wife, whose name is not mentioned, he had two sons, whose death has been mentioned above, and a daughter, who was a child at the time that her father was elected to his second consulship.

PAULUS, JULIUS, one of the most distinguished of the Roman jurists, has been supposed, without any good reason, to be of Greek origin. He was in the auditorium of Papinian, and, consequently, was acting as a jurist in the reign of Septimius Severus. He was exiled by Elagabalus, but he was recalled by Alexander Severus when the latter became emperor, and was made a member of his consilium. Paulus also held the office of præfectus prætorio: he survived his contemporary Ulpian. Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the Digest than from any other jurist except Ulpian. Upward of seventy separate works by Paulus are quoted in the Digest. Of these, his greatest work was Ad Edictum, in eighty books.

Paulus, Passiēnus, a contemporary and friend of the younger Pliny, was a distinguished Roman eques, and was celebrated for his elegiac and lyric poems. He belonged to the same municipium (Mevania in Umbria) as Propertius, whom he numbered among his ancestors.

Pausanias (Παυσανίας). 1. A Spartan of the Agid branch of the royal family, the son of Cleombrotus and nephew of Leonidas. Several writers incorrectly call him king; but he only succeeded his father Cleombrotus in the guardianship of his cousin Plistarchus, the son of Leonidas, for whom he exercised the functions of royalty from B.C. 479 to the period of his death. In 479, when the Athenians called upon the Lacedæmonians for aid against the Persians, the Spartans sent a body of five thousand Spartans, each attended by seven Helots, under the command of Pausanias. At the Isthmus Pausanias was joined by the other Peloponnesian allies, and at Eleusis by the Athenians, and forthwith took the command of the combined forces, the other Greek generals forming a sort of council of war. The allied forces amounted to nearly one hundred and ten thousand men. Near Platææ in Bœotia, Pausanias defeated the Persian army under the command of Mardonius. This decisive victory secured the independence of Greece. Pausanias received as his reward a tenth of the Persian spoils. In 477 the confederate Greeks sent out a fleet, under the command of Pausanias, to follow up their success by driving the Persians completely out of Europe and the islands. Cyprus was first attacked, and the greater part of it subdued. From Cyprus Pausanias sailed to Byzantium, and captured the city. The capture of this city afforded Pausanias an opportunity for commencing the execution of the design which he had apparently formed even before leaving Greece. Dazzled by his success and reputation, his station as a Spartan citizen had become too restricted for his ambition. His position as regent was one which must terminate when the king became of age. He therefore aimed at becoming tyrant over the whole of Greece, with the assistance of the Persian king. Among the prisoners taken at Byzantium were some Persians connected with the royal family. These he sent to the king, with a letter, in which he offered to bring Sparta and the rest of Greece under his power, and proposed to marry his daughter. His offers were gladly accepted, and whatever amount of troops and money he required for accomplishing his designs. Pausanias now set no bounds to his arrogant and domineering temper. The allies were so disgusted by his conduct, that they all, except the Peloponnesians and Æginetans, voluntarily offered to transfer to the Athenians that pre-eminence of rank which Sparta had hitherto enjoyed. In this way the Athenian confederacy first took its rise. Reports of the conduct and designs of Pausanias reached Sparta, and he was recalled and put upon his trial; but the evidence respecting his meditated treachery was not yet thought sufficiently strong. Shortly afterward he returned to Byzantium, without the orders of the ephors, and renewed his treasonable intrigues. He was again recalled to Sparta, was again put on his trial, and again acquitted. But even after this second escape he still continued to carry on his intrigues with Persia. At length a man, who was charged with a letter to Persia, having his suspicions awakened by noticing that none of those sent previously on similar errands had returned, counterfeited the seal of Pausanias and opened the letter, in which he found directions for his own death. He carried the letter to the ephors, who prepared to arrest Pausanias; but he took refuge in the temple of Athena (Minerva) Chalciœcus. The ephors stripped off the roof of the temple and built up the door; the aged mother of Pausanias is said to have been among the first who laid a stone for this purpose. When he was on the point of expiring, the ephors took him out lest his death should pollute the sanctuary. He died as soon as he got outside, B.C. 470. He left three sons behind him, Plistoanax, afterward king, Cleomenes, and Aristocles.—2. Son of Plistóanax, and grandson of the preceding, was king of Sparta from B.C. 408 to 394 In 403 he was sent with an army into Attica, and secretly favored the cause of Thrasybulus and the Athenian exiles, in order to counteract the plans of Lysander. In 395 Pausanias was sent with an army against the Thebans; but in consequence of the death of Lysander, who was slain under the walls of Haliartus on the day before Pausanias reached the spot, the king agreed to withdraw his forces from Bœotia. On his return to Sparta he was impeached, and, seeing that a fair trial was not to be hoped for, went into voluntary exile, and was condemned to death. He was living at Tegea in 385, when Mantinea was besieged by his son Agesipolis, who succeeded him on the throne.—3. King of Macedonia, the son and successor of Aeropus. He was assassinated in the year of his accession by Amyntas II., 394.—4. A pretender to the throne of Macedonia, made his appearance in 367, after Alexander II. had been assassinated by Ptolemæus. Eurydice, the mother of Alexander, sent to request the aid of the Athenian general Iphicrates, who expelled Pausanias from the kingdom.—5. A Macedonian youth of distinguished family, from the province of Orestis. Having been shamefully treated by Attalus, he complained of the outrage to Philip; but, as Philip took no notice of his complaints, he directed his vengeance against the king himself. He shortly afterward murdered Philip at the festival held at Ægæ, 336, but was slain on the spot by some officers of the king's guard. Suspicion rested on Olympias and Alexander of having been privy to the deed; but with regard to Alexander, at any rate, the suspicion is probably totally unfounded. There was a story that Pausanias, while meditating revenge, having asked the sophist Hermocrates which was the shortest way to fame, the latter replied that it was by killing the man who had performed the greatest achievements. — 6. The traveller and geographer, was perhaps a native of Lydia. He lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius, and wrote his celebrated work in the reign of the latter emperor. This work, entitled Ἑλλάδος Περιήγησις, a Periegesis or Itinerary of Greece, is in ten books, and contains a description of Attica and Megaris (i.), Corinthia, Sicyonia, Phliasia, and Argolis (ii.), Laconica (iii.)

Messenia (iv.), Elis (v., vi.), Achæa (vii.), Arcadia (viii.), Bœotia (ix.), Phocis (x.). The work shows that Pausanias visited most of the places in these divisions of Greece, a fact which is clearly demonstrated by the minuteness and particularity of his description. The work is merely an Itinerary. Pausanias gives no general description of a country or even of a place, but he describes the things as he comes to them. His account is minute; but it mainly refers to objects of antiquity and works of art, such as buildings, temples, statues, and pictures. He also mentions mountains, rivers, and fountains, and the mythological stories connected with them, which, indeed, are his chief inducements to speak of them. His religious feeling was strong, and his belief sure, for he tells many old legends in true good faith and seriousness. His style has been much condemned by modern critics; but if we except some corrupt passages, and if we allow that his order of words is not that of the best Greek writers, there is hardly much obscurity to a person who is competently acquainted with Greek, except that obscurity which sometimes is owing to the matter. With the exception of Herodotus, there is no writer of antiquity, and perhaps none of modern times, who has comprehended so many valuable facts in a small volume. The best editions are by Siebelis, Lips., 1822–1828, 5 vols. 8vo; by Schubart and Walz, Lips., 1838–40, 3 vols. 8vo; [and by L. Dindorf, Paris, 1845, 8vo.]

Pausĭas (Παυσίας), one of the most distinguished Greek painters, was a contemporary of Aristides, Melanthius, and Apelles (about B.C. 360–330), and a disciple of Pamphilus. He had previously been instructed by his father Brietes, who lived at Sicyon, where also Pausias passed his life. The department of the art which Pausias most practiced was painting in encaustic with the cestrum. His favorite subjects were small panel-pictures, chiefly of boys. One of his most celebrated pictures was the portrait of Glycera, a flower-girl of his native city, of whom he was enamored when a young man. Most of his paintings were probably transported to Rome, with the other treasures of Sicyonian art, in the ædileship of Scaurus, when the state of Sicyon was compelled to sell all the pictures which were public property in order to pay its debts.

[Pausicæ (Παυσίκαι), a people of the Persian empire, classed under the eleventh general division, dwelling between the Oxus and Jaxartes.]

Pausilўpum (τὸ Παυσίλυπον), that is, the "grief-assuaging," was the name of a splendid villa near Neapolis in Campania, which Vedius Pollio bequeathed to Augustus. The name was transferred to the celebrated grotto (now Posilippo) between Naples and Puzzuoli, which was formed by a tunnel cut through the rock by the architect Cocceius, by command of Agrippa. At its entrance the tomb of Virgil is still shown.

[Pausiras (Παυσίρας) or Pausiris (Παύσιρις), son of Amyrtæus, the rebel satrap of Egypt. Vid. Amyrtæus. Notwithstanding his father's revolt, he was appointed by the Persian king to the satrapy of Egypt.]

Pauson (Παύσων), a Greek painter, who appears, from the description of Aristotle (Poet., ii., § 2), to have lived somewhat earlier than the time of this philosopher.

Pausŭlæ (Pausulānus: now Monte dell' Ol[illegible]), a town in the interior of Picenum, between [illegible] Salvia and Asculum.

Pavor. Vid. Pallor.

Pax, the goddess of Peace, called Irene by the Greeks. Vid. Irene.

Pax Jūlĭa or Pax Augusta (now Beja), a Roman colony in Lusitania, and the seat of a conventus juridicus, north of Julia Myrtilis.

Paxi (now Paxo and Antipaxo), the name of two small islands off the western coast of Greece between Corcyra and Leucas.

Pēdæum or Pedæus (Πήδαιον, accus., Hom. Il., xiii., 172), a town of the Troad.

[Pēdæus (Πηδαῖος), son of Antenor, slain by Meges in the Trojan war.]

Pēdălĭum (Πηδάλιον). 1. (Now Cape Ghinzi), a promontory of Caria, on the western side of the Sinus Glaucus, called also Artemisium, from a temple of Artemis upon it.—2. (Now Capo della Grega), a promontory on the eastern side of Cyprus.

[Pedanius, T. 1. The first centurion of the principes, was distinguished for his bravery in the second Punic war, B.C. 212.—2. Pedanius Secundus, præfectus urbi in the reign of Nero, was killed by one of his own slaves.]

Pēdăsa (Πήδασα: Πηδασεύς, plur. Πηδασέες, Herod.), a very ancient city of Caria, was originally a chief abode of the Leleges. Alexander assigned it to Halicarnassus. At the time of the Roman empire it had entirely vanished, though its name was preserved in that of the district around its site, namely, Pedăsis (Πηδασίς). Its locality is only known thus far, that it must have stood somewhere in the triangle formed by Miletus, Halicarnassus, and Stratonicea.

Pēdăsus (Πήδασος). 1. A town of Mysia, on the Satniois, mentioned several times by Homer. It was destroyed by the time of Strabo, who says that it was a settlement of the Leleges on Mount Ida.—[2. A city of Messenia, mentioned by Homer, which subsequent writers sought to identify with Methone or Corone.]

[Pedasus (Πήδασος), son of Bucolion and the nymph Abarbarea, and brother of Æsepus, slain by Euryalus under the walls of Troy.]

Pedius. 1. Q., the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Cæsar, being the grandson of Julia, Cæsar's eldest sister. He served under Cæsar in Gaul as his legatus, B.C. 57. In 55 he was a candidate for the curule ædileship with Cn. Plancius and others, but he lost his election. In the civil war he fought on Cæsar's side. He was prætor in 48, and in that year he defeated and slew Milo in the neighborhood of Thurii. In 45 he served against the Pompeian party in Spain. In Cæsar's will, Pedius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavianus and L. Pinarius, Octavianus obtaining three fourths of the property, and the remaining one fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pedius: the latter resigned his share of the inheritance to Octavianus. After the fall of the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, at the battle of Mutina, in April, 43, Octavianus marched upon Rome at the head of an army, and in the month of August he was elected consul along with Pedius. The latter forthwith proposed a law, known by the name of the Lex Pedia, by which all the murderers of Julius Cæsar were punished with aquæ et ignis interdictio. Pedius was left in charge of the city, while Octavianus marched into the north of Italy. He died toward the end of the year, shortly after the news of the proscription had reached Rome.—[2. Q., grandson of No. 1, was dumb from his birth. He was instructed in painting by the direction of his kinsman Messala, with the sanction of Augustus, and attained to considerable excellence in the art, but died while still a youth.]—3. Sextus, a Roman jurist, frequently cited by Paulus and Ulpian, lived before the time of Hadrian.

Pednēlissus (Πεδνηλισσός), a city in the interior of Pisidia, and apparently on the Eurymedon, above Aspendus and Selge. It formed an independent state, but was almost constantly at war with Selge. Mr. Fellowes supposes its site to be marked by the ruins of the Roman period near Bolkas-Koi, on the eastern bank of the Eurymedon.

Pedo Albinovānus. Vid. Albinovanus.

Peducæus, Sex. 1. Proprætor in Sicily, B.C. 76 and 75, in the latter of which years Cicero served under him as quæstor.—2. Son of the preceding, and an intimate friend of Atticus and Cicero. In the civil war Peducæus sided with Cæsar, by whom he was appointed in 48 to the government of Sardinia. In 39 he was proprætor in Spain.

Pedum (Pedānus: now Gallicano), an ancient town of Latium, on the Via Lavicana, which fell into decay at an early period.

Pegæ. Vid. Pagæ.

Pēgăsis (Πηγασίς), i. e., sprung from Pegasus, was applied to the fountain Hippocrene, which was called forth by the hoof of Pegasus. The Muses are also called Pegasides, because the fountain Hippocrene was sacred to them.

Pēgăsus (Πήγασος). 1. The celebrated winged horse, whose origin is thus related: When Perseus struck off the head of Medusa, with whom Neptune (Poseidon) had had intercourse in the form of a horse or a bird, there sprang from her Chrysaor and the horse Pegasus. The latter received this name because he was believed to have made his appearance near the sources (πηγαί) of Oceanus. He ascended to the seats of the immortals, and afterward lived in the palace of Jupiter (Zeus), for whom he carried thunder and lightning. According to this view, which is apparently the most ancient, Pegasus was the thundering horse of Jupiter (Zeus); but later writers describe him as the horse of Eos (Aurora), and place him among the stars. Pegasus also acts a prominent part in the combat of Bellerophon against the Chimæra. In order to kill the Chimæra, it was necessary for Bellerophon to obtain possession of Pegasus. For this purpose the soothsayer Polyidus at Corinth advised him to spend a night in the temple of Minerva (Athena). As Bellerophon was asleep in the temple, the goddess appeared to him in a dream commanding him to sacrifice to Neptune (Poseidon), and gave him a golden bridle. When he awoke he found the bridle, offered the sacrifice, and caught Pegasus while he was drinking at the well Pirene. According to some, Minerva (Athena) herself tamed and bridled Pegasus, and surrendered him to Bellerophon. After he had conquered the Chimæra, he endeavored to rise up to heaven upon his winged horse, but fell down upon the earth. Vid. Bellerophon. Pegasus was also regarded as the horse of the Muses, and in this connection is more celebrated in modern times than in antiquity; for with the ancients he had no connection with the Muses, except producing with his hoof the inspiring fountain Hippocrene. The story about this fountain runs as follows: When the nine Muses engaged in a contest with the nine daughters of Pierus on Mount Helicon, all became darkness when the daughters of Pierus began to sing; whereas, during the song of the Muses, heaven, the sea, and all the rivers stood still to listen, and Helicon rose heavenward with delight, until Pegasus, on the advice of Neptune (Poseidon), stopped its ascent by kicking it with his hoof. From this kick there arose Hippocrene, the inspiring well of the Muses, on Mount Helicon, which, for this reason, Persius calls fons caballinus. Others, again, relate that Pegasus caused the well to gush forth because he was thirsty. Pegasus is often seen represented in ancient works of art along with Minerva (Athena) and Bellerophon.—2. A Roman jurist, one of the followers or pupils of Proculus, and præfectus urbi under Domitian (Juv., iv., 76). The Senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was passed in the time of Vespasian, when Pegasus was consul suffectus with Pusio, probably took its name from him.

Peiso Lacus. Vid. Pelso Lacus.

Pelagĭus, probably a native of Britain, celebrated as the propagator of those heretical opinions which have derived their name from him, and which were opposed with great energy by his contemporaries, Augustine and Jerome. He first appears in history about the beginning of the fifth century, when we find him residing at Rome. In the year 409 or 410, when Alaric was threatening the metropolis, Pelagius, accompanied by his disciple and ardent admirer Cœlestius, passed over to Sicily, from thence proceeded to Africa, and, leaving Cœlestius at Carthage, sailed for Palestine. The fame of his sanctity had preceded him, for upon his arrival he was received with great warmth by Jerome and many other distinguished fathers of the Church. Soon afterward the opinions of Pelagius were denounced as heretical; and, in A.D. 417, Pelagius and Cœlestius were anathematized by Pope Innocentius. A very few only of the numerous treatises of Pelagius have descended to us. They are printed with the works of Jerome.

[Pelagon (Πελάγων). 1. A Pylian warrior, served in the Trojan war under Nestor.—2. A Lycian warrior in the train of Sarpedon.—3. A Phocian, son of Amphidamas: from him Cadmus bought the cow which guided him to Thebes.]

Pelagŏnĭa (Πελαγονία: Πελαγόνες, pl.). 1. A district in Macedonia. The Pelagones were an ancient people, probably of Pelasgic origin, and seem originally to have inhabited the Valley of the Axius, since Homer calls Pelagon a son of Axius. The Pelagones afterward migrated westward to the Erigon, the country around which received the name of Pelagonia, which thus lay south of Pæonia. The chief town of this district was also called Pelagonia (now Vitolia or Monastir), which was under the Romans the capital of the fourth division of Macedonia. It was situated on the Via Egnatia, not far from the narrow passes leading into Illyria.—2. A district in Thessaly, called the Pelagonian Tripolis, because it consisted of the three towns of Azōrus, Pythium, and Doliche. It was situated west of Olympus, in the upper valley of the Titaresius, and belonged to Perrhæbia, whence these three towns are sometimes called the Perrhæbian Tripolis. Some of the Macedonian Pelagonians, who had been driven out of their homes by the Pæonians, migrated into this part of Thessaly, which was originally inhabited by Dorians.

[Pelarge (Πελαργή), daughter of Potneus, wife of Isthmiades, was instrumental in establishing the Cabiri-worship in Bœotia, and hence became herself an object of worship.]

Pelasgi (Πελασγοί), the earliest inhabitants of Greece, who established the worship of the Dodonæan Zeus (Jupiter), Hephæstus (Vulcan), the Cabiri, and other divinities that belong to the earliest inhabitants of the country. They claimed descent from a mythical hero, Pelasgus, of whom we have different accounts in the different parts of Greece inhabited by Pelasgians. The nation was widely spread over Greece and the islands of the Grecian archipelago, and the name of Pelasgia was given at one time to Greece. One of the most ancient traditions represented Pelasgus as a descendant of Phoroneus, king of Argos; and it seems to have been generally believed by the Greeks that the Pelasgi spread from Argos to the other countries of Greece. Arcadia, Attica, Epirus, and Thessaly were, in addition to Argos, some of the principal seats of the Pelasgi. They were also found on the coasts of Asia Minor, and, according to some writers, in Italy as well. Of the language, habits, and civilization of this people, we possess no certain knowledge. Herodotus says they spoke a barbarous language, that is, a language not Greek; but from the facility with which the Greek and Pelasgic languages coalesced in all parts of Greece, and from the fact that the Athenians and Arcadians are said to have been of pure Pelasgic origin, it is probable that the two languages had a close affinity. The Pelasgi are further said to have been an agricultural people, and to have possessed a considerable knowledge of the useful arts. The most ancient architectural remains of Greece, such as the treasury or tomb of Atreus at Mycenæ, are ascribed to the Pelasgians, and are cited as specimens of Pelasgian architecture, though there is no positive authority for these statements.

Pĕlasgĭa (Πελασγία), an ancient name of the islands of Delos and Lesbos, referring, of course, to their having been early seats of the Pelasgians.

Pelasgiōtis (Πελασγιῶτις), a district in Thessaly, between Hestiæotis and Magnesia. Thessalia.

Pelasgus. Vid. Pelasgi.

Pelendŏnes, a Celtiberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the sources of the Durius and the Iberus.

Pelethrŏnĭum (Πελεθρόνιον), a mountain district in Thessaly, part of Mount Pelion where the Lapithæ dwelt, and which is said to have derived its name from Pelethronius, king of the Lapithæ, who invented the use of the bridle and the saddle.

Pēleus (Πηλεύς), son of Æacus and En[deis,] was king of the Myrmidons at Phthia in Thessaly. He was a brother of Telamon, and a [half-]brother of Phocus, the son of Æacus by the Nereid Psamathe. Peleus and Telamon resolved to get rid of Phocus, because he excelled them in their military games, and Telamon, or, according to others, Peleus, murdered their step-brother. The two brothers concealed their crime by removing the body of Phocus, but were nevertheless found out, and expelled by Æacus from Ægina. Peleus went to Phthia in Thessaly, where he was purified from the murder by Eurytion, the son of Actor, married his daughter Antigone, and received with her a third of Eurytion's kingdom. Others relate that he went to Ceyx at Trachis; and, as he had come to Thessaly without companions, he prayed to Jupiter (Zeus) for an army; and the god, to please Peleus, metamorphosed the ants (μύρμηκες) into men, who were accordingly called Myrmidons. Peleus accompanied Eurytion to the Calydonian hunt, and involuntarily killed him with his spear, in consequence of which he fled from Phthia to Iolcus, where he was again purified by Acastus, the king of the place. While residing at Iolcus, Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, fell in love with him; but, as her proposals were rejected by Peleus, she accused him to her husband of having attempted her virtue. Acastus, unwilling to stain his hand with the blood of the man whom he had hospitably received, and whom he had purified from his guilt, took him to Mount Pelion, where they hunted wild beasts; and when Peleus, overcome with fatigue, had fallen asleep, Acastus left him alone, and concealed his sword, that he might be destroyed by the wild beasts. When Peleus awoke and sought his sword, he was attacked by the Centaurs, but was saved by Chiron, who also restored to him his sword. There are some modifications of this account in other writers: instead of Astydamia, some mention Hippolyte, the daughter of Cretheus; and others relate that after Acastus had concealed the sword of Peleus, Chiron or Mercury (Hermes) brought him another, which had been made by Vulcan (Hephæstus). While on Mount Pelion, Peleus married the Nereid Thetis, by whom he became the father of Achilles, though some regarded this Thetis as different from the marine divinity, and called her a daughter of Chiron. The gods took part in the marriage solemnity; Chiron presented Peleus with a lance, Neptune (Poseidon) with the immortal horses, Balius and Xanthus, and the other gods with arms. Eris or Strife was the only goddess who was not invited to the nuptials, and she revenged herself by throwing an apple among the guests, with the inscription "To the fairest." Vid. PARIS. Homer mentions Achilles as the only son of Peleus and Thetis, but later writers state that she had already destroyed by fire six children, of whom she was the mother by Peleus, and that, as she attempted to make away with Achilles, her seventh child, she was prevented by Peleus. After this, Peleus, who is also mentioned among the Argonauts, in conjunction with Jason and the Dioscuri, besieged Acastus and Iolcus, slew Astydamia, and over the scattered limbs of her body led his warriors into the city. The flocks of Peleus were at one time worried by a wolf, which Psamathe had sent to avenge the murder of her son Phocus, but she herself afterward, on the request of Thetis, turned the animal into stone. Peleus, who had in former times joined Hercules in his expedition against Troy, was too old to accompany his son Achilles against that city: he remained at home, and survived the death of his son.

PĔLĬĂDES (Πελιάδες), the daughters of Pelias. Vid. PELIAS.

PĔLĬAS (Πελίας). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Tyro, a daughter of Salmoneus. Neptune (Poseidon) once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, with whom she was in love, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. To conceal her shame, their mother exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learned their parentage; and, after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, to the exclusion of Æson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro. Pelias soon afterward expelled his own brother Neleus, and thus became sole ruler of Iolcos. After Pelias had long reigned over Iolcos, Jason, the son of Æson, came to Iolcos and claimed the kingdom as his right. In order to get rid of him, Pelias sent him to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece. Hence arose the celebrated expedition of the Argonauts. After the return of Jason, Pelias was cut to pieces and boiled by his own daughters (the Peliades), who had been told by Medea that in this manner they might restore their father to vigor and youth. His son Acastus held funeral games in his honor at Iolcus, and expelled Jason and Medea from the country. For details, vid. JASON, MEDEA, ARGONAUTÆ. The names of several of the daughters of Pelias are recorded. The most celebrated of them was Alcestis, the wife of Admetus, who is therefore called by Ovid Pelia gener.—[2. A Trojan, wounded by Ulysses in the Trojan war; he survived the destruction of the city, and accompanied Æneas to Italy.]

PĒLĪDES (Πηλείδης, Πηλείων), a patronymic from Peleus, generally given to his son Achilles, more rarely to his grandson Neoptolemus.

PELIGNI, a brave and warlike people of Sabine origin in central Italy, bounded southeast by the Marsi, north by the Marrucini, south by Samnium and the Frentani, and east by the Frentani likewise. The climate of their country was cold (Hor., Carm., iii., 19, 8); but it produced a considerable quantity of flax, and was celebrated for its honey. The Peligni, like their neighbors, the Marsi, were regarded as magicians. Their principal towns were CORFINIUM and SULMO. They offered a brave resistance to the Romans, but concluded a peace with the republic along with their neighbors the Marsi, Marrucini, and Frentani, in B.C. 304. They took an active part in the Social war (90, 89), and their chief town Corfinium was destined by the allies to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome. They were subdued by Pompeius Strabo, after which time they are rarely mentioned.

PĔLINÆUS MONS (τὸ Πελιναῖον ὄρος, or Πελληναῖον: now Mount Elias), the highest mountain of the island of Chios, a little north of the city of Chios, with a celebrated temple of Ζεὺς Πελιναῖος.

PELINNA, or more commonly PELINNÆUM (Πέλιννα, Πελινναῖον: now Gardhiki), a town of Thessaly in Hestiæotis, on the left bank of the Peneus, was taken by the Romans in their war with Antiochus.

PĒLĬON, more rarely PĒLĬOS (τὸ Πήλιον ὄρος: now Plessidhi or Zagora), a lofty range of mountains in Thessaly, in the district of Magnesia, was situated between the Lake Bœbēis and the Pagasæan Gulf, and formed the promontories of Sepias and Æantium. Its sides were covered with wood, and on its summit was a temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Actæus, where the cold was so severe that the persons who went in procession to this temple once a year wore thick skins to protect themselves. Mount Pelion was celebrated in mythology. The giants in their war with the gods are said to have attempted to heap Ossa and Olympus on Pelion, or Pelion and Ossa on Olympus, in order to scale heaven. Near the summit of this mountain was the cave of the Centaur Chiron, whose residence was probably placed here on account of the number of the medicinal plants which grew upon the mountain, since he was celebrated for his skill in medicine. On Pelion also the timber was felled with which the ship Argo was built, whence Ovid applies the term Pelias arbor to this ship.

PELLA (Πέλλα: Πελλαῖος, Pellæus). 1. (Now Alakilisi), an ancient town of Macedonia, in the district Bottiæa, was situated upon a hill, and upon a lake formed by the River Lydias, one hundred and twenty stadia from its mouth. It continued to be a place of small importance till the time of Philip, who made it his residence and the capital of the Macedonian monarchy, and adorned it with many public buildings. It is frequently mentioned by subsequent writers on account of its being the birth-place of Alexander the Great. It was the capital of one of the four districts into which the Romans divided Macedonia (vid. p. 464, a), and was subsequently made a Roman colony under the name of Col. Jul. Aug. Pella. — 2. (Now El-Bujeh?), the southernmost of the ten cities which composed the Decapolis in Peræa, that is, in Palestine east of the Jordan, stood five Roman miles southeast of Scythopolis, and was also called Βοῦτις. It was taken by Antiochus the Great in the wars between Syria and Egypt, and was held by a Macedonian colony till it was destroyed by Alexander Jannæus on account of the refusal of its inhabitants to embrace the Jewish religion It was restored and given back to its old inhabitants by Pompey. It was the place of refuge of the Christians who fled from Jerusalem before its capture by the Romans. The exact site of Pella is very uncertain.—3. A city of Syria on the Orontes, formerly called Pharnace, was named Pella by the Macedonians, and afterward APAMEA (No. 1).—4. In Phrygia. Vid. PELTÆ.

PELLÆUS PAGUS was the name given by Alexander, after Pella in Macedonia, to the district of Susiana about the mouths of the Tigris; in which he built the city of Alexandrea, afterward called Charax.

PELLĀNA. Vid. PELLENE, No. 2.

PELLĒNĒ (Πελλήνη, Dor. Πελλάνα: Πελληνεύς). 1. A city in Achaia, bordering on Sicyonia, the most easterly of the twelve Achæan cities, was situated on a hill sixty stadia from the city, and was strongly fortified. Its port-town was Aristonautæ. The ancients derived its name from the giant Pallas, or from the Argive Pellen, the son of Phorbas. It is mentioned in Homer; and the inhabitants of Scione, in the peninsula of Pallene, in Macedonia, professed to be descended from the Pellenæans in Achaia, who were shipwrecked on the Macedonian coast on their return from Troy. In the Peloponnesian war Pellene sided with Sparta. In the later wars of Greece between the Achæan and Ætolian leagues, the town was several times taken by the contending parties. Between Pellene and Ægæ there was a smaller town of the same name, where the celebrated Pellenian cloaks (Πελληνιακαὶ χλαῖναι) were made, which were given as prizes to the victors in the games at this place.—2. Usually called PELLANA, a town in Laconia, on the Eurotas, about fifty stadia northwest of Sparta, belonging to the Spartan Tripolis.

PĒLŌDĒS (Πηλώδης λιμήν, in App. Παλόεις: now Armyro), a port-town belonging to Buthrotum in Epirus, and on a bay which probably bore the same name.

PELOPĒA or PELOPĪA (Πελόπεια), daughter of Thyestes, dwelt at Sicyon, where her father offered her violence, without knowing that she was his daughter. While pregnant by her father, she married her uncle Atreus. Shortly afterward she bore a son Ægisthus, who eventually murdered Atreus. For details, vid. ÆGISTHUS.

[PELOPIDÆ (Πελοπίδαι), descendants of Pelops, e. g., Theseus (Plut.), Tantalus, Atreus (Pelopeius, Ovid), Thyestes, Agamemnon (Propert.), Hermione and Iphigenia (Pelopeïa virgo, Ovid), Orestes (Lucan.).]

PELŎPĬDAS (Πελοπίδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Hippoclus, was descended from a noble family, and inherited a large estate, of which he made a liberal use. He lived always in the closest friendship with Epaminondas, to whose simple frugality, as he could not persuade him to share his riches, he is said to have assimilated his own mode of life. He took a leading part in expelling the Spartans from Thebes, B.C. 379; and from this time until his death there was not a year in which he was not intrusted with some important command. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedæmonians, and joined Epaminondas in urging the expediency of immediate action. In 369 he was also one of the generals in the f invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans. I specting his accusation on his return from t campaign, vid. p. 281, b. In 368 Pelopidas sent again into Thessaly, on two separate oc sions, in consequence of complaints against A exander of Pheræ. On his first expedition A exander of Pheræ sought safety in flight; Pelopidas advanced into Macedonia to arbitr between Alexander II. and Ptolemy of Alo Among the hostages whom he took with h from Macedonia was the famous Philip, the ther of Alexander the Great. On his seco visit to Thessaly, Pelopidas went simply as ambassador, not expecting any opposition, a unprovided with a military force. He was se ed by Alexander of Pheræ, and was kept in c finement at Pheræ till his liberation in 367 b Theban force under Epaminondas. In the sa year in which he was released he was sent ambassador to Susa, to counteract the Lacedæ monian and Athenian negotiations at the Pe sian court. In 364 the Thessalian towns ag applied to Thebes for protection against Al ander, and Pelopidas was appointed to aid the His forces, however, were dismayed by a eclipse of the sun (June 13), and, therefo leaving them behind, he took with him in Thessaly only three hundred horse. On his arrival at Pharsalus he collected a force whic he deemed sufficient, and marched against Al exander, treating lightly the great disparity of numbers, and remarking that it was better as it was, since there would be more for him to conquer. At Cynoscephalæ a battle ensued, in which Pelopidas drove the enemy from their ground, but he himself was slain as, burning with resentment, he pressed rashly forward to attack Alexander in person. The Thebans and Thessalians made great lamentations for his death, and the latter, having earnestly requested leave to bury him, celebrated his funeral with extraordinary splendor.

[PELOPIS INSULÆ, nine islands on the coast of Argolis, eastward of Methana, between Ægina and Calauria.]

PELOPONNĒSUS (ἡ Πελοπόννησος: now Morea), the southern part of Greece or the peninsula, which was connected with Hellas proper by the Isthmus of Corinth. It is said to have derived its name Peloponnesus, or the "Island of Pelops," from the mythical Pelops. Vid. PELOPS. This name does not occur in Homer. In his time the peninsula was sometimes called Apia, from Apis, son of Phoroneus, king of Argos, and sometimes Argos; which names were given to it on account of Argos being the chief power in Peloponnesus at that period. Peloponnesus was bounded on the north by the Corinthian Gulf, on the west by the Ionian or Sicilian Sea, on the south by the Libyan, and on the west by the Cretan and Myrtoan seas. On the east and south there are three great gulfs, the Argolic, Laconian, and Messenian. The ancients compared the shape of the country to the leaf of a plane-tree; and its modern name, the Morea (ὁ Μωρέος), which first occurs in the twelfth century of the Christian era, was given it on account of its resemblance to a mulberry-leaf. Peloponnesus was divided into various provinces, all of which were bounded on one side by the sea, with the exception of ARCADIA, which was in the centre of the country. These provinces, besides ARCADIA, were ACHAIA in the north, ELIS in the west, MESSENIA in the west and south, LACONIA in the south and east, [ARGOLIS in the east,] and CORINTHIA in the east and north. An account of the geography of the peninsula is given under these names. The area of Peloponnesus is computed to be seven thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine English miles, and it probably contained a population of upward of a million in the flourishing period of Greek history. Peloponnesus was originally inhabited by Pelasgians. Subsequently the Achæans, who belonged to the Æolic race, settled in the eastern and southern parts of the peninsula, in Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia; and the Ionians in the northern part, in Achaia; while the remains of the original inhabitants of the country, the Pelasgians, collected chiefly in the central part, in Arcadia. Eighty years after the Trojan war, according to mythical chronology, the Dorians, under the conduct of the Heraclidæ, invaded and conquered Peloponnesus, and established Doric states in Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia, from whence they extended their power over Corinth, Sicyon, and Megara. Part of the Achæan population remained in these provinces as tributary subjects to the Dorians, under the name of Periœci, while others of the Achæans passed over to the north of Peloponnesus, expelled the Ionians, and settled in this part of the country, which was called after them Achaia. The Ætolians, who had invaded Peloponnesus along with the Dorians, settled in Elis and became intermingled with the original inhabitants. The peninsula remained under Doric influence during the most important period of Greek history, and opposed to the great Ionic city of Athens. After the conquest of Messenia by the Spartans, it was under the supremacy of Sparta till the overthrow of the power of the latter by the Thebans at the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371.

PELOPS (Πέλοψ), grandson of Jupiter (Zeus), son of Tantalus and Dione, the daughter of Atlas. Some writers call his mother Euryanassa or Clytia. He was married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Atreus, Thyestes, Dias, Cynosurus, Corinthius, Hippalmus (Hippalcmus or Hippalcimus), Hippasus, Cleon, Argius, Alcathous, Ælius, Pittheus, Trœzen, Nicippe, and Lysidice. By Axioche or the nymph Danais he is said to have been the father of Chrysippus. Pelops was king of Pisa in Elis, and from him the great southern peninsula of Greece was believed to have derived its name Peloponnesus. According to a tradition, which became very general in later times, Pelops was a Phrygian, who was expelled by Ilus from Phrygia (hence called by Ovid, Met., viii., 622, Pelopeia arva), and thereupon migrated with his great wealth to Pisa. Others describe him as a Paphlagonian, and call the Paphlagonians themselves Πελοπήϊοι. Others, again, represent him as a native of Greece; and there can be little doubt that in the earliest traditions Pelops was described as a native of Greece and not as a foreign immigrant; and in them he is called the tamer of horses and the favorite of Neptune (Poseidon). The legends about Pelops consist mainly of the story of his being cut to pieces and boiled, of his contest with Œnomaus and Hippodamia, and of his relation to his sons; to which we may add the honors paid to his remains. 1. Pelops cut to pieces and boiled (Κρεουργία Πέλοπος). Tantalus, the favorite of the gods, once invited them to a repast, and on that occasion killed his own son, and having boiled him, set the flesh before them that they might eat it. But the immortal gods, knowing what it was, did not touch it; Ceres (Demeter) alone, being absorbed by grief for her lost daughter, consumed the shoulder of Pelops. Hereupon the gods ordered Mercury (Hermes) to put the limbs of Pelops into a caldron, and thereby restore him to life. When the process was over, Clotho took him out of the caldron, and as the shoulder consumed by Ceres (Demeter) was wanting, the goddess supplied its place by one made of ivory; his descendants (the Pelopidæ), as a mark of their origin, were believed to have one shoulder as white as ivory.—2. Contest with Œnomaus and Hippodamia. As an oracle had declared to Œnomaus that he should be killed by his son-in-law, he refused giving his fair daughter Hippodamia in marriage to any one. But since many suitors appeared, Œnomaus declared that he would bestow her hand upon the man who should conquer him in the chariot-race, but that he should kill all who were defeated by him. Among other suitors Pelops also presented himself, but when he saw the heads of his conquered predecessors stuck up above the door of Œnomaus, he was seized with fear, and endeavored to gain the favor of Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, promising him half the kingdom if he would assist him in conquering his master. Myrtilus agreed, and left out the linch-pins of the chariot of Œnomaus. In the race the chariot of Œnomaus broke down, and he was thrown out and killed. Thus Hippodamia became the wife of Pelops. But as Pelops had now gained his object, he was unwilling to keep faith with Myrtilus; and accordingly, as they were driving along a cliff, he threw Myrtilus into the sea. As Myrtilus sank, he cursed Pelops and his whole race. Pelops returned with Hippodamia to Pisa in Elis, and soon also made himself master of Olympia, where he restored the Olympian games with greater splendor than they had ever been celebrated before.—3. The sons of Pelops. Chrysippus was the favorite of his father, and was, in consequence, envied by his brothers. The two eldest among them, Atreus and Thyestes, with the connivance of Hippodamia, accordingly murdered Chrysippus, and threw his body into a well. Pelops, who suspected his sons of the murder, expelled them from the country. Hippodamia, dreading the anger of her husband, fled to Midea in Argolis, from whence her remains were afterward conveyed by Pelops to Olympia. Pelops, after his death, was honored at Olympia above all other heroes. His tomb, with an iron sarcophagus, existed on the banks of the Alpheus, not far from the temple of Diana (Artemis), near Pisa. The spot on which his sanctuary (Πελόπιον) stood in the Altis was said to have been dedicated by Hercules, who also offered to him the first sacrifices. The magistrates of the Eleans likewise offered to him there an an nual sacrifice, consisting of a black ram, with special ceremonies. The name of Pelops was so celebrated that it was constantly used by the poets in connection with his descendants and the cities they inhabited. Hence we find Atreus, the son of Pelops, called Pelopeius Atreus, and Agamemnon, the grandson or great-grandson of Atreus, called Pelopeius Agamemnon. In the same way, Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, and Hermione, the wife of Menelaus, are each called by Ovid Pelopeia virgo. Virgil (Æn., ii., 193) uses the phrase Pelopēa mœnia to signify the cities in Peloponnesus which Pelops and his descendants ruled over; and, in like manner, Mycenæ is called by Ovid Pelopeïades Mycenæ.

Pelōris, Pelōrĭas, or Pelōrus (Πελωρίς, Πελωριάς, Πέλωρος: now Cape Faro), the northeastern point of Sicily, was northeast of Messana, on the Fretum Siculum, and one of the three promontories which formed the triangular figure of the island. According to the usual story, it derived its name from Pelorus, the pilot of Hannibal's ship, who was buried here after being killed by Hannibal in a fit of anger; but the name was more ancient than Hannibal's time, being mentioned by Thucydides. On the promontory there was a temple of Neptune (Poseidon), and a tower, probably a light-house, from which the modern name of the Cape (Faro) appears to have come.

Pelōrus (Πέλωρος: now probably Lori or Luri), a river of Iberia in Asia, appears to have been a southern tributary of the Cyrus (now Kour).

Pelso or Peiso (now Plattensee), a great lake in Pannonia, the waters of which were conducted into the Danube by the Emperor Galerius, who thus gained a great quantity of fertile land for his newly-formed province of Valeria.

Peltæ (Πέλται: Πελτηνός), an ancient and flourishing city of Asia Minor, in the north of Phrygia, ten parasangs from Celænæ (Xenoph.), and no doubt the same place as the Pella of the Roman writers, twenty-six Roman miles north or northeast of Apamea Cibotus, to the conventus of which it belonged. The surrounding district is called by Strabo τὸ Πελτηνὸν πεδίον. Its site is uncertain. Some identify it with the ruins eight miles south of Sandakli; others, with those near Ishekli.

Peltuīnum (Peltuīnas -ātis: now Monte Bello), a town of the Vestin in Central Italy.

Pēlūsĭum (Πηλούσιον: Egypt. Peremoun or Peromi; in the Old Testament, Sin: all these names are derived from nouns meaning mud: Πηλουσιώτης; Pelusiōta: ruins at Tineh), also called Abaris in early times, a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, stood on the eastern side of the easternmost mouth of the Nile, which was called after it the Pelusiac mouth, twenty stadia (two geographical miles) from the sea, in the midst of morasses, from which it obtained its name. As the key of Egypt on the northeast, and the frontier city toward Syria and Arabia, it was strongly fortified, and was the scene of many battles and sieges in the wars of Egypt with Assyria, Persia, Syria, and Rome, from the defeat of Sennacherib near it by Sethon down to its capture by Octavianus after the battle of Actium. In later times it was the capital of the district of Augustamnica. It was the place of the geographer Claudius Ptolemæ Penātes, the household gods of the Ro both those of a private family and of the as the great family of citizens. Hence we to distinguish between private and public tes. The name is connected with penus, the images of those gods were kept in the tralia, or the central part of the house. Lares were included among the Penates; names, in fact, are often used synonyma The Lares, however, though included Penates, were not the only Penates; for family had usually no more than one Lar, as the Penates are always spoken of in the ral. Since Jupiter and Juno were regarde the protectors of happiness and peace in family, these divinities were worshipped a nates. Vesta was also reckoned among the nates; for each hearth, being the symbol mestic union, had its Vesta. All other Pen both public and private, seem to have con of certain sacred relics connected with nite divinities, and hence Varro says that number and names of the Penates were inite. Most ancient writers believe that Penates of the state were brought by from Troy into Italy, and were preserved Lavinium, afterward at Alba Longa, and at Rome. At Rome they had a chapel the centre of the city, in a place called As the public Lares were worshipped central part of the city and at the public hear so the private Penates had their place at hearth of every house, and the table also sacred to them. On the hearth a perpetual was kept up in their honor, and the table ways contained the salt-cellar and the first of fruit for these divinities. Every meal th was taken in the house thus resembled a sac fice offered to the Penates, beginning with purification and ending with a libation, wh was poured either on the table or upon hearth. After every absence from the heart the Penates were saluted like the living inhab itants of the house; and whoever went abroa prayed to the Penates and Lares for a happy r turn, and when he came back to his house, hung up his armor, staff, and the like, by side of their images.

Penēis, that is, Daphne, daughter of the riv er-god Peneus.

Penĕlĕōs (Πηνέλεως), son of Hippalcmus an Asterope, and one of the Argonauts. He wa the father of Opheltes, and is also mention among the suitors of Helen. He was one of the leaders of the Bœotians in the war against Troy, where he slew Ilioneus and Lycon, and was wounded by Polydamas. He is said to have been slain by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus Penĕlŏpē (Πηνελόπη, Πενελόπη, Πηνελόπεια daughter of Icarius and Peribœa of Sparta, mar ried Ulysses, king of Ithaca. (Respecting her marriage, vid. Icarius, No. 2.) By Ulysses she had an only child, Telemachus, who was an in fant when her husband sailed against Troy During the long absence of Ulysses she was be leaguered by numerous and importunate suitors, whom she deceived by declaring that she must finish a large robe which she was making for Laërtes, her aged father-in-law, before she could make up her mind. During the daytime she accordingly worked at the robe, and in the night she undid the work of the day. By this means she succeeded in putting off the suitors. But at length her stratagem was betrayed by her servants; and when, in consequence, the faithful Penelope was pressed more and more by the impatient suitors, Ulysses at length arrived in Ithaca, after an absence of twenty years. Having recognized her husband by several signs, she heartily welcomed him, and the days of her grief and sorrow were at an end. Vid. ULYSSES. While Homer describes Penelope as a most chaste and faithful wife, some later writers charge her with the very opposite vice, and relate that by Mercury (Hermes) or by all the suitors together she became the mother of Pan. They add that Ulysses, on his return, repudiated her, whereupon she went to Sparta, and thence to Mantinea, where her tomb was shown in after times. According to another tradition, she married Telegonus, after he had killed his father Ulysses.

[PENESTÆ (Πενέσται), according to Stephanus of Byzantium, a Thessalian tribe, but according to Livy, a warlike race of Grecian Illyria, in the district Penestia or Penestiana terra, on the borders of Thessaly and Macedonia.]

PENĒUS (Πηνειός). 1. (Now Salambria or Salamria), the chief river of Thessaly, and one of the most important in all Greece, rises near Alalcomenæ in Mount Lacmon, a branch of Mount Pindus, flows first southeast and then northeast, and after receiving many affluents, of which the most important were the Enipeus, the Lethæus, and the Titaresius, forces its way through the Vale of Tempe between Mounts Ossa and Olympus into the sea. Vid. TEMPE. As a god, Peneus was called a son of Oceanus and Tethys. By the Naiad Creusa he became the father of Hypseus, Stilbe, and Daphne. Cyrene also is called by some his wife, and by others his daughter, and hence Peneus is described as the progenitor of Aristæus.—2. (Now Gastuni), a river in Elis, which rises on the frontiers of Arcadia, flows by the town of Elis, and falls into the sea between the promontories Chelonatas and Ichthys.

PĔNĬUS, a little river of Pontus, falling into the Euxine. (Ovid, Ex Ponto, iv., 10.)

PENNĪNÆ ALPES. Vid. ALPES.

[PENNUS, JUNIUS M. 1. Prætor B.C. 172, and obtained Nearer Spain for his province. He was consul B.C. 167, with Q. Ælius Pætus, and obtained Pisæ as his province.—2. M. JUNIUS, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 126, in which year he brought forward a law for expelling all strangers or foreigners (peregrini) from Rome. This law was opposed by C. Gracchus, but was carried. Pennus was afterward elected to the ædileship, but died before obtaining any higher honor in the state.]

PENTĂPŎLIS (Πεντάπολις), the name for any association of five cities, was applied specifically to, 1. The five chief cities of Cyrenaica in Northern Africa, Cyrene, Berenice, Arsinoë, Ptolemaïs, and Apollonia, from which, under the Ptolemies, Cyrenaica received the name of Pentapolis, or Pentapolis Libyæ, or, in the Roman writers, Pentapolitana Regio. When the name occurs alone, this is its meaning; the other applications of it are but rare.—2. The five cities of the Philistines in the southwest of Palestine, namely, Gaza, Ashdod (Azotus), Askalon, Gath, and Ekron.—3. In the apocryphal Book of the Wisdom of Solomon (x., 6), the name is applied to the five "cities of the plain" of the southern Jordan, Sodom, Gomorrha, Adama, Zeboïm, and Zoar, all of which (except the last, which was spared at the intercession of Lot) were overthrown by fire from heaven, and the valley in which they stood was buried beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

PENTELĒUM (Πεντέλειον), a fortified place in the north of Arcadia, near Pheneus.

PENTĔLĬCUS MONS (τὸ Πεντελικὸν ὄρος: now Penteli), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble, which derived its name from the demus of Pentĕle (Πεντέλη), lying on its southern slope. It is a branch of Mount Parnes, from which it runs in a southeasterly direction between Athens and Marathon to the coast. It is probably the same as the mountain called Brilessus (Βριλησσός) by Thucydides and others.

PENTHESILĒA (Πενθεσίλεια), daughter of Mars (Ares) and Otrera, and queen of the Amazons. After the death of Hector she came to the assistance of the Trojans, but was slain by Achilles, who mourned over the dying queen on account of her beauty, youth, and valor. Thersites ridiculed the grief of Achilles, and was, in consequence, killed by the hero. Thereupon Diomedes, a relative of Thersites, threw the body of Penthesilea into the River Scamander; but, according to others, Achilles himself buried it on the banks of the Xanthus.

PENTHEUS (Πενθεύς), son of Echīon and Agāve, the daughter of Cadmus. He succeeded Cadmus as king of Thebes; and having resisted the introduction of the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) into his kingdom, he was driven mad by the god, his palace was hurled to the ground, and he himself was torn to pieces by his own mother and her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, who, in their Bacchic phrensy, believed him to be a wild beast. The place where Pentheus suffered death is said to have been Mount Cithæron or Mount Parnassus. It is related that Pentheus got upon a tree for the purpose of witnessing in secret the revelry of the Bacchic women, but on being discovered by them was torn to pieces. According to a Corinthian tradition, the women were afterward commanded by an oracle to discover that tree, and to worship it like the god Bacchus (Dionysus); and, accordingly, out of the tree two carved images of the god were made. The tragic fate of Pentheus forms the subject of the Bacchæ of Euripides.

[PENTHILIDÆ (Πενθιλίδαι), a noble family at Mytilene in Lesbos, who derived their origin from Penthilus, the son of Orestes, who was said to have led a colony to Lesbos.]

PENTHĪLUS (Πένθιλος), son of Orestes and Erigone, is said to have led a colony of Æolians to Thrace. He was the father of Echelatus and Damasias.

PENTRI, one of the most important of the tribes in Samnium, were conquered by the Romans along with the other Samnites, and were the only one of the Samnite tribes who remained faithful to the Romans when the rest of the nation revolted to Hannibal in the second Punic war. Their chief town was BOVIANUM.

PEOR, a mountain of Palestine, in the land of Moab, only mentioned in the Pentateuch. It was probably one of the summits of the mountains called Abarim, which ran north and south through Moabitis, along the eastern side of the valley of the southern Jordan and the Dead Sea.

PĔOS ARTĔMĪDOS (Πέος, probably corrupted from Σπέος, cave, Ἀρτεμίδος: ruins at Beni Hassan), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, nearly opposite to Hermopolis the Great, on the western bank. It is remarkable as the site of the most extensive rock-hewn catacombs in all Egypt, the walls of which are covered with sculptures and paintings of the greatest importance for elucidating Egyptian antiquities.

PEPARĒTHUS (Πεπάρηθος: Πεπαρήθιος: now Piperi), a small island in the Ægean Sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and east of Halonesus, with a town of the same name upon it, and two other small places. It produced a considerable quantity of wine. It is mentioned in connection with Halonesus in the war between Philip and the Athenians. Vid. HALONESUS.

[PEPHNOS (Πέφνος). 1. A city on the west coast of Laconia, twenty stadia from Thalamæ. In front of it lay, 2. A small island of the same name, where, according to tradition, the Dioscuri were born.]

PEPHRĒDO (Πεφρηδώ). Vid. GRÆÆ.

PEPŪZA (Πέπουζα: ruins near Besh-Shehr), a city in the west of Phrygia, of some note in ecclesiastical history.

PĔRÆA (ἡ Περαία, sc. γῆ or χώρα, the country on the opposite side), a general name for any district belonging to or closely connected with a country, from the main part of which it was separated by a sea or river, was used specifically for, 1. The part of Palestine east of the Jordan in general, but usually, in a more restricted sense, for a part of that region, namely, the district between the Rivers Hieromax on the north, and Arnon on the south. Respecting its political connections with the rest of the country, vid. PALÆSTINA. — 2. PERÆA RHODIORUM (ἡ περαία τῶν Ῥοδίων), also called the Rhodian Chersonese, a district in the south of Caria, opposite to the island of Rhodes, from Mount Phœnix on the west, to the frontier of Lycia on the east. This strip of coast, which was reckoned fifteen hundred stadia in length (by sea), and was regarded as one of the finest spots on the earth, was colonized by the Rhodians at an early period, and was always in close political connection with Rhodes even under the successive rulers of Caria; and, after the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190, it was assigned, with the whole of Carian Doris, to the independent republic of the Rhodians. Vid. RHODUS.—3. P. TENEDIŌRUM (περαία Τενεδίων), a strip of the western coast of Mysia, opposite to the island of Tenedos, between Cape Sigeum on the north, and Alexandrea Troas on the south.—4. A city on the western coast of Mysia, near Adramyttium, one of the colonies of the Mytilenæans, and not improbably preserving in its name that of a district once called Peræa Mytilenæorum; for the people of Mytilene are known to have had many settlements on this coast.

[PERCENNIUS, a common soldier, was the ringleader in the formidable mutiny of the Pa[nno]nian legions, which broke out at the beg[inning] of the reign of Tiberius, A.D 14. He was [killed] by order of Drusus.]

PERCŌTE (Περκώτη, formerly Περκώπη, acc[ord]ing to Strabo: now Borgas or Burgus, T[urk.] and Percate, Grk.), a very ancient city of My[sia] between Abydos and Lampsacus, near the [Hel]lespont, on a river called PERCATES, in a b[eau]tiful situation. It is mentioned by Homer

PERDICCAS (Περδίκκας). 1. I. The founde[r of] the Macedonian monarchy, according to Hero[do]tus, though later writers represent Caranu[s as] the first king of Macedonia, and make Perdi[ccas] only the fourth. Vid. CARANUS. Accordi[ng to] Herodotus, Perdiccas and his two brothers, G[auan]es and Aëropus, were Argives of the race [of] Temenus, who settled near Mount Bermius, f[rom] whence they subdued the rest of Macedo[nia]. (Herod., viii., 137, 138.) It is clear, howe[ver,] that the dominions of Perdiccas and his im[me]diate successors comprised but a very s[mall] part of the country subsequently known u[nder] that name. Perdiccas was succeeded by [his] son Argæus. — 2. II. King of Macedonia f[rom] about B.C. 454 to 413, was the son and succe[ss]or of Alexander I. Shortly before the co[m]mencement of the Peloponnesian war Perdicc[as] was at war with the Athenians, who sent a fo[rce] to support his brother Philip, and Derdas, [a] Macedonian chieftain, against the king, wh[ile] the latter espoused the cause of Potidæa, wh[ich] had shaken off the Athenian yoke, B.C. 432. [In] the following year peace was concluded b[e]tween Perdiccas and the Athenians, but it d[id] not last long, and he was during the great[er] part of his reign on hostile terms with the Ath[e]nians. In 429 his dominions were invaded [by] Sitalces, king of the powerful Thracian tribe o[f] the Odrysians, but the enemy was compelle[d] by want of provisions, to return home. It w[as] in great part at his instigation that Brasidas i[n] 424 set out on his celebrated expedition to Ma[c]edonia and Thrace. In the following year (423) however, a misunderstanding arose betwee[n] him and Brasidas; in consequence of which h[e] abandoned the Spartan alliance, and conclude[d] peace with Athens. Subsequently we find hi[m] at one time in alliance with the Spartans, an[d] at another time with the Athenians; and it i[s] evident that he joined one or other of the bel[]ligerent parties according to the dictates of hi[s] own interest at the moment.—3. III. King o[f] Macedonia B.C. 364–359, was the second so[n] of Amyntas II. by his wife Eurydice. On th[e] assassination of his brother Alexander II b[y] Ptolemy of Alorus, 367, the crown of Macedo[]nia devolved upon him by hereditary right, but Ptolemy virtually enjoyed the sovereign power as guardian of Perdiccas till 364, when the latter caused Ptolemy to be put to death, and took the government into his own hands. Of the reign of Perdiccas we have very little information. We learn only that he was at one time engaged in hostilities with Athens on account of Amphipolis, and that he was distinguished for his patronage of men of letters. He fell in battle against the Illyrians, 359.—4. Son of Or[on]tes, a Macedonian of the province of Orestis, was one of the most distinguished of the generals of Alexander the Great He accompanied Ale[x]

r throughout his campaigns in Asia; and ing on his death-bed is said to have taken oyal signet-ring from his finger and given Perdiccas. After the death of the king , Perdiccas had the chief authority intrust- him under the command of the new king idæus, who was a mere puppet in his hands, he still further strengthened his power by assassination of his rival Meleager. Vid. LAGER. The other generals of Alexander ded him with fear and suspicion; and at h his ambitious schemes induced Antipater, rus, and Ptolemy to unite in a league and re open war against Perdiccas. Thus as- l on all sides, Perdiccas determined to Eumenes in Asia Minor, to make head st their common enemies in that quarter, he himself marched into Egypt against my. He advanced without opposition as Pelusium, but found the banks of the Nile gly fortified and guarded by Ptolemy, and repulsed in repeated attempts to force the ge of the river; in the last of which, near phis, he lost great numbers of men. There- his troops, who had long been discontent- ith Perdiccas, rose in mutiny, and put him ath in his own tent.

RDIX (Πέρδιξ), the sister of Dædalus, and er of Talos, or, according to others, the r's son of Dædalus, figu es in the mytho- al period of Greek art, as the inventor of us implements, chiefly for working in wood. lix is sometimes confounded with Talos or s, and it is best to regard the various le- ls respecting Perdix, Talos, and Calos as rring to one and the same person, namely, rding to the mythographers, a nephew of lalus. The inventions ascribed to him are, saw, the idea of which is said to have been ested to him by the back-bone of a fish, or teeth of a serpent; the chisel; the com- es; the potter's wheel. His skill excited jealousy of Dædalus, who threw him head- from the temple of Minerva (Athena) on Acropolis, but the goddess caught him in his and changed him into the bird which was ed after him, perdix, the partridge.

PEREGRINUS PROTEUS, a cynic philosopher, n at Parium, on the Hellespont, flourished in reign of the Antonines. After a youth spent ebauchery and crimes, he visited Palestine, re he turned Christian, and by dint of hypoc- attained to some authority in the Church. next assumed the cynic garb, and returned is native town, where, to obliterate the mem- of his crimes, he divided his inheritance ng the populace. He again set out on his els, and after visiting many places, and ting every method to make himself conspic- s, he at length resolved on publicly burning self at the Olympic games; and carried his lution into effect in the two hundred and ty-sixth Olympiad, A.D. 165. Lucian, who w Peregrinus, and who was present at his nge self-immolation, has left us an account us life.

PERENNA, ANNA. Vid. ANNA.

PERENNIS, succeeded Paternus in A.D. 183, sole præfect of the prætorians, and, Com- lus being completely sunk in debauchery and h virtually ruled the empire. Having, how- ever, rendered himself obnoxious to the sol diery, he was put to death by them in 186 or 187. Dion Cassius represents Perennis as a man of a pure and upright life; but the other historians charge him with having encouraged the emperor in all his excesses, and urged him on in his career of profligacy.

PERGA (Πέργη: Περγαῖος: ruins at Murtana), an ancient and important city of Pamphylia, lay a little inland, northeast of Attalia, between the Rivers Catarrhactes and Cestrus, sixty stadia (six geographical miles) from the mouth of the former. It was a celebrated seat of the wor ship of Diana (Artemis). On an eminence near the city stood a very ancient and renowned temple of the goddess, at which a yearly festi- val was celebrated; and the coins of Perga bear images of the goddess and her temple. Under the later Roman empire, it was the capital of Pamphylia Secunda. It was the first place in Asia Minor visited by the Apostle Paul on his first missionary journey (Acts, xiii., 13; vid. also xiv., 25). Splendid ruins of the city are still visible about sixteen miles northeast of Adalia.

PERGĂMA and PERGĂMĪA. Vid. PERGAMON, No. 1.

PERGĂMON or -UM, PERGĂMOS or -US (τὸ Πέρ- γαμον, ἡ Πέργαμος: the former by far the most usual form in the classical writers, though the latter is more common in English, probably on account of its use in our version of the Bible, Rev., ii., 13; in Latin it seldom occurs in the nominative, but, when used, the form is Perga- mum: Περγαμηνός, Pergamēnus. The word is significant, connected with πύργος, a tower; it is used in the plural form, πέργαμα, as a com- mon noun by Æschylus, Prom., 956; Euripides, Phœn., 1098, 1176). 1. The citadel of Troy, and used poetically for Troy itself: the poets also use the forms PERGĂMA (τὰ Πέργαμα) and PER- GAMIA (ἡ Περγαμία, sc. πόλις): the king of Troy, Laomedon, is called Περγαμίδης, and the Ro- mans are spoken of by Silius Italicus as "san- guis Pergameus." — 2. (Ruins at Bergama or Pergamo), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Pergamus, and after ward of the Roman province of Asia, was situ- ated in the district of Southern Mysia called Teu- thrania, in one of the most beautiful and fertile valleys in the world. It stood on the northern bank of the River Caïcus, at a spot where that river receives the united waters of two small tributaries, the Selinus, which flowed through the city, and the Cetius, which washed its walls. The navigable river Caïcus connected it with the sea at the Elaïtic Gulf, from which its dis- tance was somewhat less than twenty miles. It was built at the foot, and on the lowest slopes, of two steep hills, on one of which the ruins of the acropolis are still visible, and in the plain below are the remains of the Asclepieum and other temples, of the stadium, the theatre, and the amphitheatre, and of other buildings. The origin of the city is lost in mythical traditions, which ascribed its foundation to a colony from Arcadia under the Heraclid Telephus, and its name to Pergamus, a son of Pyrrhus and An- dromache, who made himself king of Teuthra- nia by killing the king Arius in single combat

There is also a tradition that a colony of Epidaurians settled here under Æsculapius (Asclepius). At all events, it was already, in the time of Xenophon, a very ancient city, with a mixed population of Teuthranians and Greeks; but it was not a place of much importance until the time of the successors of Alexander. After the defeat of Antigonus at Ipsus in 301, the northwestern part of Asia Minor was united to the Thracian kingdom of LYSIMACHUS, who enlarged and beautified the city of Pergamus, and used it as a treasury on account of its strength as a fortress. The command of the fortress was intrusted to PHILETÆRUS, who, toward the end of the reign of Lysimachus, revolted to Seleucus, king of Syria, retaining, however, the fortress of Pergamus in his own hands; and, upon the death of Seleucus in 280, Philetærus established himself as an independent ruler. This is the date of the commencement of the kingdom of Pergamus, though the royal title was only assumed by the second successor of Philetærus, ATTALUS I., after his great victory over the Gauls. The successive kings of Pergamus were PHILETÆRUS, 280–263; EUMENES I., 263–241; ATTALUS I., 241–197; EUMENES II., 197–159; ATTALUS II. PHILADELPHUS, 159–138; ATTALUS III. PHILOMETOR, 138–133. For the outline of their history, vid. the articles. The kingdom reached its greatest extent after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans in B.C. 190, when the Romans bestowed upon Eumenes II. the whole of Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygias, Lycaonia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. It was under the same king that Pergamus reached the height of its splendor, and that the celebrated library was founded, which for a long time rivalled that of Alexandrea, and the formation of which occasioned the invention of parchment, charta Pergamena. This library was afterward united to that of Alexandrea, having been presented by Antony to Cleopatra. During its existence at Pergamus, it formed the centre of a great school of literature, which rivalled that of Alexandrea. On the death of Attalus III. in B.C. 133, the kingdom, by a bequest in his will, passed to the Romans, who took possession of it in 130 after a contest with the usurper Aristonicus, and erected it into the province of Asia, with the city of Pergamus for its capital, which continued in such prosperity that Pliny calls it "longe clarissimum Asiæ." The city was an early seat of Christianity, and is one of the Seven Churches of Asia, to whom the apocalyptic epistles are addressed. St. John describes it as the scene of a persecution of Christianity, and the seat of gross idolatry, which had even infected the Church. The expression "where Satan's seat is" is thought by some to refer to the worship of the serpent, as the symbol of Æsculapius (Asclepius), the patron god of the city. Under the Byzantine emperors, the capital of the province of Asia was transferred to Ephesus, and Pergamus lost much of its importance. Among the celebrated natives of the city were the rhetorician Apollodorus and the physician Galen.—3. A very ancient city of Crete, the foundation of which was ascribed to the Trojans who survived their city. The legislator Lycurgus was said to have died here, and his grave was shown. The site of the city is doubtful. Some place it at Per[...] others at Platania.

PERIANDER (Περίανδρος). 1. Son of Cypsel[us], whom he succeeded as tyrant of Corinth, B.[C.] 625, and reigned forty years, to B.C. 585. [His] rule was mild and beneficent at first, but af[ter]ward became oppressive. According to [the] common story, this change was owing to t[he] advice of Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, who[m] Periander had consulted on the best mode [of] maintaining his power, and who is said to ha[ve] taken the messenger through a corn-field, c[ut]ting off as he went the tallest ears, and then [to] have dismissed him without committing himse[lf] to a verbal answer. The action, however, w[as] rightly interpreted by Periander, who proceed[ed] to rid himself of the most powerful nobles [in] the state. He made his power respected abro[ad] as well as at home; and besides his conque[st] of Epidaurus, mentioned below, he kept Corcy[ra] in subjection. He was, like many of the oth[er] Greek tyrants, a patron of literature and philoso[-] phy, and Arion and Anacharsis were in favor a[t] his court. He was very commonly reckone[d] among the Seven Sages, though by some h[e] was excluded from their number, and Myson of Chenæ in Laconia was substituted in his room. The private life of Periander was marked by misfortune and cruelty. He married Melissa, daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus. She bore him two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and was passionately beloved by him; but he is said to have killed her by a blow during her pregnancy, having been roused to a fit of anger by a false accusation brought against her. His wife's death imbittered the remainder of his days, partly through the remorse which he felt for the deed, partly through the alienation of his younger son Lycophron, inexorably exasperated by his mother's fate. The young man's anger had been chiefly excited by Procles, and Periander, in revenge, attacked Epidaurus, and, having reduced it, took his father-in-law prisoner. Periander sent Lycophron to Corcyra; but when he was himself advanced in years, he summoned Lycophron back to Corinth to succeed to the tyranny, seeing that Cypselus, his elder son, was unfit to hold it, from deficiency of understanding. Lycophron refused to return to Corinth as long as his father was there; thereupon Periander offered to withdraw to Corcyra if Lycophron would come home and take the government. To this he assented; but the Corcyræans, not wishing to have Periander among them, put Lycophron to death. Periander shortly afterward died of despondency, at the age of eighty, and after a reign of forty years, according to Diogenes Laërtius. He was succeeded by a relative, Psammetichus, son of Gordias.—2. Tyrant of Ambracia, was contemporary with his more famous namesake of Corinth, to whom he was also related, being the son of Gorgus, who was son or brother to Cypselus. Periander was deposed by the people probably after the death of the Corinthian tyrant (585).

Peribœa (Περίβοια). 1. Wife of Icarius, and mother of Penelope. Vid. Icarius, No. 2.—2. Daughter of Alcathous, and wife of Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Ajax and Teucer. Some writers call her Eribœa.—3. Daughter of Hipponous, and wife of Œneus, by whom she became the mother of Tydeus. Vid. Œneus.—4. Wife of King Polybus of Corinth.—[5. Daughter of Acesamenus, mother by Axius of Pelagon.—6. Daughter of Eurymedon, mother of Nausithous by Neptune (Poseidon).]

Pericles (Περικλῆς). 1. The greatest of Athenian statesmen, was the son of Xanthippus and Agariste, both of whom belonged to the noblest families of Athens. The fortune of his parents procured for him a careful education, which his extraordinary abilities and diligence turned to the best account. He received instruction from Damon, Zeno of Elea, and Anaxagoras. With Anaxagoras he lived on terms of the most intimate friendship, till the philosopher was compelled to retire from Athens. From this great and original thinker Pericles was believed to have derived not only the cast of his mind, but the character of his eloquence, which, in the elevation of its sentiments, and the purity and loftiness of its style, was the fitting expression of the force and dignity of his character and the grandeur of his conceptions. Of the oratory of Pericles no specimens remain to us, but it is described by ancient writers as characterized by singular force and energy. He was described as thundering and lightening when he spoke, and as carrying the weapons of Jupiter (Zeus) upon his tongue. In B.C. 469, Pericles began to take part in public affairs, forty years before his death, and was soon regarded as the head of the more democratical part in the state, in opposition to Cimon. He gained the favor of the people by the laws which he got passed for their benefit. Thus it was enacted through his means that the citizens should receive from the public treasury the price of their admittance to the theatre, amounting to two oboli apiece; that those who served in the courts of the Heliæa should be paid for their attendance; and that those citizens who served as soldiers should likewise be paid. It was at his instigation that his friend Ephialtes proposed, in 461, the measure by which the Areopagus was deprived of those functions which rendered it formidable as an antagonist to the democratical party. This success was followed by the ostracism of Cimon, who was charged with Laconism, and Pericles was thus placed at the head of public affairs at Athens. Pericles was distinguished as a general as well as a statesman, and frequently commanded the Athenian armies in their wars with the neighboring states. In 454 he commanded the Athenians in their campaigns against the Sicyonians and Acarnanians; in 448 he led the army which assisted the Phocians in the Sacred war; and in 445 he rendered the most signal service to the state by recovering the island of Eubœa, which had revolted from Athens. Cimon had been previously recalled from exile, without any opposition from Pericles, but had died in 449. On his death the aristocratical party was headed by Thucydides, the son of Melesias, but on the ostracism of the latter in 444, the organized opposition of the aristocratical party was broken up, and Pericles was left without a rival. Throughout the remainder of his political course no one appeared to contest his supremacy; but the boundless influence which he possessed was never perverted by him to sinister or unworthy purposes. So far from being a mere selfish demagogue, he neither indulged nor courted the multitude. The next important event in which Pericles was engaged was the war against Samos, which had revolted from Athens, and which he subdued after an arduous campaign, 440. The poet Sophocles was one of the generals who fought with Pericles against Samos. For the next ten years, till the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians were not engaged in any considerable military operations. During this period Pericles devoted especial attention to the Athenian navy, as her supremacy rested on her maritime superiority, and he adopted various judicious means for consolidating and strengthening her empire over the islands of the Ægean. The funds derived from the tribute of the allies and from other sources were, to a large extent, devoted by him to the erection of those magnificent temples and public buildings which rendered Athens the wonder and admiration of Greece. Under his administration the Propylæa, and the Parthenon, and the Odeum were erected, as well as numerous other temples and public buildings. With the stimulus afforded by these works, architecture and sculpture reached their highest perfection, and some of the greatest artists of antiquity were employed in erecting or adorning the buildings. The chief direction and oversight of the public edifices was intrusted to Phidias. Vid. Phidias. These works calling into activity almost every branch of industry and commerce at Athens, diffused universal prosperity while they proceeded, and thus contributed in this, as well as in other ways, to maintain the popularity and influence of Pericles. But he still had many enemies, who were not slow to impute to him base and unworthy motives. From the comic poets Pericles had to sustain numerous attacks. They exaggerated his power, spoke of his party as Pisistratids, and called upon him to swear that he was not about to assume the tyranny. His high character and strict probity, however, rendered all these attacks harmless. But as his enemies were unable to ruin his reputation by these means, they attacked him through his friends. His friends Phidias and Anaxagoras, and his mistress Aspasia, were all accused before the people. Phidias was condemned and cast into prison (vid. Phidias); Anaxagoras was also sentenced to pay a fine and quit Athens (vid. Anaxagoras); and Aspasia was only acquitted through the entreaties and tears of Pericles. The Peloponnesian war has been falsely ascribed to the ambitious schemes of Pericles. It is true that he counselled the Athenians not to yield to the demands of the Lacedæmonians, and he pointed out the immense advantages which the Athenians possessed in carrying on the war; but he did this because he saw that war was inevitable; and that, as long as Athens retained the great power which she then possessed

Sparta would never rest contented. On the outbreak of the war in 431, a Peloponnesian army under Archidamus invaded Attica, and upon his advice the Athenians conveyed their movable property into the city, and their cattle and beasts of burden to Eubœa, and allowed the Peloponnesians to desolate Attica without opposition. The next year (430), when the Peloponnesians again invaded Attica, Pericles pursued the same policy as before. In this summer the plague made its appearance in Athens. The Athenians, being exposed to the devastation of the war and the plague at the same time, began to turn their thoughts to peace, and looked upon Pericles as the author of all their distresses, inasmuch as he had persuaded them to go to war. Pericles attempted to calm the public ferment; but such was the irritation against him that he was sentenced to pay a fine. The ill feeling of the people having found this vent, Pericles soon resumed his accustomed sway, and was again elected one of the generals for the ensuing year (429). Meantime Pericles had suffered in common with his fellow-citizens. The plague carried off most of his near connections. His son Xanthippus, a profligate and undutiful youth, his sister, and most of his intimate friends, died of it. Still he maintained unmoved his calm bearing and philosophic composure. At last his only surviving legitimate son, Paralus, a youth of greater promise than his brother, fell a victim. The firmness of Pericles then at last gave way: as he placed the funeral garland on the head of the lifeless youth, he burst into tears and sobbed aloud. He had one son remaining, his child by Aspasia, and he was allowed to enrol this son in his own tribe and give him his own name. In the autumn of 429, Pericles himself died of a lingering sickness. When at the point of death, as his friends were gathered round his bed, recalling his virtues and enumerating his triumphs, Pericles, overhearing their remarks, said that they had forgotten his greatest praise: that no Athenian through his means had been made to put on mourning. He survived the commencement of the war two years and six months. The name of the wife of Pericles is not mentioned. She had been the wife of Hipponicus, by whom she was the mother of Callias. She bore two sons to Pericles, Xanthippus and Paralus. She lived unhappily with Pericles, and a divorce took place by mutual consent, when Pericles connected himself with Aspasia. Of his strict probity he left the decisive proof in the fact that at his death he was found not to have added a single drachma to his hereditary property.—2. Son of the preceding, by Aspasia, was one of the generals at the battle of Arginusæ, and was put to death by the Athenians with the other generals, 406.

Periclȳmĕnus (Περικλύμενος.) 1. One of the Argonauts, was son of Neleus and Chloris, and brother of Nestor. Neptune (Poseidon) gave him the power of changing himself into different forms, and conferred upon him great strength, but he was nevertheless slain by Hercules at the capture of Pylos.—2. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Chloris, the daughter of Tiresias of Thebes. In the war of the Seven against Thebes he was believed to have killed Parthenopæus; and when he pursued Amphiaraus, the latter, by the command of Jupiter (Zeus), was swallowed up by the earth.

[Peridĭa, a Theban female, mother of Onytes, who was slain by Turnus in Italy.]

Periēres (Περιήρης). 1. Son of Æolus and Enarete, king of Messene, was the father of Aphareus and Leucippus by Gorgophone. In some traditions Perieres was called a son of Cynortas, and, besides the sons above mentioned, he is said to have been the father of Tyndareos and Icarius.—[2. Father of Borus, mentioned in the Iliad.—3. A Cumæan, founder of Zancle in Sicily.]

[Perigūne (Περιγούνη), daughter of Sinis, the famous robber, who was slain by Theseus; after her father's death Theseus married her, being charmed with her beauty, and had by her a son named Melanippus.]

Perilāus (Περίλαος). 1. Son of Icarius and Peribœa, and a brother of Penelope.—[2. A citizen of Megara, who espoused the party of Philip of Macedon, and, according to Demosthenes, betrayed his country to that monarch, but was afterward treated by him with neglect and contempt.]

Perillus (Πέριλλος), a statuary, was the maker of the bronze bull of the tyrant Phalaris, respecting which, vid. further under Phalaris. Like the makers of other instruments of death, Perillus is said to have become one of the victims of his own handiwork.

[Perimēdes (Περιμήδης). 1. A companion of Ulysses, mentioned in the Odyssey.—2. Father of Schedius, who was a commander of the Phocians in the Trojan war.]

[Perimus (Πέριμος), son of Meges, a Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus.]

[Perimela, daughter of Hippodamas, cast by her father into the sea, and changed by Neptune into an island.]

Perinthus (Πέρινθος: Περίνθιος: now Eski Eregli), an important town in Thrace, on the Propontis, was founded by the Samians about B.C. 559. It was situated twenty-two miles west of Selymbria, on a small peninsula, and was built on the slope of a hill with rows of houses rising above each other like seats in an amphitheatre. It is celebrated for the obstinate resistance which it offered to Philip of Macedon, at which time it was a more powerful place than Byzantium. Under the Romans it still continued to be a flourishing town, being the point at which most of the roads met leading to Byzantium. The commercial importance of the town is attested by its numerous coins, which are still extant. At a later time, but not earlier than the fourth century of the Christian era, we find it called Heraclea, which occurs sometimes alone without any addition, and sometimes in the form of Heraclea Thraciæ or Heraclea Perinthus.

Pĕrĭphas (Περίφας). 1. An Attic autochthon previous to the time of Cecrops, was a priest of Apollo, and, on account of his virtues, was made king of the country. In consequence of the honors paid to him, Jupiter (Zeus) wished to destroy him; but, at the request of Apollo, he was metamorphosed by Jupiter (Zeus) into an eagle, and his wife likewise into a bird.—[2. Son of the Ætolian Ochesius, fell by the hand of Mars (Ares) in the Trojan war.—3. Son of Epytus, and a herald of Æneas.—4. A Greek, who was engaged in the Trojan war, and took part in the destruction of the city.]

PERIPHĒTES (Περιφήτης). 1. Son of Vulcan (Hephæstus) and Anticlēa, surnamed Corynetes, that is, Club-bearer, was a robber at Epidaurus, who slew travellers with an iron club. Theseus at last killed him, and took his club for his own use. — [2. Son of Copreus of Mycenæ, a Greek warrior at Troy, slain by Hector.—3. A Trojan warrior, slain by Teucer.]

[PERISADII (Περισάδιες), an Illyrian people in the neighborhood of the silver mines of Damastion, also called Σεσαρήσιοι.]

PERNE (Πέρνη), a little island off the coast of Ionia, opposite to the territory of Miletus, to which an earthquake united it.

PĒRO (Πηρώ), daughter of Neleus and Chloris, was married to Bias, and celebrated for her beauty. [Vid. MELAMPUS.]

PERPERĒNA (Περπερήνα, and other forms), a small town of Mysia, south of Adramyttium, in the neighborhood of which there were copper mines and celebrated vineyards. It was said to be the place at which Thucydides died.

PERPERNA or PERPENNA (the former is the preferable form). 1. M., prætor B.C. 135, when he carried on war against the slaves in Sicily, and consul 130, when he defeated Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died near Pergamum on his return to Rome in 129.—2. M., son of the last, consul 92, and censor 86. He is mentioned by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of longevity. He attained the age of ninety-eight years, and died in 49, the year in which the civil war broke out between Cæsar and Pompey. He took no prominent part in the agitated times in which he lived.—3. M. PERPERNA VENTO, son of the last, joined the Marian party in the civil war, and was raised to the prætorship. After the conquest of Italy by Sulla in 82, Perperna fled to Sicily, which he quitted, however, upon the arrival of Pompey shortly afterward. On the death of Sulla in 78, Perperna joined the consul M. Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the new aristocratical constitution, and retired with him to Sardinia on the failure of this attempt. Lepidus died in Sardinia in the following year, 77, and Perperna, with the remains of his army, crossed over to Spain and joined Sertorius. Perperna was jealous of the ascendency of Sertorius, and, after serving under him some years, he and his friends assassinated Sertorius at a banquet in 72. His death soon brought the war to a close. Perperna was defeated by Pompey, was taken prisoner, and was put to death.

PERRHÆBI (Περραιβοί or Περαιβοί), a powerful and warlike Pelasgic people, who, according to Strabo, migrated from Eubœa to the main land, and settled in the districts of Hestiæotis and Pelasgiotis in Thessaly. Hence the northern part of this country is frequently called Perrhæbia (Περραιβία, Περαιβία), though it never formed one of the regular Thessalian provinces. Homer places the Perrhæbi in the neighborhood of the Thessalian Dodona and the River Titaresius; and at a later time the name of Perrhæbia was applied to the district bounded by Macedonia and the Cambunian Mountains on the north, by Pindus on the west, by the Peneus on the south and southeast, and by the Peneus and Ossa on the east. The Perrhæbi were members of the Amphictyonic league. At an early period they were subdued by the Lapithæ; at the time of the Peloponnesian war they were subject to the Thessalians, and subsequently to Philip of Macedon; but at the time of the Roman wars in Greece they appear independent of Macedonia.

PERSABŌRA or PERISABŌRA (Περσαβώρα: now Anbar), a strongly-fortified city of Babylonia, on the western side of the Euphrates, at the point where the canal called Maarsares left the river.

PERSÆ. Vid. PERSIS.

PERSÆUS (Περσαῖος), a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Cittium in Crete, and a disciple of Zeno. He lived for some years at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, with whom he seems to have been in high favor. Antigonus appointed him to the chief command in Corinth, where he was slain when the city was taken by Aratus, B.C. 243.

PERSĒ (Πέρση), daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Helios (the Sun), by whom she became the mother of Æētes and Circe. She is further called the mother of Pasiphaë and Perses. Homer and Apollonius Rhodius call her Perse while others call her Perseis or Persea.

PERSĒIS, a name given to Hecate, as the daughter of Perses by Asteria.

PERSĔPHŎNĒ (Περσεφόνη), called PROSERPĪNA by the Romans, the daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) and Demeter (Ceres). In Homer she is called Persephonia (Περσεφόνεια); the form Persephone first occurs in Hesiod. But, besides these forms of the name, we also find Persephassa, Phersephassa, Persephatta, Phersephatta, Pherrephassa, Pherephatta, and Phersephonia, for which various etymologies have been proposed. The Latin Proserpina is probably only a corruption of the Greek. In Attica she was worshipped under the name of Cora (Κόρη, Ion. Κούρη), that is, the Daughter, namely, of Demeter (Ceres); and the two were frequently called The Mother and the Daughter (ἡ Μήτηρ καὶ ἡ Κόρη). Being the infernal goddess of death, she is also called a daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) and Styx. In Arcadia she was worshipped under the name of Despœna, and was called a daughter of Poseidon (Neptune) Hippius and Demeter (Ceres), and said to have been brought up by the Titan Anytus. Homer describes her as the wife of Hades (Pluto), and the formidable, venerable, and majestic queen of the Shades, who rules over the souls of the dead, along with her husband. Hence she is called by later writers Juno Inferna, Averna, and Stygia; and the Erinnyes are said to have been her daughters by Pluto groves sacred to her are placed by Homer in the western extremity of the earth, on the frontiers of the lower world, which is itself called the house of Persephone (Proserpina). The story of her being carried off by Hades or Pluto against her will is not mentioned by Homer, who simply describes her as the wife and queen of Hades. Her abduction is first mentioned by Hesiod. The account of her abduction, which is the most celebrated part of her story, and the wanderings of her mother in search of her, and the worship of the two goddesses in Attica at the festival of the Eleusinia, are related under Demeter. In the mystical theories of the Orphics, Persephone (Proserpina) is described as the all-pervading goddess of nature, who both produces and destroys every thing; and she is therefore mentioned along, or identified with, other mystic divinities, such as Isis, Rhea, Ge (Terra), Hestia, Pandora, Artemis (Diana), Hecate. This mystic Persephone is further said to have become by Zeus (Jupiter) the mother of Dionysus (Bacchus), Iacchus, Zagreus or Sabazius. Persephone (Proserpina) frequently appears in works of art. She is represented either with the grave and severe character of an infernal Juno, or as a mystical divinity with a sceptre and a little box, in the act of being carried off by Pluto.

Persĕpŏlis (Περσέπολις, Περσαίπολις: in the Middle Ages, Istakhar: now Takhti-Jemshid, i. e., Throne of Jemshid, or Chil-Minar, i. e., Forty Pillars: large ruins), is the Greek name, probably translated from the Persian name, which is not recorded, of the great city which succeeded Pasargada as the capital of Persis and of the Persian empire. From the circumstance, however, of the conquest of the Babylonian empire taking place about the time when Persepolis attained this dignity, it appears to have been seldom used as the royal residence. Neither Herodotus, Xenophon, Ctesias, nor the sacred writers during the Persian period, mention it at all, though they often speak of Babylon, Susa, and Ecbatana as the capitals of the empire. It is only from the Greek writers after the Macedonian conquest that we learn its rank in the empire, which appears to have consisted chiefly in its being one of the two burial places of the kings (the other being Pasargada), and also a royal treasury; for Alexander found in the palace immense riches, which were said to have accumulated from the time of Cyrus. Its foundation is sometimes ascribed to Cyrus the Great, but more generally to his son Cambyses. It was greatly enlarged and adorned by Darius I. and Xerxes, and preserved its splendor till after the Macedonian conquest, when it was burned; Alexander, as the story goes, setting fire to the palace with his own hand at the end of a revel, by the instigation of the courtesan Thaïs, B.C. 331. It was not, however, so entirely destroyed as some historians represent. It appears frequently in subsequent history, both ancient and medieval. It is now deserted, but its ruins are considerable, though too dilapidated to give any good notion of Persian architecture, and they are rich in cuneiform inscriptions. It was situated in the heart of Persis, in the part called Hollow Persis (κοίλη Πέρσις), not far from the border of the Carmanian Desert, in a beautiful and healthy valley, watered by the River Araxes (now Bend-Emir) and its tributaries the Medus and the Cyrus. The city stood on the northern side of the Araxes, and had a citadel (the ruins of which are still seen) built on the levelled surface of a rock, and inclosed by triple walls rising one above the other to the heights of sixteen, forty-eight, and sixty cubits, within which was the palace, with its royal sepulchres and treasuries.

Perses (Πέρσης). 1. Son of the Titan Crius and Eurybia, and husband of Asteria, by whom he became the father of Hecate.—2. Son of Perseus and Andromeda, described by the Greeks as the founder of the Persian nation.—3. Son of Helios (the Sun) and Perse, and brother of Æëtes and Circe.

Perseus (Περσεύς), the famous Argive hero, was a son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Danaë, and a grandson of Acrisius. An oracle had told Acrisius that he was doomed to perish by the hands of Danaë's son, and he therefore shut up his daughter in an apartment made of brass or stone. But Jupiter (Zeus) having metamorphosed himself into a shower of gold, came down through the roof of the prison, and became by her the father of Perseus. From this circumstance Perseus is sometimes called aurigena. As soon as Acrisius discovered that Danaë had given birth to a son, he put both mother and son into a chest, and threw them into the sea; but Jupiter (Zeus) caused the chest to land in the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where Dictys, a fisherman, found them, and carried them to Polydectes, the king of the country. They were treated with kindness by Polydectes; but the latter having afterward fallen in love with Danaë, and finding it impossible to gratify his desires in consequence of the presence of Perseus, who had meantime grown up to manhood, he sent Perseus away to fetch the head of Medusa, one of the Gorgons. Guided by Mercury (Hermes) and Minerva (Athena), Perseus first went to the Grææ, the sisters of the Gorgons, took from them their one tooth and their one eye, and would not restore them until they showed him the way to the nymphs who possessed the winged sandals, the magic wallet, and the helmet of Pluto (Hades), which rendered the wearer invisible. Having received from the nymphs these invaluable presents, from Mercury (Hermes) a sickle, and from Minerva (Athena) a mirror, he mounted into the air, and arrived at the Gorgons, who dwelt near Tartessus on the coast of the ocean, whose heads were covered, like those of serpents, with scales, and who had large tusks like boars, brazen hands, and golden wings. He found them asleep, and cut off the head of Medusa, looking at her figure through the mirror, for a sight of the monster herself would have changed him into stone. Perseus put her head into the wallet which he carried on his back, and as he went away he was pursued by two other Gorgons; but his helmet, which rendered him invisible, enabled him to escape in safety. Perseus then proceeded to Æthiopia, where he saved and married Andromeda. Vid. Andromeda. Perseus is also said to have come to the Hyperboreans, by whom he was hospitably received, and to Atlas, whom he changed into the mountain of the same name by the Gorgon's head. On his return to Seriphos, he found his mother with Dictys in a temple, whither they had fled from the violence of Polydectes. Perseus then went to the palace of Polydectes, and metamorphosed him and all his guests, and, some say, the whole island, into stone. He then presented the kingdom to Dictys. He gave the winged sandals and the helmet to Mercury (Hermes), who restored them to the nymphs and to Pluto (Hades), and the head of Gorgon to Minerva (Athena), who placed it in the middle of her shield or breast-plate. Perseus then went to Argos, accompanied by Danaë and Andromeda. Acrisius, remembering the oracle, escaped to Larissa, in the country of the Pelasgians; but Perseus followed him, in order to persuade him to return. Some writers state that Perseus, on his return to Argos, found Prœtus, who had expelled his brother Acrisius, in possession of the kingdom; and that Perseus slew Prœtus, and was afterward killed by Megapenthes, the son of Prœtus. The more common tradition, however, relates, that when Teutamidas, king of Larissa, celebrated games in honor of his guest Acrisius, Perseus, who took part in them, accidentally hit the foot of Acrisius with the discus, and thus killed him. Acrisius was buried outside the city of Larissa, and Perseus, leaving the kingdom of Argos to Megapenthes, the son of Prœtus, received from him in exchange the government of Tiryns. According to others, Perseus remained in Argos, and successfully opposed the introduction of the Bacchic orgies. Perseus is said to have founded the towns of Midea and Mycenæ. By Andromeda he became the father of Perses, Alcæus, Sthenelus, Heleus, Mestor, Electryon, Gorgophone, and Autochthe. Perseus was worshipped as a hero in several places.

Perseus or Perses (Περσεύς), the last king of Macedonia, was the eldest son of Philip V., and reigned eleven years, from B.C. 178 to 168. Before his accession he persuaded his father to put to death his younger brother Demetrius, whom he suspected that the Roman senate intended to set up as a competitor for the throne on the death of Philip. Immediately after his accession he began to make preparations for war with the Romans, which he knew to be inevitable, though seven years elapsed before actual hostilities commenced. The war broke out in 171. The first year of the war was marked by no striking action. The consul P. Licinius Crassus first suffered a defeat in Thessaly in an engagement between the cavalry of the two armies, but subsequently gained a slight advantage over the king's troops. The second year of the war (170), in which the consul A. Hostilius Mancinus commanded, also passed over without any important battle, but was, on the whole, favorable to Perseus. The third year (169), in which the consul Q. Marcius Philippus commanded, again produced no important results. The length to which the war had been unexpectedly protracted, and the ill success of the Roman arms, had by this time excited a general feeling in favor of the Macedonian monarch; but the ill-timed avarice of Perseus, who refused to advance the sum of money which Eumenes, king of Pergamus, demanded, deprived him of this valuable ally; and the same unseasonable niggardliness likewise deprived him of the services of twenty thousand Gaulish mercenaries, who had actually advanced into Macedonia to his support, but retired on failing to obtain their stipulated pay. He was left to carry on the contest against Rome single-handed. The fourth year of the war (168) was also the last. The new consul, L. Æmilius Paulus, defeated Perseus with great loss in a decisive battle fought near Pydna, on June 22, 168. Perseus took refuge in the island of Samothrace, where he shortly afterward surrendered with his children to the prætor Cn. Octavius. When brought before Æmilius, he is said to have degraded himself by the most abject supplications; but he was treated with kindness by the Roman general. The following year he was carried to Italy, where he was compelled to adorn the splendid triumph of his conqueror (November 30, 167), and afterward cast into a dungeon, from whence, however, the intercession of Æmilius procured his release, and he was permitted to end his days in an honorable captivity at Alba. He survived his removal thither a few years, and died, according to some accounts, by voluntary starvation, while others, fortunately with less probability, represent him as falling a victim to the cruelty of his guards, who deprived him of sleep. Perseus had been twice married; the name of his first wife, whom he is said to have killed with his own hand in a fit of passion, is not recorded; his second, Laodice, was the daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator. He left two children: a son, Alexander, and a daughter, both apparently by his second marriage, as they were mere children when carried to Rome. Besides these, he had adopted his younger brother Philip, who appears to have been regarded by him as the heir to his throne, and became the partner of his captivity.

Persĭcus Sinus, Persĭcum Mare (ὁ Περσικὸς κόλπος, ἡ Περσικὴ θάλασσα, and other forms: the Persian Gulf), is the name given by the later geographers to the great gulf of the Mare Erythræum (now Indian Ocean), extending in a southeastern direction from the mouths of the Tigris, between the northeastern coast of Arabia and the opposite coast of Susiana, Persis, and Carmania, to the narrow strait formed by the long tongue of land which projects from the northern side of Oman in Arabia, by which strait it is connected with the more open gulf of the Indian Ocean called Paragon Sinus (now Gulf of Oman). The earlier Greek writers know nothing of it. Herodotus does not distinguish it from the Erythræan Sea. The voyage of Alexander's admiral Nearchus from the Indus to the Tigris made it better known, but still the ancient geographers in general give very inaccurate statements of its size and form.

Persĭdes (Περσείδης, Περσηϊάδης), a patronymic given to the descendants of Perses.

Persis, and very rarely Persia (ἡ Περσίς, and ἡ Περσική, sc. γῆ, the fem. adjectives, the masc. being Περσικός, from the ethnic noun Πέρσης, pl. Πέρσαι, fem. Περσίς, Latin Persa and Perses, pl. Persæ: in modern Persian and Arabic, Fars or Farsistan, i. e., stan, land of, Fars = Old Persian pars, horse or horseman: Eng. Persia), originally a small mountainous district of Western Asia, lying on the northeastern side of the Persian Gulf, and surrounded on the other sides by mountains and deserts. On the northwest and north it was separated from Susiana, Media, and Parthia by the little river Oroatis or Orosis, and by Mons Parachoathras; and on the east from Carmania by no definite boundaries in the Desert. The only level part of the country was the strip of sea-coast called Persis Paralia; the rest was intersected with branches of Mons Parachoathras, the valleys between which were watered by several rivers, the chief of which were the Araxes, Cyrus, and Medus: in this part of the country, which was called Koile Persis, stood the capital cities Pasargada and Persepolis. The country has a remarkable variety of climate and of products; the northern mountainous regions being comparatively cold, but with good pastures, especially for camels; the middle slopes having a temperate climate, and producing abundance of fruit and wine; and the southern strip of coast being intensely hot and sandy, with little vegetation except the palm-tree. The inhabitants were a collection of nomad tribes of the Indo-European stock, who called themselves by a name which is given in Greek as Artæi ('Αρταῖοι), and which, like the kindred Median name of Arii ('Αριοι), signifies noble or honorable, and is applied especially to the true worshippers of Ormuzd and followers of Zoroaster: it was, in fact, rather a title of honor than a proper name; the true collective name of the people seems to have been Pâraca. According to Herodotus, they were divided into three classes or castes: first, the nobles or warriors, containing the three tribes of the Pasargadæ, who were the most noble, and to whom the royal family of the Achæmenidæ belonged, the Marphii, and the Maspii; secondly, the agricultural and other settled tribes, namely, the Panthialæi, Derusiæi, and Germanii; thirdly, the tribes which remained nomadic, namely, the Daæ, Mardi, Dropici, and Sagartii, names common to other parts of Western and Central Asia. The Persians had a close ethnical affinity to the Medes, and followed the same customs and religion. Vid. Magi, Zoroaster. The simple and warlike habits which they cultivated in their native mountains preserved them from the corrupting influences which enervated their Median brethren; so that from being, as we find them at the beginning of their recorded history, the subject member of the Medo-Persian kingdom, they obtained the supremacy under Cyrus, the founder of the great Persian empire, B.C. 559. Of the Persian history before this date we know but little: the native poetical annalists of a later period are perfectly untrustworthy: the additional light lately obtained from the Persian inscriptions is, so far as it goes, confirmatory of the Greek writers, from whom, and from some small portions of Scripture, all our knowledge of ancient Persian history is derived. According to these accounts, the Persians were first subjected by the Medes under Phraortes, about B.C. 688, at the time of the formation of the great Median empire; but they continued to be governed by their own princes, the Achæmenidæ. An account of the revolution, by which the supremacy was transferred to the Persians, is given under Cyrus. At this time there existed in Western Asia two other grea doms, the Lydian, which comprised nearly whole of Asia Minor, west of the River H which separated it from the Medo-Persian ritories, and the Babylonian, which, besides Tigris and Euphrates valley, embraced S and Palestine. By the successive conque these kingdoms, the dominions of Cyrus extended on the west as far as the coasts of Euxine, the Ægean, and the Mediterranean, to the frontier of Egypt. Turning his arm the opposite direction, he subdued Bactria, effected some conquests beyond the Oxus, fell in battle with the Massagetæ. Vid. Cyr His son Cambyses added Egypt to the emp Vid. Cambyses. Upon his death the Mag priesthood made an effort to restore the supr acy to the Medes (vid. Magi, Smerdis), wh was defeated by the conspiracy of the se Persian chieftains, whose success conferred crown upon Darius, the son of Hystaspes. T king was at first occupied with crushing re ions in every part of the empire, and with two expeditions against Scythia and Cyrena of which the former entirely failed, and the ter was only partially successful. He conq ed Thrace, and on the east he added the val of the Indus to the kingdom; but in this qu ter the power of Persia seems never to ha been much more than nominal. The Persi empire had now reached its greatest exte from Thrace and Cyrenaïca on the west to Indus on the east, and from the Euxine, Caucasus (or, rather, a little below it), the Ca pian, and the Oxus and Jaxartes on the nort to Æthiopia, Arabia, and the Erythræan Sea the south, and it embraced, in Europe, Thra and some of the Greek cities north of the Eux ine; in Africa, Egypt and Cyrenaïca; in Asia on the west, Palestine, Phœnicia, Syria, the several districts of Asia Minor, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, Susiana, Atropatene, Great Media; on the north, Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, and Sogdiana; on the east, the Paropamisus, Arachosia, and India (i. e., part of the Punjab and Scinde); on the south, Persia, Carmania, and Gedrosia; and in the centre of the eastern part, Parthia, Aria, and Drangiana. The capital cities of the empire were Babylon, Susa, Ecbatana in Media, and, though these were seldom, if ever, used as residences, Pasargada and Persepolis in Persia. (Vid. the several articles.) Of this vast empire Darius undertook the organization, and divided it into twenty satrapies, of which a full account is given by Herodotus. Perusĭa (Perusīnus: now Perugia), an ancient city in the eastern part of Etruria, between the Lake Trasimenus and the Tiber, and one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan confederacy. It was situated on a hill, and was strongly fortified by nature and by art. In conjunction with the other cities of Etruria, it long resisted the power of the Romans, and at a later period it was made a Roman colony. It is memorable in the civil wars as the place in which L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, took refuge when he was no longer able to oppose Octavianus in the field, and where he was kept closely blockaded by Octavianus for some months, from the end of B.C. 41 to the spring of 40. Famine compelled it to surrender; but one of its citizens having set fire to his own house, the flames spread, and the whole city was burned to the ground. The war between L. Antonius and Octavianus is known from the long siege of this town by the name of the Bellum Perusinum. It was rebuilt and colonized anew by Augustus, from whom it received the surname of Augusta. In the later time of the empire it was the most important city in all Etruria, and long resisted the Goths. Part of the walls and some of the gates of Perusia still remain. The best preserved of the gates is now called Arco d'Augusto, from the inscription Avgvsta Pervsia over the arch; the whole structure is at least sixty or seventy feet high. Several interesting tombs, with valuable remains of Etruscan art, have been discovered in the neighborhood of the city.

Pessīnūs or Pĕsīnūs (Πεσσινοῦς, Πεσινοῦς: Πεσσινεύντιος, fem. In this temple was a wooden (Livy says stone) image of the goddess, which was removed to Rome, to satisfy an oracle in the Sibylline books. Under Constantine the city was made the capital of the province of Galatia Salutaris, but it gradually declined until the sixth century, after which it is no more mentioned.

Petălĭa or Petălĭæ (now Petalius), an uninhabited and rocky island off the southwestern coast of Eubœa, at the entrance into the Euripus.

Petēlĭa or Petĭlĭa (Πετηλία: Petelinus: now Strongoli), an ancient Greek town on the eastern coast of Bruttium, founded, according to tradition, by Philoctetes. (Virg., Æn., iii., 402.) It was situated north of Croton, to whose territory it originally belonged, but it was afterward conquered by the Lucanians. It remained faithful to the Romans, when the other cities of Bruttium revolted to Hannibal, and it was not till after a long and desperate resistance that it was taken by one of Hannibal's generals. It was repeopled by Hannibal with Bruttians; but the Romans subsequently collected the remains of the former population, and put them again in possession of the town.

PETOVĬO or PŒTOVIO (now Pettau), a town in Pannonia Superior, on the frontiers of Noricum, and on the Dravus (now Drave), was a Roman colony with the surname Ulpia, having been probably enlarged and made a colony by Trajan or Hadrian. It was one of the chief towns of Pannonia, had an imperial palace, and was the head-quarters of a Roman legion. The ancient town was probably on the right bank of the Drave, opposite the modern Pettau, as it is only on the former spot that inscriptions, coins, and other antiquities have been found.

A small place in the Corinthian territory, probably on the coast, near the borders of Argolis.—2. A place in Elis, not far from the city of Elis, of which some suppose it to have been the acropolis. The sepulchral monument of the philosopher Pyrrho was shown here.—3. (Now Casa della Pietra), also called PETRÆA and PETRĪNI (the people Πετρῖνοι and Petrini), an inland town of Sicily, on the road from Agrigentum to Panormus.—4. A town on the coast of Illyricum, with a bad harbor.—5. A city of Pieria in Macedonia.—6. A fortress of the Mædi in Thrace.—7. (Pl. neut.), a place in Dacia, on one of the three great roads which crossed the Danube.—8. In Pontus, a fortress built by Justinian, on a precipice on the sea-coast, between the rivers Bathys and Acinasis.—9. In Sogdiana, near the Oxus (Q. Curt., vii., 11).—10. By far the most celebrated of all the places of this name was PETRA or PETRÆ (now Wady-Musa), in Arabia Petræa, the capital first of the Idumæans, and afterward of the Nabathæans. It is pro[bably] the same place which is called Selah (wh[ich] means, like πέτρα, a rock) and Joktheel in [the] Old Testament. It lies in the midst of [the] mountains of Seir, at the foot of Mount H[or], just half way between the Dead Sea and t[he] head of the Ælanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, [in a] valley, or rather ravine, surrounded by alm[ost] inaccessible precipices, which is entered by [a] narrow gorge on the east, the rocky walls [of] which approach so closely as sometimes har[dly] to permit two horsemen to ride abreast. [On] the banks of the river which runs through t[he] ravine stood the city itself, a mile in length a[nd] half a mile in breadth, between the sides of t[he] valley, and some fine ruins of its public bui[ld]ings still remain. But this is not all: the ro[cks] which surround, not only the main valley, b[ut] all its lateral ravines, are completely hone[y]combed with excavations, some of which w[ere] tombs, some temples, and some private hous[es], at the entrances to which the surface of t[he] rock is sculptured into magnificent architectu[ral] façades and other figures, whose details a[re] often so well preserved as to appear but ju[st] chiselled, while the effect is wonderfully heig[ht]ened by the brilliant variegated colors of th[e] rock, where red, purple, yellow, sky-blue, blac[k] and white are seen in distinct layers. The[se] ruins are chiefly of the Roman period, when Petra had become an important city as a centr[e] of the caravan traffic of the Nabathæans. A[t] the time of Augustus, as Strabo learned from a friend who had resided there, it contained many Romans and other foreigners, and was governed by a native prince. It had maintained its independence against the Greek kings of Syria, and retained it under the Romans till the time of Trajan, by whom it was taken. It was the chief city of the whole country of Arabia Petræa, which probably derived its name from Petra; and under the later empire it was the capital of Palæstina Tertia.

PETREIUS, M., a man of great military experience, is first mentioned in B.C. 62, when he served as legatus to the proconsul C. Antonius, and commanded the army in the battle in which Catiline perished. He belonged to the aristocratical party; and in 55 he was sent into Spain along with L. Afranius as legatus of Pompey, to whom the provinces of the two Spains had been granted. Soon after the commencement of the civil war in 49, Cæsar defeated Afranius and Petreius in Spain, whereupon the latter joined Pompey in Greece. After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48), Petreius crossed over to Africa, and took an active part in the campaign in 46, which was brought to an end by the decisive defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus. Petreius then fled with Juba, and, despairing of safety, they fell by each other's hands.

PETRĪNUS (now Rocca di monti Ragoni), a mountain near Sinuessa, on the confines of Latium and Campania, on which good wine was grown.

PETRŎCŌRĬI, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, in the modern Perigord. Their country contained iron mines, and their chief town was Vesunna (now Perigueux).

[PETRONIA, daughter of a man of consular ank, was first the wife of Vitellius, and subsequently of Dolabella. By Vitellius she had a son Petronianus, whom his father put to death.]

[PETRONIUS, C. 1. Succeeded Ælius Gallus in the government of Egypt, and carried on war in B.C. 22 against the Æthiopians, who had invaded Egypt under their queen Candace. Petronius not only drove back the Æthiopians, but took many of their towns. He was a friend of Herod, and sent corn to Judæa when the latter country was visited by a famine.—2. TURPILIANUS, consul A.D. 61 with C. Cæsonius Pætus, succeeded Suetonius Paulinus as governor of Britain, but did nothing in that capacity, though he received the triumphal insignia in A.D. 65. He was put to death at the commencement of the reign of Galba.]
